The Albany (NY) Times Union (3/4, Lyons) reported, "While police continue to wage their war on street drugs, many law enforcement experts say more needs to be done about Internet pharmacies." The issue "took on heightened awareness last week with the raid of several Orlando, Fla., pharmacies that were selling drugs to customers in New York. … 'Perhaps most disturbing is that many of these Internet pharmaceutical sites ... are hiding behind a facade of legitimacy by pretending to ask customers health questions,' said Joseph T. Rannazzisi, a Drug Enforcement Administration deputy assistant administrator, in testimony in 2005 before a House subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations." The GAO "issued a report two years ago showing 'that although extensive time and resources are required to locate, charge and convict criminal anabolic steroid dealers, the penalties under the federal sentencing guidelines faced by persons convicted of such offenses do not reflect the seriousness of their crimes or provide adequate deterrence.'"

Newsday (3/5) reports, "Following last week's steroid bust that implicated professional and college athletes, and high school coaches, Sen. Charles Schumer…proposed additional federal regulation of a substance he said has become the 'drug of choice' for those seeking a quick boost in athletic performance. … Under Schumer's proposal, HGH regulation would be put on a par with current steroid laws, and federal law enforcement would be able to prosecute doctors who write prescriptions 'in bad faith' -- an act already illegal in New York state."

"Grow Houses" Seen As National Trend In Marijuana Trade. The Christian Science Monitor (3/5, Jonsson) reports, "Raids on 40 houses in 12 suburban Georgia counties over the past two weeks are one recent sign of what police say is a national trend in marijuana marketing: growing the illicit crop year-round indoors, using suburban homes as 'grow-houses.' … Georgia has lagged behind in indoor busts, with just one last year. The US government eradicates some 3.5 million marijuana plants each year, mostly outdoors, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration." Police "say the 'burbs give growers a degree of solace and safety, protected by suburbia's premium on privacy and even a 2001 US Supreme Court ruling that prevents law officers from aiming heat-sensing equipment at homes unless they first obtain search warrants."

DOJ_NMG_0139243

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/4) reported on one case in with marijuana growers "had invested tens of thousands of dollars in heating and air conditioning upgrades to create a semitropical climate where the air was a slightly humid 81 degrees. To save money — the operation can burn about $2,500 worth of electricity a month — and avoid detection by electric meter, the growers had hotwired the power system, digging a hole and tapping into an underground electrical line."

In Braintree, Massachusetts, the Patriot Ledger (3/2) reported a local couple "has been busted for running a marijuana farm worth hundreds of thousands of dollars in their suburban home. … The grow house operation is believed to be the largest ever uncovered in Braintree, according to Deputy Chief Russell Jenkins."

California Man Sentenced To Nearly 6 Years In Prison In "Pot-Candy" Case. The San Francisco Chronicle (3/2) reported the ringleader of an Oakland group that "made marijuana-laced candy and soft drinks resembling popular confections was sentenced…to 70 months in prison. Kenneth Affolter…pleaded guilty in September to a single count of conspiring to manufacture and distribute marijuana for making doctored treats that authorities said were packaged for shipment throughout the West Coast. … The case was the latest pitting federal officials against medicinal marijuana advocates."

Mexican Drug Cartels Shift To Overland Trafficking Routes. On its front page today, the Los Angeles Times (3/4, Tobar, 850K) says "Central America has become a crucial way station in the billion-dollar cocaine business, with traffickers shipping hundreds of tons northward from Colombia along the isthmus and increasingly infiltrating police and government agencies." The Times adds, "Everyone from impoverished fishermen and small-town mayors to legislators and high-ranking police officials has been swept up in the drug trade as the smuggling routes have changed. In years past, the favored route was across the Caribbean to the southeastern United States. Now, with greater Mexican cartel involvement, the cocaine often moves up the coasts of Central America and overland through Mexico." A DEA official said "Central America will remain the primary transit zone for U.S.-bound drugs 'for the foreseeable future.'"

Central America Called Crucial Way Station In Cocaine Trade. The Los Angeles Times (3/4) reported Central America "has become a crucial way station in the billion-dollar cocaine business, with traffickers shipping hundreds of tons northward from Colombia along the isthmus and increasingly infiltrating police and government agencies, U.S. and regional sources say. The recent killings of three Salvadoran legislators in Guatemala underscored the shift, intelligence sources say. … Michael A. Braun, chief of operations for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said in a 2005 congressional hearing that 'the corrupting power of illicit drug trafficking organizations on the governmental institutions of Central America significantly increases the difficulty of successful drug interdiction efforts.' Central America will remain the primary transit zone for U.S.-bound drugs 'for the foreseeable future,' Braun added."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Said To Have Final Chance To Overhaul Immigration Laws. Time (3/12, Calabresi, 4.03M) reports President George W. Bush "is about to get his last chance to prove that that" his "commitment" to an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws "is real. Immigration reform stands out as the unfulfilled promise of the Bush presidency, and as Congress prepares to debate a compromise bill in the coming weeks, Democratic leaders in the House and Senate say Bush's help is crucial." But "power is sluicing out of the White House, Iraq is draining the Administration's remaining energies, and the President is entering a difficult period with a Congress he has never treated with much respect."

TAX:

Absent Congressional Action, AMT Could Affect 23 Million. U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Wiener, 2.03M) reports, "Virtually everyone agrees that the" Alternative Minimum Tax is "out of control and needs to be fixed. The big question is how and at what cost in lost potential tax revenue -- roughly $1.2 trillion over 10 years if the AMT is totally repealed." So far, Congress "has enacted short-term boosts in exemptions from the tax to slow its expanding reach from only about 1.3 million taxpayers five years ago. If a new temporary or permanent fix isn't enacted for 2007, the number of returns affected could soar to 23 million."

DOJ_NMG_0139244

Schumer, Lott Debate AMT. Sen. Charles Schumer said on ABC's This Week (3/4, Stephanopoulos), "What we Democrats want to do is get tax cuts for the middle class, and that's what we're doing by getting the AMT down. We have had tax cut after tax cut after tax cut for the very wealthy. Instead, we want to redirect tax cuts to the middle class."

Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott said on ABC's This Week (3/4, Stephanopoulos), "Let's talk about taxing the middle class. This is how we got the AMT. The Democrats put it in place in '69, and exacerbated it in 1993, when not a single Republican voted for it. And that's what middle class gets."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress Takes Up Problems At Walter Reed Today. ABC World News (3/4, story 5, 1:45, Harris, 8.78M) reported Congress will "open hearings on the treatment of wounded Iraq and Afghanistan veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. The growing scandal over deplorable conditions and inadequate care has already cost the Army Secretary and other brass their jobs." ABC (Hendren) added, "On Capitol Hill, lawmakers are preparing for their first chance to grill the top military officers in charge of Walter Reed. Among those scheduled to appear at tomorrow's hearing is Gen. Richard Cody, the Army's Vice Chief of Staff, and Walter Reed's last two commanders. And they'll hear from wounded troops."

The AP (3/4, Heilprin) reports legislators "promised a quick response and sought an independent commission." In a letter to Defense Secretary Robert Gates, Sen. Charles Schumer "asked for an independent commission, possibly headed by former Secretary of State Colin Powell, to investigate all post-combat medical facilities and recommend changes." The Los Angeles Times (3/5, Levey, 850K) says Schumer's "call for an independent panel follows a promise from President Bush last week to name a bipartisan commission for the same purpose. ... Members of Congress from both parties have expressed outrage at the substandard care. The revelations have also embarrassed the Bush administration as it has been laboring to build support for sending 21,500 additional troops to Iraq."

The Washington Post (3/5, A9, White, 690K) reports that when the first hearing begins today, "many eyes will turn to Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who has served as the Army's top doctor since he gave up command of the hospital in 2004. The hearing will allow Kiley to explain why bureaucratic tangles and horrid conditions made life so difficult for outpatients at the Army's premier hospital, while also likely putting him in a position of defending his job." While some in Congress "have called for Kiley to step down and take responsibility for the problems at Walter Reed, he has been spared so far."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/5, Lubold, 59K) says the Army is "scrambling to rectify the situation: It's moving patients out of certain areas of Walter Reed in preparation for those places being refurbished, and it's creating new support initiatives to help wounded veterans of the war in Iraq." But on its front page, the Washington Post (3/5, Hull, Priest, 690K) reports under the headline "It Is Just Not Walter Reed" that solders at other facilities are offering "stories of neglect and substandard care. ... They describe depressing living conditions for outpatients at other military bases around the country, from Fort Lewis in Washington state to Fort Dix in New Jersey. They tell stories -- their own versions, not verified -- of callous responses to combat stress and a system ill equipped to handle another generation of psychologically scarred vets." The Post says "hundreds of soldiers" contacted the newspaper. ... From Fort Campbell in Kentucky: 'There were yellow signs on the door stating our barracks had asbestos.'" And from Fort Dix: "Scare tactics are used against soldiers who will write sworn statement to assist fellow soldiers for their medical needs."

Walter Reed Problems Said To Have "Appalled" Gates. Newsweek (3/12, Barry, Wolffe, 3.12M) reports in its "Periscope" column the "grim stories" about the treatment of outpatients at Walter Reed Army Hospital "appalled the one person who really mattered: the new secretary of Defense, Robert Gates. He promised President Bush that high-level officials would be held accountable -- and seemed to get that when the commander of the hospital, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, was fired." But then Gates "found that the temporary replacement -- Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, named after Weightman was sacked -- had earlier run the place himself." A senior Defense official says "a furious Gates demanded the resignation of the secretary of the Army, Francis J. Harvey."

Gates Changes Atmosphere For Media. U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column, "Distinguishing himself from Don Rumsfeld's combativeness," Gates "held his first press conference around a big table in a small conference room. But it was too cramped, so he set his sights on making the larger briefing room cozier. Gone is the lone podium, replaced by a set that would better fit a morning TV news show: a big table for himself and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in front of a world map."

VA Secretary Says He Welcomes Congressional Oversight. Meanwhile, the New York Times (3/5, Clemetson, 1.16M) reports VA Secretary Jim Nicholson is "seeking to put a positive public face on his beleaguered agency." He said in an interview Friday, "If there is even one injured veteran that falls through the cracks then that is too many. It pains me to hear about problems in our system, but I am a competitor, and I am finding that it is strengthening my resolve and deepening my commitment." Nicholson said, "I welcome congressional oversight, and the oversight of the President and the commission he is forming."

DOJ_NMG_0139245

Krugman Compares Walter Reed, Katrina Responses. In his New York Times (3/5, 1.16M) column, Paul Krugman writes that when the problems at Walter Reed were first reported two years ago, "officials simply denied that there were any problems. And they initially tried to brush off last month's exposé in The Washington Post. But this time, with President Bush's approval at 29 percent, Democrats in control of Congress, and Donald Rumsfeld no longer defense secretary -- Robert Gates, his successor, appears genuinely distressed at the situation -- the whitewash didn't stick. Yet even now it's not clear whether the public will be told the full story, which is that the horrors of Walter Reed's outpatient unit are no aberration. For all its cries of 'support the troops,' the Bush administration has treated veterans' medical care the same way it treats everything else: nickel-and-diming the needy, protecting the incompetent and privatizing everything it can. ... The Walter Reed scandal is another Hurricane Katrina: the moment when the administration's misgovernment became obvious to everyone."

Gates "Greeted As A Liberator" At Pentagon. The Washington Post (3/5, A13, Ricks, 690K) reports "Robert M. Gates is finding Donald H. Rumsfeld an easy act to follow, as the new defense secretary wins hearts and minds throughout Washington and overseas. … At the Pentagon, where Gates has been greeted as a liberator, 'you can already feel the stability,' said retired Air Force Lt. Gen. Charles F. Wald, formerly the deputy US commander in Europe. He said he considers the appointment of Gates to be the Bush administration's best move in years." Moreover, Gates "has shown that he can act decisively, as when he fired Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey on Friday over the handling of the growing patient-care scandal at Walter Reed Army Medical Center." Gates, adds the Post, "has been welcomed largely because of who he is not rather than what he has done, noted a longtime friend who has held top national security posts. In the months ahead, however, Gates will be judged on his own decision-making in the war he has inherited from Rumsfeld." Also, "despite some departmental friction over the burdens of Iraq, Gates seems to have a better relationship with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice than did Rumsfeld."

Cheney Praises Bolton's Service At UN. The Washington Post's (3/5, A13) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that former U.N. ambassador John Bolton "has been trashing the administration lately, but Vice President Cheney had only praise for him at the Conservative Political Action Conference here last week," saying he wanted "especially" to recognize Bolton, "who did a superb job for America at the United Nations."

Paulson Sounds Optimistic Note On US Economy. Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson said on ABC's This Week (3/4, Stephanopoulos), "There's always a possibility that there will be a downturn. But I don't see it. I think we have a healthy economy in the US. A year ago, when the growth rates were much higher, I was concerned. I said, is this going to be sustainable? Now I'm looking at it and I'm seeing a situation where it looks like we're successfully making the transition."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (3/5, C1, Browning, 2.04M) reports, "Analysts see at least three ways to view last week's trouble, which resulted in a 4.2% drop in the Dow Jones Industrial Average. Goldman Sachs economists Ed McKelvey and Andrew Tilton outlined three competing views in a report last week. 1. A much-overdue short-term pullback. … 2. A flight from risky investments. If that is what is going on, then the market shift is more serious. … 3. A sign of a weaker economy to come. This could be the most troubling prognosis."

The New York Times (3/5, Creswell, Bajaj, 1.16M) says an "escalating crisis in the market, which seemed to reach a new crescendo late last week, is threatening a wide band of people. Foremost are the poor and minority homeowners who used easy credit to buy houses that are turning out to be too expensive for them now that mortgage rates are going up, but the pain is also being felt widely throughout the business world." The Rimes adds, "Large companies that bought subprime lenders during the boom, like H&R Block and HSBC, are now scrambling to sell them or scale back their exposure. Many investors are also likely to suffer: Wall Street firms made billions in fees, commissions and trading revenue from packaging and selling subprime mortgages to them as bonds."

And House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel said on Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "When you have these economists and the chairman of the federal reserve, they tell you on one hand what could happen, and on the other hand it may not happen, it puts us in the Congress the same place that it puts most Americans. ... It seems like we're living in two different worlds, one where they tell us, the Secretary of the Treasury, not to worry, that the economy is secure, and the other where we have 48 million people who don't know from day to day where they're going to get health insurance."

Homeless Veterans, Hard To Count, May Not Get Aid They Need. The Washington Post (3/5, Davenport, 690K) writes that the "number of homeless veterans from recent wars is hard to gauge. From 2004 to 2006, the Department of Veterans Affairs provided shelter to 300 veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan tours, out of the tens of thousands who have served." But Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America Executive Director Paul Rieckhoff said "that figure 'is not even close to accurate'...because it doesn't include the 'others sleeping in buses, their cars or on the streets.'" He said in New York City alone, "his organization has helped 60 homeless veterans since 2004. As in the Vietnam War era, when thousands of vets ended up homeless, there are already signs that the recent conflicts are taking a traumatic psychological toll on some service members. Many veterans' advocates said that despite unprecedented attempts by the military and Veterans Affairs to care for veterans, increasing numbers of the new generation of warriors are ending up homeless."

DOJ_NMG_0139246

Sanchez Said To Face Tests On Her Substance As Public Official. The Los Angeles Times (3/5, A1, Powers, 850K) profiles Rep. Loretta Sanchez, who "has been viewed alternately as a masterful fundraiser, legislative lightweight, political mentor, headstrong politician, leading Latina voice and one of Congress' 'babes.'" The Times recounts her recent confrontation with Rep. Joe Baca, and says "in the coming months, Sanchez will be tested on whether her reputation will be more coquette or congresswoman. Entrenched in the House majority for the first time, she is allied with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and sits on two of the most prominent committees: Armed Services and Homeland Security, being the second-ranking Democrat on the latter."

Thune's Help For South Dakota Firm Seen As Symptomatic Of GOP Problems. In a syndicated column running in today's Washington Post (3/5, A15, 690K), Robert Novak writes, "The Federal Railroad Administration handed a rare victory to the American taxpayer last week by denying a questionable $2.3 billion loan application by the Dakota, Minnesota and Eastern (DM&E) Railroad. What makes this news of special interest is the paramount role Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) played in boosting the loan. Here is a cautionary tale of political life in Washington and how it corrupts." Thune "guided through Congress legislative changes that made the loan possible. But an assessment that DM&E was a poor credit risk was shared by two other conservative senators -- Tom Coburn of Oklahoma and Jim DeMint of South Carolina -- who took the extraordinary step of advocating rejection of a colleague's pet project. Making matters worse, Thune worked as a paid lobbyist for the South Dakota-based railroad before his election to the Senate and has received political contributions from company executives." Novak adds, "If he had it to do over again, I asked the senator last week, would he still advocate the loan project? Thune replied: 'I don't know what else I could do. I was strong for my state. It was a no-brainer.'" The DM&E loan "cannot prove a cautionary tale for Thune unless he knows he went in the wrong direction and admits it, at least to himself. If he has not come to terms with this, he is not alone. Well-meaning conservatives such as Thune get caught up in procuring the benefits of the federal leviathan for their states and their constituents. It is much of what ails the Republicans."

Navy Said To Be Getting Rid Of Useful Warships. Craig Hooper, who served on the Chief of Naval Operations' Maritime Strategy Working Group at the Naval War College last fall, writes in the Washington Post (3/5, A15, 690K), "Over the past six years, 79 condemned Navy ships have been towed out to sea and destroyed by Air Force bombs, submarine-launched torpedoes or hails of gunfire. These exercises, long considered the most cost-effective way to dispose of unwanted naval vessels, have eaten away at America's inventory of still-useful retired warships. Soon every vessel capable of serving in America's reserve combat fleet could vanish, leaving an overextended Navy with no viable backup forces. This unwise drawdown goes against Navy tradition." Hooper adds, "As the Navy budget, already under pressure because of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, is hoarded for new shipbuilding initiatives, the inactive reserve, an emergency fleet of second-string warships, is quietly becoming a sham. … Important reserve warships are disappearing. … This flurry of ship disposal suggests the administration is getting rid of useful warships to compel construction of pricey new vessels. … This is no way to run a navy. With each sinking, the Navy risks becoming a hollow force, dependent on the construction of pricey ships that, given America's overextended finances, may never arrive."

Coast Guard Cutter Contracts Seen As "Series Of Lemons." U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Marek, 2.03M) reports audits "have revealed that" the costs of the Coast Guard's newest cutter "has grown by millions of dollars since it was commissioned and that it has potentially fatal design flaws. And that's only part of the bad news. The 38,000-person military service has been accused of buying what one member of Congress called 'a series of lemons' with a $24 billion megacontract to replace nearly all its ships and planes." Supporters "wonder if even" Coast Guard Commandant Thad Allen "can fix all this."

Some See Message About Bush In New Movie About Ancient Greece. The New York Times (3/5, Cieply, 1.16M) reports, "Three weeks ago a handful of reporters at an international press junket here for the Warner Brothers movie '300,' about the battle of Thermopylae some 2,500 years ago, cornered the director Zack Snyder with an unanticipated question. 'Is George Bush Leonidas or Xerxes?' one of them asked. The questioner, by Mr. Snyder's recollection, insisted that Mr. Bush was Xerxes, the Persian emperor who led his force against Greek's city states in 480 B.C., unleashing an army on a small country guarded by fanatical guerilla fighters so he could finish a job his father had left undone. More likely, another reporter chimed in, Mr. Bush was Leonidas, the Spartan king who would defend freedom at any cost." The Times adds, "In the era of media clutter, film marketers increasingly welcome controversy as a way to get attention for their more provocative fare. … But the dance can be more delicate when viewers find a potentially divisive message in big studio movies that were meant more to entertain than enlighten. The danger is that an accidental political overtone will alienate part of the potential audience for a film that needs broad appeal to succeed."

DOJ_NMG_0139247

NYTimes Urges Congress To Address Problems In Credit Industry. The New York Times (3/5, 1.16M) editorializes, "In response to the explosion in consumer debt, Congress passed a law in 2005 making it more difficult for individuals to declare bankruptcy." But "legislators did nothing to curb the blizzard of pre-approved cards that fall through the mail slots. Often the most profitable customers are the least responsible ones. At a Senate Banking Committee hearing in January, Chairman Christopher Dodd cited a study estimating that credit-card penalty fees had risen to $17.1 billion in 2006 from $1.7 billion in 1996." Congress "needs to do more to make rates and fees more transparent while putting an end to some of the most abusive policies."

OTHER NEWS:

Increasingly, Uninsured Belong To Middle Class. The New York Times (3/5, Pear, 1.16M) reports that the problem of a lack of health insurance is increasingly impacting "middle-class people." While it is "well known that the ranks of the uninsured have been swelling; federal figures show an increase of 6.8 million since 2000," the "surprise is that the uninsured are not necessarily the poor, the unemployed and the undocumented. ... And that is one reason, according to a recent New York Times/CBS News poll, that the problems of the uninsured have jumped to the top of the domestic political agenda in Washington and on the campaign trail. Today, more than one-third of the uninsured -- 17 million of the nearly 47 million -- have family incomes of $40,000 or more."

Estimates Of Oil Reserves Rise As Technology Revives Old Fields. The New York Times (3/5, Mouawad, 1.16M) reports, "Within the last decade, technology advances have made it possible to unlock more oil from old fields, and, at the same time, higher oil prices have made it economical for companies to go after reserves that are harder to reach. With plenty of oil still left in familiar locations, forecasts that the world's reserves are drying out have given way to predictions that more oil can be found than ever before." There "is still a minority view, held largely by a small band of retired petroleum geologists and some members of Congress, that oil production has peaked, but the theory has been fading. Equally contentious for the oil companies is the growing voice of environmentalists, who do not think that pumping and consuming an ever-increasing amount of fossil fuel is in any way desirable." The Times adds, "Increased projections for how much oil is extractable may become a political topic on many different fronts and in unpredictable ways. By reassuring the public that supplies will meet future demands, oil companies may also find legislators more reluctant to consider opening Alaska and other areas to new exploration."

Romney Gets Straw Poll Victory From Skeptical Conservatives. The Politico (3/5, Simon, Allen) reports Mitt Romney spoke Friday at the Conservative Political Action Conference and then stuck "around for a reception that was open to all attendees. In the voting, where he took 21 percent, to Giuliani's 17 percent and McCain's 12 percent, despite a dude in a dolphin suit who was wandering around the convention with a sign calling himself 'Flip Romney, another Flip-Flopper from Massachusetts.'" The "hot CPAC souvenir was the Romney Flip Flop -- cheap foam footwear available in green, orange, yellow and red. These shots aimed at what many Republicans view as Romney's greatest liability -- the perception that he is guided by opportunism rather than principle. Romney wanted to win badly enough that he stacked the deck by bringing a group of college kids in to vote for him." The Politico also interviewed Romney, who discussed a range of topics, such as the influence of Internet media, saying, "I think what you're seeing is that blogs are able to get to bottom of things and to cut through the spin. The spin has a huge impact on the mainstream media. Candidates are able to go to the mainstream media, spin their story, they write it and sometimes it's accurate, sometimes it's not. The blogs actually are open for comment and debate and they ultimately get the truth out. And that's critical, in my opinion. Because there are going to be a lot of opposition research folks on other campaigns trying to put up things that aren't accurate."

The Financial Times (3/5, Daniel) reports Romney "had faced skepticism" at CPAC "amid charges that he had flip-flopped on some of the critical issues for conservatives, changing his stance on gay and abortion rights. The initial reception to his speech at the conference on Friday was far less enthusiastic than the rousing greeting for the celebrity figure of Rudy Giuliani, former mayor of New York."

DOJ_NMG_0139248

Steele, Gingrich Win Plaudits For CPAC Appearances. The Washington Times (3/5, Hallow, Dinan, 88K) reports former Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and Newt Gingrich "were the biggest stars according to activists who attended the three-day Conservative Political Action Conference." Former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani "pulled off CPAC's biggest coup, former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III was the biggest surprise, and Ann Coulter was the biggest loser." Steele, "rejected last fall by the Bush White House for chairmanship of the Republican National Committee (RNC) -- was mobbed by hundreds of attendees wanting their picture taken with him on the dais after he served as master of ceremonies at the Thursday banquet featuring Vice President Dick Cheney and former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton." This year's CPAC "was also a boon for Mr. Gingrich, as the former House speaker acknowledged after his Saturday speech that closed the conference." Gingrich was "the only top-tier potential contender for the Republican nomination who hadn't formed a presidential exploratory committee or bought any CPAC banquet tables for supporters. Yet in the largest presidential preference straw poll in the conference's history, he placed fourth (14 percent) -- ahead of Arizona Sen. John McCain (12 percent), who rejected an invitation to address the event."

Conservatives Unhappy With State Of Movement. The Politico (3/3, Martin) reports that at CPAC, there was "considerable grumbling about the health of the movement. From conservative pioneers to up-and-coming true believers, many attendees are looking for leaders -- and they're uncertain about the current crop of presidential candidates and not even thrilled with the current occupant of the White House." Conservative activist and public relations specialist Mike Thompson said, "It's a struggle. Conservatives want to win, but they aren't really sure the guys at the top of the field are conservative." The Politico adds some of the "ire at the CPAC conclave is directed squarely at Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), whom many conservatives suspect talks the talk when it comes to movement ideals but harbors dangerously moderate instincts." The Politico adds that on Thursday, David Bossie, the president of Citizens United, "gleefully unveiled a 22-page dossier kneecapping McCain ("He's No Ronald Reagan: Why Conservatives Should Not Vote for John McCain"). But Bossie also said his beef wasn't just with the one Republican presidential aspirant – McCain -- who skipped the CPAC festivities." It is "not just skepticism about McCain, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney that has members of the movement in a funk."

Bush's Woes May Boost Giuliani Quest For GOP Nomination. The Gannett News Service (3/5, Raasch) says in an analysis piece that in a paradoxical way, George W. Bush's struggles as president may be benefiting 2008 candidate Rudy Giuliani, who has a solid lead in head-to-head polls among fellow Republicans." In Giuliani's case, "a recent surge in national polls so defies conventional wisdom that it may be indicative of important contours in the 2008 campaign, at least as it is shaping up today. The search for a candidate identified with strong leadership qualities, as Giuliani has carried since 9/11, may be trumping some of the threshold requirements on abortion rights and other cultural issues that have marked GOP presidential primaries for over a quarter century." Giuliani's "poll standing has risen the more he has been on the stump, where a lot of coverage has focused on this twice-divorced candidate's attempts to explain himself to dubious cultural conservatives. Yet, as he has moved around the country, Giuliani leads Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., to 44-21% in the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll, taken Feb. 22-25. A month earlier, Giuliani enjoyed a 7 percentage-point advantage."

Conservatives May Overlook Differences With Giuliani. Newsweek (3/12, Darman, 3.12M) reports in its cover story that former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani is "pitching himself to Republican primary voters as the man destined to steady the party and the nation in a time of trial." But the Republicans "will require some convincing. Giuliani is a social moderate running in a party dominated by Christian conservatives; he supports gay rights and gun control, and hopes to be his party's first pro-choice presidential nominee since Gerald Ford more than 30 years ago." Yet with their "party in turmoil after the disastrous 2006 midterm elections, some conservatives seem willing to overlook the mayor's colorful past." In a new NEWSWEEK Poll, Giuliani "leads McCain by 25 points (59 to 34 percent) as the choice of registered Republicans and voters leaning Republican for the party's nomination, while Romney trails both men by more than 30 points."

Giuliani Surge Seen As "Mind Boggling." In her U.S. News and World Report column (3/12), Gloria Borger says it is "mind-boggling: Rudy Giuliani is surging. The pro-abortion rights, pro-gun control, pro-gay rights, thrice-married former New York mayor -- who as part of a spoof once dressed in drag and got cozy with Donald Trump -- is ahead. And not just in one poll; in most every poll." Giuliani's "bid is a huge gamble with a simple premise: that, in the end, the appeal of his personality, leadership cred, and the new primary schedule (which could be full of big states with large urban areas with lots of moderate Republicans), will give a city boy a chance to win the nomination."

DOJ_NMG_0139249

Giuliani's Leadership Style Seen As Too Similar To Bush's. In his Newsweek column (3/12), Jonathan Alter says Giuliani's "leadership style seems out of sync with history's pendulum. Why would voters want to replace a my-way-or-the-highway Texan with a shut-up-and-listen New Yorker? Exchange a Crawford cowboy for an urban cowboy? A woman, African-American, Hispanic, Mormon or Vietnam POW would represent a sharper break from the immediate past."

Clinton, Obama Commemorate 42nd Anniversary Of Selma March. ABC World News (3/4, lead story, 2:35, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Forty-two years ago on what's now called Bloody Sunday," Selma, Alabama, "became a flashpoint in the civil rights struggle as police clashed with protesters who were demanding voting rights. Today, it was a political clash between the two top Democratic presidential contenders. Senators Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama gave dueling speeches at black churches just block as way from one another." ABC (Cochran) added Obama "spoke at the church of Martin Luther King Jr. used as headquarters to fight for the Voting Rights Act. He seemed to answer accusations that he is not black enough." Sen. Barack Obama: "So don't tell me I don't have a claim on Selma, Alabama. Don't tell me I'm not coming home when I come to Selma, Alabama. I'm here because somebody marched for our freedom." Cochran: "Hillary Clinton decided to come after Obama announced he would be in Selma. She spoke at another black church. She too said the voting rights act has changed America. Sen. Hilary Clinton: "It is the gift that keeps on giving. Today it is giving Senator Obama the chance to run for president of the United States. It is giving me that chance too." Cochran: "It may not mean a thing, but the line to hear Obama is several times longer than the line to hear Hillary Clinton."

The CBS Evening News (3/4, lead story, 3:30, Borger, 7.66M) reported, "The real homecoming today was for Bill Clinton, making his first appearance on the campaign trail with his wife in a made for TV moment. He's not here by chance, he's here to help Hillary, who's been losing some support in the African American community where he's still very popular. Once even dubbed America's first black president, Bill Clinton counts when African American votes are crucial." Clinton: "But I am honored to be here with you because of the price that our forbearers paid walking over this bridge and going to Montgomery." Borger: "But many black voters say they're attorney between voting for the African American Obama or sticking with the Clintons, who supported civil rights for years."

ABC World News (3/4, story 2, 2:00, Crawford, 8.78M) reported, "Like other black Democrats, Congressman John Lewis is facing a dilemma." Rep. John Lewis: "I'm torn. I'm torn." Sen. Barack Obama: "Thank you." Crawford: "Should he vote for the man who could become the first black President or the woman named Clinton, with all that means to African-American voters?" Rep. John Lewis: "When I celebrated my 60th birthday in Atlanta, President Clinton came down and spoke. When I celebrated my 65th birthday in Atlanta, Senator Obama came down. They're friends. They're like brothers. And Mrs. Clinton is an extension of her husband." Crawford: "African-American leaders have warned Barack Obama against taking the black vote for granted. There is strong loyalty to the Clintons, especially to Bill, who was affectionately known as 'the first black President.' Although the Southern states vote Republican in the general election, they are vital to Democrats in the primaries."

USA Today (3/5, Benn, Kizzire, 2.27M) reports the "re-enactment of the march over the Edmond Pettus Bridge into Selma was the first time in their campaigns that the candidates appeared together. Later, they watched former President Bill Clinton inducted into the National Voting Rights Hall of Fame."

The AP (3/5, Pickler) reports, "Not to be outdone in the hunt for black votes, Hillary Clinton also spoke in Selma at a church three blocks away and brought a secret weapon — her husband. Three days before the march anniversary, her campaign announced that the former president who is so popular among blacks would accompany her for his induction into Selma's Voting Rights Hall of Fame." Clinton and Obama "both appeared outside Brown Chapel for a pre-march rally, but came from opposite sides of the podium and did not interact. Despite the intense rivalry between their campaigns, the two praised each other." But they "did not join arms when the commemorative march attended by thousands got under way. Instead, Clinton held hands with her husband and Obama was several people down the line. Obama, who shed his coat and tie for the march, approached Hillary Clinton at one point and the two chatted for a few seconds before moving back to opposite sides of the street."

McClatchy (3/5, Stearns) reports Obama, "the upstart Illinois Democrat, brought the hot vibe of the cool new. Clinton, the veteran New Yorker, brought her long history and a ringer: husband and former President Bill Clinton, whom black author Toni Morrison once called the 'first black president.'" The "rhetoric Sunday was lofty despite the gamesmanship. Obama, a toddler at the time of the Selma demonstrations, said the civil rights measures that Selma begat made his rise possible." Sen. Clinton "took the idea further, saying that the civil rights movement had made possible not just Obama's candidacy but New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson's and her own."

DOJ_NMG_0139250

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/5, Shepard, 379K) reports the appearances by Clinton and Obama "looked to be an early defining moment in the campaign for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination. Overflow crowds of mostly African-Americans jammed two historic churches to hear sermon-like speeches from the front-runners for the party's nomination, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois." The crowds "swelled even larger when former President Bill Clinton, one of the most popular political figures ever among African-Americans, led a re-enactment of the famous 1965 'Bloody Sunday' march that produced landmark federal legislation guaranteeing minorities the right to vote." Comments "from those who heard the speeches Sunday did not provide definitive proof of which candidate carried the day."

USA Today (3/5, Benn, 2.27M) reports Obama "praised Selma for its civil rights achievements Sunday morning, and said that his presidential candidacy has a direct relation to the events of 1965."

The Chicago Tribune (3/5, Glanton, Dorning, 617K) reports Clinton "avoided upstaging his wife at her speech by staying away from the church. But people cheered and rushed to be near him when he joined his wife and Obama for a re-enactment of the 1965 march." Marching at "the front of the procession through downtown Selma and across the bridge, the Clintons and Obama were separated in line by two black congressmen and several other civil rights leaders. People along the route snapped pictures and yelled out the names of Obama and the Clintons. Many of them fell in behind as the march passed."

The New York Times (3/5, Healy, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports, "Evoking the passions and rivalries of the civil rights era," Clinton and Obama "made deeply personal appeals to voters in the sanctuaries of black churches here on Sunday, and then joined former President Bill Clinton for a march across a bridge where white police officers beat protesters, most of them black, nearly 42 years ago." The "visit to Selma, a historically rich, economically struggling city, became a proxy battle for black support between Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama, whose candidacy represents a threat to Mrs. Clinton's traditional base. That competitive dynamic intensified on Sunday with the debut of Mr. Clinton on the campaign trail, six weeks into his wife's bid, and among a bloc of voters who are at once devoted to the former president and torn between his wife and Mr. Obama." In a "35-minute address, interrupted repeatedly by applause and shouts of praise from worshipers, Mr. Obama said it was time for his generation to pick up the work of those who had toiled before. He said it was time for the 'Joshua generation' — a biblical reference to the leader who succeeded Moses — to urge family and friends to shake their apathy to engage in politics and action."

The Washington Post (3/5, A5, Kornblut, Whoriskey, 690K) reports that in "the days leading up to the commemoration of 'Bloody Sunday,' advisers to Obama and Clinton had insisted it would not be a day for politics. But their mere presence in Alabama signaled the extraordinary importance of black voters in the upcoming Democratic primaries, with recent surveys indicating that Obama is jeopardizing Clinton's lead in the race by gaining among African Americans." Any "pretense that it was not part of the presidential campaign was dropped as they day went on. Supporters carried signs for the two campaigns, former president Clinton joked about the 'rainbow coalition' of candidates on the Democratic ballot, and Rep. Artur Davis, the Alabama Democrat who represents Selma, unabashedly introduced Obama in his keynote address at Brown Chapel AME Church as the next president of the United States."

Davis Takes Indirect Swipe At Clinton. In his blog at The Politico (3/5), Jonathan Martin says, "Rep. Artur Davis offered a glowing introduction of" Obama, "his colleague and candidate that included a direct shot at Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton. Noting how the same knock against Obama, 'longevity,' had been used against 'Dr. King and Jack and Bobby,' Davis said seniority wasn't always an asset." Davis said, "Longevity can make you too cautious. It can make you calculate when you cast your vote on a war."

Silicon Valley Leaders Intrigued By Obama. The Washington Times (3/5, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Silicon Valley leaders "whose endorsements have been key in past presidential races give Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton high marks, but say there is little to learn about her candidacy. Instead, they have bubbling curiosity about her fellow 2008 contender, Sen. Barack Obama." The "local insiders who track stock deals and initial public offerings the way Washingtonians follow politics have growing interest in the Illinois Democrat. Many of them think Mr. Obama could be Silicon Valley's next new thing."

Obama Streak Of 56-Straight Floor Votes Snapped. The Washington Post (3/5, A13, Kane, 690K) reports that Sen. Obama's "reign as the only perfect attendee of Senate votes among presidential hopefuls came to a crashing end last week. After 56 straight votes this year on the chamber floor, Obama (D-Ill.) missed his 57th on Friday, bypassing his senatorial duties on a homeland security bill to deliver a speech to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee meeting in Chicago. 'He really hoped to make it back to Washington in time, but it turns out, that was just the audacity of hope,' spokesman Ben LaBolt said of the streak ending. Obama was the last of the six senators already declared for the presidential campaign to have made every vote in the chamber this year. He missed a second vote Friday as well.

DOJ_NMG_0139251

Both were amendments that sailed to easy passage in the ongoing debate on the homeland security bill."

WSJournal Criticizes Obama For Public Finance Offer. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A16, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "False hope springs eternal, which is one way to look at the recent concordat between Barack Obama and John McCain to 'save' the public financing of Presidential election campaigns. In case you haven't been following this political version of 'Weekend at Bernie's' -- and you need a hobby if you have -- nearly every major Presidential candidate has decided not to abide by public-spending limits for the 2008 campaign. That includes Messrs. Obama and McCain." But Obama says "if he wins the Democratic nomination, he will ask his GOP opponent to agree with him to accept public money and spending limits for the 2008 general election. Mr. McCain quickly matched the offer. In some media precincts, this is being hailed as an achievement, and other candidates are being challenged to follow suit. We hope they don't. The public-financing regime is collapsing of its own misguided assumption that only public money in politics is uncorrupting."

Clinton Warns Of Dangers From Foreign Debt. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A2, Solomon, Harwood, 2.04M) reports Sen. Hillary Clinton "is warning about the 'economic vulnerabilities' posed by foreign interests owning large amounts of U.S. debt." In remarks "on the Senate floor and a letter to Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke and Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, Mrs. Clinton said President Bush's economic policies have contributed to an 'erosion of U.S. economic sovereignty.' She also said it is 'undeniable that the exponential growth of foreign debt in the last six years has undermined our economic standing.'" Clinton's comments "are an early indication of how big an issue the growing unease over globalization and free trade will be in the 2008 campaign. Many Democrats won election last year in part by arguing that global trade leads to job losses and lower wages. They also are warning about the nation's heavy reliance on foreign debt to finance domestic needs, including the federal budget deficit."

Clinton Campaign Seeks Aura Of Inevitability. U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Walsh, 2.03M) reports Hillary Clinton "has begun trying to present a warmer, more genial side -- and she's having some success. Forty percent of Americans have an unfavorable view of Hillary Clinton, but 58 percent see her favorably, according to the latest USA Today/Gallup poll. That's an improvement from just a few years ago. And she enjoys a substantial lead over her Democratic rivals for the 2008 presidential nomination." Clinton's "basic strategy is to scare off potential donors and supporters of her competitors by campaigning as the favorite of the Democratic establishment -- and the inevitable nominee."

Bloomberg Said To Be Considering Run As Third Party Candidate. In her Newsweek column (3/12), Eleanor Clift says, "Not as ill-tempered as Giuliani," Mayor Michael Bloomberg is "doing a good job -- perhaps, some New Yorkers might say, even a better job than his predecessor did. So why isn't he the one running for president? Publicly, Bloomberg is focused on his second term and leaving the city in better shape than he got it. Privately, Bloomberg and political adviser Kevin Sheekey are meeting with pollsters and consultants to assess the mayor's chances as a third-party, independent candidate." Sheekey said, "There is no Bloomberg campaign. But we have certainly reached out." Clift adds the "money part is easy for a self-made media mogul." "He could spend $500 million in a campaign and not even think about it," says Al From, founder of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council.

Kucinich Waits For Campaign To Catch On With Public. Time (3/12, Stein, 4.03M) profiles Democratic Rep. Dennis Kucinich, who is "so sure that what he's been saying for four years is right -- he's for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, ratifying Kyoto, universal health care -- he's convinced there's a moment coming, some event or speech or interview, when voters will suddenly realize he's not a joke: 'When people see what I have to say, they go, 'Hey, wait. He's right about the war. Ha-ha. He's right about health care. Ha-ha.'" Kucinich "believes deeply in the coming of this grand American epiphany even if no one outside his tiny camp does."

Richardson Wins Praise From Republican Watts. The U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that it "could have been the environment, the Clinton School of Public Service in Little Rock, or the brash frankness of an ex-politician. But former Rep. J. C. Watts, once the House GOP's main communicator and a sometimes entry on Republican vice presidential lists, fessed up at the University of Arkansas last month that he likes Democratic New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson in the 2008 presidential race." Watts said, "Personally, I'm a Bill Richardson fan. I think he has the Bill Clinton touch with people."

Dean, Martinez To Meet On Primary Schedule. U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that the groundwork is "being laid for the first meeting between the two party chairmen, longtime Democratic boss Howard Dean and GOP newbie Sen. Mel Martinez." Both sides "want to make sure that the other won't let states hold primaries before New Hampshire's first. We hear that the GOP will activate a rule to punish state parties if they do by slashing their number of delegates at the nominating convention in half. The Democrats don't have a similar rule."

DOJ_NMG_0139252

DeLay Seeks To Rally Conservatives. U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column, "Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay is joining the activist world with a plan to return conservatives to dominance." DeLay "calls his new group the Coalition for a Conservative Majority, and it has one mission: recruiting and electing conservatives in all 50 states. He plans to begin building it during an April book tour to promote No Retreat, No Surrender, his blueprint for victory."

Rothenberg Says Collins Faces Tough, But Winnable Race. In his Roll Call column (3/5), Stuart Rothenberg says that if "you listen to Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) talk for a few minutes, you are likely to think that she doesn't have the toughness and quickness to hold off her likely Democratic challenger, Rep. Tom Allen. Well, stop thinking that way. I don't know whether Collins will be able to swim against a potentially strong anti-President Bush, anti-Iraq War current in 2008, but at this point, I'm certainly not going to bet against her." Since his election to the House, Allen's "liberal and organized labor interest group ratings have been at or near 100 percent. National Journal's ratings place him as the 86th most liberal Member of the House in 2006, sandwiching him between Rep. Lucille Roybal-Allard (D-Calif.) and Rep. Robert Wexler (D-Fla.). In contrast, Collins ranked as the 46th most liberal Member of the Senate in 2006."

Beverly Hills Official Set To Become Highest-Ranking Iranian American. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A1, Sanders, 2.04M) reports in a front page article that when voters in Beverly Hills "go to the polls tomorrow, Jimmy Delshad is a favorite to be re-elected to the City Council. Under the city's system, he would also become mayor," making him "one of the highest-ranking Iranian-American elected officials in the US."

Former Senator Eagleton Dies At 77. ABC World News (3/4, story 6, :30, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "And a Vietnam war opponent who became the Democratic vice presidential nominee has died. Thomas Eagleton was George McGovern's running mate until it was revealed that he had been treated for depression and pulled out of the race. Eagleton continued as a Senator from Missouri until 1987. Thomas Eagleton was 77."

The CBS Evening News (3/4, story 2, :20, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "Eagleton resigned as George McGovern's running mate in '72 after it was revealed he received shock treatment for depression. Eagleton served three terms in the Senate."

WPost Praises Virginia Law On Court-Appointed Lawyers' Fees. The Washington Post (3/5, A14, 690K) editorializes that "Virginia's legislature took a big step last month toward reforming the antediluvian rules that make adequate legal representation a pipe dream for many poor defendants in serious criminal cases. Alone among states, Virginia until now has set ironclad caps on the fees paid to court-appointed defense attorneys, caps that cannot be waived under any circumstances, even by judges. The capped fees are so low that often the effect is to force defense lawyers to work for peanuts or discourage them from working enough, in all but the most open-and-shut cases." The Post credits "the bipartisan efforts of Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat, and Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell, a Republican."

Bush To Face Questions On Economic Policies In Latin America. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A4, McKinnon, Moffett, 2.04M) reports President Bush travels to Latin America this week "to take on Hugo Chávez's militant brand of economic populism. But the weakened US president could spend much of the trip defending against charges his own economic policies have helped shortchange the region." In a speech in Washington today, the President is expected "to lay out a central theme of his Latin America tour -- that democracy is key to improving life for the millions of working poor in the region." His message "seeks to respond to widespread complaints in the region that globalization and international-development policies -- of which he is viewed by many there as a main champion -- have done little to improve the lives of ordinary people there." The president also "hopes to use the democracy theme to push back against what he views as Mr. Chávez's authoritarian tendencies." However, Bush "won't venture into any countries that have moved into Mr. Chávez's sphere of influence, including Argentina, Bolivia, Ecuador and Nicaragua." Instead, he plans during his weeklong trip to visit "five generally friendly countries: Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico."

Chavez Calls Negroponte A "Professional Killer." The AP (3/5, Nunez) reports Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez Sunday "said he believes enemies including the CIA are out to kill him," and called Deputy Secretary Negroponte a "professional killer." Chavez said Venezuelan officials "have intelligence that associates of jailed Cuban anti-communist militant Luis Posada Carriles also are involved in plotting to assassinate him." He said the death plot idea has "gained weight" due to various factors, "including the recent appointment of Negroponte" as Deputy Secretary.

DOJ_NMG_0139253

Chavez Using Oil To Earn International Favor. The Christian Science Monitor (3/5, Llana, Rice-Oxley, 59K) reports, "The London bus has come to symbolize many things over the years. It's a national icon, a picture postcard paragon of public transport, a byword for frustration and irregularity. But a harbinger of international socialism? Far-fetched perhaps, but less so after the latest move by…Chávez to offer cut-rate fuel so that 250,000 Londoners on welfare can travel half-price throughout one of the world's most expensive cities." The Monitor adds, "For the past year residents in New York, Boston, and other major US cities have scored cheaper heating bills, thanks to Venezuela. Chávez has also sent cheap oil to Cuba, Nicaragua, and more than a dozen other countries. His offerings go beyond oil and have been announced with particular frenzy since he won a third term in December, promising $500 million in financing for Ecuador, $135 million for a dairy cooperative in Argentina, and a development plan in Nicaragua that includes generators to ease blackouts as well as a new development bank."

US To Offer Pyongyang "Face-Saving" Nuclear Plan. The New York Times (3/5, A7, Sanger, 1.16M) reports, "In an effort to make the best of newly murky intelligence about North Korea, Bush administration officials say they plan to tell the North's nuclear negotiators on Monday that Washington's doubts about how much progress the country has made in enriching uranium gives North Korea a face-saving way to surrender its nuclear equipment." The "new approach to solve a dispute over the existence and extent of a uranium program" will come at a meeting Monday with North Korea at the United Nations. On Sunday, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said that at the meeting he planned to "form an agenda to work on our bilateral relationship -- what's involved in the establishment of diplomatic relations, what's involved before North Korea can get off the state-sponsor-of-terrorism list, and how to get them off the Trading with the Enemies Act." He said he would be "pressing for disclosure of all their nuclear programs, including highly enriched uranium."

AFP (3/5) says Monday's talks begin "amid questions in Washington over whether US intelligence had exaggerated Pyongyang's nuclear threat."

Meanwhile, Senate Intelligence Committee member Dianne Feinstein told Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "The gathering of intelligence with respect to North Korea has been very difficult. And the drop in the level of confidence on the uranium-based development I think is an indication of that. I, for one, am very pleased to see this agreement. I don't think you can underestimate the value of China in keeping the North Koreans on track now in seeing that this plutonium-based program is disassembled and that North Korea is brought into the mainstream. ... I don't think we are well served by isolating countries. ... So I am very optimistic."

House Intelligence Committee member Pete Hoekstra said on Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "I think Congress needs to take a very close look at this agreement to make sure that it's not a legacy agreement. Legacy agreements cut corners. We need to make sure that there's verification in this agreement. We need to make sure that North Korea comes clean on whatever nuclear weapons that they have in place."

Intelligence On North Korean Nuclear Program Uncertain. Newsweek (3/12, Hirsh, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports in its "Periscope" column, "Last week the government's senior North Korea intel analyst, Joseph DeTrani, told Congress that American officials now had only 'midlevel confidence' in the same intel that led the Bush administration to assert in 2002 the North was actively 'enriching' uranium -- and could have a bomb-making plant up and running soon." During a "confrontation with Pyongyang officials in October 2002 over the North's secret program, the then Assistant Secretary of State Jim Kelly says he actually had little certainty. He told NEWSWEEK last week that the North Koreans themselves 'gave no specifics about what kind of program they had.'" Now, "post-Iraq, the intel community is more cautious. And with the administration eager to pursue an aid-for-nukes agreement with Kim Jong Il, there's less interest in putting the worst possible spin on what is known."

WSJournal Says Pyongyang Has Habit Of Breaking Its Word. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (3/5, A16, 2.04M) urges Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, "before he sits down" Monday with his Korean counterpart, to "take a look at the brief statement issued quietly Thursday by the United Nations Development Program (UNDP)." The agency announced that it is "suspending all operations" in North Korea because the "necessary conditions set out by the Executive Board on 25 January 2007 have not been met." Pyongyang's failure to comply, the Journal writes, represents, "There is no better guide to Kim Jong Il's negotiating style, nor to the North Korean dictator's habit of breaking his word. Nuclear negotiators, beware."

Lawmakers Complain Of Weak US Intelligence. The Washington Times (3/5, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Rep. Peter Hoekstra, a member of the House Intelligence Committee, said Sunday US intelligence agencies "are not providing adequate information for Congress to make policy decisions on key foreign-policy areas including Iran and North Korea." In an appearance on Fox News Sunday, Hoekstra said, "We still don't have the intelligence community overall to give us, as policy-makers, the information that we need to make good decisions in North Korea, Iran and other places." He "blamed the bureaucratic leadership in the intelligence community for what he said are delays in implementing necessary reforms after September 11 and intelligence failures in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0139254

Bolton Urges Bush To Speak Out On Intelligence. Former US Ambassador to the U.N., John Bolton, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/5, A17, 2.04M) that in light of suggestions that US intelligence on Pyongyang's nuclear program is not as strong as once believed, "President Bush himself must speak, and sooner rather than later, to tell us what he thinks of the intelligence, and the direction of his own policy. Recent polls show his approval rating near 30%, with support among Republicans falling precipitously. If the President's conservative base erodes further, where will his support come from? From liberal editorialists enthusing about his newfound foreign policy 'pragmatism'? Based on my personal experience, the President will not have both."

Iran, Saudi Summit Produces "Little Substance." The New York Times (3/5, A6, Fattah, 1.16M) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah "concluded an extraordinary meeting early Sunday promising a thaw in relations between the two regional powers. But they stopped short of agreeing on any concrete plans to tackle the escalating sectarian and political crises throughout the Middle East." Ahmadinejad said that the two countries had "agreed to try to curb tensions between Shiite and Sunni Muslims" and "discussed in detail issues related to the Palestinians and Iraq." The two also "are believed to have focused on finding ways to end the political standoff in Lebanon." Ahmadinejad's first official visit to Saudi Arabia was "marked by decidedly public shows of warmth and friendship between the leaders," however analysts were "divided on Sunday over the ultimate impact of the summit meeting." To some, "it promised to break the spiraling cycle of brinkmanship in the region, focusing both countries on constructive solutions to their differences. Skeptics, however, said the absence of any tangible resolutions or initiatives, coupled with Mr. Ahmadinejad's continuing aggressive speech, suggested that the meeting was more a public relations offensive meant to help Iran improve its image at home and in the Arab world as its confrontation with the United States appears to be escalating."

The Financial Times (3/5, Smyth) says Ahmadinejad's visit "appeared designed to ease tensions between" the two countries, while the AP (3/5, Abu-Nasr) says cooperation "will benefit both countries, as well as the whole region."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/5, Peterson, 59K) says Sunday's meeting "illustrates the growing regional alarm over Shiite-Sunni violence" in both Iraq and Lebanon. But "while both leaders prefer to blame outside actors for the increase in sectarian tension…elements in Iran and Saudi Arabia have helped to finance sectarian militias in Iraq and, in the case of the Saudis, engaged in heated sectarian rhetoric."

Palestinian Leaders Seek To Finalize Unity Government. The New York Times (3/5, A7, Kershner, 1.16M) reports Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "and the leader of the Fatah faction, arrived in Gaza on Sunday to meet with" Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, "in another effort to iron out differences over a possible Palestinian unity government." Spokesmen from Fatah and Hamas "expressed hopes over the weekend that the new government would be formed this week" as disagreements remain "on important posts, including interior minister."

Hamas-Linked School Received US Aid. The Washington Times (3/5, A1, Mowbray, 88K) reports on its front page that "millions of dollars in US foreign aid have been given in the past several years to two Palestinian universities -- one of them controlled by Hamas -- that have participated in the advocacy, support or glorification of terrorism." The funding – "principally in scholarships to individual students -- is being eyed by several members of Congress and their aides, who say it may violate US law." According to the Times, USAID has provided "more than $140,000 in assistance to the Hamas-controlled Islamic University in Gaza -- including scholarships to 49 of its students."

Bush "Inner Circle" Split Over Doha Talks. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A8, Hitt, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "As angst over the shaky state of the US trade agenda grows, tensions are emerging within President Bush's inner circle over how best to get the stalled Doha round of world trade talks moving." The chairman of the National Economic Council, "presidential friend Allan Hubbard, and national-security adviser Stephen Hadley have privately voiced frustration with the tortured pace of action in the latest stage of comprehensive talks." The Journal adds, "Launched in Doha, Qatar, soon after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the talks had as their primary aim better integrating poor nations into the global trading system. Messrs. Hubbard and Hadley have pressed for a bolder US offer in an effort to encourage other countries to compromise." In "one heated meeting among top Bush aides just before Christmas in the Old Executive Office Building," US Trade Representative Susan Schwab "opposed the idea of a grand offer. Ms. Schwab, who had seen a similar move by her predecessor flop, pushed instead for "quiet negotiations" focusing on details to build trust among Doha's participants." Bush "sided with Ms. Schwab, and has continued to back her." But "she is now at risk of being overshadowed -- some fear undercut -- by new Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, who is moving deeper into the public debate on Doha and trade."

Beijing Announces 18% Increase In Military Spending. The New York Times (3/5, A8, Yardley, Lague, 1.16M) reports China announced "its biggest increase in defense spending in five years" on Sunday, "a development that quickly prompted the United States to renew its calls for more transparency from the Chinese military about the scope and intent of its continuing, rapid arms buildup." At a news conference, Jiang Enzhu, a spokesman for the National People's Congress, said China's military budget would rise this year by 17.8 percent to "just under $45 billion." Beijing's military modernization efforts, "particularly its drive to develop advanced weaponry, have been raising concern from Washington to Tokyo to New Delhi, where officials are worried that the buildup could be as much offensive as defensive." On Sunday, Deputy Secretary Negroponte, who is touring Asia, "chose not to focus on the size of the latest budget increase, but instead emphasized that China needed to be less secretive about its military buildup." He told reporters in Beijing, "I think the point we would make with respect to military spending and military acquisition of various types would be the point about transparency."

DOJ_NMG_0139255

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (3/5, A12, Cody, 690K) says Negroponte said the Bush administration "'is dissatisfied with China's unwillingness to share such information," saying, "We think it's important in our dialogue that we understand what China's plans and intentions are." China's announcement and Negroponte's "swift appeal for more transparency highlighted a particularly uneasy point in what has become a broad, close and increasingly important US-China relationship."

The Financial Times (3/5, Yeh) says the Bush administration "has, in recent weeks, expressed increased suspicion of the general objectives and technological sophistication of the Chinese military, which is extremely secretive." Similarly, the Wall Street Journal (3/5, A3, Fairclough, Batson, Leow, 2.04M) says the move "could raise tensions with the US." The US and China's "Asian neighbors are increasingly concerned about China's strengthening military -- worries that escalated markedly after China's successful test of an antisatellite missile in January." The Washington Times (3/5, Lanfranco, 88K) also reports the story.

Paulson: China Not An Enemy. The Washington Times/AP (3/5) reports, "Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. says the economy is healthy, inflation seems under control and the U.S. should not perceive China as an economic enemy." Paulson, who "this week makes his third visit to China as Treasury secretary, said in a television interview broadcast it is essential that both countries have strong economic ties. The former head of the investment company Goldman Sachs has said China is moving too slowly in overhauling its currency system and cracking down on copyright piracy. … 'I would say that our relationship with China is multifaceted, and it's a very important relationship for the US. And I don't believe we need to make China an enemy,' Mr. Paulson said." The Wall Street Journal (3/5, 2.04M) runs an abbreviated version of the same AP story.

House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel said on Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "I'm certain that" Paulson "already has his cue cards when he comes back. This is an ancient society. It's very difficult for them to understand our economy, that their pirating and stealing of our products is something they're working on. ... But the Congress, Republicans and Democrats, are going to start getting tough on China. We're going to expect our United States Trade Representative to enforce international law."

Brown Expected To Effect "Big Change" In British Foreign Policy. The Christian Science Monitor (3/5, Rice-Oxley, 59K) reports, "Barring an improbable political upset," Gordon Brown will be the next British prime minister, and "members of Parliament, political analysts, and people who know Mr. Brown say he will be a much different prime minister from Blair." His interests "are Africa and trade justice rather than the Middle East; he was never enthusiastic about Iraq; he appears to have little in common with President Bush." Americans may find Brown "a very different proposition from Blair, more cautious, possibly less compliant," and "some say the White House should prepare for a big change in style, if not substance."

"Human Rights" Clause Blocking EU-India Trade Accord. The Financial Times (3/5, Johnson) reports, "Indian objections to the inclusion of a standard "human rights and democracy" clause in a proposed free trade agreement with the European Union have emerged as a serious stumbling block, the Financial Times has learnt. The row is a setback for the ambitious agenda set at the EU-India summit in Helsinki in October last year, when both sides pledged to deepen economic and political ties." India "is a member of the United Nations Human Rights Council, but ranks low, according to the Asian Human Rights Commission, among the international community in terms of the ratification of international conventions and covenants."

Killings Said To Have Exposed Rampant Lawlessness In Central America. The New York Times (3/5, McKinley, 1.16M) reports, "After three Salvadoran congressmen were waylaid and killed on a road in Guatemala last month, it did not take the authorities long to find the culprits: they were Guatemalan police officers, and their unmarked police car had a tracking device that proved they were at the scene. They quickly confessed, saying they thought their victims were drug dealers, and were sent to a maximum-security prison." In prison, "the four who confessed ended up dead." The Times adds, "The police and the interior minister say that rioting gang members inside the prison shot and stabbed them. But other inmates and their visitors that day say a group of heavily armed men in military garb and ski masks made their way through seven locked doors and executed them, with no interference from guards, removing any possibility that they could identify co-conspirators. … Perhaps more important, the whole episode has exposed to the world the rampant police corruption, lawlessness and drug trafficking that plagues much of Central America, and Guatemala in particular."

DOJ_NMG_0139256

Ivory Coast's President, Rebels Sign Accord. The New York Times (3/5, Polgreen, 1.16M) reports, "he president of Ivory Coast and the leader of a rebel group that controls its northern half signed a new agreement on Sunday to end a political impasse and reunite the country, which has been divided by war." The plan "is the latest in a long string of agreements seeking to end a simmering conflict that has kept Ivory Coast, once one of the most peaceful and prosperous nations in West Africa, divided in two and hobbled economically. Laurent Gbagbo, Ivory Coast's president, and Guillaume Soro, leader of the New Forces rebel group, met in Ouagadougou, capital of Burkina Faso, to sign the agreement." The two sides "plan to form a unity government within five weeks and form a joint military command."

Sweden Cited As Example For Pension Reform. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A6, Perry, 2.04M) reports, "As aging populations and shaky public finances make overhauling pension systems a global priority, an initiative implemented nearly a decade ago in Sweden is looking like the pension world's next big thing." By "pegging public pensions to individual earnings and overall life-expectancy rates," Sweden "has given its citizens incentives to be more productive and retire later -- and sidestepped the political paralysis that has stymied change elsewhere." Some elements of its system are now being adopted in other countries such as Brazil and Russia.

Left Accused Of Double Standard On Civil Rights. Armando Valladares, former US ambassador to the UN Commission on Human Rights and current chairman of the New York-based Human Rights Foundation, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/5, 2.04M), "The news that the Cuban dictator is gravely ill floods my mind with memories of my years spent in captivity. I believe that those of us who were political prisoners know his legacy better than anyone. For 22 years, I was an inmate in his vast prison system, mostly confined to an island gulag, for crimes I did not commit." Valladares adds, "The legacy of Castro for Cuba will be much like that of Stalin in Russia, Pol Pot and Ieng Sari in Cambodia and Hitler in Germany. … But his poisonous legacy will also include the double standard by foreign governments, intellectuals and journalists who fought ferociously against the unspeakable violations of human rights by right-wing dictatorships, yet applauded Castro. To this day many of these intellectuals serve as apologists and accomplices in the subjugation of the Cuban people."

Diehl Urges Turkey To "Shrug" Off US Genocide Resolution. The Washington Post's (3/5, A15) Jackson Diehl writes that "a vote expected next month on a nonbinding House resolution describing a 'genocide' in the Ottoman Empire beginning in 1915 has the potential to explode US relations with Turkey, sway the outcome of upcoming Turkish elections and spill over into several other strategic American interests, including Iraq and Iran." Diehl says that although "maybe Congress has no business debating Turkish history, maybe it is doing so for the wrong reasons. Yet if Turkey is to become the stable, Western-oriented democracy that it aspires to be, its politicians will have to learn, at least, to react the way everyone else does to nonbinding House resolutions: that is, with a shrug."

Congress Urged To Protect Rights Of War Medics. Leonard Rubenstein, executive director of Physicians for Human Rights, writes in the Washington Post (3/5, A15, 690K), "In war, health workers are often heroes and often victims. Though the Geneva Conventions are supposed to protect them as they fulfill their ethical duty to provide care to wounded combatants without regard to affiliation -- what is known as medical neutrality -- they frequently become targets by attending to the enemies of one side or another." Rubenstein urges Congress to "revise the law to protect medical ethics and restore America's commitment to being a place of refuge for those fleeing persecution. This step is also essential to revive principles of medical neutrality."

EU Market Commissioner Urges Reforms. Charlie McCreevy, EU commissioner for the internal market and services, writes in a Wall Street Journal (3/5, A17, 2.04M) op-ed that "many seem to see the regulatory burden of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act…as a significant reason for reduced US capital market competitiveness. The detailed requirements for internal control of public companies have turned out to be extremely expensive to implement." But "as trans-Atlantic markets further integrate," McCreevy says "we have to shift up a gear and chart a route to recognize each other's audit oversight bodies, implement the Basel II banking accord in a way that benefits banks and customers on both sides, and move to a risk-based system of reinsurance regulation that benefits homeowners and policyholders alike."

DOJ_NMG_0139257

NYTimes Celebrates ICC Moves Against Genocide. The New York Times (3/5, 1.16M) editorializes, "Genocide moves swiftly, kills promiscuously and keeps finding new perpetrators, despite the world's repeated vows of 'never again.' In the face of such rampaging horror, carefully considered court verdicts, like last week's World Court ruling on the 1995 Srebrenica massacre in Bosnia, and patiently assembled dossiers, like the one that International Criminal Court prosecutors have now filed against two accused masterminds of Darfur's ongoing slaughter, seem frustratingly inadequate. … Court rulings can never compensate the survivors of these horrors. But by strengthening the reach and authority of international law, these cases should give pause to those tempted to unleash future genocides -- and to those who stand by."

NYTimes Praises Drug Firm's Action Against Malaria In Africa. The New York Times (3/5, 1.16M) writes in an editorial, "The big pharmaceutical companies are rightly criticized for concentrating on the development and marketing of drugs that sell for high prices in the industrialized world while neglecting to produce medications that could save millions of lives in the poorest countries. So it came as especially welcome news last week that Paris-based Sanofi-Aventis, the world's fourth-largest drug company, working in collaboration with a nonprofit drug-development organization pioneered by Doctors Without Borders, will soon introduce a cheap and easy-to-use pill to combat malaria in sub-Saharan Africa. … Now that Sanofi has shown, in the words of one executive, that 'we are not nasty people working against poor countries and seeking only profits,' let us hope that many other big drug companies feel the same humanitarian impulse."

WSJournal Criticizes EU Action Against Microsoft. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, 2.04M) editorializes, "Each round of the European Union's battle royal with Microsoft has revealed more about flaws in the bloc's antitrust office than about the stubbornness of the American software giant. Brussels' latest sucker punch is no exception. Last Thursday, EU antitrust czarina Neelie Kroes threatened to fine Microsoft up to €3 million, or about $4 million, a day because she doesn't like the prices the company wants to charge for licensing its technology." The Journal goes on to criticize "eurocrats," whose threats against "another multimillion-dollar fine when the appeals court is due to rule soon on the original judgment smacks of spite."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Security Crackdown Widens To Shiite Slum."
"Disabled Woman Is Able Ally For Parents."
"For Rep. Sanchez, A Hot-Tomato Label Means A Hot Potato."
"China May Close Reeducation Prisons."
"Obama, Clinton Reach Out To Black Voters."
"Cities Are Answering The Scrawl."

USA Today:
"Where Did The Money Go?."
"More Colleges Banning Smoking."
"U.S. Marshals Official Accused Of Misspending Security Funds."
"Chip Foose Overhaulin' Mainstream Designs."

New York Times:
"Basra Raid Finds Dozens Detained By Iraq Spy Unit."
"Oil Innovations Pump New Life Into Old Wells."
"N.A.A.C.P. President Is Stepping Down After A Brief Stay."
"A Record Of Failure at Center For Sex Offenders."
"Without Health Benefits, A Good Life Turns Fragile."
"In Guatemala, Officers' Killings Echo Dirty War."

Washington Post:
"No U.S. Backup Strategy For Iraq."
"'It Is Just Not Walter Reed'."
"Patent Office Web Site Will Solicit Advice."
"In Canada, the New Rush Is For Diamonds."
"Domenici Says He Contacted Prosecutor."
"Lanier Poised To Become Police Chief."

Washington Times:
"China Boost Defense Fund As Talks End."
"School Linked To Hamas Gets U.S. Cash."
"NAACP Leader Quits Over Group's Focus."
"Silicon valley Looks To Obama."
"CPAC Embraces Steele, Gingrich."
"Kibbutz Ideal Collapses As Israel Shifts To Capitalism."

Detroit Free Press:
"Tara Likely Strangled."
"Fatigue, Frostbite Catch Up To Him."
"Germans Love And Hate Chrysler."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"NTSB Official Urges Changes At Crash Exit."
"Deadly Pursuits."
"Obama, Clinton Stump In Selma."
"'Time Switch May Torment Computers.'"

DOJ_NMG_0139258

Houston Chronicle:
"A Hannah Bonanza."
"State-Of-Th-Art-Healing."
"Beijing Boost Military Budget Mightily."
"Hole In The Sewing Supply Market."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Clinton, Obama Visit-Selma; Black Vote-Analysis; Afghanistan Violence; Push Into Sadr City; Walter Reed-Hearings; Thomas Eagelton Obit; Tornado Aftermath-Alabama; Christians Vs Atheist; Sled Dog Race-Alaska.
CBS: Clinton, Obama-Selma; Eagleton Obit; US-Afghan Civilian Deaths; Iraq-US Death Toll; Iraq Vet-Alabama Tornadoes.
NBC: Preempted By Golf.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Walter Reed-Congressional Hearings; US And Iraqi Forces-Sadr City; AL-Voting Rights March Commemoration; Obama, Clinton-Selma; AL-Funerals For Tornado Victims; Asian Stock Markets.
CBS: US And Iraqi Forces-Sadr City; Selma, AL-Voting Rights March Commemoration; Obama, Clinton-Selma; Walter Reed-Congressional Hearings; Eagleton Obit; Iditarod Sled Dog Race; Weekend Box Office.
NPR: Congressional Subpoenas-Fired Federal Prosecutors; Feinstein, Hoekstra-Militants In Pakistan; US Military Investigating Suicide Bombing Incident In Afghanistan; Canada's Defense Minister-Afghanistan's Human Rights Commission; Atlanta-Bush Crash Investigation; Obama, Clinton-Selma; NAACP President Resigns.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Speaks on Western Hemisphere policy, Reagan Building and International Trade Center. Open press.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Addresses the VFW Convention. Omni Shoreham Hotel.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 1:30 p.m. Senate reconvenes at 1:30 p.m. Morning business until 3 p.m., when the Senate resumes consideration of S.4, the 9/11 Commission recommendations bill. Also, a vote on an executive calendar matter is scheduled for 5:30 p.m.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Oversight of Goverment Management, the Federal Workforce and the District of Columbia Subcommittee. Hearing on the TSA personnel system for both screeners and non-screeners. Witnesses TSA Assistant Secretary Kip Hawley, AFGE President John Gage, others. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

US House: 10 a.m. OVERSIGHT AND GOVERNMENT REFORM _ National Security Subcommittee. Field hearing on conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Invited witnesses: Specialist Jeremy Duncan; Annette McLeod, wife of Cpl. Wendell ``Dell'' McLeod; Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon; Lt. General Kevin C. Kiley, M.D., U.S. Army Surgeon General; Major General George W. Weightman, Commander (former), Walter Reed Army Medical Center; Cynthia A. Bascetta, Director, Health Care, U.S. Government Accountability Office; General Richard A. Cody, Vice Chief Of Staff Of The Army. Location: Joel Auditorium, Walter Reed Medical Center.

12:30 p.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Meets for morning business, and at 2 p.m. for legislative business. First votes are set for 6:30 p.m.

1:30 p.m. HOUSE APPROPRIATIONS _ Defense Subcommittee. Hearing on the infrastructure and conditions at Walter Reed Army Hospital. Witnesses still TBA. Location: Room 2359, Rayburn.

2 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Subcommittee on Financial Services. Testimony from Kathy Petronchak, commissioner, Small Business/Self-Employed Division, IRS; Nina Olson, National Taxpayer Advocate, IRS; Robert S. McIntyre, director, Citizens for Tax Justice; Leonard E. Burman, director, Tax Policy Center; Alan D. Viard, resident scholar, American Enterprise Institute. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

Other: COUNTIES _ The National Association of Counties (NACo) holds its 2007 Legislative Conference. Highlights: 1:30 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. Opening General Session. Participants: Gov. Brian Schweitzer, D-Mont.; U.S. Transportation Secretary Mary Peters; former Louisiana Senator John Breaux, who will moderate a bipartisan panel of experts to inspire change in the nations health care system; and presidential candidate, Rep. Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW.

INTERNATIONAL BANKERS _ The Institute of International Bankers holds its Washington conference. Highlights: 12 p.m. Rep. Barney Frank - luncheon speaker. 2 p.m. FRB Governors Kevin Warsh. 4 p.m. Rep. Spencer Bachus. 4:30 p.m. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board Chairman Mark Olson. Location: Four Seasons Hotel, 2800 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

VFW CONFERENCE _ The Veterans of Foreign Wars holds its Washington Conference. Highlights: 8 a.m. Opening session with VA Secretary Nicholson, Sen. Joseph Lieberman. 10 a.m. U.S. Coast Guard Commandant Admiral Thad W. Allen speaks. 11 a.m. Vice President Cheney speaks. 1 p.m. POW/MIA session, with retired Air Force Gen.

DOJ_NMG_0139259

Robert Foglesong, and retired Gen. Ruslan Aushev. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW.

AMERICAN LEGION-NATIONAL DC CONFERENCE _ The American Legion 47th National Washington Conference. Highlights: 9:15 a.m. Mario Mancuso, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense Special Operations and Combating Terrorism, Department of Defense. 9:40 a.m. Gordon H. Mansfield, Deputy Secretary of Veterans Affairs, Department of Veteran Affairs. 11:35 a.m. Bob Filner, Chairman, House Committee on Veterans Affairs. 2:00 p.m. Jeff Sessions, U.S. Senator (Alabama); Location: Renaissance Washington Hotel, 999 9th St. NW.

ATTORNEYS GENERAL _ The National Association of Attorneys General holds its spring meeting. Highlights: 1:45 p.m. Session on the REAL ID program, with Assistant DHS Secretary Richard Barth. Location: Fairmont Hotel, 2401 M St. NW.

HISPANIC CHAMBER _ The United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce holds its 17th annual legislative conference, ``Advancing Latino Entrerpreneurship -- It's Just Good Business." Highlights: 1 p.m. President Bush speaks. 6:30 p.m. - 8:30 p.m. Latina Leaders Reception. Note: This event at Altria Group, Inc. Headquarters, 101 Constitution Avenue, Suite 400. Location: Ronald Reagan Building & International Trade Center 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

HOSPITALS _ The Federation of American Hospitals holds its 2007 Public Policy Conference and Business Exposition. Highlights: 8:25 a.m. Plenary session with keynote address by Comptroller General David M. Walker. Location: Marriott Wardman Park Hotel, 2660 Woodley Road NW.

LATAM-BUSH TRIP _ 9 a.m. - 10:15 a.m. The Inter-American Dialogue hosts a informal discussion of U.S. policy toward Latin America and the Caribbean in the context of President Bush's trip to the region later in the week. Panelists; Peter Hakim, president, Inter-American Dialogue; Michael Shifter, vice president for policy, Inter-American Dialogue; and Sydney Weintraub, William E. Simon Chair in Political Economy, Center for Strategic and International Studies. Location: Inter-American Dialogue offices, 1211 Connecticut Ave. NW, Suite 510.

FARM-TRADE _ 10 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a roundtable, ``The Farm Bill, the Doha Negotiations and the President's Trade Agenda: Proposals for Agricultural Policy Reform and their IKmplications for U.S. Trade Policy." Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

AMERICA COMPETES _ 2 a.m. Sens. Jeff Bingaman (D-NM) and Pete Domenici (R-NM) will join Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell and other senators to introduce the ``America COMPETES Act. Location: Mansfield Room, US Capitol.

ENERGY-NUCLEAR _ 12 p.m. The US Energy Association holds a briefing on the World Energy Council study on nuclear power in Europe. Location: US Energy Association, Suite 550, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

GLOBAL HIV/AIDS ISSUES _ 12 p.m. Physicians for Human Rights and other HIV/AIDS advocacy groups sponsor a congressional briefing on ``Confronting Rapidly Emerging HIV Epidemics in Asia and Eastern Europe." Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

HIV _ 12 p.m. Physicians for Human Rights, others, hold a briefing on the HIV epidemics in Asia and Eastern Europe, focusing on Vietnam. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

COAL EMISSIONS _ 12:30 p.m. The FutureGen Alliance holds a briefing to provide an update on the project regarding near-zero emissions technology and reducing carbon dioxide emissions. Location: Suite 701, 1150 17th St. NW.

LEVIN _ 1 p.m. Rep. Sander Levin speaks at an event by the Center for American Progress on globalization and the shared benefits domestically and abroad. Location: 10th floor, 1333 H St. NW.

ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION _ 2 p.m. The American Legion hosts a forum on illegal immigration and will feature government and private sector speakers who will discuss way to deal with this countrys population of illegal aliens. Speakers include: Senator Jeff Sessions of Alabama; Alfonso Aguilar, Chief of Citizenship U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, DHS; Kris Kobach, Professor University of Missouri, Kansas City School of Law; Roy Beck President, NumbersUSA; Dr. John Fonte Senior Fellow, Hudson Institute; and Mark Krikorian, Executive Director Center for Immigration Studies. Location: Renaissance Washington Hotel, Auditorium, 999 9th St. NW.

PENTAGON BRIEFING _ 2 p.m. Press briefing and media roundtable with Gen. Montgomery Meigs (U.S. Army retired) from the Joint IED Defeat Organization. He'll give an update press on JIEDDO efforts. Location: Pentagon, Room 1E462.

TERRORISM-DEMOCRATIC STATES _ 2 p.m. - 4 p.m. The United States Institute of Peace hosts a discussion of a multi-author study, ``Democracy and Counterterrorism: Lessons From the Past," edited by Robert Art and Louise Richardson, which examines thirteen cases across Europe, Latin America, Asia, and the Middle East to assess how democratic states have countered terrorist groups, and what lessons their campaigns offer for democracies currently battling al Qaeda and other global jihadists. Speakers: Robert Art, Brandeis University; Louise Richardson Radcliffe, Institute for Advanced Study, Harvard University; Paul Pillar, Center for Peace and Security Studies, Georgetown University; and Richard Falkenrath New York Police Department. Moderator: Paul Stares, U.S. Institute of Peace. Location: U.S. Institute of Peace 2nd Floor Conference Room 1200 17th St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0139260

WEBB-IRAN _ 2:30 p.m. Senator Jim Webb of Virginia holds media availability to discuss his bill prohibiting the use of funds for military operations in Iran without the consent of Congress. Location: Senate Radio & TV Gallery. Notes: He plans to introduce the bill on the Senate floor at 2 p.m.

KOREA _ 4 p.m. The Congressional Human Rights Caucus and the Congressional Korea Caucus hold a briefing with former Norwegian Prime Minister Kjell Magne Bondevik concerning human rights in North Korea. Location: Room 2255, Rayburn.

WALTER REED-NELSON _ 4:30 p.m. Sen. Ben Nelson holds a news conference following his tour of Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

BAMFORD-IRAN _ 8:10 a.m. Historian James Bamford, author of ``A Pretext for War: 9/11, Iraq and the Abuse of Americas Intelligence Agencies," lectures at American University. Topic: ``Building the Case for War with Iran: What Did Congress and the Media Learn from Iraq?" Location: Ward 2 (Auditorium/Classroom on the lower level of Ward Circle Building), American University, 4400 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

POLAR BEAR-PUBLIC HEARING _ 6 p.m. - 9 p.m. US Fish and Wildlife Service holds public hearing on the 12-month petition finding and proposed rule to list the polar bear as ``threatened throughout its range under the Endangered Species Act. Location: Interior Dept. auditorium, 1849 C. St NW.

LABOR SECRETARY-AWARD _ 7:15 p.m. US Secretary of Labor Elaine Chao delivers remarks and receives an award at a US Hispanic Chamber of Commerce event. Open press. Location: 101 Constitution Ave. NW, Suite 400.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0139261

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, MARCH 5, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

DOJ Probes Arab Bank's Ties To Terrorism Funding 3
Hicks' Military Lawyer Blasted Over Statements Made In Australia 3

Homeland Response:

Holt Seeks Update On FBI's Anthrax Investigation 3
WPost: Florida Encouraging Building Where Hurricanes Likely To Strike Again 3
WPost Says Homeland Security Bill Should Not Be Blocked Over Labor Issue 3

War News:

Bush, Cheney To Deliver Speeches On Iraq, War On Terror 4
US, Iraqi Troops Meet Little Resistance In Push Into Sadr City 4
War Spending Bill Seen As Fraying Democratic Unity 6
Sadr, Mahdi Army Quiescent As US Surge Starts 7
US Said To Do Little To Aid Iraqi Refugees 8
Japan Mulls Extending Iraq Mission 8
Khalilzad Says US Has Not Ruled Out Bilateral Talks At Iraq Summit 8
US Troops Said To Have Fired On Afghan Civilians 9
Taliban Bombing Underscores Purpose Of Cheney Visit 9
Lawmakers Urge Pakistan To Curb Al Qaeda 9

DOJ:

Domenici Says He Contacted US Attorney 10

Criminal Law:

Kremlin Critic Shot In Maryland Thought To Be Robbery Victim. 11
FBI, California AG Investigating Allegedly Corrupt Police Dept .. 11
FBI Agent Maintains Elderly Mob Figure Remains Influential 11
Defendant In DC Death Penalty Case Seeks Mistrial." 12
Federal Law Prevents Prosecutors From Charging Olsen With Murder 12
Gibbons Retains Top Criminal Lawyer 12
Whereabouts Of Nearly One In Five Released Texas Sex Felons Unknown 12
FBI Now Able Crack Mortgage Fraud Cases More Quickly 13
Sarbanes-Oxley Used To Prosecute Lawyer Tied To FBI Child Porn Probe 13
D'Amato To Lobby For Poker Players Alliance 13
Florida Sex Offender Center Shows Record Of Failure 13
Former Teen Welfare Mother Poised To Become DC Police Chief 13

Civil Law:

Measure Curbing Federal Procurement Access For Former Officials Clears Committee 14

Civil Rights:

DOJ Official To Lead Racial Healing Discussions In Omaha 14
Plaintiffs Await Ruling On Georgia Tech Policies 14
Disabled Attorney Helps Others With Disabilities 15
NAACP President Resigns 15
Role Of Education In Black Achievement Examined 15
NYTimes Urges Legislative Review Of New York's Civil Confinement Agreement 16

Antitrust:

Environmental Concerns Feature Into TXU Buyout Deal 16
IP Verdicts Exceeded $1.3 Billion In 2006 16
Federal Judge Rejects Recusal Motion In Music Price-Fixing Case 16
Alcatel-Lucent To Appeal Dismissal Of Microsoft Patent Dispute 17
Patent Office To Review Applications Online 17

Indian Affairs:

Cherokee Nation Slave Descendents Face Uncertainty After Ouster 17

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Ahead Of Bush Visit, FBI Investigates Salvadoran Legislators' Murder In Guatemala 18
Mueller Starts Reading List For FBI 18
Fourteen-Year-Old's Murder Spurs Crackdown On Los Angeles Gangs 18
Attorneys, Jurors Reflect On Failed Prosecution Of DC's Largest Drug Seizure 18
Louisiana Cocaine Dealer Facing Life In Prison 19
Reporting Continues On Multistate Investigation Of Online Drug Sales 19
"Grow Houses" Seen As National Trend In Marijuana Trade 19
California Man Sentenced To Nearly 6 Years In Prison In "Pot-Candy" Case 20
Mexican Drug Cartels Shift To Overland Trafficking Routes 20
Central America Called Crucial Way Station In Cocaine Trade .. 20

Immigration:

Bush Said To Have Final Chance To Overhaul Immigration Laws ... 20

Tax:

Absent Congressional Action, AMT Could Affect 23 Million ... 20

Congress-Administration:

Congress Takes Up Problems At Walter Reed Today ... 21
Gates "Greeted As A Liberator" At Pentagon ... 22
Cheney Praises Bolton's Service At UN ... 22
Paulson Sounds Optimistic Note On US Economy ... 22
Homeless Veterans, Hard To Count, May Not Get Aid They Need ... 22
Sanchez Said To Face Tests On Her Substance As Public Official ... 23
Thune's Help For South Dakota Firm Seen As Symptomatic Of GOP Problems ... 23
Navy Said To Be Getting Rid Of Useful Warships ... 23
Some See Message About Bush In New Movie About Ancient Greece ... 23
NYTimes Urges Congress To Address Problems In Credit Industry ... 24

Other News:

Increasingly, Uninsured Belong To Middle Class ... 24
Estimates Of Oil Reserves Rise As Technology Revives Old Fields ... 24
Romney Gets Straw Poll Victory From Skeptical Conservatives 24
Bush's Woes May Boost Giuliani Quest For GOP Nomination ... 25
Clinton, Obama Commemorate 42nd Anniversary Of Selma March ... 26
Clinton Warns Of Dangers From Foreign Debt ... 28
Bloomberg Said To Be Considering Run As Third Party Candidate ... 28
Kucinich Waits For Campaign To Catch On With Public ... 28
Richardson Wins Praise From Republican Watts ... 28
Dean, Martinez To Meet On Primary Schedule ... 28
DeLay Seeks To Rally Conservatives ... 28
Rothenberg Says Collins Faces Tough, But Winnable Race ... 28
Beverly Hills Official Set To Become Highest-Ranking Iranian American ... 29
Former Senator Eagleton Dies At 77 ... 29
WPost Praises Virginia Law On Court-Appointed Lawyers' Fees 29
Bush To Face Questions On Economic Policies In Latin America 29
US To Offer Pyongyang "Face-Saving" Nuclear Plan ... 30
Lawmakers Complain Of Weak US Intelligence ... 30
Iran, Saudi Summit Produces "Little Substance." ... 30
Palestinian Leaders Seek To Finalize Unity Government ... 31
Bush "Inner Circle" Split Over Doha Talks ... 31
Beijing Announces 18% Increase In Military Spending ... 31
Brown Expected To Effect "Big Change" In British Foreign Policy 32
"Human Rights" Clause Blocking EU-India Trade Accord ... 32
Killings Said To Have Exposed Rampant Lawlessness In Central America ... 32
Ivory Coast's President, Rebels Sign Accord ... 32
Sweden Cited As Example For Pension Reform ... 33
Left Accused Of Double Standard On Civil Rights ... 33
Diehl Urges Turkey To "Shrug" Off US Genocide Resolution ... 33
Congress Urged To Protect Rights Of War Medics ... 33
EU Market Commissioner Urges Reforms ... 33
NYTimes Celebrates ICC Moves Against Genocide ... 33
NYTimes Praises Drug Firm's Action Against Malaria In Africa ... 33
WSJournal Criticizes EU Action Against Microsoft ... 34

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 34

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 35

DOJ_NMG_0139263

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Probes Arab Bank's Ties To Terrorism Funding. The Los Angeles Times (3/4, Meyer, 850K) reports, "A three-year investigation into the activities of" Arab Bank, "one of the Middle East's largest and most influential" banks, is "producing extensive evidence of how tens of millions of dollars have flowed from wealthy Saudi Arabians to Palestinian groups that allegedly used some of the money to pay off suicide bombers and their survivors." DOJ "is conducting a criminal investigation into the New York branch of Arab Bank, which is based in Jordan, and its financial links to organizations and individuals accused of terrorism, according to three former U.S. counter-terrorism officials." The Times notes that in 2005, Arab Bank "agreed to pay the federal government $24 million in fines for violating U.S. laws aimed at preventing terrorist financing. … The bank is also being sued in federal court in Brooklyn by Americans and Israelis injured in suicide bombings or other fighting in Israel and the occupied territories."

Hicks' Military Lawyer Blasted Over Statements Made In Australia. The New York Times (3/5, Bonner, 1.16M) reports Col. Morris D. Davis, the chief prosecutor at Guantánamo Bay, "has lashed out at the military lawyer for one of the detainees." Davis said Maj. Michael Mori of the United States Marine Corps, "should not be making public appearances in Australia in uniform on behalf of his client, David Hicks, and that he faced possible prosecution for some of his remarks." Davis is quoted as saying, "I don't know what Major Mori's plans are right now but if he wants to come back home and represent his client, that would be helpful. … Certainly in the U.S. it would not be tolerated having a U.S. marine in uniform actively inserting himself into the political process. It is very disappointing to see that happening in Australia, and if that was any of my prosecutors, they would be held accountable." Major Mori, "who was in Australia this past week, for the seventh time in three years, reacted with anger. 'Are they trying to intimidate me?' he said in a telephone interview on Sunday."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Holt Seeks Update On FBI's Anthrax Investigation. The AP (3/5) reports Rep. Rush Holt "wants hearings into what he says is a lack of headway in the FBI's investigation into the deadly anthrax attacks of 2001. 'It seems to me this investigation is not making progress. I can't say for sure. They won't brief me,' Holt told The Times of Trenton for Saturday newspapers. 'Not briefing Congress on the status of the probe into the biggest biological attack in United States history is inexcusable,' he said. … Over the years, Holt has been a vocal critic of the bureau's handling of the case, especially because anthrax contamination was found in mail facilities in and near Holt's district. Holt on Friday called on four committee chairmen and one subcommittee chairman in the House to hold oversight hearings into the investigation. … Several earlier attempts to receive information failed. In September and October 2006, Holt formally requesting that the FBI brief Congress on the investigation. He was denied."

WPost: Florida Encouraging Building Where Hurricanes Likely To Strike Again. The Washington Post (3/5, A14, 690K) editorializes, "America has a bad habit of building in areas that don't make sense environmentally or actuarially" that "has been aided and abetted by public officials who bend to the will of developers and their customers, despite storms, floods, earthquakes and other natural calamities that destroy lives and break banks. The latest example of this can be found in Florida. By rolling back insurance rates, spreading the risk and fiddling with its catastrophe fund, the Sunshine State has invited more development in dangerous places." The Post states that "in keeping a campaign promise to cut rates, Gov. Charlie Crist (R) and the legislature not only are gambling with the state's fiscal future but also are giving people an incentive to keep putting themselves in harm's way."

WPost Says Homeland Security Bill Should Not Be Blocked Over Labor Issue. The Washington Post (3/5, A14, 690K) editorializes President Bush "shouldn't veto" the Senate's "generally sensible homeland security bill" over a provision to provide union rights for TSA screeners, and Republicans "shouldn't vote to sustain if he does. Other employees of the Department of Homeland Security enjoy the benefits of collective bargaining without endangering Americans' safety. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), who sponsored the bill, points out that TSA employees have unnecessarily limited access to redress, which contributes to the TSA's high turnover, high absenteeism and low morale. Meanwhile, there's a lot more to the bill than this one provision." The Post goes on to commend the bill's sponsors for excluding "a requirement that all sea cargo containers be scanned for harmful materials before entering the United States. … A pilot program testing the mere feasibility of scanning all containers is far from complete."

DOJ_NMG_0139264

WAR NEWS:

Bush, Cheney To Deliver Speeches On Iraq, War On Terror. The Washington Times (3/5, Ward, 88K) reports, "Both President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney will give speeches in the next few days on the war on terrorism, to the applause of Republicans who say the White House needs to be more aggressive in selling the successes in Iraq." Bush "will speak on Iraq and the war against terrorism tomorrow in a speech to the American Legion. Mr. Cheney will speak today to the Veterans of Foreign Wars legislative convention. A senior Bush administration official, however, said that 'more than anything else, the actions on the ground in Iraq, part in Baghdad, are going to dictate how it's interpreted, so, the president, we view his role in this is to give the broader context.' Politically, the White House is happy that the center of the Iraq war debate has shifted to Capitol Hill, giving the Democrats the chance to fail on their campaign promises to end the war."

US, Iraqi Troops Meet Little Resistance In Push Into Sadr City. ABC World News (3/4, story 4, 1:35, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "In Iraq today US troops moved into Sadr City, the vast and volatile Shiite neighborhood, a stronghold of the radical religious leader Muqtada al Sadr. This is the latest step in the new security operation which is designed to bring Baghdad under control." ABC (McCarthy) noted Sadr City is "the stronghold of the anti-American cleric Muqtada al Sadr. And what was perhaps most surprising was that they actually met little or no resistance. Some had thought that Sadr's men would fight the Americans, but it now appears the militias have been told to lie low during the American surge."

Similarly, USA Today (3/5, Davis, 2.27M) calls the raid a "critical step in the new Baghdad security plan," and says Mahdi Army "militants have displayed little resistance to the security campaign. Sunday was no exception: US forces swept through the eastern corner of Sadr City with barely a sign of opposition."

The Washington Post (3/5, A11, Raghavan, 690K) reports "the operation represented the most serious effort yet by the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to neutralize the Mahdi Army." Maliki "has for months faced intense US pressure to send troops into Sadr City and assert the government's authority." But "he has long avoided doing so because Sadr, who controls six ministries and 30 seats in parliament, is his political benefactor." Sunday's push "occurred only after Sadr had agreed to support Maliki's new Baghdad security plan, Iraqi officials said, and after negotiations with civil leaders and Sadr's representatives on the role of US troops in Sadr City." Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a US military spokesman, said, "It is a multi-day operation, continuing operation. … We do not go and do this just to leave."

The Los Angeles Times (3/5, Susman, 850K) reports Sadr City's "fearsome reputation and political clout had rendered it largely off-limits to US and Iraqi government troops for nearly three years." The Times refers to a "limited raid, in the Jamila section of the sprawling slum," which "raised the question of how long things will stay quiet, given the opposition to foreign troops of anti-US Shiite cleric…Al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia took control of Sadr City's streets after the US-led invasion of Iraq in 2003." The Times adds, "More than 600 US soldiers and 550 Iraqi troops, backed by a column of armored vehicles, took part in Sunday's operation, described as a first step toward establishing a permanent US-Iraqi security station within Sadr City."

US Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said on CNN's Late Edition (3/4, Blitzer), "We don't know whether he's had a change of heart, but certainly there is a change in tactics. He is lying low. Many of his supporters have left, particularly the commanders, Sadr City. The mayor of Sadr City welcomed the coalition forces today and promised to cooperate with it as they went along with the Iraqi forces there. This is a good thing that he is not resisting the coalition at this time. But what is needed over the long term is for the Sadr movement, for Muqtada al-Sadr, to embrace the political process and to give up on militias and on violence."

The CBS Evening News (3/4, story 4, :10, Attkisson, 7.66M) didn't note the offensive into Sadr City, but reported that "the US military said today two Marines and a sailor have been killed, raising the US death toll to 3,170."

"Surge" Said To Be Reducing Insurgent Violence. On ABC World News (3/4, story 4, 1:35, 8.78M), Terry McCarthy said, "I have just come back into Baghdad after a month away, and what has struck me is how much calmer the city feels now than before I left. It is far from perfect -- today Baghdad had two car bombs and several roadside bombs, and tonight we can hear mortars falling in the south of the city. But during the day, the streets are definitely more crowded, and many locals told us they feel much safer moving around their own neighborhoods. The police tell us the number of dead bodies turning up on the streets is dropping sharply. All this, however, pales in comparison to Kurdistan in the north, where we spent most of last week. The economy is booming up there, and the security situation is almost perfect."

Mohammed and Omar Fadhil, who write a blog, IraqTheModel.com, from Baghdad, say in today's Wall Street Journal (3/5, A17, 2.04M), "The new strategy to secure Baghdad has been dubbed by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki as 'Operation Imposing the Law.' After weeks of waiting and anxiety it is finally underway, and early signs are encouraging. The government information campaign and the news about thousands of additional troops coming had a positive impact even before the operation started. … The brightest image of the past two weeks was the scene of displaced families returning home; more than a thousand families are back to their homes under the protection of the Army and police. This figure invites hope that Baghdad will restore its social, ethnic and religious mosaic. Marketplaces are seeing more activity and stores that were long shuttered are reopening -- including even some liquor stores that came under vicious attacks in the past." This "is a sign that extremists no longer can intimidate people and hold the city hostage. All of this gives the sense that law is being imposed."

DOJ_NMG_0139265

The AP (3/5, Lenz) reports on the "new strategy to move some units off big, fortress-like bases and into outposts in Iraq's most violent places. The plan hinges on hopes that increased contact with ordinary Iraqis will help soldiers separate innocent civilians from militants hiding among them, and try to rebuild a battered U.S. image after four years of fighting. The shift also stands as an indirect indictment of the Pentagon's old counterinsurgency plans after years of losing touch with the Iraqi streets - and access to the crucial rumor mills and informants." An open-air clinic produced "dozens of tips. ... Along with the advantages, however, come risks. A coordinated attack last month on the outpost in Tarmiyah, about 30 miles north of Baghdad, killed two soldiers and wounded dozens more."

Iraqi, British Troops Storm Government Offices In Basra. The New York Times (3/5, Semple, 1.16M) reports, "Iraqi special forces and British troops stormed the offices of an Iraqi government intelligence agency in the southern city of Basra on Sunday, and British officials said they discovered about 30 prisoners, some showing signs of torture." The raid "appeared to catch Iraq's central government by surprise and raised new questions about the rule of law in the Shiite-dominated south, where less than two weeks ago Britain announced plans for a significant reduction in its forces because of improved stability." The Times adds, "News of the Basra raid, with its resonant themes of torture and sectarian-driven conflict, coincided" with the Sadr City operation. Maliki "condemned the raid in Basra. He publicly said nothing about the evidence of torture."

10,000 Government Employees Fired Or Reassigned. USA Today (3/5, Jervis, 2.27M) reports, "Iraq's Interior Ministry has fired or reassigned more than 10,000 employees, including high-ranking police, who were found to have tortured prisoners, accepted bribes or had ties to militias, a ministry spokesman has disclosed." A "soon-to-be-released internal inquiry also details 41 incidents of human rights abuse at the ministry. In one case, four members of the national police hanged prisoners from a ceiling and beat them with sticks in a ministry-run prison known as Site 4, according to the report by the ministry's inspector general."

"Plan B" If "Surge" Fails Could Entail Containing Civil War, Redeployment Outside Baghdad. The Washington Post (3/5, A1, DeYoung, Ricks, 690K) reports on its front page, "During a White House meeting last week, a group of governors asked President Bush and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, about their backup plan for Iraq. What would the administration do if its new strategy didn't work? The conclusion they took away, the governors later said, was that there is no Plan B." While "senior officials have rebuffed questions about other options in the event of failure... the subject is on a lot of minds inside and outside the government. 'I would be irresponsible if I weren't thinking about what the alternatives might be,' Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates acknowledged last month to Congress, where many favor gradual or immediate withdrawal." Gates "did not elaborate. Several administration officials, while insisting that a wide range of options was discussed before Bush's Jan. 10 announcement, firmly closed the door on the subject of fallback plans. … National security experts outside the government have stepped into the void, offering detailed options through public papers, speeches and policy proposals over the past several weeks." Stephen D. Biddle, "a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations and an adviser to the Defense Department," said, "The ultimate Plan B is pull everybody out. … Nobody wants to do that. Most are looking at the middle ground between surge and pullout." The Post adds, "Most options involve partial or complete US redeployment from Baghdad and other violent urban centers, followed by containment of the civil war within Iraq's borders. … A related option would involve redeploying US forces to the relative safety of the Kurdish region in northern Iraq, to more peaceful areas in the south and to Anbar in the west, where they could focus on fighting al-Qaeda."

Meanwhile, on the Los Angeles Times (3/5, 850K), Harvard professor Samantha Power writes, "Some defenders of…Bush's approach...have now settled on genocide warnings after each of their original justifications for being in Iraq -- weapons of mass destruction, terrorism prevention, energy diversification, regional stabilization and democracy promotion — has crumbled one by one. Other proponents of remaining in Iraq...are genuinely frightened that, as ferocious as the civil war there has become, a U.S. withdrawal could unleash an all-out slaughter." Power argues instead, "We must announce our intention to depart and use the intervening months to prioritize civilian protection by pursuing a bold set of measures combining political pressure, humanitarian relocation and judicial deterrence." If US political pressure on Maliki fails, "the US should go further and announce its willingness to assist in the voluntary transport and relocation of Iraqi civilians in peril. ... Finally, if we are serious about preventing further sectarian horrors, the US must send a clear signal to the militias and political leaders who order or carry out atrocities that they will be brought to justice for their crimes."

DOJ_NMG_0139266

Tancredo Says Bush Has Signaled US Pullout May Begin In November. Rep. Tom Tancredo said on CNN's Late Edition (3/4, Blitzer), "I remember Gen. Casey specifically in front of a Senate committee saying that he had talked with every single commander on the ground. Not one of them supported such an increase or believed that it was necessary, and in fact, would be counterproductive because it would only make the Iraqis more dependent on the United States. ... I think that the increase in the number of troops that we've sent to Iraq is simply the beginning of the end game. We are leaving Iraq. We are leaving there relatively soon. ... I don't know why a lot of people haven't focused on this, but" President Bush "said, I'm establishing a benchmark. And that benchmark is November. And by November, he said, every single province -- 18 provinces -- in Iraq will be under control of the Iraqi government. Well, to me, that is a pretty strong statement to anybody who's listening that that's the end of the line."

War Spending Bill Seen As Fraying Democratic Unity. Roll Call (3/5, Davis, Pierce) reports, "The still-evolving bill to pay for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan has rapidly become a political headache for Democratic and GOP leaders, as the debate over what to include in the measure has exacerbated intraparty tensions in both chambers." The House Appropriations Committee "could mark up the $100-plus billion emergency supplemental spending bill as early as Thursday, but knowledgeable Democratic aides cautioned last week that the schedule has not been confirmed and could spill into the week of March 12. … While Democratic leaders have emphasized their party's unity on the mid-February resolution condemning the proposed troop increase, the supplemental measure is already straining that accord." The divisions "have presented a serious test for Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) leadership, as well as for Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.), who must shepherd the legislation. … Meanwhile, Senate Republicans said the Democrats' apparent inability to forge a consensus on how to address the Iraq War in the supplemental and in other ways made their opposition to funding restrictions or cuts much easier."

Murtha Says US Doesn't Have The Troops To Sustain Iraq War Effort. Rep. John Murtha said on NBC's Meet The Press (3/4, Russert), "The other day, Gen. Pace, the chief of the Joint Chiefs, said, 'Look, you're going to hurt the troops deployment overseas if you do what Murtha wants to do.' ... What he didn't talk about was our strategic reserve, what he didn't talk about was we're sending troops back without a year at home, what he didn't talk about was the fact they're going in without the equipment they need to fight in combat. That's unconscionable, and the Congress is going to stop that. The White House is finally beginning to recognize they don't have the troops, as I predicted they wouldn't have, to sustain this deployment. They certainly don't have the troops to increase and to have a surge without breaking every rule that they set. ... We're caught in a civil war. ... There's no way that we can continue our troops in harm's way in a civil war. I supported an extra 200,000 troops in Vietnam when I came back from Vietnam. It didn't work. This is not working."

Senators' Opinions On Iraq Resolution Break Along Party Lines. Senate Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin said on CBS' Face The Nation (3/4, Schieffer), "There's going to be a resolution, which we believe will get the support of almost every Democrat, and hopefully a few Republicans, because this should not be a partisan issue, which will modify the authorization so that our mission in Iraq is more limited. It will not be combat in the middle of Baghdad. It will be a transition to a more limited mission of supporting the Baghdad army, training and logistics of that army. And we will, of course, have a limited presence for a targeted counterterrorism mission, as well as trying to see if we can provide some support for the borders of Iraq."

Sen. Charles Schumer said on ABC's This Week (3/4, Stephanopoulos), "We are coming to a very broad consensus...that we ought to change the mission. The mission in Iraq has devolved into policing a civil war, having our troops walk up and down Haifa Street, as the Sunnis and Shiites who have hated each other for centuries shoot at one another. We want to change it, to have a much more narrow focus, and that is on counter-terrorism as well as force protection. ... We're hoping to get close to unanimity, like we did on the surge resolution, that requires the President to change that mission, so that we focus on what Americans always wanted to focus on: counter-terrorism."

Sen. Christopher Dodd said on CNN's Late Edition (3/4, Blitzer), "Obviously this is a civil war going on, and expecting US forces to be a referee in civil war in large urban areas -- Baghdad has six million people -- with some 18 to 21,000 groups on the ground doesn't make a lot of sense to many people. ... I think it's going to be incumbent upon the Iraqis themselves to pull this together."

Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott said on ABC's This Week (3/4, Stephanopoulos), "This is about the Congress trying to micromanage the situation. When the going gets tough, they're trying to figure out how to get out. And they can't get their act together on how to defund the troops, so they're having all these different approaches. You had the Biden resolution, the Levin resolution, the Pelosi-Reid resolution, the Murtha slow-bleed resolution. ... They can't get it together."

DOJ_NMG_0139267

Sen. Lindsey Graham said on NBC's Meet The Press (3/4, Russert), "People are frustrated. They're beginning to doubt whether the Iraqis can get their act together among themselves. Are we're in the middle of a group of people, no matter how long we stay and how much money we spend and how many Americans are killed, are they capable of pulling this off? I think people doubt that. ... The biggest mistake we made early on was underselling how hard it would be. I think people have lost sight due to frustration, that it's part of the overall war on terror. The President's going forward based on an assumption that a failed state in Iraq is a mighty blow in the overall war on terror. ... Thank God there's not 535 commander-in-chiefs, there's only one."

Sen. Jon Kyl said on CNN's Late Edition (3/4, Blitzer), "There are elements of Shiite and Sunni people fighting each other, to be sure, but some of that was spawned by Al Qaeda deliberately trying to get the Shiites to strike back at Sunnis. ... What I heard when I was in Baghdad just about 12 days ago, both from the Iraqi leaders and also from our military commanders on the ground, early signs of success that this new strategy could work and was beginning to work."

Sen. Joseph Lieberman, again disagreeing with the Democratic majority, said on CBS' Face The Nation (3/4, Schieffer), "I don't think the resolution makes sense insofar as, look, if people want to stop this war, the way that the Constitution gives Congress authority to do it is to stop the funding. They won't do that, because there's not the support for it and they don't want to seem to be not supporting our troops. ... I wish instead of going into this kind of trench warfare, parliamentary partisan battling in Congress off and on for the next few months, that instead we do two things. One is concentrate on something all of us agree on, which is fixing the unacceptable, immoral gaps in our treatment system for the veterans who have fought in Iraq and Afghanistan. Second, we've got in Iraq now a new plan, additional troops, a new general. ... Let's have a truce in the political war here in Washington over the war in Iraq so we can give our general and our troops the opportunity to show some success in the real war in Iraq."

Public Opinion Shift Seen As Aiding Democrats, Hurting McCain. The Washington Times (3/5, Bellantoni, Miller, 88K) reports, "As the war in Iraq and the broader battle against terror were being fought abroad, the political calculus at home changed, with public opinion shifting to favor the Democrats on an issue that long had been a Republican winner." Republicans "won the 2002 and 2004 elections in part because voters were convinced that Democrats were weak on defense and lacked the political will to protect the U.S. from terrorists. That changed as the war in Iraq grew more unpopular -- a major factor in the sweeping Democratic gains last fall, allowing the party to regain congressional power." The Times adds, "Anti-war sentiment has been bolstered lately, with polls showing the majority of Americans disapproving of President Bush's plan to send a 'surge' of 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Most surveyed instead want to see troops withdrawn from Iraq with varying degrees of dispatch." The war has also "turned the Republican presidential race on its head, dragging down the popularity of one-time front-runner and war hawk Sen. John McCain of Arizona and bolstering anti-war candidates. 'I would much rather lose a campaign than lose a war,' Mr. McCain has said in defending his stance of wanting to send more troops to Iraq. The senator told The Washington Times he sees his party's rank and file recoiling from Democrats' anti-war rhetoric. 'Where I've been traveling -- which is talking to Republicans -- the Republican base is coming back and supporting the president because the Democrats have overreached,' said Mr. McCain, a decorated Vietnam veteran."

Sadr, Mahdi Army Quiescent As US Surge Starts. Newsweek (3/12, Nordland, 3.12M) reports Shiite leader Moqtada al-Sadr "has all but disappeared from the Iraqi scene the past three weeks, and Sadr's Mahdi Army has been notably quiet, too. Officially, the Iraqi government is attributing that to the new Baghdad security plan, part of a surge of forces that will eventually include 21,500 new American troops." But one Iraqi official "says what's really happening is the taming of Moqtada." Despite an "upsurge in suicide bombings by Sunni extremists, mostly aimed at Shia civilians, the number of reprisal killings is down dramatically since the security plan was launched on Feb. 14." The senior Iraqi official "credits pressure on Sadr from his former patrons in Iran, as well as from Ayatollah Sistani and the Marjaiyah, the Shia clerical leadership in Najaf. He says Iran is withholding military advice and aid to Sadrists as well as other rogue elements, and leaning on them to stop the killings." Some analysts "worry that Sadr and Shia extremists are just biding their time. But as additional U.S. troops arrive during the next two months, that may prove an uncomfortable wait."

IED Remains Biggest Threat To US Troops. U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Kingsbury, 2.03M) reports the letters IED, "for improvised explosive device, have become forever associated with the war in Iraq. These weapons are the greatest day-to-day threat to U.S. forces. The military reported that at least 60 U.S. troops have been killed in IED attacks so far this year (the military doesn't report the cause of death in all instances). IEDs were responsible for more than half of American hostile-fire deaths in the past 12 months." The military has "struggled to develop practices and gear to counter the IED threat, with an array of devices designed to trigger the bombs prematurely or render them harmless."

DOJ_NMG_0139268

Kennedy Says It Will Take Congress Time To Affect Iraq Policy. Time (3/12, Calabresi, 4.03M) interviewed Sen. Edward Kennedy. Asked why, since Democrats "have the country with them against the war in Iraq," they "aren't acting to end it?" Kennedy said, "This war is the major blunder in American foreign policy. We ought to free ourselves from our troop involvement. But if you look back on Vietnam, it wasn't until 1973 that we passed the resolution that actually halted troops and money. There's no question that this is a slow-moving institution, and it's no new statement to say that we are behind what's happening out in the countryside."

US Said To Do Little To Aid Iraqi Refugees. Time (3/12, Calabresi, 4.03M) reports the war in Iraq "has driven nearly 4 million people from their homes. As many as 2 million have fled the country, in what Refugees International calls the fastest-growing crisis in the world." The burden "of coping with this exodus has fallen most heavily on Iraq's neighbors, such as Syria, Jordan and Iran, who have absorbed the vast majority of exiles. But the war's reverberations are being felt beyond the Middle East, in places as seemingly distant and incongruous as Sweden, which has taken in more than 11,000 Iraqis since 2005." The US, however, "has been reluctant to open its doors, admitting just 18 Iraqi refugees in 2005 and 202 in 2006." Although the Bush Administration "has offered to cover about a third of the $60 million that the U.N. says is needed for the refugees, the US's European and Arab allies think Washington should cover far more of the costs resulting from what they view as America's war."

Syria Playing Large Role In Aiding Refugees. Time (3/12, Butters, 4.03M) reports the Iraqi-refugee issue "is also changing Syria in deeper ways, altering the country's image in the Middle East -- and bolstering its leverage with the U.S. While the Bush Administration has accused it of supporting terrorism in Iraq, Israel and Lebanon, Syria has established itself as the lifeboat of the Arab world. Having taken in 180,000 temporary Lebanese refugees fleeing the war with Israel last summer, Syria is the only Arab country that has been equally welcoming to all of Iraq's religious sects, according to Syrian human-rights groups. Only Jordan -- which has received 750,000 Iraqis but has stopped accepting more -- comes close to matching Syria's largesse."

Sweden Accepting More Iraqi Refugees. Time (3/12, Walt, 4.03M) reports Sweden, a "country of 9 million has long prided itself on being one of the world's most hospitable to foreigners fleeing war and hardship." But "nothing could have prepared Swedes for the numbers of Iraqis who are pouring in today." Having "granted asylum to 2,330 Iraqis in 2005, Sweden received nearly four times that many last year." With Iraq's "civil war still raging, Swedish officials say they are bracing for a possible 35,000 this year."

Japan Mulls Extending Iraq Mission. The AP (3/5) reports, "Japan's top government spokesman said Monday that Tokyo is undecided about whether to extend the nation's air force mission in Iraq when it expires in July, but that a decision is expected by the end of this month. Tokyo has been airlifting U.N. and coalition personnel and supplies into Baghdad and other Iraqi cities from nearby Kuwait since last year as part of efforts to support the reconstruction of Iraq. The mission is set to end July 31, and debate is already gearing up about whether Tokyo will continue its contributions to a war increasingly unpopular at home. ... some in Japan criticize the operations for violating the pacifist constitution, which prohibits the use of force in solving international disputes."

Khalilzad Says US Has Not Ruled Out Bilateral Talks At Iraq Summit. Ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, told CNN's Late Edition (3/4, Blitzer), "This is a multilateral meeting at the invitation of Iraq. Of course, the purpose is to get the neighbors to contribute to stabilizing Iraq, to work with the Iraqi government with regard to its agenda for success in Iraq. And we have not decided, at this point, with regard to anything bilateral, but we will be prepared to play our role as constructively as possible."

Similarly, the Washington Times (3/5, 88K) reports, "US and Iranian officials, in separate remarks yesterday, both left open the possibility of bilateral talks on the sidelines of a regional meeting this week in Baghdad." The Times notes Ambassador Khalilzad's remarks to CNN and reports that Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammed Ali Hosseini, "meanwhile, said his country has not decided whether it will attend the Baghdad conference but did not rule out a decision to meet directly" with Khalilzad."

Meanwhile, Sen. Jon Kyl said on CNN's Late Edition (3/4, Blitzer), "It's important that the Iraqis are calling this group of their neighbors together, to urge them to help Iraq become a stable society. And clearly...we have an interest in conveying to the Iranians our displeasure with their sponsorship of weapons and elements of violence within Iraq. And I think it is important for us to convey that message to them."

Sen. Christopher Dodd said on CNN's Late Edition (3/4, Blitzer), "This should have happened a long time ago. We've had more than a year of the Administration refusing to sit down and talk with anybody, except our friends in the region, no wanting to talk to the Syrians or the Iranians. So I welcome that. I hope it's not too late."

House Intelligence Committee member Pete Hoekstra said on Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "If you take a look at the bigger picture -- their activities with the nuclear weapons program, their relationships with Hamas, Hezbollah, their activities in Iraq -- Iran is clearly somebody that we need to be very, very concerned about. ... We need to focus on them and I think some of the changes and some of the steps that are being taken by the Administration are very positive."

DOJ_NMG_0139269

US Troops Said To Have Fired On Afghan Civilians. The CBS Evening News (3/4, story 3, :20, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "There are charges that US forces fired on Afghan civilians in the chaotic aftermath of a suicide bomb attack on a US military convoy in Afghanistan today. Afghan witnesses and gunshot victims say as many as ten Afghan victims were killed and 34 wounded. A US spokesman says it's unclear what happened."

ABC World News (3/4, story 3, 2:10, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "This is a delicate and dangerous moment in Afghanistan. A time when US troops are trying to both prepare for and pre-empt an expected spring offensive from the Taliban. And today at this crucial moment there was an incident that could further turn public opinion against Americans."

The New York Times (3/5, Gall, 1.16M) reports "American and Afghan officials said" US troops "opened fire on a highway filled with civilian cars and bystanders on Sunday." The US military "said the unit came under fire after a suicide bomber detonated his explosive-laden car near their convoy 'as part of a complex ambush involving enemy small-arms fire from several directions.' Members of the unit, on patrol near Jalalabad airfield, returned fire, and the civilians were killed and wounded in the cross-fire during the battle, according to a statement from the military press office at Bagram Air Base, 40 miles north of Kabul." The Washington Times/AP (3/5, Faiez), Washington Post (3/5, A11, Witte, 690K) and Los Angeles Times (3/5, Azimi, King, 850K) also reports the story.

Karzai Urged To Sign Amnesty Law. Richard May, a former captain with the Army's 82nd Airborne Division who served in Afghanistan and Iraq, and is now a fellow at the World Security Institute's Center for Defense Information, writes in the New York Times (3/5, 1.16M), "Late last month some 25,000 people held a rally in the Afghan capital, Kabul. Were they calling for more aid?" They "were urging President Hamid Karzai to sign a law providing legal amnesty for actions committed during the civil war that raged in Afghanistan during and after the Soviet occupation. While the law has passed both houses of Afghanistan's Parliament, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and several humanitarian groups have argued against it on the grounds that it eliminates any possibility for justice for the people killed, tortured and raped during that awful period." May says "Karzai should sign the law." The "fragile government in Kabul cannot focus on dividing its country over past acts. It must look to the future with a vision that accepts all elements of its society." Karzai "should err on the side of unity."

Taliban Bombing Underscores Purpose Of Cheney Visit. Time (3/2, Baker, 4.03M) reports the "suicide bomber outside the main U.S. military base in Afghanistan on Feb. 27 killed about two dozen people -- and underscored the mission of Dick Cheney, who had arrived less than 24 hours earlier to meet with Afghan President Hamid Karzai." The Vice President "had just come from Pakistan, where he urged President Pervez Musharraf to crack down on the activities of the Taliban -- which claimed responsibility for the attack, saying it was timed to Cheney's visit--and al-Qaeda." Musharraf is "in a bind. Even if he doubled the number of troops on the border, says a Western diplomat in Pakistan, it would probably just exacerbate regional violence by fueling antigovernment sentiment."

Newsweek (3/12, Hirsh, Yousafzai, 3.12M) reports the "Feb. 27 attack on Baghram air base during Cheney's surprise visit was the most vivid reminder to date that, half a decade after they were supposedly vanquished, the Taliban is back in force, along with its onetime Qaeda guests. And the jihadists are now confident enough to launch a frontal suicide assault on the main U.S. stronghold in South Asia." The "Bush team's main concern now is that the Taliban's 'spring offensive' could topple Karzai or turn him into a more isolated figure, hunkered down in Kabul." An "even scarier prospect is that a newly Talibanized Afghanistan, along with sympathetic areas of neighboring Pakistan, could become a launchpad for the next plot against America." Taliban officials "tell NEWSWEEK that they have carved out a huge border zone of their own. And they say Qaeda 'foreigners' -- mainly Arabs bent on killing Westerners -- are being welcomed back into parts of Afghanistan and Pakistan's North Waziristan region, where Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf signed a controversial peace deal with tribal elders last September."

Lawmakers Urge Pakistan To Curb Al Qaeda. The AP (3/5, Yen) reports Pakistan "must do more to stem al-Qaeda in its ungoverned territories amid growing signs operatives plan a spring offensive against allied forces in Afghanistan," lawmakers on the intelligence committees said Sunday.

Senate Intelligence Committee member Dianne Feinstein told Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "The Pakistanis either have to let us go in, or go in themselves when they have intelligence. And I think the kind of half-measures that the Pakistanis have taken in that particular area don't stand us in good stead. There's no question that there's going to be a spring offensive in Afghanistan…and we have to have some pinpoint attacks that produce some dividends."

DOJ_NMG_0139270

Meanwhile, House Intelligence Committee member Pete Hoekstra said on Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "There's no doubt that we've degraded the capabilities of Al Qaeda, but they are regrouping. … We may want Pakistan to do more things. But President Musharraf is facing elections in September. There are parliamentary elections next January. We need stability in the regime. We need this regime to survive. And there's a reason that they've called this the ungoverned areas. No one has really been able to go into these areas and take control, but the Pakistanis have been doing a number of things to help us go after Al Qaeda."

New Al Qaeda's Strength Called Into Question. The Christian Science Monitor (3/5, Grier, 59K) reports, "Hidden in the harsh terrain of Pakistan's tribal lands near the Afghan border, Al Qaeda's senior leaders have quietly been rebuilding their terrorist network – including lines of command to cells in other nations." But "this resurgence does not mean the group has regained its old strength, say US intelligence officials and outside experts. Al Qaeda's top levels are now filled with inexperienced commanders, and its new camps can train only a fraction of the recruits the pre-2001 infrastructure in Afghanistan could handle." Al Qaeda's "goals also remain murky. It is not clear whether the organization has a specific plan to strike within the United States or whether it considers Europe, or Iraq, more important in its war to impose its vision of Islam on the Middle East."

DOJ:

Domenici Says He Contacted US Attorney. The AP (3/5, Talhelm) reports, "New Mexico Sen. Pete Domenici acknowledged Sunday that he called a federal prosecutor to ask about a criminal investigation several months after calling for his replacement, but insisted he never pressured nor threatened his state's US attorney." The prosecutor, David Iglesias, "was fired by the Justice Department in December. Iglesias says he believes he was dismissed for resisting pressure from two members of Congress before last year's election to rush indictments in a Democratic kickback investigation." The AP adds, "Ethics experts said Domenici's conduct may have violated Senate rules, which generally bar communications between members of Congress and federal prosecutors about ongoing criminal investigations.":

The Washington Post (3/5, A1, Eggen, 690K) notes "Iglesias and five other fired prosecutors are scheduled to testify tomorrow before Congress." Iglesias "declined to comment in detail yesterday on Domenici's statement, saying he was refraining from further public remarks before the hearings."

The New York Times (3/5, Johnston, 1.16M) reports "a Justice Department spokesman said on Sunday that records at the agency showed that the senator complained about Mr. Iglesias in calls to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales in September 2005 and again in January and April 2006. The senator made a brief call to Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, in October 2006 when the deliberations over Mr. Iglesias's dismissal began. In each of these calls, said Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, Mr. Domenici expressed general concerns about Mr. Iglesias and questioned whether he was 'up to the job.' Mr. Roehrkasse added, 'At no time did they discuss the public corruption case.'" The Times adds, "A Justice Department official said Mr. Domenici's criticism of Mr. Iglesias was a factor in the decision to remove the prosecutor, adding that the decision was also based on an internal evaluation at Justice Department headquarters regarding his handling of the job."

Newsweek (3/12, Isikoff, 3.12M) reports the "firings of eight U.S. attorneys has put the heat on top Justice Department officials -- and some GOP members of Congress." The "controversy escalated last week when David Iglesias, the former U.S. attorney in New Mexico, went public with a dramatic charge: that he had gotten phone calls from two unidentified GOP lawmakers in D.C. last October, pressing him to bring indictments in a high-profile corruption case involving a prominent local Democrat before the November election." Iglesias "plans to name the lawmakers who called him as Rep. Heather Wilson (who was in a tight re-election battle at the time) and Sen. Pete Domenici (who originally sponsored him for the job)." A senior Justice official "confirmed to NEWSWEEK that Domenici 'did express general concerns' about Iglesias to senior DOJ officials -- but insisted he did not specifically complain about the corruption case." The "decision to fire the U.S. attorneys en masse was made late last year by two top aides to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales -- chief of staff Kyle Sampson and deputy A.G. Paul McNulty -- according to a senior department official."

Feinstein Discusses Upcoming Hearings. Senate Judiciary Committee member Dianne Feinstein said on Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "What's strange about this, never before in history has it happened that in a short given period of time, at least seven were called and told they should resign by a specific date in January. I think that's been pretty well-established. Now, the problem is that the Patriot Act had in it an amendment which gave the ability to the Administration to appoint an interim US attorney permanently, not subject to a limited period of time, pending confirmation. We in the Senate believe it's very important that US attorneys be confirmed by the Senate. That's really what's going on now. Some political things may well emerge. There are going to be a series of hearings...and we'll see what facts emerge. But I think there's a lot of evidence that this was done in a way to bring in some bright young Republican operatives into these positions. We'll see."

DOJ_NMG_0139271

More Commentary. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (3/5) editorializes, "The Bush administration slipped a provision into the USA Patriot Act that Congress renewed last year allowing the attorney general to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods without congressional approval. Previously, such appointments could last for only 120 days. Lawmakers may have figured that the extra leeway might help in rare emergencies." The Sentinel continues, "Well, surprise, surprise. The Justice Department has so far used this provision eight times - and not for emergencies. In a move unprecedented for its scope, the agency has fired eight U.S. attorneys. And indications are that the dismissed prosecutors were too independent, even though President Bush had appointed them. The administration appears to be replacing them with those more pliable. … Congress must stop the purge and reimpose the time limit. Commendably, a House judiciary subcommittee is issuing subpoenas to four of the dismissed prosecutors to appear before it on Tuesday, and the Senate Judiciary Committee is poised to follow suit. Sworn testimony should shed some light on what may be an administration effort to get prosecutors to toe the party line." The Sentinel adds, "The dispute is all the more reason to set the record straight in hearings. … Also, Congress must retract the permission it gave the Justice Department to appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely - permission the administration has abused."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Kremlin Critic Shot In Maryland Thought To Be Robbery Victim. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A7, Perez, Cullison) reports the FBI joined local police investigating the Adelphi, Md shooting of Paul M. Joyal, "an intelligence expert who suggested the Kremlin was involved in the poisoning death of" Alexander Litvinenko. According to the Journal, "A federal law-enforcement official said local police asked for help from the Federal Bureau of Investigation in part because of Mr. Joyal's activities in the Russian emigré community in the U.S. and his views on" the poisoning of Litvinenko." On 'Dateline NBC' Feb. 25, Joyal "said the Litvinenko murder was a message 'to anyone who wants to speak out against the Kremlin: 'If you do, no matter who you are, where you are, we will find you and we will silence you -- in the most horrible way possible.'"

The Financial Times (3/5, Sevastopulo, Belton) reports Oleg Kalugin, a "former senior KGB officer who met a Russia intelligence expert just hours before his shooting…expressed doubt that the incident was related to" the Litvinenko case. The Times adds, "Police have not commented on the shooting. But a law-enforcement official said Mr Joyal, who remains in critical condition, appeared to have been the victim of a robbery. The official said he was shot after resisting two men who had robbed him. The case has raised interest partly because Daniel McGrory, a reporter with The Times who appeared on the same NBC programme as Mr Joyal, died five days before the broadcast. There has been no official an-nouncement about the cause of death but he is believed to have died from a stroke."

The Washington Post (3/5, B1, Rich) reports Joyal "was robbed of his wallet and briefcase, law enforcement sources said yesterday. That property was taken…supports the theory that he was shot during a robbery rather than in retaliation for public criticism of the Kremlin."

The Washington Post (3/4, C1, Rondeaux, Aratani) reported "an FBI official confirmed yesterday that the agency is looking into the shooting. Joseph Persichini Jr., the FBI's assistant director in charge of the Washington field office, said his office is assisting Prince George's and the Baltimore office of the FBI in the investigation. 'We're pursuing this as hard as possible. We're not at all sure of the motive,' Persichini said."

FBI, California AG Investigating Allegedly Corrupt Police Dept. The Los Angeles Times (3/5, Garrison) reports California Atty. Gen. Jerry Brown "has announced plans to conduct a 'top to bottom' review of the Maywood Police Department, following allegations of sexual misconduct, racism and brutality among officers in the small suburb southeast of Los Angeles. The probe, made public Friday, comes amid residents' growing anger toward the 37-member department. Officers have been accused of beating residents and stalking and sexually abusing women. … Critics have charged that the department's afternoon sobriety checks were designed to snare unlicensed illegal immigrants and generate money. About 96% of the city's population is Latino and more than half are foreign born." The Los Angeles County district attorney's office and the FBI "also are investigating the department, Maywood City Councilman Sam Peña said."

FBI Agent Maintains Elderly Mob Figure Remains Influential. The AP (3/5, McShane) reports, "At an age when most of his contemporaries were long out to pasture or in prison, Matty 'The Horse' Ianniello was still riding high. … It was 1997, and big money was rolling in from rackets in Little Italy, the garbage industry, a mobbed-up union local. The silver-haired Ianniello kept $130,000 in cash around his suburban home, adding a touch of green to his golden years. It took almost a decade, but 'The Horse' now faces the last roundup: He pleaded guilty in a pair of racketeering cases last year. Death behind bars is a possibility for the mobster, who eschewed a graceful exit and ignored organized crime history — the boss always becomes the No. 1 target of law enforcement. Even if he's 86 years old. Even if he knows better. … When Ianniello pleaded guilty last year to corrupting a Queens bus drivers union, he arrived in court propped up by a cane. His voice was difficult to understand during his plea; Ianniello's lawyer blamed his client's garbled diction on a stroke. Others were more skeptical, suggesting Ianniello was as healthy as — well, a horse. 'Don't let his age fool you,' said assistant FBI special agent Matt Heron after one of Matty's arrests. 'He's still an influential player.'"

DOJ_NMG_0139272

Defendant In DC Death Penalty Case Seeks Mistrial." The Washington Times (3/4, McElhatton) reports, "The defendant in a rare death-penalty case in the District is asking for a mistrial. Larry Gooch, accused of being the enforcer for the violent M Street Crew drug gang in Northeast, last week asked the federal court judge in the case to declare a mistrial. He claims he is not receiving adequate legal representation. Mr. Gooch said he wants a mistrial because one of his attorneys recently elicited 'damaging' testimony from Metropolitan Police Department Detective Carlton Herndon, according to defense filings. … Testimony began last month and is expected to resume today. U.S. District Judge Rosemary M. Collyer has not ruled on Mr. Gooch's request for a mistrial, according to court filings."

Federal Law Prevents Prosecutors From Charging Olsen With Murder. The AP (3/5) reports, "A federal act is preventing prosecutors from moving forward in the murder case against Timmy Brent Olsen. He was charged with murder last January in the 1995 disappearance and death of 15-year-old Kiplyn Davis. Olsen is in a federal prison in Phoenix, Arizona, serving a 12-year sentence for perjury for lying to a federal grand jury investigating the girl's disappearance. He is appealing that conviction. Prosecutors can't force him to return to face the state murder charges without potentially having to dismiss the charges on a technicality. And Olsen won't sign a waiver of the federal act that is keeping him from facing the Utah charges. Prosecutors say they are willing to wait for him to exhaust his federal appeals, at which time he would have no choice but to face the murder charge."

Gibbons Retains Top Criminal Lawyer. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A6, Wilke, 2.04M) reports, "Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons, facing a federal investigation of whether he accepted improper gifts or payments from a federal contractor, retained Abbe Lowell, one of the nation's best-known criminal defense lawyers." Gibbons "represented Nevada in Congress for five terms before his election as governor last year. He served on the House intelligence and armed services committees, and used his position to help a Reno software maker, eTreppid Technologies LLC, seek federal contracts." Gibbons and eTreppid's owner, Warren Trepp, "said they did nothing improper."

Whereabouts Of Nearly One In Five Released Texas Sex Felons Unknown. The San Antonio Express-News (3/5, Hughes) reports from Austin, TX, "When Anselmo Pruneda Jr. left prison last May, the forwarding address he left to a Houston boarding house almost sounded like an invitation to the cops for tea. … 'O Do Drop In,' he wrote. … No such place exists." The Express-News continues, "Pruneda, who had spent a dozen years in prison related to the sexual assault of a 9-year-old boy and failing to register as a sex offender, didn't register as required with the Houston police, either. … Lawmakers created sex offender registries so people could check how close potential predators lived to their neighborhoods, playgrounds or schools. But these registries are not fool-proof." The Express-News adds, "The Houston Chronicle and San Antonio Express-News examined the whereabouts of more than 800 sex offenders released from prison to Harris or Bexar counties during the 18 months ending last December. … All had been rejected for early release and had served their entire sentences. Almost 20 percent of them either failed to register as sex offenders or their addresses in the state registry were incomplete, 'unknown,' 'absconded' 'out of state' or 'homeless.' … And that's not counting how many false or out-of-date addresses are only detected when too few local police officers try to knock on too many sex-offender doors." The Express-News notes, "More than 46,000 adults in Texas are registered as sex offenders for crimes ranging from indecent exposure to aggravated sexual assault of a child. … As state leaders in Austin clamor to get tough on violent sex offenders who target children, calling for longer sentences with no possibility of parole or possibly the death penalty, police who work with sex offenders say politicians are overlooking a disturbing trend. … Increasingly, sex offenders deemed too dangerous for early parole return home unsupervised once they have completed their entire sentences. And under the current system, they are less scrutinized, not more. … When paroled, sex offenders aren't released until officials verify and approve where they will live. When registering with local authorities, they must prove their address with a state ID card or drivers license. … But sex offenders who complete their sentences can refuse to tell prison authorities where they will live. Or they can claim they will leave Texas or name a location in the vaguest of terms. They still are required to register with local law enforcement upon release, but police say they often go undetected if they don't."

DOJ_NMG_0139273

FBI Now Able Crack Mortgage Fraud Cases More Quickly. The Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News (3/5, Morris) reports, "Mortgage fraud is being called the country's fastest-growing white-collar crime. It costs lenders more than $1 billion a year and has turned increasing numbers of federal agents into experts on real estate paperwork. These days, they quickly crack cases that once took years to work, experts say. Two Kansas City politicians recently learned just how quickly. The very day last fall when Katheryn Shields, who was then county executive in Jackson County, Mo., and her husband signed paperwork selling their home, an FBI agent notified them they were the targets of a criminal investigation involving the sale."

Sarbanes-Oxley Used To Prosecute Lawyer Tied To FBI Child Porn Probe. The AP (3/5, Christoffersen) reports, "The arrest of a prominent attorney on charges of destroying evidence in a child pornography investigation is raising alarm bells that a law targeting corporate accounting schemes could be used to prosecute lawyers over work done on their clients' behalf. … Philip Russell was charged Feb. 16 with destroying a computer that contained child pornography at Christ Church in Greenwich." Russell, "the former attorney for the church, is accused of obstructing an FBI investigation that led to the January conviction of the church's music director, Robert Tate, for possessing child pornography. Russell was charged under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which Congress passed in 2002 after a wave of corporate accounting scandals to make it easier to prosecute such cases. He faces up to 40 years in prison if convicted. … The law, which was aimed at cases involving corporate document shredding, made it easier to prosecute obstruction of justice by requiring only that an investigation was foreseeable rather than already pending. Prosecutors also no longer have to show the defendant acted with corrupt intent to keep evidence from investigators, experts say.

D'Amato To Lobby For Poker Players Alliance. In its technology section, the New York Times (3/5, Rivlin, Richtel, 1.16M) says former Sen. Alphonse D'Amato, who "never folds," went from playing poker on Capital Hill to playing a more high-stakes poker game on Long Island that involves Howard Stern, among others. So, the paper says "it is a safe bet that his love of poker never proved so lucrative as it did last week, when he signed a lobbying deal with the Poker Players Alliance, a nascent group that hopes that Mr. D'Amato will help them become players in Washington politics, too. … The group is hoping that Mr. D'Amato, long known for his connections to Washington insiders and his ability to deliver perks to his constituents and interest groups, can help them overturn a new federal ban on Internet gambling — or at least exempt poker from its provisions." The paper notes, "The first big assault on poker players came in October when President Bush signed a bill aimed at online gambling by making it a crime to use credit cards or online payment systems for poker and other online casino games and sports betting conducted over the Internet."

Florida Sex Offender Center Shows Record Of Failure. The New York Times (3/5, Goodnough, Davey) reports from Arcadia, FL, "Inside a privately run treatment center here for pedophiles and rapists who have completed their prison sentences, where they are supposed to reflect on their crimes and learn to control their sexual urges, bikini posters were pinned to walls. … Two men took their shirts off, rubbed each other's backs and held hands, while others disappeared together into dormitory rooms. Some of the sex offenders appeared to be drunk from homemade 'buck' liquor secretly brewed and sold here. … And some of the center's employees, who openly ignored the breaking of rules ('As long as they are happy, we let them go,' one explained), reported that a high turnover rate among staff members was mostly because of female employees leaving their jobs after having had sex with the offenders." The Times adds, "These and other observations were included in a memorandum composed in 2004 by six employees on loan here from Pennsylvania. They had been dispatched by the Liberty Behavioral Health Corporation, which ran the facility, the Florida Civil Commitment Center, and a facility in Pennsylvania. … Nineteen states have laws that allow them to confine or restrict sex criminals beyond prison in a trend that is expanding around the country, with legislators in New York last week announcing agreement on a new civil commitment law there. … The courts have upheld the constitutionality of such laws in part because they are meant to furnish treatment where possible. Most of the states run their own centers to hold and treat such predators, generally with meager results, but at a time when private solutions are popular for prisons, toll roads and other state functions, a few have teamed with private industry. … Yet as the story of the center here in Arcadia reveals, even a $19 million partnership between the state and a company that describes itself as "a national leader in the field of specialized sex offender treatment and management" failed to meet a central purpose: treating sex offenders so they would be well enough to return to society."

Former Teen Welfare Mother Poised To Become DC Police Chief. The Washington Post (3/5, A1, Klein) reports, "Cathy L. Lanier's career could have dead-ended in her fourth year with the D.C. police department. … A new sergeant, she was sent east of the Anacostia River to the 6th Police District, one of the city's most crime-ridden areas. From the start, things were bad." The Post continues, "Lanier's supervisor, a lieutenant, propositioned her sexually and humiliated her in public by making lewd remarks about her, she said. Once, during a meeting with Lanier and a group of male officers, the lieutenant grabbed her ponytail and made a comment about pulling a woman's hair during sex. … It was 1995, and, Lanier said, she had no clue about the law on sexual harassment. Some officers urged her to file a complaint. But another supervisor warned that the department's good-old-boy culture would ensure that if she took action, she would never be promoted. … She retained a lawyer and, along with another woman making similar allegations, went to court. The city settled their lawsuit, and each woman got $75,000. The lieutenant was shifted to a different police district." The Post adds, "Lanier thought her career was over. But there were no repercussions, she said, because she had a solid track record. 'Your reputation in the department is either as a hard, loyal worker or someone who will do anything to get out of work. I was a worker,' she said." The Post notes, "Now, at 39, she is awaiting D.C. Council confirmation as the city's first permanent female police chief and one of the youngest leaders to head the department. … She has achieved success after struggles in her personal and professional life, including a teenage pregnancy that led her to drop out of high school and an early marriage that failed. Her resiliency will be tested as she inherits a police department in a high-crime city that residents say is out of touch with the community. She is already facing extra scrutiny as a white, female chief of a force that is mostly black and male. … Running the 3,800-member department requires a commanding presence, stamina and the ability to plan while dealing with the inevitable crises. As her predecessor, Charles H. Ramsey, put it: 'There are things coming at you all the time and nobody to pass it off to. The buck stops there.'"

DOJ_NMG_0139274

CIVIL LAW:

Measure Curbing Federal Procurement Access For Former Officials Clears Committee. Under the headline, "Slowing Down The Revolving Door," the Washington Post's (3/5, D1, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "A House committee has approved legislation that would lengthen employment restrictions for federal procurement officials who take certain jobs when they leave government, from one year to two years. It also would prohibit newly hired procurement officials from awarding contracts to their former employers for two years." The Post adds that while House Oversight and Government Reform Committee chairman Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), suggests tighter restrictions "will bring more accountability to government," OMB's procurement policy chief, Paul A. Denett, "argues that the proposed restrictions 'would do great damage' to the government's ability to hire and keep qualified contracting personnel. 'They will have the unintended effect of harming the career prospects of the overwhelming number of honest, experienced government employees and encourage them to leave government service early,' Denett said in a recent letter to Waxman. An estimated 20 percent of the government's 28,000 contracting professionals are eligible to retire, Denett noted."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Official To Lead Racial Healing Discussions In Omaha. The Omaha World-Herald (3/5, Greff) reports, "The arson fire that blew a wall off Bob's Food Mart last month exposed not only the store's contents but also racial tension in the surrounding community of east Omaha. … And as with Hurricane Katrina, underlying problems surfaced, north Omaha leader LaVon Stennis Williams said at a community meeting Sunday at St. Therese of the Child Jesus Catholic Church." The World-Herald continues, "The Feb. 18 robbery and arson at Bob's Food Mart, which police said may have been a racially motivated hate crime, sparked community outcry - and now, an avenue for change. … Two white men robbed the store and ordered Kassahun Goshime, an Ethiopian immigrant, into the basement. His hands and mouth were bound with duct tape and the store was set on fire. Goshime escaped. … His family owns the store. Racist graffiti has been found spray-painted on his home as well as on the store, at 16th and Fort Streets." The World-Herald adds, "Bill Whitcomb, a race relations mediator with the Kansas City office of the U.S. Department of Justice, will be in Omaha next week to lead three discussions on race relations and develop a plan to address the issue, Stennis Williams said. … One of those meetings, a forum scheduled for March 15 at 6:30 p.m., is open to the public. Whitcomb also will lead a meeting with community leaders and another with elected officials. … Stennis Williams said others have told her of racial tensions in the area. … More than two dozen people attended Sunday's community meeting. Contributing to Sunday's discussion were Tommie Wilson, president of the Omaha chapter of the NAACP; Tristan Bonn, Omaha's former public safety auditor; and representatives of the Anti-Defamation League."

Plaintiffs Await Ruling On Georgia Tech Policies. The Washington Times (3/5, Price) reports, "Two women whose 2006 lawsuit against the Georgia Institute of Technology led to the repeal of the school's speech code await a federal judge's opinion on two other unresolved issues in their civil rights case." The Times continues, "Plaintiffs Ruth Malhotra and Orit T. Sklar -- both conservative student leaders at Georgia Tech -- say a ruling is pending by U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester of the Northern District of Georgia on their requests to overturn a school policy that bans funding of religious and political groups with student activity fees and to shut down an administration-run program that challenges biblical doctrine concerning homosexuality. … 'The clock is ticking away' on the rest of Judge Forrester's decision, which 'could come at any time,' said David French, director of the Alliance Defense Fund Center for Academic Freedom, which is representing Miss Malhotra, a graduate student in international affairs from Georgia, and Miss Sklar, a senior in Tech's undergraduate civil-engineering program. … Mr. French describes ADF as a 'Christian public-interest legal organization' that promotes religious liberty on college campuses." The Times adds, "The plaintiffs and ADF brought the lawsuit a year ago, claiming that Tech's policies designed to protect students from intolerance actually discriminated against conservative religious students who speak out against issues such as homosexuality, abortion and feminism. … Miss Malhotra accused Georgia Tech of 'unlawfully promoting its own [left-wing] agenda while stifling the free expression' of students who hold positions the institution does not share. Both women have been active in College Republicans. … A spokesman for Georgia Tech declined last week to discuss the students' suit, saying the case is in the hands of the Georgia state Attorney General's Office."

DOJ_NMG_0139275

Disabled Attorney Helps Others With Disabilities. The Los Angeles Times (3/5, Riccardi) reports from Denver, "Carrie Ann Lucas is confined to a wheelchair. She breathes with the aid of a ventilator. She cannot hear and can see only at close range. … She begins most days about 4 a.m. with newspapers and e-mails. About 5:30, she wakes her three disabled daughters. She and an aide dress the two who use wheelchairs. The girls cannot feed themselves so Lucas and the aide plug feeding tubes into their bellies. She pours cereal for the one daughter who can eat on her own. She puts the girls on their school buses, the last leaving by 7:10. … Lucas cherishes these mornings, tough as they are, because she knows how hard it is to keep a family together." The Times continues, "She is one of a handful of attorneys in the country whose specialty is representing disabled parents like herself. Her mission: Making sure they get the same chance as everyone else to be moms and dads. … According to the U.S. Census Bureau, 15% of all parents with children in the household have some disability. These parents are far more likely to have the government try to take their children away. Even Lucas lives in fear that social services may seize her children. She knows the sorrow of losing a child — a 7-year-old girl whom she wanted to adopt was taken from her after a difficult court fight." The Times adds, "Lucas works her cases out of a seventh-floor office at the Colorado Cross-Disability Coalition in central Denver. … More disabled people seek help from the coalition than Lucas, who carries about a dozen cases at a time, can handle. … Among those she has worked with was a deaf woman in suburban Denver, whose two toddlers were taken away and put up for adoption after social workers deemed her an unfit mother because she could not hear her children's cries for attention. Lucas could identify with her — she sleeps with a sound-activated pager that vibrates when one of her daughters calls for her."

NAACP President Resigns. The Washington Times/AP (3/5, Texeira) reports, "NAACP President Bruce S. Gordon said Sunday he is leaving the civil rights organization after just 19 months at the helm, citing clashes with board members over management style and the organization's mission as the reasons. 'I believe that any organization that's going to be effective will only be effective if the board and the CEO are aligned and I don't think we are aligned,' Gordon told The Associated Press. 'This compromises the ability of the board to be as effective as it can be.'" Julian Bond, "chairman of the board of the Baltimore-based National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said Sunday that Gordon tried to quit just six weeks after taking the job in August 2005, but Bond convinced him to stay."

The New York Times (3/5, Hernandez, 1.16M) reports, "In interviews, black leaders close to the organization said the reasons behind his departure stemmed from a dispute over its future role in a nation where the battlefront for civil rights has shifted. 'We want it to be a social justice organization; he wanted it to be more of a social service organization,'" said Bond. Gordon "said he did not believe that the organization should abandon its civil rights mission but rather that it should expand its role to include providing social services."

The Washington Post (3/5, A3, Fears, 690K) reports, "During his tenure, Gordon closed the rift between the 98-year-old NAACP and the White House. In July, President Bush addressed the organization's annual convention in Washington. With the speech, Bush avoided becoming the first president since Warren G. Harding not to address the most recognized black American rights group throughout his term." The Post also reports, "Gordon's push to move the NAACP's headquarters to Washington was embraced by numerous board members, including Bond, but was unpopular with executive committee members because it would increase costs, according to a member who is familiar with the talks." The Los Angeles Times (3/5, Hamburger, Silverstein, 850K) also reports the story.

Role Of Education In Black Achievement Examined. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (3/5, 1.16M), "It's an article of faith that the key to success in real estate is location, location, location. For young black boys looking ahead to a difficult walk in life, the mantra should be education, education, education. … If anything, the role that education plays in the life prospects of black Americans is even more dramatic than in the population as a whole. It's the closest thing to a magic potion for black people that I can think of. For boys and men, it is very often the antidote to prison or an early grave." A new report from the Center for Labor Market Studies at Northeastern University in Boston "tells us that young adults in general have been struggling in the labor market. Many have been left behind by the modest economic recovery of the past few years, especially those with limited education credentials. The report, which focuses on black males, emphasizes the importance of education in overcoming this tough employment environment:"

DOJ_NMG_0139276

NYTimes Urges Legislative Review Of New York's Civil Confinement Agreement. In its headline, the New York Times (3/5, 1.16M) suggests Spitzer is a "gunslinger" for his recent attack on the health care establishment, saying such tactics have won him "impressive victories," like budget, ethics and workers' compensation reforms. The paper warns Spitzer and legislative leaders that the "troubling" civil confinement agreement could become like the Rockefeller drug laws because it would mean "locking people up for crimes they might commit in the future. The Legislature should hold new hearings to assess the wisdom of this specific proposal." The paper also says Spitzer has not fundamentally changed the way Albany works, since most of the reform agreements were reached behind closed doors. The paper concludes, "Polls show that Mr. Spitzer is enormously popular, and that the public backs his efforts to shake up state government. When the going gets rough, as it surely will, having the strong support of the public may be the most powerful weapon in his arsenal."

ANTITRUST:

Environmental Concerns Feature Into TXU Buyout Deal. Time (3/12, Thomas, 4.03M) reports that on Feb. 25, "the Texas utility TXU Corp. agreed to a proposed $45 billion buyout -- the biggest deal ever to take a public company private -- with major environmental initiatives attached." It "turns out the barbarians at the gate -- Henry Kravis of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and David Bonderman of Texas Pacific Group (TPG) -- have a little tree hugger in them. Even before the deal with TXU was sealed, the buyout shops called up environmentalists and, in a 17-hr. meeting at San Francisco's Mandarin Oriental Hotel, agreed to roll back carbon emissions from all TXU power plants to 1990 levels by 2020. Four days later, the company's board accepted the buyout offer, agreeing to drop controversial plans for eight of 11 new coal-fired power plants and to support a federal cap on carbon emissions."

IP Verdicts Exceeded $1.3 Billion In 2006. The National Law Journal (3/5, Qualters) reports, "Finisar Corp. employs dozens of Ph.D.-level scientists to create technology for its high-speed data communication components and testing business, but one of the company's most lucrative inventions may be a patent outside of its core business that generated a court victory worth $117.3 million last year." The Journal continues, "In June 2006, the Sunnyvale, Calif.-based Finisar won a $78.9 million jury verdict in a patent infringement case against broadcast satellite company The DirecTV Group Inc. of El Segundo, Calif. Although appeals are in the works, fines are racking up, including a judge's $25 million enhancement for willful infringement and $13.4 million for prejudgment interest, post-judgment interest and a compulsory license. Finisar Corp. v. DirecTV Group Inc., No. 05-00264 (E.D. Texas)." The Journal adds, "Amid a worldwide market expansion for technology products, the Finisar case is one of a burgeoning number of blockbuster verdicts in intellectual property cases. These verdicts exceeded $1.3 billion in 2006, according to VerdictSearch, an affiliate of the National Law Journal, and our own research. … There's a direct correlation between intellectual property jury verdicts and the importance of the technology protected by the patent, said Eric Maschoff, a shareholder at Workman Nydegger of Salt Lake City, who served as Finisar's lead patent prosecution counsel on the case. 'Companies are looking more and more towards their intellectual property portfolio as an asset, and they're exploiting that asset,' Maschoff said. … Lawyers report that the sheer market size of high-technology products based on the patents in those portfolios can lead to massive infringement verdicts. Companies' rising inclination to bring such cases to trial, and the emergence of high-tech courtrooms that enable the use of animation and other visual aids, also boost the possibility of gargantuan verdicts."

Federal Judge Rejects Recusal Motion In Music Price-Fixing Case. The New York Law Journal (3/5, Bar) reports, "A federal judge has rejected a request that she recuse herself from a high-profile litigation involving the music industry on the ground that her attorney husband and his firm have represented some of the defendants in other matters." The Journal continues, "Lead attorneys for plaintiffs in the case expressed concern that because Southern District of New York Judge Loretta A. Preska's husband, Thomas J. Kavaler, and his firm, Cahill Gordon & Reindel, represented several of the music company defendants in other litigation, she might be inclined to tilt toward the defendants. … But Preska rejected the argument in In re Digital Music Antitrust Litigation, 06 MDL 1780, finding that the plaintiffs' motion for recusal was not only time-barred, but was wrong on its merits. … 'Courts have uniformly rejected the argument that an appearance of impropriety exists in the following situation: (i) a judge's spouse is a partner in a law firm that represents a litigant in other matters before the judge; and (ii) the spouse did not perform any work at the law firm for the litigant or worked for the litigant on unrelated matters,' she said." The Journal adds, "Numerous lawsuits have been filed by online music downloaders who claim that the music divisions of Sony, Bertelsmann, Universal, Time Warner and EMI Music North America 'conspired artificially to fix or maintain prices' of digital music recordings offered for sale over the Internet in violation of federal and state antitrust laws. … Two of those cases were originally assigned to Preska. She presided over Seley v. Universal Music Group, 06 Civ. 1887, after the case was filed on March 9, 2006, and in Devine v. Universal Music Group, 06 Civ. 4211. … On June 12, 2006, Preska issued a memo in the Devine case informing the parties that her husband and his firm 'from time to time' represent Sony, Warner and Universal. … On July 3, 2006, Christopher Lovell, a partner at Lovell Stewart Halebian who represents a plaintiff in the case, sent a letter to the judge asserting a possible conflict. But Lovell did not formally request that the judge recuse herself."

DOJ_NMG_0139277

Alcatel-Lucent To Appeal Dismissal Of Microsoft Patent Dispute. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, B4, Cheng, Fleetwood) reports, "A federal judge ruled that Microsoft Corp. did not violate an Alcatel-Lucent patent for speech recognition." The Journal continues, "This is the second of several patent disputes between the two companies. Last week, a jury awarded1 Alcatel-Lucent $1.5 billion from Microsoft in regards to violating two patents involving MP3 technology." The Journal adds, "U.S. District Court Judge Rudi Brewster in San Diego dismissed all claims late Thursday regarding the speech-recognition dispute so that the jury trial set to start later this month will not happen. But Alcatel-Lucent intends to continue pursuing its options in the case. … 'We plan to appeal this decision and are comfortable with our chances of success as the case makes its way through the legal system,' said Alcatel-Lucent spokeswoman Joan Campion."

Patent Office To Review Applications Online. The Washington Post (3/5, A1, Sipress, 690K) reports, "The government is about to start opening up the process of reviewing patents to the modern font of wisdom: the Internet." The Patent and Trademark Office "is starting a pilot project that will not only post patent applications on the Web and invite comments but also use a community rating system designed to push the most respected comments to the top of the file, for serious consideration by the agency's examiners. A first for the federal government, the system resembles the one used by Wikipedia, the popular user-created online encyclopedia."

INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Cherokee Nation Slave Descendents Face Uncertainty After Ouster. The AP (3/4, Murphy) reports, "The Cherokee Nation vote this weekend to revoke the citizenship of the descendants of people the Cherokee once owned as slaves was a blow to people who have relied on tribal benefits." The AP continues, "Charlene White, a descendant of freed Cherokee slaves who were adopted into the tribe in 1866 under a treaty with the U.S. government, wondered Sunday where she would now go for the glaucoma treatment she has received at a tribal hospital in Stilwell. … 'I've got to go back to the doctor, but I don't know if I can go back to the clinic or if they're going to oust me right now,' said White, 56, a disabled Tahlequah resident who lives on a fixed income." The AP adds, "In Saturday's special election, more than 76 percent of voters decided to amend the Cherokee Nation's constitution to remove the estimated 2,800 freedmen descendants from the tribal rolls, according to results posted Sunday on the tribe's Web site. … Marilyn Vann, president of the Descendants of Freedmen of the Five Civilized Tribes, said the election results undoubtedly will be challenged. … 'We will pursue the legal remedies that are available to us to stop people from not only losing their voting rights, but to receiving medical care and other services to which they are entitled under law,' Vann said Sunday. … 'This is a fight for justice to stop these crimes against humanity.'" The AP adds, "Cherokee Nation spokesman Mike Miller said Sunday that election results will not be finalized until after a protest period that extends through March 12. Services currently being received by freedmen descendants will not immediately be suspended, he said. … 'There isn't going to be some sort of sudden stop of a service that's ongoing,' Miller said. 'There will be some sort of transition period so that people understand what's going on.'" The AP notes, "In a statement late Saturday, Cherokee Nation Principal Chief Chad Smith said he was pleased with the turnout and election result. … 'Their voice is clear as to who should be citizens of the Cherokee Nation,' Smith said. 'No one else has the right to make that determination. It was a right of self-government, affirmed in 23 treaties with Great Britain and the United States and paid dearly with 4,000 lives on the Trail of Tears.' … The petition drive for the ballot measure followed a March 2006 ruling by the Cherokee Nation Supreme Court that said an 1866 treaty assured freedmen descendants of tribal citizenship. … A similar situation occurred in 2000 when the Seminole Nation voted to cast freedmen descendants out of its tribe, said attorney Jon Velie of Norman, an expert on Indian law who has represented freedmen descendants in previous cases."

DOJ_NMG_0139278

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Ahead Of Bush Visit, FBI Investigates Salvadoran Legislators' Murder In Guatemala. McClatchy Newspaper (3/4, San Martin) reported, "Three murdered Salvadoran legislators. Four cops, suspected in the killings, themselves shot to death in a maximum security prison. Broken government agencies. And more questions than answers. That's what FBI investigators will face when they arrive this week to help sort out the stunning murders, which have highlighted the wave of drug-fueled corruption and crime lashing a country President Bush will visit in seven days. … The FBI team arriving this week will provide technical and scientific support to try to find some answers. Interior Minister Vielmann said all lines of investigation remain open - from a possible case of mistaken identity 'to something much more profound,' including ties to organized crime."

The New York Times (3/5, McKinley) reports, "After three Salvadoran congressmen were waylaid and killed on a road in Guatemala last month, it did not take the authorities long to find the culprits: they were Guatemalan police officers, and their unmarked police car had a tracking device that proved they were at the scene. They quickly confessed, saying they thought their victims were drug dealers, and were sent to a maximum-security prison. It is a measure of the weakness of the crime-plagued Guatemalan state that what happened just four days later remains something of a mystery — aside from the indisputable fact that the four who confessed ended up dead. The police and the interior minister say that rioting gang members inside the prison shot and stabbed them. But other inmates and their visitors that day say a group of heavily armed men in military garb and ski masks made their way through seven locked doors and executed them, with no interference from guards, removing any possibility that they could identify co-conspirators. The two sets of brazen killings set off a vicious diplomatic conflict between Guatemala and El Salvador — heightened by news reports suggesting that the congressmen were indeed drug dealers — and ignited a political scandal here." The Times notes, "Since 1993, the United States has twice helped set up special antinarcotics forces here, only to watch their commanders become embroiled in the drug trade themselves. President Bush is scheduled to visit next week, and American diplomats say the lack of public security here is near the top of his agenda."

Mueller Starts Reading List For FBI. The U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column FBI Director "and avid reader Robert Mueller has started a new bureau reading list to help his G-men broaden their horizons. The list has more than 60 books about the FBI's history, terrorism, intelligence, and professional development." Some "gems: Public Enemies, by Bryan Burrough, about the birth of the FBI; The Looming Tower, Lawrence Wright's book about al Qaeda's road to 9/11; China, Inc. by Ted Fishman; and Louis Gerstner's Who Says Elephants Can't Dance? about IBM's historic turnaround. We also hear that Mueller's a big fan of former GE bigwig Jack Welch. So naturally, Welch's Winning also gets top billing."

Fourteen-Year-Old's Murder Spurs Crackdown On Los Angeles Gangs. The Sacramento Bee (3/5, Rojas) reported, "It took political officials nearly a month to respond to the slaying of Cheryl Green. Since then, the 14-year-old African American girl has become the face of brown-on-black violence in this city. The FBI has joined the Los Angeles Police Department in cracking down on gangs. The Police Department, breaking with tradition, has publicly named the city's worst 11 gangs. … The racially motivated shooting of the eighth-grader, which occurred Dec. 15 in broad daylight as she chatted with friends, was one of 269 gang-related murders citywide in 2006." The Bee goes on to report that on Jan. 18, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa "held a news conference near where the teenager was killed to announce a plan to 'dismantle' the Latino gang blamed for the girl's slaying. He was joined by Police Chief William Bratton and FBI Director Robert Mueller."

Attorneys, Jurors Reflect On Failed Prosecution Of DC's Largest Drug Seizure. The Washington Post (3/5, B08, Cauvin) reports, "The haul was unprecedented. A wiretap on the cellphone of a reputed drug kingpin led police to a stash house where they found almost 100 kilos of cocaine and nearly $1 million. A force of more than 100 federal and local agents swept up nearly a dozen suspects in raids across the region." The Post continues, "The evidence to put everyone away seemed strong. There were the drugs, the cash and the wiretaps, filled with curious talk of 'tickets' – 'little tickets,' 'VIP tickets' -- code, prosecutors said, for wholesale quantities of cocaine. … And there was the Global Positioning System device, secretly planted in the suspected kingpin's car, tracking his comings and goings between the stash house in Fort Washington and his supposed customers in and around Washington." The Post adds, "Then the case went before a jury in U.S. District Court. The outcome was hardly what authorities would have expected on that October morning a year and a half ago when they found themselves staring at the biggest seizure ever made in a D.C. drug investigation. … The jurors, after deliberating for weeks, deadlocked earlier this year on many charges against alleged kingpin Antoine Jones, including the most serious: conspiracy. And on more than a dozen other counts, the jury came back with verdicts of not guilty. The three men on trial with him, charged with conspiracy as well, fared even better. … Kevin L. Holland and Adrian Jackson were acquitted of all charges; Michael A. Huggins was acquitted of all but one lesser charge, and that eventually was dismissed by the government. All three men, jailed for more than a year pending trial, are now free. Jones remains in jail, awaiting retrial." The Post notes, "It was a stunning loss for prosecutors and police, who claimed they had busted a major drug-trafficking ring with direct links to suppliers in Mexico. But the case had weaknesses that became apparent once it went to trial. … First was the profile of the alleged conspiracy. Unlike cases against other such enterprises, this one did not allege that anyone was killed or even assaulted by Jones or his alleged co-conspirators. Although the absence of violence was a relief for investigators, it also could have had consequences with the jury, lawyers said. … Nothing in the law requires prosecutors to present evidence of violence to prove a conspiracy to distribute narcotics. And whether the lack of bodies was pivotal in this case is a question that veteran prosecutors debate. … But experience tells many prosecutors that a body, or two or three, can make juries more apt to tie defendants together in a conspiracy and return verdicts in which everyone shares blame."

DOJ_NMG_0139279

Louisiana Cocaine Dealer Facing Life In Prison. The Shreveport Times (3/3, Rucker) reports, "A Rowlett, Texas man has been convicted by a Shreveport jury on cocaine distribution and money laundering charges. Ronald King, 40, was convicted Friday, charged with one count of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine, one count of money laundering and one count of forfeiture, according to a press release from Donald Washington, United States attorney for the western district of Louisiana. His sentencing is set for June 21 at 1:15 p.m. where he faces a sentence of life in prison, a $4 million fine or both. … King was caught after an investigation conducted by the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force which includes Shreveport and Bossier City police departments, the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Shreveport and the Caddo Parish Sheriff's Office."

Reporting Continues On Multistate Investigation Of Online Drug Sales. The New York Daily News (3/2) reported it "may shock no one to learn that two world champion bodybuilders may have been using steroids or growth hormone, but two giants of that well-muscled world were among the athletes who received drugs in a shady Internet pharmacy operation," sources said. "Eight-time Mr. Universe Ronnie Coleman, a former BALCO client, and top Mr. Universe contestant Victor Martinez were among the many clients in an ongoing, multistate investigation that led to the raids on several pharmacies in Florida this week, a source said. … A source with knowledge of the probe said another one of the steroid customers is a supervisor with the Albany [New York] Police Department's narcotics squad." The Daily News noted that as many as 24 people are expected to "be rounded up in the days ahead."

The Albany (NY) Times Union (3/4, Lyons) reported, "While police continue to wage their war on street drugs, many law enforcement experts say more needs to be done about Internet pharmacies." The issue "took on heightened awareness last week with the raid of several Orlando, Fla., pharmacies that were selling drugs to customers in New York. … 'Perhaps most disturbing is that many of these Internet pharmaceutical sites ... are hiding behind a facade of legitimacy by pretending to ask customers health questions,' said Joseph T. Rannazzisi, a Drug Enforcement Administration deputy assistant administrator, in testimony in 2005 before a House subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations." The GAO "issued a report two years ago showing 'that although extensive time and resources are required to locate, charge and convict criminal anabolic steroid dealers, the penalties under the federal sentencing guidelines faced by persons convicted of such offenses do not reflect the seriousness of their crimes or provide adequate deterrence.'"

Newsday (3/5) reports, "Following last week's steroid bust that implicated professional and college athletes, and high school coaches, Sen. Charles Schumer…proposed additional federal regulation of a substance he said has become the 'drug of choice' for those seeking a quick boost in athletic performance. … Under Schumer's proposal, HGH regulation would be put on a par with current steroid laws, and federal law enforcement would be able to prosecute doctors who write prescriptions 'in bad faith' -- an act already illegal in New York state."

"Grow Houses" Seen As National Trend In Marijuana Trade. The Christian Science Monitor (3/5, Jonsson) reports, "Raids on 40 houses in 12 suburban Georgia counties over the past two weeks are one recent sign of what police say is a national trend in marijuana marketing: growing the illicit crop year-round indoors, using suburban homes as 'grow-houses.' … Georgia has lagged behind in indoor busts, with just one last year. The US government eradicates some 3.5 million marijuana plants each year, mostly outdoors, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration." Police "say the 'burbs give growers a degree of solace and safety, protected by suburbia's premium on privacy and even a 2001 US Supreme Court ruling that prevents law officers from aiming heat-sensing equipment at homes unless they first obtain search warrants."

DOJ_NMG_0139280

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/4) reported on one case in with marijuana growers "had invested tens of thousands of dollars in heating and air conditioning upgrades to create a semitropical climate where the air was a slightly humid 81 degrees. To save money — the operation can burn about $2,500 worth of electricity a month — and avoid detection by electric meter, the growers had hotwired the power system, digging a hole and tapping into an underground electrical line."

In Braintree, Massachusetts, the Patriot Ledger (3/2) reported a local couple "has been busted for running a marijuana farm worth hundreds of thousands of dollars in their suburban home. … The grow house operation is believed to be the largest ever uncovered in Braintree, according to Deputy Chief Russell Jenkins."

California Man Sentenced To Nearly 6 Years In Prison In "Pot-Candy" Case. The San Francisco Chronicle (3/2) reported the ringleader of an Oakland group that "made marijuana-laced candy and soft drinks resembling popular confections was sentenced…to 70 months in prison. Kenneth Affolter…pleaded guilty in September to a single count of conspiring to manufacture and distribute marijuana for making doctored treats that authorities said were packaged for shipment throughout the West Coast. … The case was the latest pitting federal officials against medicinal marijuana advocates."

Mexican Drug Cartels Shift To Overland Trafficking Routes. On its front page today, the Los Angeles Times (3/4, Tobar, 850K) says "Central America has become a crucial way station in the billion-dollar cocaine business, with traffickers shipping hundreds of tons northward from Colombia along the isthmus and increasingly infiltrating police and government agencies." The Times adds, "Everyone from impoverished fishermen and small-town mayors to legislators and high-ranking police officials has been swept up in the drug trade as the smuggling routes have changed. In years past, the favored route was across the Caribbean to the southeastern United States. Now, with greater Mexican cartel involvement, the cocaine often moves up the coasts of Central America and overland through Mexico." A DEA official said "Central America will remain the primary transit zone for U.S.-bound drugs 'for the foreseeable future.'"

Central America Called Crucial Way Station In Cocaine Trade. The Los Angeles Times (3/4) reported Central America "has become a crucial way station in the billion-dollar cocaine business, with traffickers shipping hundreds of tons northward from Colombia along the isthmus and increasingly infiltrating police and government agencies, U.S. and regional sources say. The recent killings of three Salvadoran legislators in Guatemala underscored the shift, intelligence sources say. … Michael A. Braun, chief of operations for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said in a 2005 congressional hearing that 'the corrupting power of illicit drug trafficking organizations on the governmental institutions of Central America significantly increases the difficulty of successful drug interdiction efforts.' Central America will remain the primary transit zone for U.S.-bound drugs 'for the foreseeable future,' Braun added."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Said To Have Final Chance To Overhaul Immigration Laws. Time (3/12, Calabresi, 4.03M) reports President George W. Bush "is about to get his last chance to prove that that" his "commitment" to an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws "is real. Immigration reform stands out as the unfulfilled promise of the Bush presidency, and as Congress prepares to debate a compromise bill in the coming weeks, Democratic leaders in the House and Senate say Bush's help is crucial." But "power is sluicing out of the White House, Iraq is draining the Administration's remaining energies, and the President is entering a difficult period with a Congress he has never treated with much respect."

TAX:

Absent Congressional Action, AMT Could Affect 23 Million. U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Wiener, 2.03M) reports, "Virtually everyone agrees that the" Alternative Minimum Tax is "out of control and needs to be fixed. The big question is how and at what cost in lost potential tax revenue -- roughly $1.2 trillion over 10 years if the AMT is totally repealed." So far, Congress "has enacted short-term boosts in exemptions from the tax to slow its expanding reach from only about 1.3 million taxpayers five years ago. If a new temporary or permanent fix isn't enacted for 2007, the number of returns affected could soar to 23 million."

Schumer, Lott Debate AMT. Sen. Charles Schumer said on ABC's This Week (3/4, Stephanopoulos), "What we Democrats want to do is get tax cuts for the middle class, and that's what we're doing by getting the AMT down. We have had tax cut after tax cut after tax cut for the very wealthy. Instead, we want to redirect tax cuts to the middle class."

Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott said on ABC's This Week (3/4, Stephanopoulos), "Let's talk about taxing the middle class. This is how we got the AMT. The Democrats put it in place in '69, and exacerbated it in 1993, when not a single Republican voted for it. And that's what middle class gets."

DOJ_NMG_0139281

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress Takes Up Problems At Walter Reed Today. ABC World News (3/4, story 5, 1:45, Harris, 8.78M) reported Congress will "open hearings on the treatment of wounded Iraq and Afghanistan veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. The growing scandal over deplorable conditions and inadequate care has already cost the Army Secretary and other brass their jobs." ABC (Hendren) added, "On Capitol Hill, lawmakers are preparing for their first chance to grill the top military officers in charge of Walter Reed. Among those scheduled to appear at tomorrow's hearing is Gen. Richard Cody, the Army's Vice Chief of Staff, and Walter Reed's last two commanders. And they'll hear from wounded troops."

The AP (3/4, Heilprin) reports legislators "promised a quick response and sought an independent commission." In a letter to Defense Secretary Robert Gates, Sen. Charles Schumer "asked for an independent commission, possibly headed by former Secretary of State Colin Powell, to investigate all post-combat medical facilities and recommend changes." The Los Angeles Times (3/5, Levey, 850K) says Schumer's "call for an independent panel follows a promise from President Bush last week to name a bipartisan commission for the same purpose. ... Members of Congress from both parties have expressed outrage at the substandard care. The revelations have also embarrassed the Bush administration as it has been laboring to build support for sending 21,500 additional troops to Iraq."

The Washington Post (3/5, A9, White, 690K) reports that when the first hearing begins today, "many eyes will turn to Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who has served as the Army's top doctor since he gave up command of the hospital in 2004. The hearing will allow Kiley to explain why bureaucratic tangles and horrid conditions made life so difficult for outpatients at the Army's premier hospital, while also likely putting him in a position of defending his job." While some in Congress "have called for Kiley to step down and take responsibility for the problems at Walter Reed, he has been spared so far."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/5, Lubold, 59K) says the Army is "scrambling to rectify the situation: It's moving patients out of certain areas of Walter Reed in preparation for those places being refurbished, and it's creating new support initiatives to help wounded veterans of the war in Iraq." But on its front page, the Washington Post (3/5, Hull, Priest, 690K) reports under the headline "It Is Just Not Walter Reed" that solders at other facilities are offering "stories of neglect and substandard care. ... They describe depressing living conditions for outpatients at other military bases around the country, from Fort Lewis in Washington state to Fort Dix in New Jersey. They tell stories -- their own versions, not verified -- of callous responses to combat stress and a system ill equipped to handle another generation of psychologically scarred vets." The Post says "hundreds of soldiers" contacted the newspaper. ... From Fort Campbell in Kentucky: 'There were yellow signs on the door stating our barracks had asbestos.'" And from Fort Dix: "Scare tactics are used against soldiers who will write sworn statement to assist fellow soldiers for their medical needs."

Walter Reed Problems Said To Have "Appalled" Gates. Newsweek (3/12, Barry, Wolffe, 3.12M) reports in its "Periscope" column the "grim stories" about the treatment of outpatients at Walter Reed Army Hospital "appalled the one person who really mattered: the new secretary of Defense, Robert Gates. He promised President Bush that high-level officials would be held accountable -- and seemed to get that when the commander of the hospital, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, was fired." But then Gates "found that the temporary replacement -- Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, named after Weightman was sacked -- had earlier run the place himself." A senior Defense official says "a furious Gates demanded the resignation of the secretary of the Army, Francis J. Harvey."

Gates Changes Atmosphere For Media. U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column, "Distinguishing himself from Don Rumsfeld's combativeness," Gates "held his first press conference around a big table in a small conference room. But it was too cramped, so he set his sights on making the larger briefing room cozier. Gone is the lone podium, replaced by a set that would better fit a morning TV news show: a big table for himself and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in front of a world map."

VA Secretary Says He Welcomes Congressional Oversight. Meanwhile, the New York Times (3/5, Clemetson, 1.16M) reports VA Secretary Jim Nicholson is "seeking to put a positive public face on his beleaguered agency." He said in an interview Friday, "If there is even one injured veteran that falls through the cracks then that is too many. It pains me to hear about problems in our system, but I am a competitor, and I am finding that it is strengthening my resolve and deepening my commitment." Nicholson said, "I welcome congressional oversight, and the oversight of the President and the commission he is forming."

Krugman Compares Walter Reed, Katrina Responses. In his New York Times (3/5, 1.16M) column, Paul Krugman writes that when the problems at Walter Reed were first reported two years ago, "officials simply denied that there were any problems. And they initially tried to brush off last month's exposé in The Washington Post. But this time, with President Bush's approval at 29 percent, Democrats in control of Congress, and Donald Rumsfeld no longer defense secretary -- Robert Gates, his successor, appears genuinely distressed at the situation -- the whitewash didn't stick. Yet even now it's not clear whether the public will be told the full story, which is that the horrors of Walter Reed's outpatient unit are no aberration. For all its cries of 'support the troops,' the Bush administration has treated veterans' medical care the same way it treats everything else: nickel-and-diming the needy, protecting the incompetent and privatizing everything it can. ... The Walter Reed scandal is another Hurricane Katrina: the moment when the administration's misgovernment became obvious to everyone."

DOJ_NMG_0139282

Gates "Greeted As A Liberator" At Pentagon. The Washington Post (3/5, A13, Ricks, 690K) reports "Robert M. Gates is finding Donald H. Rumsfeld an easy act to follow, as the new defense secretary wins hearts and minds throughout Washington and overseas. … At the Pentagon, where Gates has been greeted as a liberator, 'you can already feel the stability,' said retired Air Force Lt. Gen. Charles F. Wald, formerly the deputy US commander in Europe. He said he considers the appointment of Gates to be the Bush administration's best move in years." Moreover, Gates "has shown that he can act decisively, as when he fired Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey on Friday over the handling of the growing patient-care scandal at Walter Reed Army Medical Center." Gates, adds the Post, "has been welcomed largely because of who he is not rather than what he has done, noted a longtime friend who has held top national security posts. In the months ahead, however, Gates will be judged on his own decision-making in the war he has inherited from Rumsfeld." Also, "despite some departmental friction over the burdens of Iraq, Gates seems to have a better relationship with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice than did Rumsfeld."

Cheney Praises Bolton's Service At UN. The Washington Post's (3/5, A13) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that former U.N. ambassador John Bolton "has been trashing the administration lately, but Vice President Cheney had only praise for him at the Conservative Political Action Conference here last week," saying he wanted "especially" to recognize Bolton, "who did a superb job for America at the United Nations."

Paulson Sounds Optimistic Note On US Economy. Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson said on ABC's This Week (3/4, Stephanopoulos), "There's always a possibility that there will be a downturn. But I don't see it. I think we have a healthy economy in the US. A year ago, when the growth rates were much higher, I was concerned. I said, is this going to be sustainable? Now I'm looking at it and I'm seeing a situation where it looks like we're successfully making the transition."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (3/5, C1, Browning, 2.04M) reports, "Analysts see at least three ways to view last week's trouble, which resulted in a 4.2% drop in the Dow Jones Industrial Average. Goldman Sachs economists Ed McKelvey and Andrew Tilton outlined three competing views in a report last week. 1. A much-overdue short-term pullback. … 2. A flight from risky investments. If that is what is going on, then the market shift is more serious. … 3. A sign of a weaker economy to come. This could be the most troubling prognosis."

The New York Times (3/5, Creswell, Bajaj, 1.16M) says an "escalating crisis in the market, which seemed to reach a new crescendo late last week, is threatening a wide band of people. Foremost are the poor and minority homeowners who used easy credit to buy houses that are turning out to be too expensive for them now that mortgage rates are going up, but the pain is also being felt widely throughout the business world." The Rimes adds, "Large companies that bought subprime lenders during the boom, like H&R Block and HSBC, are now scrambling to sell them or scale back their exposure. Many investors are also likely to suffer: Wall Street firms made billions in fees, commissions and trading revenue from packaging and selling subprime mortgages to them as bonds."

And House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel said on Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "When you have these economists and the chairman of the federal reserve, they tell you on one hand what could happen, and on the other hand it may not happen, it puts us in the Congress the same place that it puts most Americans. ... It seems like we're living in two different worlds, one where they tell us, the Secretary of the Treasury, not to worry, that the economy is secure, and the other where we have 48 million people who don't know from day to day where they're going to get health insurance."

Homeless Veterans, Hard To Count, May Not Get Aid They Need. The Washington Post (3/5, Davenport, 690K) writes that the "number of homeless veterans from recent wars is hard to gauge. From 2004 to 2006, the Department of Veterans Affairs provided shelter to 300 veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan tours, out of the tens of thousands who have served." But Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America Executive Director Paul Rieckhoff said "that figure 'is not even close to accurate'...because it doesn't include the 'others sleeping in buses, their cars or on the streets.'" He said in New York City alone, "his organization has helped 60 homeless veterans since 2004. As in the Vietnam War era, when thousands of vets ended up homeless, there are already signs that the recent conflicts are taking a traumatic psychological toll on some service members. Many veterans' advocates said that despite unprecedented attempts by the military and Veterans Affairs to care for veterans, increasing numbers of the new generation of warriors are ending up homeless."

DOJ_NMG_0139283

Sanchez Said To Face Tests On Her Substance As Public Official. The Los Angeles Times (3/5, A1, Powers, 850K) profiles Rep. Loretta Sanchez, who "has been viewed alternately as a masterful fundraiser, legislative lightweight, political mentor, headstrong politician, leading Latina voice and one of Congress' 'babes.'" The Times recounts her recent confrontation with Rep. Joe Baca, and says "in the coming months, Sanchez will be tested on whether her reputation will be more coquette or congresswoman. Entrenched in the House majority for the first time, she is allied with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and sits on two of the most prominent committees: Armed Services and Homeland Security, being the second-ranking Democrat on the latter."

Thune's Help For South Dakota Firm Seen As Symptomatic Of GOP Problems. In a syndicated column running in today's Washington Post (3/5, A15, 690K), Robert Novak writes, "The Federal Railroad Administration handed a rare victory to the American taxpayer last week by denying a questionable $2.3 billion loan application by the Dakota, Minnesota and Eastern (DM&E) Railroad. What makes this news of special interest is the paramount role Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) played in boosting the loan. Here is a cautionary tale of political life in Washington and how it corrupts." Thune "guided through Congress legislative changes that made the loan possible. But an assessment that DM&E was a poor credit risk was shared by two other conservative senators -- Tom Coburn of Oklahoma and Jim DeMint of South Carolina -- who took the extraordinary step of advocating rejection of a colleague's pet project. Making matters worse, Thune worked as a paid lobbyist for the South Dakota-based railroad before his election to the Senate and has received political contributions from company executives." Novak adds, "If he had it to do over again, I asked the senator last week, would he still advocate the loan project? Thune replied: 'I don't know what else I could do. I was strong for my state. It was a no-brainer.'" The DM&E loan "cannot prove a cautionary tale for Thune unless he knows he went in the wrong direction and admits it, at least to himself. If he has not come to terms with this, he is not alone. Well-meaning conservatives such as Thune get caught up in procuring the benefits of the federal leviathan for their states and their constituents. It is much of what ails the Republicans."

Navy Said To Be Getting Rid Of Useful Warships. Craig Hooper, who served on the Chief of Naval Operations' Maritime Strategy Working Group at the Naval War College last fall, writes in the Washington Post (3/5, A15, 690K), "Over the past six years, 79 condemned Navy ships have been towed out to sea and destroyed by Air Force bombs, submarine-launched torpedoes or hails of gunfire. These exercises, long considered the most cost-effective way to dispose of unwanted naval vessels, have eaten away at America's inventory of still-useful retired warships. Soon every vessel capable of serving in America's reserve combat fleet could vanish, leaving an overextended Navy with no viable backup forces. This unwise drawdown goes against Navy tradition." Hooper adds, "As the Navy budget, already under pressure because of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, is hoarded for new shipbuilding initiatives, the inactive reserve, an emergency fleet of second-string warships, is quietly becoming a sham. … Important reserve warships are disappearing. … This flurry of ship disposal suggests the administration is getting rid of useful warships to compel construction of pricey new vessels. … This is no way to run a navy. With each sinking, the Navy risks becoming a hollow force, dependent on the construction of pricey ships that, given America's overextended finances, may never arrive."

Coast Guard Cutter Contracts Seen As "Series Of Lemons." U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Marek, 2.03M) reports audits "have revealed that" the costs of the Coast Guard's newest cutter "has grown by millions of dollars since it was commissioned and that it has potentially fatal design flaws. And that's only part of the bad news. The 38,000-person military service has been accused of buying what one member of Congress called 'a series of lemons' with a $24 billion megacontract to replace nearly all its ships and planes." Supporters "wonder if even" Coast Guard Commandant Thad Allen "can fix all this."

Some See Message About Bush In New Movie About Ancient Greece. The New York Times (3/5, Cieply, 1.16M) reports, "Three weeks ago a handful of reporters at an international press junket here for the Warner Brothers movie '300,' about the battle of Thermopylae some 2,500 years ago, cornered the director Zack Snyder with an unanticipated question. 'Is George Bush Leonidas or Xerxes?' one of them asked. The questioner, by Mr. Snyder's recollection, insisted that Mr. Bush was Xerxes, the Persian emperor who led his force against Greek's city states in 480 B.C., unleashing an army on a small country guarded by fanatical guerilla fighters so he could finish a job his father had left undone. More likely, another reporter chimed in, Mr. Bush was Leonidas, the Spartan king who would defend freedom at any cost." The Times adds, "In the era of media clutter, film marketers increasingly welcome controversy as a way to get attention for their more provocative fare. … But the dance can be more delicate when viewers find a potentially divisive message in big studio movies that were meant more to entertain than enlighten. The danger is that an accidental political overtone will alienate part of the potential audience for a film that needs broad appeal to succeed."

DOJ_NMG_0139284

NYTimes Urges Congress To Address Problems In Credit Industry. The New York Times (3/5, 1.16M) editorializes, "In response to the explosion in consumer debt, Congress passed a law in 2005 making it more difficult for individuals to declare bankruptcy." But "legislators did nothing to curb the blizzard of pre-approved cards that fall through the mail slots. Often the most profitable customers are the least responsible ones. At a Senate Banking Committee hearing in January, Chairman Christopher Dodd cited a study estimating that credit-card penalty fees had risen to $17.1 billion in 2006 from $1.7 billion in 1996." Congress "needs to do more to make rates and fees more transparent while putting an end to some of the most abusive policies."

OTHER NEWS:

Increasingly, Uninsured Belong To Middle Class. The New York Times (3/5, Pear, 1.16M) reports that the problem of a lack of health insurance is increasingly impacting "middle-class people." While it is "well known that the ranks of the uninsured have been swelling; federal figures show an increase of 6.8 million since 2000," the "surprise is that the uninsured are not necessarily the poor, the unemployed and the undocumented. ... And that is one reason, according to a recent New York Times/CBS News poll, that the problems of the uninsured have jumped to the top of the domestic political agenda in Washington and on the campaign trail. Today, more than one-third of the uninsured -- 17 million of the nearly 47 million -- have family incomes of $40,000 or more."

Estimates Of Oil Reserves Rise As Technology Revives Old Fields. The New York Times (3/5, Mouawad, 1.16M) reports, "Within the last decade, technology advances have made it possible to unlock more oil from old fields, and, at the same time, higher oil prices have made it economical for companies to go after reserves that are harder to reach. With plenty of oil still left in familiar locations, forecasts that the world's reserves are drying out have given way to predictions that more oil can be found than ever before." There "is still a minority view, held largely by a small band of retired petroleum geologists and some members of Congress, that oil production has peaked, but the theory has been fading. Equally contentious for the oil companies is the growing voice of environmentalists, who do not think that pumping and consuming an ever-increasing amount of fossil fuel is in any way desirable." The Times adds, "Increased projections for how much oil is extractable may become a political topic on many different fronts and in unpredictable ways. By reassuring the public that supplies will meet future demands, oil companies may also find legislators more reluctant to consider opening Alaska and other areas to new exploration."

Romney Gets Straw Poll Victory From Skeptical Conservatives. The Politico (3/5, Simon, Allen) reports Mitt Romney spoke Friday at the Conservative Political Action Conference and then stuck "around for a reception that was open to all attendees. In the voting, where he took 21 percent, to Giuliani's 17 percent and McCain's 12 percent, despite a dude in a dolphin suit who was wandering around the convention with a sign calling himself 'Flip Romney, another Flip-Flopper from Massachusetts.'" The "hot CPAC souvenir was the Romney Flip Flop -- cheap foam footwear available in green, orange, yellow and red. These shots aimed at what many Republicans view as Romney's greatest liability -- the perception that he is guided by opportunism rather than principle. Romney wanted to win badly enough that he stacked the deck by bringing a group of college kids in to vote for him." The Politico also interviewed Romney, who discussed a range of topics, such as the influence of Internet media, saying, "I think what you're seeing is that blogs are able to get to bottom of things and to cut through the spin. The spin has a huge impact on the mainstream media. Candidates are able to go to the mainstream media, spin their story, they write it and sometimes it's accurate, sometimes it's not. The blogs actually are open for comment and debate and they ultimately get the truth out. And that's critical, in my opinion. Because there are going to be a lot of opposition research folks on other campaigns trying to put up things that aren't accurate."

The Financial Times (3/5, Daniel) reports Romney "had faced skepticism" at CPAC "amid charges that he had flip-flopped on some of the critical issues for conservatives, changing his stance on gay and abortion rights. The initial reception to his speech at the conference on Friday was far less enthusiastic than the rousing greeting for the celebrity figure of Rudy Giuliani, former mayor of New York."

Steele, Gingrich Win Plaudits For CPAC Appearances. The Washington Times (3/5, Hallow, Dinan, 88K) reports former Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and Newt Gingrich "were the biggest stars according to activists who attended the three-day Conservative Political Action Conference." Former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani "pulled off CPAC's biggest coup, former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III was the biggest surprise, and Ann Coulter was the biggest loser." Steele, "rejected last fall by the Bush White House for chairmanship of the Republican National Committee (RNC) -- was mobbed by hundreds of attendees wanting their picture taken with him on the dais after he served as master of ceremonies at the Thursday banquet featuring Vice President Dick Cheney and former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton." This year's CPAC "was also a boon for Mr. Gingrich, as the former House speaker acknowledged after his Saturday speech that closed the conference." Gingrich was "the only top-tier potential contender for the Republican nomination who hadn't formed a presidential exploratory committee or bought any CPAC banquet tables for supporters. Yet in the largest presidential preference straw poll in the conference's history, he placed fourth (14 percent) -- ahead of Arizona Sen. John McCain (12 percent), who rejected an invitation to address the event."

DOJ_NMG_0139285

Conservatives Unhappy With State Of Movement. The Politico (3/3, Martin) reports that at CPAC, there was "considerable grumbling about the health of the movement. From conservative pioneers to up-and-coming true believers, many attendees are looking for leaders -- and they're uncertain about the current crop of presidential candidates and not even thrilled with the current occupant of the White House." Conservative activist and public relations specialist Mike Thompson said, "It's a struggle. Conservatives want to win, but they aren't really sure the guys at the top of the field are conservative." The Politico adds some of the "ire at the CPAC conclave is directed squarely at Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), whom many conservatives suspect talks the talk when it comes to movement ideals but harbors dangerously moderate instincts." The Politico adds that on Thursday, David Bossie, the president of Citizens United, "gleefully unveiled a 22-page dossier kneecapping McCain ("He's No Ronald Reagan: Why Conservatives Should Not Vote for John McCain"). But Bossie also said his beef wasn't just with the one Republican presidential aspirant – McCain -- who skipped the CPAC festivities." It is "not just skepticism about McCain, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney that has members of the movement in a funk."

Bush's Woes May Boost Giuliani Quest For GOP Nomination. The Gannett News Service (3/5, Raasch) says in an analysis piece that in a paradoxical way, George W. Bush's struggles as president may be benefiting 2008 candidate Rudy Giuliani, who has a solid lead in head-to-head polls among fellow Republicans." In Giuliani's case, "a recent surge in national polls so defies conventional wisdom that it may be indicative of important contours in the 2008 campaign, at least as it is shaping up today. The search for a candidate identified with strong leadership qualities, as Giuliani has carried since 9/11, may be trumping some of the threshold requirements on abortion rights and other cultural issues that have marked GOP presidential primaries for over a quarter century." Giuliani's "poll standing has risen the more he has been on the stump, where a lot of coverage has focused on this twice-divorced candidate's attempts to explain himself to dubious cultural conservatives. Yet, as he has moved around the country, Giuliani leads Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., to 44-21% in the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll, taken Feb. 22-25. A month earlier, Giuliani enjoyed a 7 percentage-point advantage."

Conservatives May Overlook Differences With Giuliani. Newsweek (3/12, Darman, 3.12M) reports in its cover story that former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani is "pitching himself to Republican primary voters as the man destined to steady the party and the nation in a time of trial." But the Republicans "will require some convincing. Giuliani is a social moderate running in a party dominated by Christian conservatives; he supports gay rights and gun control, and hopes to be his party's first pro-choice presidential nominee since Gerald Ford more than 30 years ago." Yet with their "party in turmoil after the disastrous 2006 midterm elections, some conservatives seem willing to overlook the mayor's colorful past." In a new NEWSWEEK Poll, Giuliani "leads McCain by 25 points (59 to 34 percent) as the choice of registered Republicans and voters leaning Republican for the party's nomination, while Romney trails both men by more than 30 points."

Giuliani Surge Seen As "Mind Boggling." In her U.S. News and World Report column (3/12), Gloria Borger says it is "mind-boggling: Rudy Giuliani is surging. The pro-abortion rights, pro-gun control, pro-gay rights, thrice-married former New York mayor -- who as part of a spoof once dressed in drag and got cozy with Donald Trump -- is ahead. And not just in one poll; in most every poll." Giuliani's "bid is a huge gamble with a simple premise: that, in the end, the appeal of his personality, leadership cred, and the new primary schedule (which could be full of big states with large urban areas with lots of moderate Republicans), will give a city boy a chance to win the nomination."

Giuliani's Leadership Style Seen As Too Similar To Bush's. In his Newsweek column (3/12), Jonathan Alter says Giuliani's "leadership style seems out of sync with history's pendulum. Why would voters want to replace a my-way-or-the-highway Texan with a shut-up-and-listen New Yorker? Exchange a Crawford cowboy for an urban cowboy? A woman, African-American, Hispanic, Mormon or Vietnam POW would represent a sharper break from the immediate past."

DOJ_NMG_0139286

Clinton, Obama Commemorate 42nd Anniversary Of Selma March. ABC World News (3/4, lead story, 2:35, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Forty-two years ago on what's now called Bloody Sunday," Selma, Alabama, "became a flashpoint in the civil rights struggle as police clashed with protesters who were demanding voting rights. Today, it was a political clash between the two top Democratic presidential contenders. Senators Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama gave dueling speeches at black churches just block as way from one another." ABC (Cochran) added Obama "spoke at the church of Martin Luther King Jr. used as headquarters to fight for the Voting Rights Act. He seemed to answer accusations that he is not black enough." Sen. Barack Obama: "So don't tell me I don't have a claim on Selma, Alabama. Don't tell me I'm not coming home when I come to Selma, Alabama. I'm here because somebody marched for our freedom." Cochran: "Hillary Clinton decided to come after Obama announced he would be in Selma. She spoke at another black church. She too said the voting rights act has changed America. Sen. Hilary Clinton: "It is the gift that keeps on giving. Today it is giving Senator Obama the chance to run for president of the United States. It is giving me that chance too." Cochran: "It may not mean a thing, but the line to hear Obama is several times longer than the line to hear Hillary Clinton."

The CBS Evening News (3/4, lead story, 3:30, Borger, 7.66M) reported, "The real homecoming today was for Bill Clinton, making his first appearance on the campaign trail with his wife in a made for TV moment. He's not here by chance, he's here to help Hillary, who's been losing some support in the African American community where he's still very popular. Once even dubbed America's first black president, Bill Clinton counts when African American votes are crucial." Clinton: "But I am honored to be here with you because of the price that our forbearers paid walking over this bridge and going to Montgomery." Borger: "But many black voters say they're attorney between voting for the African American Obama or sticking with the Clintons, who supported civil rights for years."

ABC World News (3/4, story 2, 2:00, Crawford, 8.78M) reported, "Like other black Democrats, Congressman John Lewis is facing a dilemma." Rep. John Lewis: "I'm torn. I'm torn." Sen. Barack Obama: "Thank you." Crawford: "Should he vote for the man who could become the first black President or the woman named Clinton, with all that means to African-American voters?" Rep. John Lewis: "When I celebrated my 60th birthday in Atlanta, President Clinton came down and spoke. When I celebrated my 65th birthday in Atlanta, Senator Obama came down. They're friends. They're like brothers. And Mrs. Clinton is an extension of her husband." Crawford: "African-American leaders have warned Barack Obama against taking the black vote for granted. There is strong loyalty to the Clintons, especially to Bill, who was affectionately known as 'the first black President.' Although the Southern states vote Republican in the general election, they are vital to Democrats in the primaries."

USA Today (3/5, Benn, Kizzire, 2.27M) reports the "re-enactment of the march over the Edmond Pettus Bridge into Selma was the first time in their campaigns that the candidates appeared together. Later, they watched former President Bill Clinton inducted into the National Voting Rights Hall of Fame."

The AP (3/5, Pickler) reports, "Not to be outdone in the hunt for black votes, Hillary Clinton also spoke in Selma at a church three blocks away and brought a secret weapon — her husband. Three days before the march anniversary, her campaign announced that the former president who is so popular among blacks would accompany her for his induction into Selma's Voting Rights Hall of Fame." Clinton and Obama "both appeared outside Brown Chapel for a pre-march rally, but came from opposite sides of the podium and did not interact. Despite the intense rivalry between their campaigns, the two praised each other." But they "did not join arms when the commemorative march attended by thousands got under way. Instead, Clinton held hands with her husband and Obama was several people down the line. Obama, who shed his coat and tie for the march, approached Hillary Clinton at one point and the two chatted for a few seconds before moving back to opposite sides of the street."

McClatchy (3/5, Stearns) reports Obama, "the upstart Illinois Democrat, brought the hot vibe of the cool new. Clinton, the veteran New Yorker, brought her long history and a ringer: husband and former President Bill Clinton, whom black author Toni Morrison once called the 'first black president.'" The "rhetoric Sunday was lofty despite the gamesmanship. Obama, a toddler at the time of the Selma demonstrations, said the civil rights measures that Selma begat made his rise possible." Sen. Clinton "took the idea further, saying that the civil rights movement had made possible not just Obama's candidacy but New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson's and her own."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/5, Shepard, 379K) reports the appearances by Clinton and Obama "looked to be an early defining moment in the campaign for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination. Overflow crowds of mostly African-Americans jammed two historic churches to hear sermon-like speeches from the front-runners for the party's nomination, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois." The crowds "swelled even larger when former President Bill Clinton, one of the most popular political figures ever among African-Americans, led a re-enactment of the famous 1965 'Bloody Sunday' march that produced landmark federal legislation guaranteeing minorities the right to vote." Comments "from those who heard the speeches Sunday did not provide definitive proof of which candidate carried the day."

DOJ_NMG_0139287

USA Today (3/5, Benn, 2.27M) reports Obama "praised Selma for its civil rights achievements Sunday morning, and said that his presidential candidacy has a direct relation to the events of 1965."

The Chicago Tribune (3/5, Glanton, Dorning, 617K) reports Clinton "avoided upstaging his wife at her speech by staying away from the church. But people cheered and rushed to be near him when he joined his wife and Obama for a re-enactment of the 1965 march." Marching at "the front of the procession through downtown Selma and across the bridge, the Clintons and Obama were separated in line by two black congressmen and several other civil rights leaders. People along the route snapped pictures and yelled out the names of Obama and the Clintons. Many of them fell in behind as the march passed."

The New York Times (3/5, Healy, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports, "Evoking the passions and rivalries of the civil rights era," Clinton and Obama "made deeply personal appeals to voters in the sanctuaries of black churches here on Sunday, and then joined former President Bill Clinton for a march across a bridge where white police officers beat protesters, most of them black, nearly 42 years ago." The "visit to Selma, a historically rich, economically struggling city, became a proxy battle for black support between Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama, whose candidacy represents a threat to Mrs. Clinton's traditional base. That competitive dynamic intensified on Sunday with the debut of Mr. Clinton on the campaign trail, six weeks into his wife's bid, and among a bloc of voters who are at once devoted to the former president and torn between his wife and Mr. Obama." In a "35-minute address, interrupted repeatedly by applause and shouts of praise from worshipers, Mr. Obama said it was time for his generation to pick up the work of those who had toiled before. He said it was time for the 'Joshua generation' — a biblical reference to the leader who succeeded Moses — to urge family and friends to shake their apathy to engage in politics and action."

The Washington Post (3/5, A5, Kornblut, Whoriskey, 690K) reports that in "the days leading up to the commemoration of 'Bloody Sunday,' advisers to Obama and Clinton had insisted it would not be a day for politics. But their mere presence in Alabama signaled the extraordinary importance of black voters in the upcoming Democratic primaries, with recent surveys indicating that Obama is jeopardizing Clinton's lead in the race by gaining among African Americans." Any "pretense that it was not part of the presidential campaign was dropped as they day went on. Supporters carried signs for the two campaigns, former president Clinton joked about the 'rainbow coalition' of candidates on the Democratic ballot, and Rep. Artur Davis, the Alabama Democrat who represents Selma, unabashedly introduced Obama in his keynote address at Brown Chapel AME Church as the next president of the United States."

Davis Takes Indirect Swipe At Clinton. In his blog at The Politico (3/5), Jonathan Martin says, "Rep. Artur Davis offered a glowing introduction of" Obama, "his colleague and candidate that included a direct shot at Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton. Noting how the same knock against Obama, 'longevity,' had been used against 'Dr. King and Jack and Bobby,' Davis said seniority wasn't always an asset." Davis said, "Longevity can make you too cautious. It can make you calculate when you cast your vote on a war."

Silicon Valley Leaders Intrigued By Obama. The Washington Times (3/5, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Silicon Valley leaders "whose endorsements have been key in past presidential races give Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton high marks, but say there is little to learn about her candidacy. Instead, they have bubbling curiosity about her fellow 2008 contender, Sen. Barack Obama." The "local insiders who track stock deals and initial public offerings the way Washingtonians follow politics have growing interest in the Illinois Democrat. Many of them think Mr. Obama could be Silicon Valley's next new thing."

Obama Streak Of 56-Straight Floor Votes Snapped. The Washington Post (3/5, A13, Kane, 690K) reports that Sen. Obama's "reign as the only perfect attendee of Senate votes among presidential hopefuls came to a crashing end last week. After 56 straight votes this year on the chamber floor, Obama (D-Ill.) missed his 57th on Friday, bypassing his senatorial duties on a homeland security bill to deliver a speech to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee meeting in Chicago. 'He really hoped to make it back to Washington in time, but it turns out, that was just the audacity of hope,' spokesman Ben LaBolt said of the streak ending. Obama was the last of the six senators already declared for the presidential campaign to have made every vote in the chamber this year. He missed a second vote Friday as well. Both were amendments that sailed to easy passage in the ongoing debate on the homeland security bill."

WSJournal Criticizes Obama For Public Finance Offer. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A16, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "False hope springs eternal, which is one way to look at the recent concordat between Barack Obama and John McCain to 'save' the public financing of Presidential election campaigns. In case you haven't been following this political version of 'Weekend at Bernie's' -- and you need a hobby if you have -- nearly every major Presidential candidate has decided not to abide by public-spending limits for the 2008 campaign. That includes Messrs. Obama and McCain." But Obama says "if he wins the Democratic nomination, he will ask his GOP opponent to agree with him to accept public money and spending limits for the 2008 general election. Mr. McCain quickly matched the offer. In some media precincts, this is being hailed as an achievement, and other candidates are being challenged to follow suit. We hope they don't. The public-financing regime is collapsing of its own misguided assumption that only public money in politics is uncorrupting."

DOJ_NMG_0139288

Clinton Warns Of Dangers From Foreign Debt. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A2, Solomon, Harwood, 2.04M) reports Sen. Hillary Clinton "is warning about the 'economic vulnerabilities' posed by foreign interests owning large amounts of U.S. debt." In remarks "on the Senate floor and a letter to Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke and Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, Mrs. Clinton said President Bush's economic policies have contributed to an 'erosion of U.S. economic sovereignty.' She also said it is 'undeniable that the exponential growth of foreign debt in the last six years has undermined our economic standing.'" Clinton's comments "are an early indication of how big an issue the growing unease over globalization and free trade will be in the 2008 campaign. Many Democrats won election last year in part by arguing that global trade leads to job losses and lower wages. They also are warning about the nation's heavy reliance on foreign debt to finance domestic needs, including the federal budget deficit."

Clinton Campaign Seeks Aura Of Inevitability. U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Walsh, 2.03M) reports Hillary Clinton "has begun trying to present a warmer, more genial side -- and she's having some success. Forty percent of Americans have an unfavorable view of Hillary Clinton, but 58 percent see her favorably, according to the latest USA Today/Gallup poll. That's an improvement from just a few years ago. And she enjoys a substantial lead over her Democratic rivals for the 2008 presidential nomination." Clinton's "basic strategy is to scare off potential donors and supporters of her competitors by campaigning as the favorite of the Democratic establishment -- and the inevitable nominee."

Bloomberg Said To Be Considering Run As Third Party Candidate. In her Newsweek column (3/12), Eleanor Clift says, "Not as ill-tempered as Giuliani," Mayor Michael Bloomberg is "doing a good job -- perhaps, some New Yorkers might say, even a better job than his predecessor did. So why isn't he the one running for president? Publicly, Bloomberg is focused on his second term and leaving the city in better shape than he got it. Privately, Bloomberg and political adviser Kevin Sheekey are meeting with pollsters and consultants to assess the mayor's chances as a third-party, independent candidate." Sheekey said, "There is no Bloomberg campaign. But we have certainly reached out." Clift adds the "money part is easy for a self-made media mogul." "He could spend $500 million in a campaign and not even think about it," says Al From, founder of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council.

Kucinich Waits For Campaign To Catch On With Public. Time (3/12, Stein, 4.03M) profiles Democratic Rep. Dennis Kucinich, who is "so sure that what he's been saying for four years is right -- he's for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, ratifying Kyoto, universal health care -- he's convinced there's a moment coming, some event or speech or interview, when voters will suddenly realize he's not a joke: 'When people see what I have to say, they go, 'Hey, wait. He's right about the war. Ha-ha. He's right about health care. Ha-ha.'" Kucinich "believes deeply in the coming of this grand American epiphany even if no one outside his tiny camp does."

Richardson Wins Praise From Republican Watts. The U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that it "could have been the environment, the Clinton School of Public Service in Little Rock, or the brash frankness of an ex-politician. But former Rep. J. C. Watts, once the House GOP's main communicator and a sometimes entry on Republican vice presidential lists, fessed up at the University of Arkansas last month that he likes Democratic New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson in the 2008 presidential race." Watts said, "Personally, I'm a Bill Richardson fan. I think he has the Bill Clinton touch with people."

Dean, Martinez To Meet On Primary Schedule. U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that the groundwork is "being laid for the first meeting between the two party chairmen, longtime Democratic boss Howard Dean and GOP newbie Sen. Mel Martinez." Both sides "want to make sure that the other won't let states hold primaries before New Hampshire's first. We hear that the GOP will activate a rule to punish state parties if they do by slashing their number of delegates at the nominating convention in half. The Democrats don't have a similar rule."

DeLay Seeks To Rally Conservatives. U.S. News and World Report (3/12, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column, "Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay is joining the activist world with a plan to return conservatives to dominance." DeLay "calls his new group the Coalition for a Conservative Majority, and it has one mission: recruiting and electing conservatives in all 50 states. He plans to begin building it during an April book tour to promote No Retreat, No Surrender, his blueprint for victory."

Rothenberg Says Collins Faces Tough, But Winnable Race. In his Roll Call column (3/5), Stuart Rothenberg says that if "you listen to Sen. Susan Collins (R-

DOJ_NMG_0139289

Maine) talk for a few minutes, you are likely to think that she doesn't have the toughness and quickness to hold off her likely Democratic challenger, Rep. Tom Allen. Well, stop thinking that way. I don't know whether Collins will be able to swim against a potentially strong anti-President Bush, anti-Iraq War current in 2008, but at this point, I'm certainly not going to bet against her." Since his election to the House, Allen's "liberal and organized labor interest group ratings have been at or near 100 percent. National Journal's ratings place him as the 86th most liberal Member of the House in 2006, sandwiching him between Rep. Lucille Roybal-Allard (D-Calif.) and Rep. Robert Wexler (D-Fla.). In contrast, Collins ranked as the 46th most liberal Member of the Senate in 2006."

Beverly Hills Official Set To Become Highest-Ranking Iranian American. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A1, Sanders, 2.04M) reports in a front page article that when voters in Beverly Hills "go to the polls tomorrow, Jimmy Delshad is a favorite to be re-elected to the City Council. Under the city's system, he would also become mayor," making him "one of the highest-ranking Iranian-American elected officials in the US."

Former Senator Eagleton Dies At 77. ABC World News (3/4, story 6, :30, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "And a Vietnam war opponent who became the Democratic vice presidential nominee has died. Thomas Eagleton was George McGovern's running mate until it was revealed that he had been treated for depression and pulled out of the race. Eagleton continued as a Senator from Missouri until 1987. Thomas Eagleton was 77."

The CBS Evening News (3/4, story 2, :20, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "Eagleton resigned as George McGovern's running mate in '72 after it was revealed he received shock treatment for depression. Eagleton served three terms in the Senate."

WPost Praises Virginia Law On Court-Appointed Lawyers' Fees. The Washington Post (3/5, A14, 690K) editorializes that "Virginia's legislature took a big step last month toward reforming the antediluvian rules that make adequate legal representation a pipe dream for many poor defendants in serious criminal cases. Alone among states, Virginia until now has set ironclad caps on the fees paid to court-appointed defense attorneys, caps that cannot be waived under any circumstances, even by judges. The capped fees are so low that often the effect is to force defense lawyers to work for peanuts or discourage them from working enough, in all but the most open-and-shut cases." The Post credits "the bipartisan efforts of Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat, and Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell, a Republican."

Bush To Face Questions On Economic Policies In Latin America. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A4, McKinnon, Moffett, 2.04M) reports President Bush travels to Latin America this week "to take on Hugo Chávez's militant brand of economic populism. But the weakened US president could spend much of the trip defending against charges his own economic policies have helped shortchange the region." In a speech in Washington today, the President is expected "to lay out a central theme of his Latin America tour -- that democracy is key to improving life for the millions of working poor in the region." His message "seeks to respond to widespread complaints in the region that globalization and international-development policies -- of which he is viewed by many there as a main champion -- have done little to improve the lives of ordinary people there." The president also "hopes to use the democracy theme to push back against what he views as Mr. Chávez's authoritarian tendencies." However, Bush "won't venture into any countries that have moved into Mr. Chávez's sphere of influence, including Argentina, Bolivia, Ecuador and Nicaragua." Instead, he plans during his weeklong trip to visit "five generally friendly countries: Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico."

Chavez Calls Negroponte A "Professional Killer." The AP (3/5, Nunez) reports Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez Sunday "said he believes enemies including the CIA are out to kill him," and called Deputy Secretary Negroponte a "professional killer." Chavez said Venezuelan officials "have intelligence that associates of jailed Cuban anti-communist militant Luis Posada Carriles also are involved in plotting to assassinate him." He said the death plot idea has "gained weight" due to various factors, "including the recent appointment of Negroponte" as Deputy Secretary.

Chavez Using Oil To Earn International Favor. The Christian Science Monitor (3/5, Llana, Rice-Oxley, 59K) reports, "The London bus has come to symbolize many things over the years. It's a national icon, a picture postcard paragon of public transport, a byword for frustration and irregularity. But a harbinger of international socialism? Far-fetched perhaps, but less so after the latest move by…Chávez to offer cut-rate fuel so that 250,000 Londoners on welfare can travel half-price throughout one of the world's most expensive cities." The Monitor adds, "For the past year residents in New York, Boston, and other major US cities have scored cheaper heating bills, thanks to Venezuela. Chávez has also sent cheap oil to Cuba, Nicaragua, and more than a dozen other countries. His offerings go beyond oil and have been announced with particular frenzy since he won a third term in December, promising $500 million in financing for Ecuador, $135 million for a dairy cooperative in Argentina, and a development plan in Nicaragua that includes generators to ease blackouts as well as a new development bank."

DOJ_NMG_0139290

US To Offer Pyongyang "Face-Saving" Nuclear Plan. The New York Times (3/5, A7, Sanger, 1.16M) reports, "In an effort to make the best of newly murky intelligence about North Korea, Bush administration officials say they plan to tell the North's nuclear negotiators on Monday that Washington's doubts about how much progress the country has made in enriching uranium gives North Korea a face-saving way to surrender its nuclear equipment." The "new approach to solve a dispute over the existence and extent of a uranium program" will come at a meeting Monday with North Korea at the United Nations. On Sunday, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said that at the meeting he planned to "form an agenda to work on our bilateral relationship -- what's involved in the establishment of diplomatic relations, what's involved before North Korea can get off the state-sponsor-of-terrorism list, and how to get them off the Trading with the Enemies Act." He said he would be "pressing for disclosure of all their nuclear programs, including highly enriched uranium."

AFP (3/5) says Monday's talks begin "amid questions in Washington over whether US intelligence had exaggerated Pyongyang's nuclear threat."

Meanwhile, Senate Intelligence Committee member Dianne Feinstein told Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "The gathering of intelligence with respect to North Korea has been very difficult. And the drop in the level of confidence on the uranium-based development I think is an indication of that. I, for one, am very pleased to see this agreement. I don't think you can underestimate the value of China in keeping the North Koreans on track now in seeing that this plutonium-based program is disassembled and that North Korea is brought into the mainstream. ... I don't think we are well served by isolating countries. ... So I am very optimistic."

House Intelligence Committee member Pete Hoekstra said on Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "I think Congress needs to take a very close look at this agreement to make sure that it's not a legacy agreement. Legacy agreements cut corners. We need to make sure that there's verification in this agreement. We need to make sure that North Korea comes clean on whatever nuclear weapons that they have in place."

Intelligence On North Korean Nuclear Program Uncertain. Newsweek (3/12, Hirsh, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports in its "Periscope" column, "Last week the government's senior North Korea intel analyst, Joseph DeTrani, told Congress that American officials now had only 'midlevel confidence' in the same intel that led the Bush administration to assert in 2002 the North was actively 'enriching' uranium -- and could have a bomb-making plant up and running soon." During a "confrontation with Pyongyang officials in October 2002 over the North's secret program, the then Assistant Secretary of State Jim Kelly says he actually had little certainty. He told NEWSWEEK last week that the North Koreans themselves 'gave no specifics about what kind of program they had.'" Now, "post-Iraq, the intel community is more cautious. And with the administration eager to pursue an aid-for-nukes agreement with Kim Jong Il, there's less interest in putting the worst possible spin on what is known."

WSJournal Says Pyongyang Has Habit Of Breaking Its Word. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (3/5, A16, 2.04M) urges Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, "before he sits down" Monday with his Korean counterpart, to "take a look at the brief statement issued quietly Thursday by the United Nations Development Program (UNDP)." The agency announced that it is "suspending all operations" in North Korea because the "necessary conditions set out by the Executive Board on 25 January 2007 have not been met." Pyongyang's failure to comply, the Journal writes, represents, "There is no better guide to Kim Jong Il's negotiating style, nor to the North Korean dictator's habit of breaking his word. Nuclear negotiators, beware."

Lawmakers Complain Of Weak US Intelligence. The Washington Times (3/5, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Rep. Peter Hoekstra, a member of the House Intelligence Committee, said Sunday US intelligence agencies "are not providing adequate information for Congress to make policy decisions on key foreign-policy areas including Iran and North Korea." In an appearance on Fox News Sunday, Hoekstra said, "We still don't have the intelligence community overall to give us, as policy-makers, the information that we need to make good decisions in North Korea, Iran and other places." He "blamed the bureaucratic leadership in the intelligence community for what he said are delays in implementing necessary reforms after September 11 and intelligence failures in Iraq."

Bolton Urges Bush To Speak Out On Intelligence. Former US Ambassador to the U.N., John Bolton, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/5, A17, 2.04M) that in light of suggestions that US intelligence on Pyongyang's nuclear program is not as strong as once believed, "President Bush himself must speak, and sooner rather than later, to tell us what he thinks of the intelligence, and the direction of his own policy. Recent polls show his approval rating near 30%, with support among Republicans falling precipitously. If the President's conservative base erodes further, where will his support come from? From liberal editorialists enthusing about his newfound foreign policy 'pragmatism'? Based on my personal experience, the President will not have both."

Iran, Saudi Summit Produces "Little Substance." The New York Times (3/5, A6, Fattah,

DOJ_NMG_0139291

1.16M) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah "concluded an extraordinary meeting early Sunday promising a thaw in relations between the two regional powers. But they stopped short of agreeing on any concrete plans to tackle the escalating sectarian and political crises throughout the Middle East." Ahmadinejad said that the two countries had "agreed to try to curb tensions between Shiite and Sunni Muslims" and "discussed in detail issues related to the Palestinians and Iraq." The two also "are believed to have focused on finding ways to end the political standoff in Lebanon." Ahmadinejad's first official visit to Saudi Arabia was "marked by decidedly public shows of warmth and friendship between the leaders," however analysts were "divided on Sunday over the ultimate impact of the summit meeting." To some, "it promised to break the spiraling cycle of brinkmanship in the region, focusing both countries on constructive solutions to their differences. Skeptics, however, said the absence of any tangible resolutions or initiatives, coupled with Mr. Ahmadinejad's continuing aggressive speech, suggested that the meeting was more a public relations offensive meant to help Iran improve its image at home and in the Arab world as its confrontation with the United States appears to be escalating."

The Financial Times (3/5, Smyth) says Ahmadinejad's visit "appeared designed to ease tensions between" the two countries, while the AP (3/5, Abu-Nasr) says cooperation "will benefit both countries, as well as the whole region."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/5, Peterson, 59K) says Sunday's meeting "illustrates the growing regional alarm over Shiite-Sunni violence" in both Iraq and Lebanon. But "while both leaders prefer to blame outside actors for the increase in sectarian tension…elements in Iran and Saudi Arabia have helped to finance sectarian militias in Iraq and, in the case of the Saudis, engaged in heated sectarian rhetoric."

Palestinian Leaders Seek To Finalize Unity Government. The New York Times (3/5, A7, Kershner, 1.16M) reports Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "and the leader of the Fatah faction, arrived in Gaza on Sunday to meet with" Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, "in another effort to iron out differences over a possible Palestinian unity government." Spokesmen from Fatah and Hamas "expressed hopes over the weekend that the new government would be formed this week" as disagreements remain "on important posts, including interior minister."

Hamas-Linked School Received US Aid. The Washington Times (3/5, A1, Mowbray, 88K) reports on its front page that "millions of dollars in US foreign aid have been given in the past several years to two Palestinian universities -- one of them controlled by Hamas -- that have participated in the advocacy, support or glorification of terrorism." The funding – "principally in scholarships to individual students -- is being eyed by several members of Congress and their aides, who say it may violate US law." According to the Times, USAID has provided "more than $140,000 in assistance to the Hamas-controlled Islamic University in Gaza -- including scholarships to 49 of its students."

Bush "Inner Circle" Split Over Doha Talks. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A8, Hitt, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "As angst over the shaky state of the US trade agenda grows, tensions are emerging within President Bush's inner circle over how best to get the stalled Doha round of world trade talks moving." The chairman of the National Economic Council, "presidential friend Allan Hubbard, and national-security adviser Stephen Hadley have privately voiced frustration with the tortured pace of action in the latest stage of comprehensive talks." The Journal adds, "Launched in Doha, Qatar, soon after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the talks had as their primary aim better integrating poor nations into the global trading system. Messrs. Hubbard and Hadley have pressed for a bolder US offer in an effort to encourage other countries to compromise." In "one heated meeting among top Bush aides just before Christmas in the Old Executive Office Building," US Trade Representative Susan Schwab "opposed the idea of a grand offer. Ms. Schwab, who had seen a similar move by her predecessor flop, pushed instead for "quiet negotiations" focusing on details to build trust among Doha's participants." Bush "sided with Ms. Schwab, and has continued to back her." But "she is now at risk of being overshadowed -- some fear undercut -- by new Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, who is moving deeper into the public debate on Doha and trade."

Beijing Announces 18% Increase In Military Spending. The New York Times (3/5, A8, Yardley, Lague, 1.16M) reports China announced "its biggest increase in defense spending in five years" on Sunday, "a development that quickly prompted the United States to renew its calls for more transparency from the Chinese military about the scope and intent of its continuing, rapid arms buildup." At a news conference, Jiang Enzhu, a spokesman for the National People's Congress, said China's military budget would rise this year by 17.8 percent to "just under $45 billion." Beijing's military modernization efforts, "particularly its drive to develop advanced weaponry, have been raising concern from Washington to Tokyo to New Delhi, where officials are worried that the buildup could be as much offensive as defensive." On Sunday, Deputy Secretary Negroponte, who is touring Asia, "chose not to focus on the size of the latest budget increase, but instead emphasized that China needed to be less secretive about its military buildup." He told reporters in Beijing, "I think the point we would make with respect to military spending and military acquisition of various types would be the point about transparency."

DOJ_NMG_0139292

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (3/5, A12, Cody, 690K) says Negroponte said the Bush administration "'is dissatisfied with China's unwillingness to share such information," saying, "We think it's important in our dialogue that we understand what China's plans and intentions are." China's announcement and Negroponte's "swift appeal for more transparency highlighted a particularly uneasy point in what has become a broad, close and increasingly important US-China relationship."

The Financial Times (3/5, Yeh) says the Bush administration "has, in recent weeks, expressed increased suspicion of the general objectives and technological sophistication of the Chinese military, which is extremely secretive." Similarly, the Wall Street Journal (3/5, A3, Fairclough, Batson, Leow, 2.04M) says the move "could raise tensions with the US." The US and China's "Asian neighbors are increasingly concerned about China's strengthening military -- worries that escalated markedly after China's successful test of an antisatellite missile in January." The Washington Times (3/5, Lanfranco, 88K) also reports the story.

Paulson: China Not An Enemy. The Washington Times/AP (3/5) reports, "Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. says the economy is healthy, inflation seems under control and the U.S. should not perceive China as an economic enemy." Paulson, who "this week makes his third visit to China as Treasury secretary, said in a television interview broadcast it is essential that both countries have strong economic ties. The former head of the investment company Goldman Sachs has said China is moving too slowly in overhauling its currency system and cracking down on copyright piracy. … 'I would say that our relationship with China is multifaceted, and it's a very important relationship for the US. And I don't believe we need to make China an enemy,' Mr. Paulson said." The Wall Street Journal (3/5, 2.04M) runs an abbreviated version of the same AP story.

House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel said on Fox News Sunday (3/4, Wallace), "I'm certain that" Paulson "already has his cue cards when he comes back. This is an ancient society. It's very difficult for them to understand our economy, that their pirating and stealing of our products is something they're working on. ... But the Congress, Republicans and Democrats, are going to start getting tough on China. We're going to expect our United States Trade Representative to enforce international law."

Brown Expected To Effect "Big Change" In British Foreign Policy. The Christian Science Monitor (3/5, Rice-Oxley, 59K) reports, "Barring an improbable political upset," Gordon Brown will be the next British prime minister, and "members of Parliament, political analysts, and people who know Mr. Brown say he will be a much different prime minister from Blair." His interests "are Africa and trade justice rather than the Middle East; he was never enthusiastic about Iraq; he appears to have little in common with President Bush." Americans may find Brown "a very different proposition from Blair, more cautious, possibly less compliant," and "some say the White House should prepare for a big change in style, if not substance."

"Human Rights" Clause Blocking EU-India Trade Accord. The Financial Times (3/5, Johnson) reports, "Indian objections to the inclusion of a standard "human rights and democracy" clause in a proposed free trade agreement with the European Union have emerged as a serious stumbling block, the Financial Times has learnt. The row is a setback for the ambitious agenda set at the EU-India summit in Helsinki in October last year, when both sides pledged to deepen economic and political ties." India "is a member of the United Nations Human Rights Council, but ranks low, according to the Asian Human Rights Commission, among the international community in terms of the ratification of international conventions and covenants."

Killings Said To Have Exposed Rampant Lawlessness In Central America. The New York Times (3/5, McKinley, 1.16M) reports, "After three Salvadoran congressmen were waylaid and killed on a road in Guatemala last month, it did not take the authorities long to find the culprits: they were Guatemalan police officers, and their unmarked police car had a tracking device that proved they were at the scene. They quickly confessed, saying they thought their victims were drug dealers, and were sent to a maximum-security prison." In prison, "the four who confessed ended up dead." The Times adds, "The police and the interior minister say that rioting gang members inside the prison shot and stabbed them. But other inmates and their visitors that day say a group of heavily armed men in military garb and ski masks made their way through seven locked doors and executed them, with no interference from guards, removing any possibility that they could identify co-conspirators. … Perhaps more important, the whole episode has exposed to the world the rampant police corruption, lawlessness and drug trafficking that plagues much of Central America, and Guatemala in particular."

Ivory Coast's President, Rebels Sign Accord. The New York Times (3/5, Polgreen, 1.16M) reports, "he president of Ivory Coast and the leader of a rebel group that controls its northern half signed a new agreement on Sunday to end a political impasse and reunite the country, which has been divided by war." The plan "is the latest in a long string of agreements seeking to end a simmering conflict that has kept Ivory Coast, once one of the most peaceful and prosperous nations in West Africa, divided in two and hobbled economically. Laurent Gbagbo, Ivory Coast's president, and Guillaume Soro, leader of the New Forces rebel group, met in Ouagadougou, capital of Burkina Faso, to sign the agreement." The two sides "plan to form a unity government within five weeks and form a joint military command."

DOJ_NMG_0139293

Sweden Cited As Example For Pension Reform. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, A6, Perry, 2.04M) reports, "As aging populations and shaky public finances make overhauling pension systems a global priority, an initiative implemented nearly a decade ago in Sweden is looking like the pension world's next big thing." By "pegging public pensions to individual earnings and overall life-expectancy rates," Sweden "has given its citizens incentives to be more productive and retire later -- and sidestepped the political paralysis that has stymied change elsewhere." Some elements of its system are now being adopted in other countries such as Brazil and Russia.

Left Accused Of Double Standard On Civil Rights. Armando Valladares, former US ambassador to the UN Commission on Human Rights and current chairman of the New York-based Human Rights Foundation, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/5, 2.04M), "The news that the Cuban dictator is gravely ill floods my mind with memories of my years spent in captivity. I believe that those of us who were political prisoners know his legacy better than anyone. For 22 years, I was an inmate in his vast prison system, mostly confined to an island gulag, for crimes I did not commit." Valladares adds, "The legacy of Castro for Cuba will be much like that of Stalin in Russia, Pol Pot and Ieng Sari in Cambodia and Hitler in Germany. … But his poisonous legacy will also include the double standard by foreign governments, intellectuals and journalists who fought ferociously against the unspeakable violations of human rights by right-wing dictatorships, yet applauded Castro. To this day many of these intellectuals serve as apologists and accomplices in the subjugation of the Cuban people."

Diehl Urges Turkey To "Shrug" Off US Genocide Resolution. The Washington Post's (3/5, A15) Jackson Diehl writes that "a vote expected next month on a nonbinding House resolution describing a 'genocide' in the Ottoman Empire beginning in 1915 has the potential to explode US relations with Turkey, sway the outcome of upcoming Turkish elections and spill over into several other strategic American interests, including Iraq and Iran." Diehl says that although "maybe Congress has no business debating Turkish history, maybe it is doing so for the wrong reasons. Yet if Turkey is to become the stable, Western-oriented democracy that it aspires to be, its politicians will have to learn, at least, to react the way everyone else does to nonbinding House resolutions: that is, with a shrug."

Congress Urged To Protect Rights Of War Medics. Leonard Rubenstein, executive director of Physicians for Human Rights, writes in the Washington Post (3/5, A15, 690K), "In war, health workers are often heroes and often victims. Though the Geneva Conventions are supposed to protect them as they fulfill their ethical duty to provide care to wounded combatants without regard to affiliation -- what is known as medical neutrality -- they frequently become targets by attending to the enemies of one side or another." Rubenstein urges Congress to "revise the law to protect medical ethics and restore America's commitment to being a place of refuge for those fleeing persecution. This step is also essential to revive principles of medical neutrality."

EU Market Commissioner Urges Reforms. Charlie McCreevy, EU commissioner for the internal market and services, writes in a Wall Street Journal (3/5, A17, 2.04M) op-ed that "many seem to see the regulatory burden of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act…as a significant reason for reduced US capital market competitiveness. The detailed requirements for internal control of public companies have turned out to be extremely expensive to implement." But "as trans-Atlantic markets further integrate," McCreevy says "we have to shift up a gear and chart a route to recognize each other's audit oversight bodies, implement the Basel II banking accord in a way that benefits banks and customers on both sides, and move to a risk-based system of reinsurance regulation that benefits homeowners and policyholders alike."

NYTimes Celebrates ICC Moves Against Genocide. The New York Times (3/5, 1.16M) editorializes, "Genocide moves swiftly, kills promiscuously and keeps finding new perpetrators, despite the world's repeated vows of 'never again.' In the face of such rampaging horror, carefully considered court verdicts, like last week's World Court ruling on the 1995 Srebrenica massacre in Bosnia, and patiently assembled dossiers, like the one that International Criminal Court prosecutors have now filed against two accused masterminds of Darfur's ongoing slaughter, seem frustratingly inadequate. … Court rulings can never compensate the survivors of these horrors. But by strengthening the reach and authority of international law, these cases should give pause to those tempted to unleash future genocides -- and to those who stand by."

NYTimes Praises Drug Firm's Action Against Malaria In Africa. The New York Times (3/5, 1.16M) writes in an editorial, "The big pharmaceutical companies are rightly criticized for concentrating on the development and marketing of drugs that sell for high prices in the industrialized world while neglecting to produce medications that could save millions of lives in the poorest countries. So it came as especially welcome news last week that Paris-based Sanofi-Aventis, the world's fourth-largest drug company, working in collaboration with a nonprofit drug-development organization pioneered by Doctors Without Borders, will soon introduce a cheap and easy-to-use pill to combat malaria in sub-Saharan Africa. … Now that Sanofi has shown, in the words of one executive, that 'we are not nasty people working against poor countries and seeking only profits,' let us hope that many other big drug companies feel the same humanitarian impulse."

DOJ_NMG_0139294

WSJournal Criticizes EU Action Against Microsoft. The Wall Street Journal (3/5, 2.04M) editorializes, "Each round of the European Union's battle royal with Microsoft has revealed more about flaws in the bloc's antitrust office than about the stubbornness of the American software giant. Brussels' latest sucker punch is no exception. Last Thursday, EU antitrust czarina Neelie Kroes threatened to fine Microsoft up to €3 million, or about $4 million, a day because she doesn't like the prices the company wants to charge for licensing its technology." The Journal goes on to criticize "eurocrats," whose threats against "another multimillion-dollar fine when the appeals court is due to rule soon on the original judgment smacks of spite."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Security Crackdown Widens To Shiite Slum."
"Disabled Woman Is Able Ally For Parents."
"For Rep. Sanchez, A Hot-Tomato Label Means A Hot Potato."
"China May Close Reeducation Prisons."
"Obama, Clinton Reach Out To Black Voters."
"Cities Are Answering The Scrawl."

USA Today:
"Where Did The Money Go?."
"More Colleges Banning Smoking."
"U.S. Marshals Official Accused Of Misspending Security Funds."
"Chip Foose Overhaulin' Mainstream Designs."

New York Times:
"Basra Raid Finds Dozens Detained By Iraq Spy Unit."
"Oil Innovations Pump New Life Into Old Wells."
"N.A.A.C.P. President Is Stepping Down After A Brief Stay."
"A Record Of Failure at Center For Sex Offenders."
"Without Health Benefits, A Good Life Turns Fragile."
"In Guatemala, Officers' Killings Echo Dirty War."

Washington Post:
"No U.S. Backup Strategy For Iraq."
"'It Is Just Not Walter Reed'."
"Patent Office Web Site Will Solicit Advice."
"In Canada, the New Rush Is For Diamonds."
"Domenici Says He Contacted Prosecutor."
"Lanier Poised To Become Police Chief."

Washington Times:
"China Boost Defense Fund As Talks End."
"School Linked To Hamas Gets U.S. Cash."
"NAACP Leader Quits Over Group's Focus."
"Silicon valley Looks To Obama."
"CPAC Embraces Steele, Gingrich."
"Kibbutz Ideal Collapses As Israel Shifts To Capitalism."

Detroit Free Press:
"Tara Likely Strangled."
"Fatigue, Frostbite Catch Up To Him."
"Germans Love And Hate Chrysler."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"NTSB Official Urges Changes At Crash Exit."
"Deadly Pursuits."
"Obama, Clinton Stump In Selma."
"'Time Switch May Torment Computers.'"

Houston Chronicle:
"A Hannah Bonanza."
"State-Of-Th-Art-Healing."
"Beijing Boost Military Budget Mightily."
"Hole In The Sewing Supply Market."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Clinton, Obama Visit-Selma; Black Vote-Analysis; Afghanistan Violence; Push Into Sadr City; Walter Reed-Hearings; Thomas Eagelton Obit; Tornado Aftermath-Alabama; Christians Vs Atheist; Sled Dog Race-Alaska.
CBS: Clinton, Obama-Selma; Eagleton Obit; US-Afghan Civilian Deaths; Iraq-US Death Toll; Iraq Vet-Alabama Tornadoes.
NBC: Preempted By Golf.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Walter Reed-Congressional Hearings; US And Iraqi Forces-Sadr City; AL-Voting Rights March Commemoration; Obama, Clinton-Selma; AL-Funerals For Tornado Victims; Asian Stock Markets.
CBS: US And Iraqi Forces-Sadr City; Selma, AL-Voting Rights March Commemoration; Obama, Clinton-Selma; Walter Reed-Congressional Hearings; Eagleton Obit; Iditarod Sled Dog Race; Weekend Box Office.

DOJ_NMG_0139295

NPR: Congressional Subpoenas-Fired Federal Prosecutors; Feinstein, Hoekstra-Militants In Pakistan; US Military Investigating Suicide Bombing Incident In Afghanistan; Canada's Defense Minister-Afghanistan's Human Rights Commission; Atlanta-Bush Crash Investigation; Obama, Clinton-Selma; NAACP President Resigns.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Speaks on Western Hemisphere policy, Reagan Building and International Trade Center. Open press.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Addresses the VFW Convention. Omni Shoreham Hotel.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 1:30 p.m. Senate reconvenes at 1:30 p.m. Morning business until 3 p.m., when the Senate resumes consideration of S.4, the 9/11 Commission recommendations bill. Also, a vote on an executive calendar matter is scheduled for 5:30 p.m.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Oversight of Goverment Management, the Federal Workforce and the District of Columbia Subcommittee. Hearing on the TSA personnel system for both screeners and non-screeners. Witnesses TSA Assistant Secretary Kip Hawley, AFGE President John Gage, others. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

US House: 10 a.m. OVERSIGHT AND GOVERNMENT REFORM _ National Security Subcommittee. Field hearing on conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Invited witnesses: Specialist Jeremy Duncan; Annette McLeod, wife of Cpl. Wendell ``Dell'' McLeod; Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon; Lt. General Kevin C. Kiley, M.D., U.S. Army Surgeon General; Major General George W. Weightman, Commander (former), Walter Reed Army Medical Center; Cynthia A. Bascetta, Director, Health Care, U.S. Government Accountability Office; General Richard A. Cody, Vice Chief Of Staff Of The Army. Location: Joel Auditorium, Walter Reed Medical Center.

12:30 p.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Meets for morning business, and at 2 p.m. for legislative business. First votes are set for 6:30 p.m.

1:30 p.m. HOUSE APPROPRIATIONS _ Defense Subcommittee. Hearing on the infrastructure and conditions at Walter Reed Army Hospital. Witnesses still TBA. Location: Room 2359, Rayburn.

2 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Subcommittee on Financial Services. Testimony from Kathy Petronchak, commissioner, Small Business/Self-Employed Division, IRS; Nina Olson, National Taxpayer Advocate, IRS; Robert S. McIntyre, director, Citizens for Tax Justice; Leonard E. Burman, director, Tax Policy Center; Alan D. Viard, resident scholar, American Enterprise Institute. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

Other: COUNTIES _ The National Association of Counties (NACo) holds its 2007 Legislative Conference. Highlights: 1:30 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. Opening General Session. Participants: Gov. Brian Schweitzer, D-Mont.; U.S. Transportation Secretary Mary Peters; former Louisiana Senator John Breaux, who will moderate a bipartisan panel of experts to inspire change in the nations health care system; and presidential candidate, Rep. Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW.

INTERNATIONAL BANKERS _ The Institute of International Bankers holds its Washington conference. Highlights: 12 p.m. Rep. Barney Frank - luncheon speaker. 2 p.m. FRB Governors Kevin Warsh. 4 p.m. Rep. Spencer Bachus. 4:30 p.m. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board Chairman Mark Olson. Location: Four Seasons Hotel, 2800 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

VFW CONFERENCE _ The Veterans of Foreign Wars holds its Washington Conference. Highlights: 8 a.m. Opening session with VA Secretary Nicholson, Sen. Joseph Lieberman. 10 a.m. U.S. Coast Guard Commandant Admiral Thad W. Allen speaks. 11 a.m. Vice President Cheney speaks. 1 p.m. POW/MIA session, with retired Air Force Gen. Robert Foglesong, and retired Gen. Ruslan Aushev. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW.

AMERICAN LEGION-NATIONAL DC CONFERENCE _ The American Legion 47th National Washington Conference. Highlights: 9:15 a.m. Mario Mancuso, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense Special Operations and Combating Terrorism, Department of Defense. 9:40 a.m. Gordon H. Mansfield, Deputy Secretary of Veterans Affairs, Department of Veteran Affairs. 11:35 a.m. Bob Filner, Chairman, House Committee on Veterans Affairs. 2:00 p.m. Jeff Sessions, U.S. Senator (Alabama); Location: Renaissance Washington Hotel, 999 9th St. NW.

ATTORNEYS GENERAL _ The National Association of Attorneys General holds its spring meeting. Highlights: 1:45 p.m. Session on the REAL ID program, with Assistant DHS Secretary Richard Barth. Location: Fairmont Hotel, 2401 M St. NW.

HISPANIC CHAMBER _ The United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce holds its 17th annual legislative conference, ``Advancing Latino Entrerpreneurship -- It's Just Good Business.'' Highlights: 1 p.m. President Bush speaks. 6:30 p.m. - 8:30 p.m. Latina Leaders Reception. Note: This event at Altria Group, Inc. Headquarters, 101 Constitution Avenue, Suite 400. Location: Ronald Reagan Building & International Trade Center 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0139296

HOSPITALS _ The Federation of American Hospitals holds its 2007 Public Policy Conference and Business Exposition. Highlights: 8:25 a.m. Plenary session with keynote address by Comptroller General David M. Walker. Location: Marriott Wardman Park Hotel, 2660 Woodley Road NW.

LATAM-BUSH TRIP _ 9 a.m. - 10:15 a.m. The Inter-American Dialogue hosts a informal discussion of U.S. policy toward Latin America and the Caribbean in the context of President Bush's trip to the region later in the week. Panelists; Peter Hakim, president, Inter-American Dialogue; Michael Shifter, vice president for policy, Inter-American Dialogue; and Sydney Weintraub, William E. Simon Chair in Political Economy, Center for Strategic and International Studies. Location: Inter-American Dialogue offices, 1211 Connecticut Ave. NW, Suite 510.

FARM-TRADE _ 10 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a roundtable, ``The Farm Bill, the Doha Negotiations and the President's Trade Agenda: Proposals for Agricultural Policy Reform and their IKmplications for U.S. Trade Policy." Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

AMERICA COMPETES _ 2 a.m. Sens. Jeff Bingaman (D-NM) and Pete Domenici (R-NM) will join Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell and other senators to introduce the ``America COMPETES Act. Location: Mansfield Room, US Capitol.

ENERGY-NUCLEAR _ 12 p.m. The US Energy Association holds a briefing on the World Energy Council study on nuclear power in Europe. Location: US Energy Association, Suite 550, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

GLOBAL HIV/AIDS ISSUES _ 12 p.m. Physicians for Human Rights and other HIV/AIDS advocacy groups sponsor a congressional briefing on ``Confronting Rapidly Emerging HIV Epidemics in Asia and Eastern Europe." Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

HIV _ 12 p.m. Physicians for Human Rights, others, hold a briefing on the HIV epidemics in Asia and Eastern Europe, focusing on Vietnam. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

COAL EMISSIONS _ 12:30 p.m. The FutureGen Alliance holds a briefing to provide an update on the project regarding near-zero emissions technology and reducing carbon dioxide emissions. Location: Suite 701, 1150 17th St. NW.

LEVIN _ 1 p.m. Rep. Sander Levin speaks at an event by the Center for American Progress on globalization and the shared benefits domestically and abroad. Location: 10th floor, 1333 H St. NW.

ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION _ 2 p.m. The American Legion hosts a forum on illegal immigration and will feature government and private sector speakers who will discuss way to deal with this countrys population of illegal aliens. Speakers include: Senator Jeff Sessions of Alabama; Alfonso Aguilar, Chief of Citizenship U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, DHS; Kris Kobach, Professor University of Missouri, Kansas City School of Law; Roy Beck President, NumbersUSA; Dr. John Fonte Senior Fellow, Hudson Institute; and Mark Krikorian, Executive Director Center for Immigration Studies. Location: Renaissance Washington Hotel, Auditorium, 999 9th St. NW.

PENTAGON BRIEFING _ 2 p.m. Press briefing and media roundtable with Gen. Montgomery Meigs (U.S. Army retired) from the Joint IED Defeat Organization. He'll give an update press on JIEDDO efforts. Location: Pentagon, Room 1E462.

TERRORISM-DEMOCRATIC STATES _ 2 p.m. - 4 p.m. The United States Institute of Peace hosts a discussion of a multi-author study, ``Democracy and Counterterrorism: Lessons From the Past," edited by Robert Art and Louise Richardson, which examines thirteen cases across Europe, Latin America, Asia, and the Middle East to assess how democratic states have countered terrorist groups, and what lessons their campaigns offer for democracies currently battling al Qaeda and other global jihadists. Speakers: Robert Art, Brandeis University; Louise Richardson Radcliffe, Institute for Advanced Study, Harvard University; Paul Pillar, Center for Peace and Security Studies, Georgetown University; and Richard Falkenrath New York Police Department. Moderator: Paul Stares, U.S. Institute of Peace. Location: U.S. Institute of Peace 2nd Floor Conference Room 1200 17th St. NW.

WEBB-IRAN _ 2:30 p.m. Senator Jim Webb of Virginia holds media availability to discuss his bill prohibiting the use of funds for military operations in Iran without the consent of Congress. Location: Senate Radio & TV Gallery. Notes: He plans to introduce the bill on the Senate floor at 2 p.m.

KOREA _ 4 p.m. The Congressional Human Rights Caucus and the Congressional Korea Caucus hold a briefing with former Norwegian Prime Minister Kjell Magne Bondevik concerning human rights in North Korea. Location: Room 2255, Rayburn.

WALTER REED-NELSON _ 4:30 p.m. Sen. Ben Nelson holds a news conference following his tour of Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

BAMFORD-IRAN _ 8:10 a.m. Historian James Bamford, author of ``A Pretext for War: 9/11, Iraq and the Abuse of Americas Intelligence Agencies," lectures at American University. Topic: ``Building the Case for War with Iran: What Did Congress and the Media Learn from Iraq?" Location: Ward 2 (Auditorium/Classroom on the lower level of Ward Circle Building), American University, 4400 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

POLAR BEAR-PUBLIC HEARING _ 6 p.m. - 9 p.m. US Fish and Wildlife Service holds public hearing on the 12-month petition finding and proposed rule to list the polar bear as ``threatened throughout its range under the Endangered Species Act. Location: Interior Dept. auditorium, 1849 C. St NW.

DOJ_NMG_0139297

LABOR SECRETARY-AWARD _ 7:15 p.m. US Secretary of Labor Elaine Chao delivers remarks and receives an award at a US Hispanic Chamber of Commerce event. Open press. Location: 101 Constitution Ave. NW, Suite 400.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, March 5, 2007 8:15 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Monday, March 05, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070305.pdf; dojclips070305.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, MARCH 5, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Arab Bank Accused Of Funding Terrorists (LAT) 3
Terror Case Prosecutor Assails Defense Lawyer (NYT) 5

Homeland Response:

Holt Wants Hearings On FBI Anthrax Investigation (AP) 6
Flirting With Disaster (editorial) (WP) 6
Sensible Security Fixes (WP) 7

War News:

Bush, Cheney Turn Focus To Terrorism (WT) 8
Hundreds Of U.S., Iraqi Troops Sweep Sadr City (USAT) 8
Basra Raid Finds Prisoners With Signs Of Torture (WP) 9
U.S. Gingerly Enters Sensitive Iraq Neighborhood (LAT) 11
Notes From Baghdad (WSJ) 12
U.S. Hopes For Results In Iraq Outreach (AP) 13
Basra Raid Finds Dozens Detained By Iraq Spy Unit (NYT) 14
Iraq Ousts 10,000 In Security Ministry (USAT) 16
No U.S. Backup Strategy For Iraq (WP) 17
How To Stop Genocide In Iraq (LAT) 19
Supplemental Sows Discord (RC) 20
Democrats Benefit From Public Shift On War (WT) 22
Iraq: Silence Of The Sadrists (NSWK) 24
The Things That Get You (USNEWS) 25
10 Questions For Ted Kennedy (TIME) 26
Confronting Iraq's Exodus (TIME) 27
Syria. (TIME) 27
Sweden. (TIME) 28
Japan Weighs Extending Iraq Mission (AP) 30
Bilateral Talks With U.S. Still On The Table (WT) 30
16 Civilians Die As U.S. Troops Fire On Afghan Road (NYT) 31
Insurgents Strike Marine Convoy; 10 Dead In Melee (WT/AP) 32
Marines Open Fire After Afghan Ambush (WP) 33
8 Afghans Die After Attack On U.S. Convoy (LAT) 34
New Justice, No Peace (NYT) 35
Cheney In The War Zone (TIME) 36
Cheney Gets To See A Resurgent Taliban (NSWK) 37
Senators: Pakistan Must Address Al-Qaida (AP) 38
Where Does Al Qaeda Stand Now? (CSM) 39

DOJ:

Domenici Says He Called Fired Prosecutor (AP) 40
Domenici Says He Contacted Prosecutor (WP) 42
Senator Sought Dismissal Of New Mexico Prosecutor (NYT) 43
GOP Lawmakers Played A Role In U.S. Attorney Purge (NSWK) 44
Editorial: Stop The Bush Purge (MJS) 45

Criminal Law:

FBI Helps Probe Kremlin Critic's Shooting (WSJ) 45
Doubts Over KGB Link To US Shooting (FT) 46
Analyst Robbed During Shooting (WP) 47
Intelligence Specialist's Shooting Stirs Speculation (WP) 48
Attorney General To Investigate Maywood Police (LAT) 49
Matty 'The Horse' On His Last Ride (AP) 50
Mistrial Sought In Federal Capital Case (WT) 52
Federal Act Preventing County Prosecutors From Trying Olsen (AP) 52
Nevada Governor Retains Top Lawyer (WSJ) 53
Nearly 20% Of Released Sex Felons Are Missing (SAEN) 53
FBI Watching Mortgage Fraud (MBSN) 55
Arrest Sparks Worries Over Implications Of Corporate Law (HC/AP) 56
D'Amato Never Folds (NYT) 57
A Record Of Failure At Center For Sex Offenders (NYT) 59
Early Struggles Helped Forge Lanier's Resilience (WP) 63

Civil Law:

FEDERAL DIARY: Slowing Down The Revolving Door (WP) .66

Civil Rights:

Neighbors Of Ruined Store Call For Healing (OWH) 67
Ruling Awaited On Contested Ga. Tech Policies (WT) 68
Disabled Woman Is Able Ally For Parents (LAT) 68

NAACP Leader Quits Over Group's Focus (WT/AP) 71
President Is Leaving N.A.A.C.P. (NYT) 72
NAACP President Quits, Cites Conflicts (WP)..... 74
Education, Education, Education (NYT) 74
Governor Gunslinger (NYT) 76

Antitrust:

The Big Deal Goes Green (TIME) 76
Intellectual Property Verdicts Exceed $1.3 Billion In 2006 (LAW) 77
N.Y. Federal Judge Rebuffs Recusal Motion Citing Clients Of Husband's Firm (LAW) 78
Judge Dismisses Lucent Patent Suit Against Microsoft (WSJ) 80
Open Call From The Patent Office (WP) 81

Indian Affairs:

Tribe Slave Descendants Face Uncertainty (HC/AP) 82

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Sending Investigators To Guatemala Ahead Of Bush Visit (MCT) 83
In Guatemala, Officers' Killings Echo Dirty War (NYT) 85
Reddit Washington Whispers (USNEWS) 87
Brown-on-black Violence Plagues South State (SACBEE) 88
Cash And Cocaine, But No Conviction (WP) 89
Texas Man Convicted Of Cocaine Distribution, Money Laundering (SHREVET) 91
Top Bodybuilders Allegedly Received Steroids From Internet Pharmacy (NYDN) 91
Internet Brings Drug Dealing Into The Home (ALBANYTU) ... 92
Schumer Calls For HGH Regulation (NSDY) 94
Marigolds Make Way For Marijuana In Suburbia (CSM) 94
Bust Yields Bumper Crop Of Pot Farms In Basements (AJC) 96
Police: Couple Ran Pot Farm At Home (PL) 98
Lafayette Man Pleads Guilty In Pot-candy Case (SFC) 98
Drug Smugglers Reroute Shipments Via Central America (LAT) 99
Drug Smugglers Reroute Shipments Via Central America (LAT) 102

Immigration:

Bush's Last Chance On Immigration (TIME) 104

Tax:

Here Comes The AMT (USNEWS) 105

Congress-Administration:

Senators Vow Quick Action On Walter Reed (AP) 106
Democrats Fume Over Walter Reed Scandal (LAT) 107
Walter Reed Hearing To Put Spotlight On Kiley's Leadership (WP) 108
US Army Scrambles To Clean Walter Reed (CSM) 110
'It Is Just Not Walter Reed' (WP) 111
Army Hospitals: Finally, Some Action (NSWK) 113
Reddit Washington Whispers (USNEWS) 113
Focus Is On Veterans' Chief As Inquiries On Care Begin (NYT) 115
Valor And Squalor (NYT) 116
At The Pentagon, Gates Seen As Liberator (WP) 117
World Bank Slow To Inform Employees Of Baghdad Shooting (WP) 119
Out Of Stocks, And Into ...? (WSJ) 120
Mortgage Crisis Spirals, And Casualties Mount (NYT) 122
From Serving In Iraq To Living On The Streets (WP) 124
For Rep. Sanchez, A Hot-tomato Label Means A Hot Potato (LAT) 126
A Senator's Railroad No-Brainer (WP) 128
Going Down With The Ships (WP) 129
Deep Trouble For Deepwater (USNEWS) 131
That Film's Real Message? It Could Be: 'Buy A Ticket' (NYT) 132
Blog The Debt Away (NYT) 134

Other News:

Without Health Benefits, A Good Life Turns Fragile (NYT) ... 134
Oil Innovations Pump New Life Into Old Wells (NYT) 137
Romney: Blogs More Open Than Mainstream Media (POL) 139
Romney Gets The Nod From CPAC (FT) 142
CPAC Embraces Steele, Gingrich (WT) 142
A Mood Of Gloom At CPAC (POL) 144
Giuliani's Not-so-wild Card In 2008 (USAT) 145
The Real Rudy Giuliani: A Profile (NSWK) 146
What Makes Rudy Run (USNEWS) 150
Alter: Wrong Time For An Urban Cowboy? (NSWK) 151
Clinton, Obama Praise Civil Rights Achievements (USAT) .. 152
Clintons, Obama Honor Activists In Selma (AP) 153
Candidates Obama, Clinton Vie For Black Voters In Selma (MCT) 154
Crowds Jam Selma Churches To See Obama, Clinton (AJC) 156
Obama Praises Selma Achievements (USAT) 157
Obama, Clinton Seek Votes At Civil Rights Landmark (CHIT) 157
Clinton And Obama Unite In Pleas To Blacks (NYT) 159
Clinton, Obama Link Selma March To Present (WP) 160
Davis Hits HRC On War Vote As Obama Ties Himself To Movement (POL) 162

DOJ_NMG_0139301

Silicon Valley Looks To Obama (WT) 163
The Senator's 'Streak' Ends At 57th Vote (WP) 164
Weekend At Obama's (WSJ) 164
Clinton Brings Debt Worries To The Fore (WSJ) 165
Crafting The New Hillary (USNEWS) 165
Bloomberg: The Waiting Game (NSWK) 168
The Kucinich Conundrum (TIME) 168
Susan Collins May Be Vulnerable, But Don't Underestimate Her (RC) 169
City Council Race Shows Changed Face Of Beverly Hills (WSJ) 170
Justice Restored (WP) 172
Bush Poised To Counter Chávez (WSJ) 173
Chavez Calls Envoy 'Professional Killer' (AP) 174
Chávez's Oil Largesse Winning Fans Abroad (CSM) 175
U.S. To Offer North Korea Face-Saving Nuclear Plan (NYT) 176
US, North Korea Begin Thaw In Relations (AFP) 177
N. Korea: Intelligence And Uncertainty (NSWK) 178
Kim Jong Il's Word (WSJ) 179
Key Lawmakers Complain Of Weak Intelligence (WT) 180
North Korea Climbdown (WSJ) 181
Saudi-Iran Meeting Yields Little Substance (NYT) 182
Iran, Saudi Hail 'friendly' Meeting (FT) 184
Iran President, Saudis Vow Cooperation (AP) 185
Saudi Arabia, Iran Target Mideast's Sectarian Discord (CSM) 185
Palestinian Leaders Try To Resolve Split Over Key Posts (NYT) 187
School Linked To Hamas Gets U.S. Cash (WT) 188
White House Tussles On Doha (WSJ) 189
Beijing Accelerates Its Military Spending (NYT) 191
China Boosts Military Spending (WP) 192
Chinese Military Spending To Rise By 18% (FT) 193
China's Military Buildup Spurs Concerns (WSJ) 194
China Boosts Defense Fund As Talks End (WT) 195
Paulson Doesn't See China As Enemy (WT/AP) 196
Paulson Renews Yuan-Reform Talk (WSJ/AP) 197
Britain's Gordon Brown: A Change In Tone For US (CSM) ..197
EU-India Trade Pact Stumbles (FT) 199
Ivory Coast Leader Signs Accord With Rebels (NYT) 199
Sweden's Pension Antidote Finds A Global Audience (WSJ) 200
Castro's Gulag (WSJ) 202
The House's Ottoman Agenda (WP) 203
Doctors Without Refuge (WP) 204
Capital Marketplace (WSJ) 205
Taking Genocide To Court (NYT) 206
Malaria Pills Without Profit (NYT) 207
Brussels Punching Bag (WSJ) 207

TERRORISM NEWS:

Arab Bank Accused Of Funding Terrorists (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — A three-year investigation into the activities of one of the Middle East's largest and most influential banks is producing extensive evidence of how tens of millions of dollars have flowed from wealthy Saudi Arabians to Palestinian groups that allegedly used some of the money to pay off suicide bombers and their survivors.

The information being turned up by government inquiries and lawyers suing Arab Bank "will give people a better understanding of the way money moves in that part of the world to support Hamas" and other militant groups in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, said Stephen Kroll, a terrorism finance specialist and until recently counsel to the U.S. Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs.

"It's important in focusing the public's attention on the issue of what is and what is not acceptable for banks to be involved in," Kroll said.

The Justice Department is conducting a criminal investigation into the New York branch of Arab Bank, which is based in Jordan, and its financial links to organizations and individuals accused of terrorism, according to three former U.S. counter-terrorism officials.

DOJ_NMG_0139302

In 2005, the bank agreed to pay the federal government $24 million in fines for violating U.S. laws aimed at preventing terrorist financing, including failing to report suspicious transactions.

The bank is also being sued in federal court in Brooklyn by Americans and Israelis injured in suicide bombings or other fighting in Israel and the occupied territories, and by the relatives of others who were killed. No trial date has been set, but assuming the cases go to trial, they could establish ground rules for what obligations banks have in handling money bound for militant groups. They could also provide an unusually detailed and public look at the flow of money from Saudi donors to Palestinian groups that the U.S. and Israel list as terrorist.

Lawyers suing Arab Bank accuse the firm of facilitating acts of terrorism by providing accounts and other financial services to Hamas, Islamic Jihad and similar groups. Arab Bank also acted as the administrator of a plan in which suicide bombers and others designated as "martyrs" by the Palestinian Authority and other organizations were compensated for their actions on a sliding scale, based on the extent of their injuries, according to documents filed in the cases. The lawsuits charge that the payments — and thus Arab Bank — provided an incentive for suicide bombings.

Arab Bank officials deny such charges and say they have never knowingly supported acts of terrorism. Bank officials say their agreement to pay the fine in 2005 was not an acknowledgment of any wrongdoing.

Bank officials say they provide an important financial service in the impoverished Palestinian territories and that they were merely acting as intermediaries between banks representing Saudi donors and Palestinian organizations and individuals who were being compensated for suffering at Israeli hands.

They also say that a "martyr" can mean almost any Palestinian killed or injured as part of the struggle with Israel, including innocent victims.

"Arab Bank had reason to believe these were humanitarian payments or social welfare payments, and there was certainly nothing in any of the public information that suggested to the bank at the time that these were in any way [meant] to induce terrorism or reward terrorism," said Robert Chlopak, a Washington-based spokesman for the bank.

Chlopak said the bank had checked out clients and transactions and that it did not process any payments to individuals or organizations that were designated as terrorist.

In one instance in which plaintiffs' lawyers allege that Arab Bank maintained an account for Hamas in Beirut, bank officials said that once they learned of the suspicious account, they froze it and reported it to authorities.

Arab Bank also said that it was primarily transferring funds sent to it from other banks on behalf of legitimate Saudi donors that have not been linked to terrorist activities. To win their case, the plaintiffs' lawyers would have to prove that Arab Bank knew that it was doing business with terrorist individuals or entities.

In 2005, the Treasury Department and the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency found that Arab Bank's New York branch had transferred funds between 2001 and 2004 for organizations that were later designated by the U.S. as terrorist groups. The Treasury Department said the bank had "largely complied" with the requirement to stop the transfers after the groups were identified.

But the department said that after the government designated these groups as terrorist, the bank failed to go back and review its accounts to see what dealings it had had with them and report any suspicious activities.

Some of the initial allegations in the lawsuits, most of which were filed in 2004, were based on documents seized by the Israeli military during raids on charities, businesses and other locations in the West Bank and Gaza in 2002. Among the documents were records indicating that Arab Bank provided financial services for Hamas and at least 41 organizations and individuals allegedly related to it or to Islamic Jihad.

Plaintiffs' lawyers Gary Osen and Michael Elsner used those records as a jumping-off point for a wider investigation in which they have gained access to tens of thousands of financial records from Arab Bank.

The records detail financial transactions that began in 2000 with the start of the second Palestinian intifada, or uprising. Saudi government officials created two special fundraising committees to help Palestinians battle Israeli forces and otherwise resist the occupation, according to court documents.

One of them, the Saudi Committee for Aid to the Al Quds Intifada, decreed that the life of anyone who died as a "martyr" in the conflict with Israel was worth 20,000 Saudi riyals, about $5,300 at the time. The committee began wiring that sum into accounts that families were instructed to set up at Arab Bank branches, the lawsuits allege. The average Palestinian salary is about $3,000 a year.

DOJ_NMG_0139303

In all, the Saudi Committee made about 200,000 wire transfers for the Palestinian cause, totaling more than $90 million, Shukry Bishara, Arab Bank's chief banking officer, said in a court declaration. Much of that money went to pay for hospitals and social welfare programs, or to compensate people injured or imprisoned — or the families of those killed — in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

But the money also included an undetermined amount paid to the families of suicide bombers, and those injured or imprisoned by Israel, according to the lawsuits.

The plaintiffs allege that bank officials knew that those listed as "martyrs" included suicide bombers because it was publicly advertised. They cited a Feb. 10, 2001, edition of the Saudi newspaper Al Jazirah in which the Saudi Committee listed the names of Palestinian martyrs, including those killed in suicide bombings, whose families received payments.

Several lawmakers and Bush administration officials involved in the investigation of Arab Bank have expressed concerns about its activities.

At one House Finance Committee hearing in May 2005, Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey said that during his visit to the West Bank city of Ramallah to discuss the issue, the Arab Bank manager for the Palestinian territories told him that he "had not filed a single suspicious activity report in the past two years across all the Arab Bank branches in the West Bank and in Gaza."

"It appears that such controls were indeed sorely lacking at Arab Bank across all of their global operation," Levey said.

Terror Case Prosecutor Assails Defense Lawyer (NYT)

By Raymond Bonner

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

SYDNEY, Australia, March 4 — The chief prosecutor for the American military commissions that will try suspected terrorists being held at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, has lashed out at the military lawyer for one of the detainees, a newspaper here reported in its weekend edition.

The prosecutor, Col. Morris D. Davis, said that the lawyer, Maj. Michael Mori of the United States Marine Corps, should not be making public appearances in Australia in uniform on behalf of his client, David Hicks, and that he faced possible prosecution for some of his remarks.

“I don’t know what Major Mori’s plans are right now but if he wants to come back home and represent his client, that would be helpful,” Colonel Davis was quoted as saying by The Australian. “Certainly in the U.S. it would not be tolerated having a U.S. marine in uniform actively inserting himself into the political process. It is very disappointing to see that happening in Australia, and if that was any of my prosecutors, they would be held accountable.”

Colonel Davis, who is an Air Force lawyer, added that it would be up to the Marine Corps whether to charge Major Mori with violation of Article 88 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which makes it a crime for a military officer to use “contemptuous words” about the president, vice president, secretary of defense and other high public officials.

Major Mori, who was in Australia this past week, for the seventh time in three years, reacted with anger. “Are they trying to intimidate me?” he said in a telephone interview on Sunday.

He compared Colonel Davis’s statements with remarks made last year by a senior Pentagon official, Charles D. Stimson, who was then the deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, who said that corporations should consider not using law firms that represented Guantánamo detainees pro bono. His remarks brought a torrent of objections, and he was forced to resign.

Col. Dwight Sullivan, the chief defense counsel in the military commissions procedure, said in an interview on Sunday night in Washington that Major Mori’s behavior was “absolutely proper.” Colonel Sullivan, a Marine lawyer, said that under military ethics rules, “a military defense lawyer is supposed to provide the same level of representation as a civilian lawyer.” He said that in pressing Mr. Hicks’s case in Australia, “Major Mori is fulfilling his duty as an officer and as an attorney.”

DOJ_NMG_0139304

Colonel Davis, reached by e-mail Sunday night, said his comments reflected his view that Major Mori's remarks in Australia had crossed the threshold of what was proper for a military defense lawyer. He said his remarks did not mean he was pressing for any action to be taken against Major Mori, only that he believed that the major had gone too far.

"Most of the defense counsel say the commissions are unfair and criticize the process as they are entitled to do," Colonel Davis wrote in response to a request for comment. But he said that Major Mori "goes further than any defense counsel I've ever known."

Colonel Davis said that it was improper for Major Mori to have made statements alleging that the president, the secretary of defense and Congress "intentionally created a rigged system that guarantees convictions in order to cover up wrongdoing" and that "everyone involved is potentially guilty of war crimes greater than the charge against" Mr. Hicks.

Colonel Davis said he would not permit the prosecutors on his team to make equivalent comments or "inject themselves into the political picture in an allied country."

Major Mori has been strikingly blunt in his comments about the military commissions, on at least one occasion calling them kangaroo courts.

Major Mori has been a "very effective" advocate for his client, said a senior member of the government of the Australian prime minister, John Howard, on the condition that he not be identified because he was expressing a view that the government would not state publicly.

Last week, the United States military announced that it was filing only one charge against Mr. Hicks, for "material support for terrorism," a major reduction from the initial charges, which had included conspiracy to commit murder, attempted murder and aiding the enemy.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Holt Wants Hearings On FBI Anthrax Investigation (AP)

AP, March 5, 2007

TRENTON --Rep. Rush Holt (D-Princeton) wants hearings into what he says is a lack of headway in the FBI's investigation into the deadly anthrax attacks of 2001.

"It seems to me this investigation is not making progress. I can't say for sure. They won't brief me," Holt told The Times of Trenton for Saturday newspapers.

"Not briefing Congress on the status of the probe into the biggest biological attack in United States history is inexcusable," he said.

The anthrax attacks through the postal system killed five people across the country and sickened 17 in the weeks after Sept. 11, 2001. Investigators have not determined who was responsible for the attacks.

Over the years, Holt has been a vocal critic of the bureau's handling of the case, especially because anthrax contamination was found in mail facilities in and near Holt's district.

Holt on Friday called on four committee chairmen and one subcommittee chairman in the House to hold oversight hearings into the investigation. His request may carry more weight now that his party is in the majority in Congress.

Several earlier attempts to receive information failed. In September and October 2006, Holt formally requesting that the FBI brief Congress on the investigation. He was denied.

In December, a bipartisan group of 32 House and Senate members called on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to direct that the FBI brief Congress on the investigation. That request was also denied.

Richard J. Kolko, a bureau spokesman, defended the handling of the anthrax probe, saying it is "one of the largest and most complex" ever conducted. He said the investigation is still a high priority.

Flirting With Disaster (editorial) (WP)

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139305

AMERICA HAS a bad habit of building in areas that don't make sense environmentally or actuarially. That habit has been aided and abetted by public officials who bend to the will of developers and their customers, despite storms, floods, earthquakes and other natural calamities that destroy lives and break banks. The latest example of this can be found in Florida. By rolling back insurance rates, spreading the risk and fiddling with its catastrophe fund, the Sunshine State has invited more development in dangerous places.

Make no mistake, Floridians needed relief from insurance premiums that had doubled or tripled. But in keeping a campaign promise to cut rates, Gov. Charlie Crist (R) and the legislature not only are gambling with the state's fiscal future but also are giving people an incentive to keep putting themselves in harm's way.

Florida is the country's first pin in hurricane alley. The major storms of the 2004 and 2005 seasons and their respective $20 billion and $10 billion payouts sent the insurance industry fleeing from the state. Those that stayed either stripped high-risk policyholders of coverage or jacked up premiums so high that they threatened to cripple Florida's economy, which is dependent upon development and the people who move there because of it.

So here's what Crist & Co. did: The state-run insurer of last resort, Citizens Property Insurance Corp., which is also the state's largest property insurer, rolled back planned rate increases. It can now spread the risk by offering other policies, such as fire and theft. And it will offer its subsidized rates to commercial property. Private companies buying reinsurance from the state at greatly reduced rates must pass the savings to consumers through lower premiums.

Meanwhile, the threshold for troubled insurers to tap into the Florida Hurricane Catastrophe Fund was dropped from $6 billion to $3 billion and the upper limit on claims to be paid out by the state was raised from $16 billion to $32 billion. There's only $1 billion in the fund. If another major storm hits Florida -- a likelihood on a par with the sun rising in the east -- the state is on the hook. The "no big deal, we'll just bond it out" attitude is as irresponsible as the "let's pray we don't get hit by another Big One" wishful thinking gripping many in Tallahassee.

We live in an era of rapid climate change with the potential for more frequent and more destructive storms. Everyone -- from politicians to the voters they aim to please -- must understand that there is a cost to offering below-market insurance that fuels unrestrained building in high-risk areas. Betting against Mother Nature is never a winning proposition.

Sensible Security Fixes (WP)

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

ALONG-DORMANT battle over the Department of Homeland Security's labor practices resurfaced last week in the Senate. The White House threatened to veto a generally sensible homeland security bill that was based on the Sept. 11 commission's recommendations, because of a provision that would allow Transportation Security Administration employees to engage in collective bargaining. In the Senate, 36 Republicans are promising to sustain that decision by President Bush.

He shouldn't veto, and they shouldn't vote to sustain if he does. Other employees of the Department of Homeland Security enjoy the benefits of collective bargaining without endangering Americans' safety. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), who sponsored the bill, points out that TSA employees have unnecessarily limited access to redress, which contributes to the TSA's high turnover, high absenteeism and low morale. Meanwhile, there's a lot more to the bill than this one provision.

The legislation, for example, proposes to distribute federal anti-terrorism grants to cities and states according to a formula that the bill's backers say will put the most money into regions that face the most risk. It would thus direct more money to high-risk cities such as Washington than would the House version. That's good but not good enough; the bill still requires that every state receive some money, regardless of risk. We hope the Senate reconsiders this wasteful formulation in coming days, especially after the farcical example of last year's Homeland Security grant-giving -- marked by huge declines in funding for New York City and Washington and huge increases for cities such as Louisville.

On the other hand, the bill contains a range of solid proposals -- from grants to ease communication among first responders to measures that would promote intelligence sharing. The bill's sponsors also exercised good sense when they excluded a requirement that all sea cargo containers be scanned for harmful materials before entering the United States. This bad idea made its way into the House version of the bill, its supporters claiming that it reflected the will of the Sept. 11 commission when in fact the panel supported no such measure. Requiring 100 percent scanning would be likely to disrupt trade and inflict massive costs on businesses and consumers with meager benefits. A pilot program testing the mere feasibility of scanning all containers is far from complete. If 100 percent scanning stays out of the legislation and Congress sends the money to areas that really need it, President Bush ought to forgo the politics and sign the bill.

DOJ_NMG_0139306

WAR NEWS:

Bush, Cheney Turn Focus To Terrorism (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

Both President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney will give speeches in the next few days on the war on terrorism, to the applause of Republicans who say the White House needs to be more aggressive in selling the successes in Iraq.

"The administration should step it up when it comes to messaging," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, who is one of the strongest supporters in Congress of the president's Iraq policy. "I think the president has to do more. People like myself have to do more."

Mr. Graham said the president is "doing a better job of connecting the outcome in Iraq to the global war on terror," but added that Mr. Bush should "mix it up" in how he communicates the war's stakes. "Don't always go to a place where there's a bunch of troops behind you," he said, referring to Mr. Bush's many speeches at military bases.

Mr. Bush will speak on Iraq and the war against terrorism tomorrow in a speech to the American Legion. Mr. Cheney will speak today to the Veterans of Foreign Wars legislative convention.

A senior Bush administration official, however, said that "more than anything else, the actions on the ground in Iraq, part in Baghdad, are going to dictate how it's interpreted, so, the president, we view his role in this is to give the broader context."

Politically, the White House is happy that the center of the Iraq war debate has shifted to Capitol Hill, giving the Democrats the chance to fail on their campaign promises to end the war.

"Some of the favorite things for Democrats to unite and kind of coalesce around is to be against the president," the senior official said. "I think as you saw in that House debate. We let them have that debate themselves."

After Democrats predicted last month that 40 to 50 Republicans would vote for a nonbinding resolution against Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, only 17 Republicans defected.

"The president's going to stay at a certain level on this," the Bush official said. "We're not going to get in the weeds of the political debate on Capitol Hill."

Some Republicans on Capitol Hill say this has been the best political strategy, allowing the debate to focus on the merits of each sides' arguments and whether the Democrats have a plan, instead of uniting Democrats in opposing the president. But other House Republicans, however, say Mr. Bush has not convincingly argued that Iraq is a fight against al Qaeda and other Islamist groups, and not just a maelstrom of Islamic sectarian violence.

"I think it's been difficult for the White House to turn up the volume on this fact -- on the true nature and intentions of the enemy -- above the din of the Democrats' defeatism. But we all better find a more effective way to do just that," said a Republican leadership aide. "It's much easier for Americans to support a precipitous withdrawal strategy when they don't know how serious the stakes are."

The senior Bush official said the White House thinks the president has "found about the right level of engagement on it."

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said the president has "stepped up outreach ... with Congress."

"We're aware that the war and the surge are unpopular. No question about it," Mrs. Perino said. "Our challenge is to keep showing progress and making the case in a variety of ways."

Hundreds Of U.S., Iraqi Troops Sweep Sadr City (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, March 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139307

BAGHDAD — U.S. and Iraqi troops conducted door-to-door searches in the Shiite stronghold of Sadr City on Sunday, marking a critical step in the new Baghdad security plan.

More than 600 U.S. troops and 550 Iraqi soldiers cleared out safe houses and searched for militants and weapons, according to a U.S. military statement. They met no major resistance.

The troops seek to establish a permanent security outpost in Sadr City, home to the powerful Mahdi Army militia. The operation marks a major shift in strategy by Iraq's Shiite-led government, which blocked several attempts last year by U.S. troops to enter the area.

"Many people felt we would never go into Sadr City because that was the prime minister's power base," said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a spokesman for the U.S. military in Iraq. "It's just another example of the political will that the prim e minister and council of representatives are exerting to make this work."

The Bush administration has demanded all sectarian militias be disarmed as part of a broad security initiative that includes an increase of 21,500 U.S. troops in Iraq.

"The law must prevail," Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said Sunday. "Everyone will be affected, regardless of sect."

The crowded neighborhood on Baghdad's eastern outskirts is home to about 2 million Shiite Muslims, many of whom credit the Mahdi Army for protecting them from Sunni insurgents. However, Sunni politicians have blamed the militia for killing civilians and pleaded with al-Maliki to stop the violence.

"We don't know if (al-Maliki) has a change of heart, but certainly there is a change of tactic," theU.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, told CNN.

Mahdi Army militants have displayed little resistance to the security campaign. Sunday was no exception: U.S. forces swept through the eastern corner of Sadr City with barely a sign of opposition, Garver said.

Some Sadr City residents said the area has been calm, although the militia continues to work in the shadows. "The Mahdi Army is still operating," said Ammar Abbas, a cigarette vendor near the area where the sweep took place Sunday. "We're still afraid of them."

The militia's leader, the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, has not been seen in public since January. The U.S. military said last month that he was in Iran, although al-Sadr's spokesmen denied he left the country.

Hundreds of Mahdi Army leaders have been arrested in recent weeks, the Iraqi government says.

Garver said the militants could be laying low to strike in the near future. "We know the enemy wants to strike on his time," he said.

Also Sunday:

•For a third consecutive day, Baghdad was spared a car bombing or other attack bringing mass casualties.

However, a Shiite newspaper editor and a police officer were gunned down. After nightfall, U.S. artillery was heard across Baghdad. In recent days, U.S. gunners have hit suspected Sunni insurgents' staging grounds south of the city.

•Outside Baghdad, Lt. Col. Valery Keaveny described a raid last week that uncovered a suspected Sunni "torture site" and the rescue of two Iraqi captives, who apparently had been spared immediate execution because the militants' video camera broke, and they wanted to record the killings.

Basra Raid Finds Prisoners With Signs Of Torture (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

BAGHDAD, March 5 -- Iraqi special operation forces and British troops swept into an Iraqi intelligence ministry building Sunday morning in the southern city of Basra and found prisoners with signs of torture, British officials said.

All 30 prisoners escaped during the surprise raid, which was triggered by information gleaned from suspects arrested hours earlier in another sweep, a British military spokesman said Monday morning.

"It is unclear how it occurred, but what is clear is that the Iraqi forces did not let them escape," said Maj. David Gell, who called the escape "regrettable."

DOJ_NMG_0139308

In a statement, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki called the raid an "unlawful and irresponsible act." He ordered an investigation of the raid, but did not comment on the allegations of torture at the facility that was the Basra headquarters of the National Iraqi Intelligence Agency. The spokesman for the Shiite-led Interior Ministry, which controls the agency, could not be reached.

A British military statement said its forces acted quickly because it had gained information hours earlier that presented a high threat. "It was therefore not possible for either the Iraqi units or multinational forces to pre-warn the relevant provincial authorities," it said.

The operation began at 12:45 a.m. when Iraqi special forces and British troops entered the Basra neighborhood of al-Puwaysa, where they arrested five suspects allegedly involved in car-bomb attacks against British forces, as well as kidnappings, torture and murder. Information from the suspects prompted the raid on the intelligence agency compound, Gell said.

The raid highlighted the insecure conditions in Iraq's Shiite-controlled south at a time when Britain has announced a significant drawdown of its forces. It was the latest instance of U.S. and British forces finding evidence of torture in Iraq's Shiite-dominated security and intelligence facilities that has raised questions about human rights and the rule of law in Iraq.

The operation came as more than 1,100 U.S. and Iraqi troops pushed into the Shiite militia haven of Sadr City on Sunday, the largest operation in nearly three years in the sprawling, turbulent slum. Control of the area is viewed as pivotal to stabilizing the capital and preventing Iraq's slide toward civil war.

Riding in Humvees and armored personnel carriers, the troops put up checkpoints and conducted door-to-door searches for illegal weapons and militia fighters. They met no resistance, according to U.S. military, Iraqi officials and residents. No weapons caches were found and no suspects detained, the military said.

The operation represented the most serious effort yet by the government of Maliki to neutralize the Mahdi Army, which is headed by firebrand cleric Moqtada al-Sadr and is the country's largest and most violent Shiite militia.

Maliki, a Shiite, has for months faced intense U.S. pressure to send troops into Sadr City and assert the government's authority. But he has long avoided doing so because Sadr, who controls six ministries and 30 seats in parliament, is his political benefactor.

Sunday's push occurred only after Sadr had agreed to support Maliki's new Baghdad security plan, Iraqi officials said, and after negotiations with civil leaders and Sadr's representatives on the role of U.S. troops in Sadr City.

The operation lasted several hours and primarily targeted an area near a busy market, according to residents interviewed in Sadr City. By afternoon, there were no signs of U.S. or Iraqi soldiers in the densely crowded streets lined with posters of Sadr and banners lauding the Mahdi Army.

U.S. military officials said they would continue the security sweeps to facilitate a plan to house U.S. and Iraqi troops in a police station on the edge of Sadr City, where as many as 2 million people live. The new military post, similar to those being constructed in other neighborhoods, is a key component of Maliki's security plan to build public trust in Iraq's security forces and ensure that areas are not retaken by insurgents.

"It is a multi-day operation, continuing operation," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman.

In Sadr City, black-clad militiamen have vanished from the streets. Senior Sadr officials and Mahdi Army leaders have fled to Shiite cities in southern Iraq or to neighboring Iran. Some fighters said in interviews that they wanted to engage the U.S. troops but were under strict orders from Sadr to maintain a low profile.

"We feel upset, but what can we do?" said Laith Abu Bakr, 34, a Mahdi Army fighter. "We have orders not to act."

Sadr's motive for allowing the security operation in his stronghold was unclear. Some Shiite politicians have suggested he wants to boost his political credentials and improve his image, but others say he hopes to rid his movement of rogue elements and rivals.

Publicly, however, he has started to criticize the U.S. involvement in what he said should be an Iraqi operation. Sadr has long opposed the U.S. occupation and has issued strong calls for a troop withdrawal. In 2004, the Mahdi Army staged an uprising in Shiite areas, prompting U.S. forces to storm Sadr City.

On Sunday, Rahim al-Daraji, the mayor of Sadr City, said "as long as there is an Iraqi leadership, they are most welcome. The Americans can go into Sadr City."

DOJ_NMG_0139309

"The people were very cooperative and were very happy because these forces are coming to protect them," he said.

But some residents said they felt safe under militia protection and questioned the presence of U.S. troops.

The Mahdi Army is "treating us very well," said Riyad Hamid Swadi, 40, the owner of a small junk shop. "What are the Americans doing here?"

A senior Sadr official said he did not believe that Sadr had agreed to allow U.S. troops to be stationed inside Sadr City and warned that their presence could provoke the Mahdi Army.

"This will create a spark," Sheik Ayad al-Khabi said. "They are going to drag the Shiites into a fight."

Separately, Maliki announced plans to reshuffle his cabinet in the next two weeks, a move he has promised for months. Maliki's aides have indicated that he intends to replace several Sadr loyalists in charge of key ministries, including the Health Ministry, which has been plagued by allegations of corruption.

Falah Shanshal, of the Sadr bloc in parliament, said that Sadr's supporters had given Maliki a list of replacements for the ministry posts and that they would block attempts to wrest ministries from their control.

U.S. Gingerly Enters Sensitive Iraq Neighborhood (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Just after 8 a.m. Sunday, U.S. and Iraqi troops tapped on Saif Mirwan's front gate in the Shiite stronghold of Sadr City and politely asked to search his house. They looked in each room, asked how his family was doing, checked out the pigeons he keeps on his roof, and then left with handshakes and a thank you.

With that, Sadr City, whose fearsome reputation and political clout had rendered it largely off-limits to U.S. and Iraqi government troops for nearly three years, became an official part of the latest U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown.

In the first daylight door-to-door weapons searches here since the crackdown began, there was none of the bloodshed that greeted American troops the last time they tried to police the district in the spring of 2004.

But the limited raid, in the Jamila section of the sprawling slum, also raised the question of how long things will stay quiet, given the opposition to foreign troops of anti-U.S. Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia took control of Sadr City's streets after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

More than 600 U.S. soldiers and 550 Iraqi troops, backed by a column of armored vehicles, took part in Sunday's operation, described as a first step toward establishing a permanent U.S.-Iraqi security station within Sadr City. Military officials say these stations will foster trust between local residents and troops and will form the backbone of the security plan, which is seen as a last-ditch effort to quell sectarian warfare between Sunni Arabs and Shiites, fueled in large part by execution-style killings attributed to Shiite militias including the Mahdi Army.

At least 15 stations have been established in other neighborhoods of Baghdad, according to the U.S. military, and several more are planned. Those in Sunni neighborhoods are aimed at quelling the Sunni-led insurgency, which has used bombings, roadside explosives and sniper attacks to kill American troops and spread terror among the Shiite majority.

Setting up in Sadr City, which is named for al-Sadr's late father, a revered cleric, is a tricky maneuver because al-Sadr is politically influential with fellow Shiites, including Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The troops arriving Sunday participated in what they termed a "soft-knock" operation, clearly aware that one wrong move could stoke anger among al-Sadr supporters. The troops avoided pounding or kicking on doors and, according to people whose homes were searched, were unfailingly polite and observant of Muslim sensibilities.

"They thanked us with respect and a smile," said Shihab Ahmed, a teacher, noting that the Americans greeted him in Arabic and asked permission before entering his house with a bomb-sniffing dog. "I am happy that such a campaign is done in my neighborhood. It doesn't upset me, as it is aiming to clear the area of weapons."

In a few hours, the operation was over for the day. A checkpoint was dismantled, allowing traffic to move normally. The convoy rumbled away, and shopkeepers returned to business as usual.

Still unclear is what will happen when troops return to establish a permanent presence, and how long al-Sadr will keep a lid on his militia.

DOJ_NMG_0139310

The cleric pulled his militiamen off the streets when the security plan officially was launched Feb. 13 as a favor to al-Maliki. But al-Sadr's impatience with the plan has grown as attacks on Shiites by Sunni Arab insurgents have soared in recent days. On Saturday, al-Sadr issued a statement through associates rejecting recent statements by U.S. and Iraqi government officials that negotiations had cleared the way for a government security station in Sadr City.

Some analysts believe al-Sadr will keep his troops at bay -- at least for the time being.

"It's very clear al-Sadr's policy is to absorb the initial punch of the surge, not to engage the Americans, not to give them an excuse to focus on the Shiites," said Vali Nasr, an expert on Iraq and on the Sunni-Shiite conflict at the Naval Post-graduate School in Monterey, Calif.

But as U.S. troops continue to hand over security functions to Iraqi forces in coming months, Nasr said, al-Sadr will be well-positioned to revive his Mahdi Army, which most Shiites consider far more capable than Iraqi forces at protecting them. Al-Maliki will have to support him in exchange for his cooperation with the security plan, and his loyalists will embrace the return of his bullying but effective militiamen, Nasr predicted.

Across Baghdad, there were reminders of the ongoing sectarian war. Police said that since Saturday, they had found 20 bodies of men who were believed to be victims of Shiite death squads. And at least three Iraqi civilians died in bombings.

One car bomb exploded near an Iraqi police patrol in Doura, a troubled Sunni area in southern Baghdad and killed one civilian. Another Iraqi died when a bomb exploded in the Shiite district of Karada, and a third was killed when a blast hit near a downtown bank.

South of the city, three women and one child were killed when a bomb targeting a U.S. military convoy exploded. The victims were inside a minibus that took a direct hit from the blast.

Times staff writers Raheem Salman and Saif Rasheed, and special correspondents in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Notes From Baghdad (WSJ)

By Mohammed Fadhil And Omar Fadhil

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

BAGHDAD -- The new strategy to secure Baghdad has been dubbed by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki as "Operation Imposing the Law." After weeks of waiting and anxiety it is finally underway, and early signs are encouraging.

The government information campaign and the news about thousands of additional troops coming had a positive impact even before the operation started. Commanders and lieutenants of various militant groups abandoned their positions in Baghdad and in some cases fled the country. Diyala province to the east of Baghdad was the destination for many Sunni extremists, while Shiite militiamen went to Babil and Diwaniya in the south. Some higher-ranking members of Shiite and Sunni militant groups fled to Iran and Syria respectively. This migration motivated the government to announce supporting security measures in five provinces around Baghdad, to make sure that fleeing bad guys do not regroup in other cities.

This indicates that both the addition of more troops and the tough words of Prime Minister Maliki are doing the job of intimidating the militants. The extremists understand only the language of power, and any reluctance or softness on the part of the Iraqi or U.S. government would only embolden them. In this way the clearly voiced commitment of President Bush and Prime Minister Maliki was exactly the type of strong message that needed to be sent.

One difference between this and earlier -- failed -- attempts to secure Baghdad is the willingness of the Iraqi and U.S. governments to commit enough resources for enough time to make it work. Another important point is the insistence of the Iraqi government that political factions not interfere with the progress of military action. The commanders and the prime minister have made it clear that no one will be above the law, and that even places of worship and the offices of politicians will be subject to searches and raids if evidence of involvement in violence is found.

The Iraqi commanders are also trying to give the operation a national stamp by including troops from across the country -- even from Kurdistan and far provinces like Basra, where politicians and officers have been long opposed to being involved in Baghdad. Yet another aspect that makes "Imposing Law" unique is its ascending intensity. Unlike other operations that always started from a peak and soon lost momentum, this plan is becoming stricter and gaining momentum by the day as more troops pour into the city, allowing for a better implementation of the "clear and hold" strategy. People here always want the "hold" part to materialize, and feel safe when they go out and find the Army and police maintaining their posts -- the bad guys can't intimidate as long as the troops are staying.

DOJ_NMG_0139311

The Iraqi people themselves are playing their role in the plan. Recent figures from U.S. officers in Baghdad show that the joint forces have been receiving an average of 250 security tips from civilians since the beginning of the operation, about twice previous figures. With help from a government-appointed committee, people in some Baghdad neighborhoods are returning occupied mosques to their original keepers and worshippers, and holding joint prayers between the two sects in mixed neighborhoods.

So after only a couple weeks we can feel, despite the continuing violence, that much has been accomplished. Many Baghdadis feel hopeful again about the future, and the fear of civil war is slowly being replaced by optimism that peace might one day return to this city. This change in mood is something huge by itself.

The brightest image of the past two weeks was the scene of displaced families returning home; more than a thousand families are back to their homes under the protection of the Army and police. This figure invites hope that Baghdad will restore its social, ethnic and religious mosaic.

Marketplaces are seeing more activity and stores that were long shuttered are reopening -- including even some liquor stores that came under vicious attacks in the past. This is a sign that extremists no longer can intimidate people and hold the city hostage. All of this gives the sense that law is being imposed.

Checkpoints are not seen as scary threats to the innocent. They look more professional and impartial as they include members of the police, Army, Multinational Forces and even traffic cops with laptops verifying registration papers. We've lost the fear that checkpoints might be traps set by death squads; they search everyone, even official convoys and ambulances.

We feel safer about moving in the city now, and politicians who used to hide behind the walls of the Green Zone are venturing out. Watching Mr. Maliki walking on Palestine Street in central Baghdad gave a positive impression that the state, and not the gangs, owns the streets.

It is true that not all of Baghdad has seen the same amount of progress, but we realize that patience is necessary. People do not complain about delays at checkpoints but instead say they'd like to see stricter inspection.

Military-wise, the results are not humble either; hundreds of militants have been killed, more hundreds arrested, and dozens of weapons caches discovered and destroyed. The frequency of attacks has declined drastically, and the terrifying scene of bullet-riddled bodies has become a rarer incident.

Our people want to see this effort succeed. We know it's not going to be an easy fight. Rescuing all of Baghdad's districts from the grip of militants and terrorists will require sacrifice and hard work. We hope the troops and the governments in Baghdad and America do not lose their resolve.

Mohammed and Omar Fadhil write a blog, IraqTheModel.com, from Baghdad.

U.S. Hopes For Results In Iraq Outreach (AP)

By Ryan Lenz

AP, March 5, 2007

YOUSSIFIYAH, Iraq - It was the kind of exchange that U.S. troops are counting on.

Medics treated an electrical burn on an Iraqi man injured doing home wiring. In return, he passed along a tip: Powerful local clan leaders have ordered a fresh crop of roadside bombs against U.S.-led forces.

The whispered warning - in the shadow of a mosque believed to support Sunni insurgents - is just what the soldiers want to hear as part of a new strategy to move some units off big, fortress-like bases and into outposts in Iraq's most violent places.

The plan hinges on hopes that increased contact with ordinary Iraqis will help soldiers separate innocent civilians from militants hiding among them, and try to rebuild a battered U.S. image after four years of fighting.

The shift also stands as an indirect indictment of the Pentagon's old counterinsurgency plans after years of losing touch with the Iraqi streets - and access to the crucial rumor mills and informants.

"I live where I work. It puts me so much closer to the people. That's what this is all about. The people are the center of gravity in this fight," said Capt. Richard Ince, a native of Georgetown, Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0139312

His company - part of the Army's 2nd Battalion, 5th Cavalry Regiment - has turned a water treatment plant into a military compound near Youssifiyah, a volatile area 12 miles south of Baghdad. It's in the so-called "Triangle of Death" because of relentless attacks on U.S. military units patrolling its dirt and gravel roads.

On Friday, he made the five-minute walk from the base to near the mosque in a grove of palm and pine trees on the outskirts of Youssifiyah. Until recently, such a stroll would have been considered foolhardy - if not a breach of orders - for U.S. forces.

Now, it's encouraged.

Troops quickly turned the stone courtyard of an abandoned home into an open-air clinic. They did not advertise their plans in advance, fearing insurgents could plot an attack. Instead, word was spread by knocking on a few doors and letting the local grapevine do the rest.

Within minutes, dozens of people waited behind razor wire for treatment. In Iraq, even humanitarian outreach is accompanied by full-bore security. Every patient was searched and even babies were patted down.

Medics doled out children's Tylenol and antibiotics to parents with sick children. A smiling sergeant was handing out rainbow-colored pencils and candies to youngsters when a man holding his arm approached.

It was charred by a serious electrical burn, which oozed blood. Then, through an interpreter, he told Ince about how local tribal chiefs had called for more roadside bombs in the area.

Ince nodded and spoke quietly into a radio.

Sgt. James Farris, 31, of Tullahoma, Tenn., who had been listening to the exchange, said soldiers have heard dozens of tips like this since they moved into their new post earlier this year.

Some were credible and others viewed with suspicion. But it's opening the channels that's needed, he said.

Along with the advantages, however, come risks. A coordinated attack last month on the outpost in Tarmiyah, about 30 miles north of Baghdad, killed two soldiers and wounded dozens more.

About two hours after the clinic outside Youssifiyah opened, it was ordered closed. Nurses rushed to pack crates. Soldiers, who had watched quietly through the morning, suddenly took defensive positions.

There was no direct threat. Ince simply didn't want to press his luck.

"The longer you stay out here, the more you open yourself to negative action," Ince said, rushing to leave. "When you're ahead at the craps table, that's when you pick up your chips and go home."

Basra Raid Finds Dozens Detained By Iraq Spy Unit (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

BAGHDAD, Monday, March 5 — Iraqi special forces and British troops stormed the offices of an Iraqi government intelligence agency in the southern city of Basra on Sunday, and British officials said they discovered about 30 prisoners, some showing signs of torture.

The raid appeared to catch Iraq's central government by surprise and raised new questions about the rule of law in the Shiite-dominated south, where less than two weeks ago Britain announced plans for a significant reduction in its forces because of improved stability.

News of the Basra raid, with its resonant themes of torture and sectarian-driven conflict, coincided with the next stage of the intensified security plan here in Baghdad, where more than 1,100 American and Iraqi soldiers moved into Sadr City, a stronghold of Iraq's largest Shiite militia. The soldiers met no resistance in what the Americans called the plan's biggest test yet.

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, a conservative Shiite, condemned the raid in Basra. He publicly said nothing about the evidence of torture.

"The prime minister has ordered an immediate investigation into the incident of breaking into the security compound in Basra and stressed the need to punish those who have carried out this illegal and irresponsible act," said the full text of a statement issued late Sunday by his office.

DOJ_NMG_0139313

It remained unclear why he sought to pursue the raiding force aggressively rather than the accusations of prisoner abuse. Efforts to reach officials in his office were unsuccessful.

The discovery of prisoners in the Basra offices, which the British described as the headquarters of Iraq's government intelligence agency, echoed other recent cases in which American or British forces stumbled onto a government-run detention center that held people showing signs of torture.

As recently as December, a combined force of British and Iraqi troops assaulted a police station in Basra and rescued 127 prisoners from fetid conditions. Some of the prisoners had been tortured.

The most significant recent case involved a secret Baghdad prison run by the Shiite-controlled Interior Ministry, known as Site 4 and discovered by American and Iraqi troops last year, where more than 1,400 prisoners were discovered and where some had been subjected to systematic abuse.

Mr. Maliki has been under considerable pressure, particularly from American officials and Sunni Arab leaders, to rid the country's Shiite-run security and intelligence forces of militia influence and human rights abuses. American officials have warned Iraqi leaders that they might curtail aid to the Interior Ministry, which runs the country's police forces, if officials who commit "gross violations of human rights" and are not held accountable.

The Interior Ministry, dominated by Shiites, has long been accused by Sunni Arabs of complicity in torture and killings.

It was unclear whether the Basra detainees were still in custody, and there was no further information on the of the detainees or their captors. A spokesman for the British military command in Basra, Maj. David Gell, said in a telephone interview early Monday that he could not provide any further information about them. [A] news agency said the detainees included a woman and two children.

The raid in Basra comes as the British command is planning a drawdown of as many as 1,600 of its 7,200 troops, a decision driven by the British government's assessment that Iraqi forces are strong enough to manage the security of the region on their own. In announcing the reduction on Feb. 22, Prime Minister Tony Blair said that while the Basra area remained dangerous, British troops faced far less violence than Americans farther north and that "the next chapter in Basra's history can be written by Iraqis."

It was unclear whether the discovery in Basra would have any impact on British planning.

Major Gell said the intelligence agency office was raided after an investigation earlier Sunday led to the capture of five suspected bomb makers and evidence that pointed to possible violations at the agency's offices. In those offices, he said, "Evidence of significant criminal activity such as torture was found."

In Baghdad, Iraqi and American soldiers began to patrol the streets of Sadr City and conducted house-to-house searches for illegal weapons and militia fighters linked to sectarian crimes, according to residents and the American military command. No shots were fired.

"Local residents were receptive and cooperative with coalition and Iraqi forces," said Lt. Col. Scott R. Bleichwehl, a military spokesman in Baghdad. The operation is the most ambitious since the implementation of the latest security plan for Baghdad nearly three weeks ago. The push into Sadr City, a bastion of Shiite militancy and anti-Americanism, will serve as a test of Mr. Maliki's willingness to seriously confront the country's Shiite militias, particularly the Mahdi Army, which is based in Sadr City and is led by Moktada al-Sadr, a powerful cleric.

Sadr City residents said they witnessed American soldiers converting a police station into a small garrison on the neighborhood's western flank. American and Iraqi military officials would not confirm this report, but officials have been planning to open a joint Iraqi-American security station there, one of several in the plan to pacify Baghdad, unveiled by President Bush in January.

The sweep on Sunday amounted to the largest military operation in Sadr City involving American troops since 2004, when the Americans suppressed a violent uprising of the Mahdi Army with ground forces and aerial bombardments.

American officials have been pressing Mr. Maliki to send troops into Sadr City and wrest control from the Mahdi Army, which has been accused of driving the cycle of sectarian bloodshed but is considered by many Shiite followers of Mr. Sadr to be a bulwark defense against Sunni insurgents.

DOJ_NMG_0139314

The prime minister has also been under pressure from the Americans and his Iraqi critics to distance himself politically from Mr. Sadr, whose backing was decisive in Mr. Maliki's campaign for prime minister last year.

On Sunday, Mr. Maliki announced that he planned to reshuffle his cabinet within the next two weeks, possibly eroding Mr. Sadr's influence in the administration. While the prime minister did not identify whom he would replace, two prominent Shiite politicians said in interviews on Sunday that the Health Ministry, the most powerful of the six ministries run by a Sadr loyalist, would be removed from Mr. Sadr's faction's control.

The military incursion into Sadr City, widely anticipated for days, lacked any element of surprise. It followed protracted negotiations — among representatives of Mr. Sadr, neighborhood leaders, Iraqi government officials and American and British military commanders — regarding the American role in Sadr City, home to at least 1.5 million people.

Mr. Sadr has long demanded an American withdrawal from Iraq. But he has promised not to impede the government's latest crackdown in Baghdad, which involves a so-called surge of about 20,000 American troops in the capital. The cleric has privately ordered his militia fighters not to resist the military sweeps regardless of provocation.

Many militia leaders, in turn, have left Sadr City and sought sanctuary in Shiite-dominated southern Iraq and Iran, possibly figuring that they can wait out the offensive and return to the capital later. Their subordinates, foot soldiers who have for years operated openly in Sadr City, manning checkpoints and maintaining neighborhood watches, have also remained out of sight in recent days.

For the past two weeks, American and Iraqi forces have been conducting sweeps of neighborhoods bordering Sadr City. These operations, in eastern Baghdad, have been the centerpiece of the new security plan, which is viewed by many here as a last-ditch effort to save the country from all-out civil war. American and Iraqi commanders say they have conducted thousands of patrols and detained hundreds of suspects.

Abdul Hassan Jubara al-Kahbi, the manager of the Sadr City governing council, warned that a prolonged American presence in the neighborhood might eventually incite militia members to retaliate.

Other residents, however, had more mundane concerns, like the traffic jams the sweep caused.

"You can see a vehicle at the entrance of each street," said a 45-year-old baker, who gave only his nickname, Abu Aqil. "It took me two hours to reach the grocery store and return home."

Elsewhere, the American command said Sunday that one marine and one sailor were killed on Friday while conducting a combat mission in Anbar Province, and another marine was killed on Saturday, also while on a combat mission in Anbar.

In an operation unrelated to the Sadr City incursion, American soldiers in Baghdad raided a mosque on Sunday and captured three suspected insurgents hiding inside, according to the American military.

In the western Baghdad neighborhood of Jamiya, the authorities discovered the bodies of eight Shiite pilgrims who were apparently on their way to a holy city south of the capital to celebrate an Islamic holiday this weekend. The bodies were handcuffed and had bullet holes in their heads, according to an official at Yarmouk Hospital.

In Hilla, a bomb killed four other Shiite pilgrims — three women and a child — on their way to Karbala, one of the southern holy cities. The bomb was apparently intended for an American convoy but missed, according to an official at the Interior Ministry. Two others were wounded.

In Baghdad, three people were killed and seven were wounded in a series of attacks. In one, an editor for the Iraqi newspaper Al Mashriq was shot and killed by gunmen while he waited to catch a bus to go to work, an official at the Interior Ministry and a colleague said.

Iraq Ousts 10,000 In Security Ministry (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, March 5, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraq's Interior Ministry has fired or reassigned more than 10,000 employees, including high-ranking police, who were found to have tortured prisoners, accepted bribes or had ties to militias, a ministry spokesman has disclosed.

DOJ_NMG_0139315

A soon-to-be-released internal inquiry also details 41 incidents of human rights abuse at the ministry. In one case, four members of the national police hanged prisoners from a ceiling and beat them with sticks in a ministry-run prison known as Site 4, according to the report by the ministry's inspector general.

The United States has pressured Iraq's Shiite-led government to clean up its security forces as they undertake a broad plan to reduce sectarian violence. Sunni politicians have accused Iraq's police of collaborating with Shiite death squads.

More than half of those fired or reassigned since June were found to have militia ties, Jassim Hanoon, the Interior Ministry's deputy spokesman, said in a weekend interview. The investigation is ongoing.

"We are struggling against this disease," Hanoon said of militia infiltration at the ministry.

The Interior Ministry employs about 270,000 people, including police, emergency response units and administrative staff.

"Maybe we aren't 100% cured," Hanoon said. "But we're getting better day by day." Some ministry employees were fired for arresting innocent people, while others had past criminal records, he said.

Investigators are using information gathered within the ministry to probe political leaders and members of parliament, something not previously done, Hanoon said. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has vowed to pursue criminal charges against political figures — including members of parliament — linked to extremist groups.

The cases of human rights abuse were detailed in a 250-page annual report that will be released this week, Akeel Saeel, the Interior Ministry's inspector general, said in an interview.

The four policemen allegedly involved in the Site 4 case were arrested and handed over to Iraq's criminal court system, Saeel said.

"Under Saddam, investigators had this ideology. Torturing was routine," Saeel said. "I do feel we're having an impact, but it takes time, step by step."

U.S. military advisers are working to better screen and train police, including requiring 15 to 20 hours of human rights training for recruits, said Lt. Col. Pablo Hernandez, a spokesman with the U.S. military unit responsible for training Iraqi police.

"If you look at what they had in the past and the product they're putting out today, it's a lot better," Hernandez said.

No U.S. Backup Strategy For Iraq (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

During a White House meeting last week, a group of governors asked President Bush and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, about their backup plan for Iraq. What would the administration do if its new strategy didn't work?

The conclusion they took away, the governors later said, was that there is no Plan B. "I'm a Marine," Pace told them, "and Marines don't talk about failure. They talk about victory."

Pace had a simple way of summarizing the administration's position, Gov. Phil Bredesen (D-Tenn.) recalled. "Plan B was to make Plan A work."

In the weeks since Bush announced the new plan for Iraq -- including an increase of 21,500 U.S. combat troops, additional reconstruction assistance and stepped-up pressure on the Iraqi government -- senior officials have rebuffed questions about other options in the event of failure. Eager to appear resolute and reluctant to provide fodder for skeptics, they have responded with a mix of optimism and evasion.

Even if the administration is not talking about Plan B, the subject is on a lot of minds inside and outside the government. "I would be irresponsible if I weren't thinking about what the alternatives might be," Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates acknowledged last month to Congress, where many favor gradual or immediate withdrawal.

Gates did not elaborate. Several administration officials, while insisting that a wide range of options was discussed before Bush's Jan. 10 announcement, firmly closed the door on the subject of fallback plans. "I don't think anyone is going to be inclined to discuss any contingency-type planning," said National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

National security experts outside the government have stepped into the void, offering detailed options through public papers, speeches and policy proposals over the past several weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0139316

"The ultimate Plan B is pull everybody out," said Stephen D. Biddle, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations and an adviser to the Defense Department. "Nobody wants to do that. Most are looking at the middle ground between surge and pullout."

Most options involve partial or complete U.S. redeployment from Baghdad and other violent urban centers, followed by containment of the civil war within Iraq's borders -- keeping out meddlesome neighbors such as Iran and preventing a wider, regional conflict. Retired Marine Gen. Anthony Zinni, a former chief of Central Command, the U.S. military headquarters for the Middle East, said Congress is "drifting toward containment" and predicted that option will soon begin gaining popularity.

Daniel L. Byman and Kenneth M. Pollack of the Brookings Institution last month released the most comprehensive public exploration of containment. The two national security experts seemed to wince even as they proposed keeping up to 80,000 troops along Iraq's borders, cautioning that "there would be no end in sight either for the war or for their mission." But it is "the only rational course of action," they wrote.

"I firmly believe that is where we should wind up, and is what we should be doing now," said retired Air Force Gen. Charles F. Wald, formerly the No. 2 U.S. officer in Europe.

One military officer involved in long-term planning for Iraq said he does not think the idea is feasible. "It would be a massive operation," the officer said. "But having said that, it's probably the best option if they go into open civil war."

Other senior military officials are skeptical of containment, fearing that it would be almost impossible to achieve and that a policy of standing back and letting Iraqis kill each other would be morally indefensible and a recruiting boon for al-Qaeda and other extremist groups. Even proponents of containment warn that it would leave U.S. troops as concentrated targets while limiting their ability to control the situation militarily.

A related option would involve redeploying U.S. forces to the relative safety of the Kurdish region in northern Iraq, to more peaceful areas in the south and to Anbar in the west, where they could focus on fighting al-Qaeda. "You can have your civil war without us," columnist Charles Krauthammer recently suggested that Bush tell Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. "We will be around to pick up the pieces as best we can."

Biddle, who noted that new Iraq strategy proposals "proliferate hourly" in the public domain, said another variant is to set up "heavily defended forward operating bases out in the desert somewhere [and] either sit there and mind our own business and do nothing except be present -- enabling us to say we're still there -- or, in a somewhat more activist flavor, to conduct raids of various kinds" against al-Qaeda bases and rescue missions for Iraqi military units.

Steven N. Simon, senior fellow for Middle Eastern studies at the Council on Foreign Relations and the NSC's director for national security threats during the Clinton administration, last month proposed U.S. disengagement from Iraq itself, calling for containment from the outside with a reinforced U.S. presence elsewhere in the region and the opening of a regional diplomatic dialogue. Those steps should be initiated immediately, Simon wrote, before the costs of the war begin to widen across the Middle East and beyond.

Still other withdrawal possibilities center on the replacement of conventional troops with a significant Special Forces contingent to engage in counterterrorism, along with what Biddle called "facilitating ethnic cleansing" by providing armed escorts for Iraqis who want to leave contested areas.

Any containment option is likely to add substantially to the nearly 4 million Iraqis who have fled to Jordan and Syria or have been displaced from their homes within Iraq, said Carlos Pascual of the Brookings Institution, who served as director of the State Department's Office of Reconstruction and Stabilization until October 2005. Humanitarian agencies are already drawing up plans for huge refugee camps inside and around Iraq's borders, although many are concerned they will only add to the country's problems.

"When refugees and displaced persons start collecting in camps," Pascual said, "you get a vulnerable population -- and a lot of unemployed men -- who are subject to attack, recruitment and internal violence. This is where you often get further radicalization, and the camps themselves become a source of the problem."

Over the years of U.S. involvement in Iraq, new plans have been launched with assurances of success -- the return of sovereignty to a handpicked Iraqi administration in the summer of 2004; a democratically elected government in January 2005;

DOJ_NMG_0139317

"Plan Baghdad," designed to retake the capital from insurgents and militias, in the summer of 2006. The current Plan A is arguably already Plan D or beyond.

Since last summer, public opinion has turned against Bush's handling of the war and favors withdrawing, rather than increasing, troops. Although the administration has said the new strategy should show progress within months, many officials privately say it could be years, if ever, and the Democratic majority in Congress has shown little inclination to wait patiently.

Any substantive administration planning for other contingencies is occurring at the margins of policy, far from key decision-makers. "Planners plan, but I don't think anyone is saying, 'Let's do the partition,' or 'Let's pull back and let Baghdad burn,' " one Pentagon official said. "That would be a tectonic shift. That would be catastrophic failure."

One military officer and another defense expert said they believe that retired Army Col. James Kurtz, a specialist in strategic planning, has been asked by the Pentagon to begin studying alternative strategies at the Institute for Defense Analyses, a government-run think tank. "It's just not appropriate to ask for that," Kurtz said in response to an inquiry. "We keep what we do with our sponsors, okay?"

Bush has warned that the U.S. commitment to Iraq is not open-ended and will require increased effort from Iraqis. Pressed to specify U.S. limits, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice promised the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that there would be ample opportunity "to see whether or not in fact the Iraqis are living up to the assurances they gave us."

"And what if they don't?" Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) asked.

"I don't think you go to Plan B," Rice replied. "You work with Plan A."

How To Stop Genocide In Iraq (LAT)

By Samantha Power, Samantha Power, A Professor At Harvard University's Kennedy School Of Government, Is The Author Of T

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

Offering the carrot of U.S. withdrawal may be the best way to end ethnic cleansing in Iraq.

THOSE WHO SUPPORT remaining in Iraq increasingly can be heard invoking the specter of genocide as grounds for staying. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) warned that, if U.S. troops leave, "You'll see a bloodletting in Baghdad that makes Srebrenica look like a Sunday school picnic."

Some defenders of President Bush's approach, having backed the Iraq war from the start, have now settled on genocide warnings after each of their original justifications for being in Iraq — weapons of mass destruction, terrorism prevention, energy diversification, regional stabilization and democracy promotion — has crumbled one by one.

Other proponents of remaining in Iraq are not, in fact, looking to redeem their own faulty judgment. They are genuinely frightened that, as ferocious as the civil war there has become, a U.S. withdrawal could unleash an all-out slaughter. With increasing numbers of civilian corpses piling up every day, they have reason to worry.

Although critics of withdrawal do a masterful job of painting a grim picture of the apocalypse that awaits, they offer no account of how U.S. forces in Iraq will do more than preserve a status quo that is already deteriorating into wholesale ethnic cleansing. Although more than 115,000 U.S. troops have been in Iraq for the last four years, about 3.8 million Iraqis have fled their homes and at least 50,000 Iraqis are fleeing each month. It would be nice to think the surge of troops to Baghdad would help to staunch the flow. But with only one-third of the new troops on duty at any given time in a city of 6 million people, they will have no more success deterring the militias intent on carving out homogeneous Shiite or Sunni neighborhoods than U.S. forces have had to date. About 74% of Shiites polled and 91% of Sunnis — the people who have the most to fear from genocide — would like to see U.S. forces gone by the end of the year.

Unfortunately, many of those who favor a U.S. exit have recklessly waved off atrocity warnings or taken to blaming Iraqis for their plight. What is needed to stave off even greater carnage than we see today is neither assuming massacres won't happen nor suspending thought until the surge has demonstrably failed in six months — at which point other options may no longer be viable. Rather, we must announce our intention to depart and use the intervening months to prioritize civilian protection by pursuing a bold set of measures combining political pressure, humanitarian relocation and judicial deterrence.

DOJ_NMG_0139318

First, although it has a familiar and thus unsatisfying ring to it, the most viable long-term route to preventing mass atrocities is to use remaining U.S. leverage to bring about a political compromise that makes Iraqi Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds feel economically stable, physically secure and adequately represented in political structures. This is consistent with the position of leading U.S. generals and the members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, who have stressed that there is no military solution to Iraq's meltdown and urged the administration, the Iraqis and regional players to reopen broad-ranging political negotiations.

Instead of simply lining up behind Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's government in the hopes that it will one day decide to stop ethnic cleansing, recent withdrawal proposals in Congress use the leverage of the proposed redeployment to press Iraqis to reach a political solution. A plan put forth by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) has come under neoconservative fire for setting a target departure date, but it provides for flexibility to suspend the U.S. drawdown if Iraqis meet the key economic, political and security benchmarks they have committed to achieve this year. The plan would also retain some U.S. forces in Iraq and the region to help deter atrocities by sectarian militias and aggression from Iraq's neighbors.

However, if this political pressure fails and U.S. forces remain unable to stave off an ever-widening civil war, the U.S. should go further and announce its willingness to assist in the voluntary transport and relocation of Iraqi civilians in peril. If Iraqis tell us that they would feel safer in religiously homogenous neighborhoods, and we lack the means to protect them where they are, we should support and protect them in their voluntary, peaceful evacuation — a means, one might say, to preempt genocide in advance of our departure.

The administration must help secure asylum for those Iraqis — and there are millions who fit this bill — who have a "well-founded fear of persecution." At the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees' conference scheduled for April, which will be attended by Jordan, Iran, Iraq, Syria and the United States, the overburdened countries of first asylum (Syria is sheltering 1 million Iraqis; Jordan has taken in 700,000) must be persuaded to reopen their gates to fleeing Iraqis. And Western countries must dramatically expand the number of resettlement slots for Iraqis. Astoundingly, the U.S. took in just 202 Iraqis last year and, although the maximum for this year was recently raised to 7,000, this is still not sufficient.

Finally, if we are serious about preventing further sectarian horrors, the U.S. must send a clear signal to the militias and political leaders who order or carry out atrocities that they will be brought to justice for their crimes. That means offering belated U.S. support to the International Criminal Court, the only credible, independent body with the jurisdiction to prosecute crimes against humanity and genocide.

Many of those who say U.S. troops should stay in Iraq to prevent genocide are the same people who for political reasons refuse to acknowledge the gravity of the calamity unfolding on our watch. The same people who modeled a war on best-case scenarios are now resisting ending a war by invoking worst-case scenarios. But after years of using the alleged needs of the Iraqi people to justify U.S. political postures, it is long past time to use the leverage we still have to actually advance Iraqi welfare.

Supplemental Sows Discord (RC)

By Susan Davis And Emily Pierce

Roll Call, March 5, 2007

The still-evolving bill to pay for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan has rapidly become a political headache for Democratic and GOP leaders, as the debate over what to include in the measure has exacerbated intraparty tensions in both chambers.

The House Appropriations Committee could mark up the $100-plus billion emergency supplemental spending bill as early as Thursday, but knowledgeable Democratic aides cautioned last week that the schedule has not been confirmed and could spill into the week of March 12.

Procedurally, three legislative days are required after a bill has been dropped in order to have a markup, so if language is not circulated by Tuesday, a markup is unlikely to occur this week, aides said.

Staffers were expected to work through the weekend, and failure to produce language early in the week will be further indication of the challenges facing Democratic leaders to build consensus between the conservative and liberal flanks of the party who have vastly divergent views on the war that will be difficult to reconcile.

DOJ_NMG_0139319

While Democratic leaders have emphasized their party's unity on the mid-February resolution condemning the proposed troop increase, the supplemental measure is already straining that accord.

The divisions have presented a serious test for Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) leadership, as well as for Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.), who must shepherd the legislation.

"It's a big tent, and I'm glad I'm not in Nancy Pelosi's shoes." said Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.), co-chairwoman of the Progressive Caucus as well as the co-founder of the Out of Iraq Caucus.

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on Defense, has been a lightning rod for Democrats on the Iraq War since he announced plans — without first vetting it with leadership or the full Democratic Caucus — to include conditions and guidelines in the supplemental that critics have charged would unfairly restrict President Bush's ability to conduct the war.

While Murtha appears to have relented on some of his stronger positions — such as putting in conditions that would make it difficult to fund the additional troops Bush wants to send to Iraq — after strong backlash from both sides of the aisle, there continues to be significant discontent among the rank-and-file Members who supported Murtha's plan.

A potentially large segment of the Out of Iraq Caucus, which numbers 71 and overlaps heavily with the Progressive Caucus, is not expected to support the supplemental spending bill if it contains funds that do support the president's plan to deploy more troops.

"The only conditions I'll vote for are full-funding to bring our troops home from Iraq," Woolsey said Thursday.

But the California lawmaker declined to say whether she and other anti-war lawmakers would vote against the bill if, combined with potential GOP opposition to the bill, it meant it would doom the measure.

"I hope we get to a place where that's not necessary," Woolsey said.

But while emergency funding requests for the Iraq War have previously received strong bipartisan support, Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) announced last week that Republicans were ready to take the rare step of formally whipping against the bill if it contained any measures that they believe would put roadblocks up for the White House on Iraq.

"I think placing arbitrary or punitive political hurdles before the commander in chief in a time of war, especially under the guise of supporting our troops, is wrong and it is reckless," Boehner said late last week.

Boehner said the GOP would adhere to two principles in the supplemental: to oppose any effort to "put handcuffs" on Bush, or to add "unnecessary" additional spending in the bill that does not pertain to the war effort.

Democrats have floated the proposal to give the president waiver authority to make the terms outlined in the supplemental for troop readiness less binding, but Boehner said it was unclear if that would be enough.

"It may. But at the end of the day, these are unnecessary obstacles that will not support our troops ... and will not support the president," he said. "And if they want to cut the funding, they ought to have the courage to stand up and do it forthright."

Rep. Bill Young (R-Fla.), the ranking member on the Defense subcommittee, said late last week that he did not believe waiver authority would be enough to appease most Republicans.

"I think it's accurate to say that our leadership and our defense folks would be opposed to those restrictions with or without a waiver," he said.

Democrats are also expected to include billions of dollars in additional funds in the supplemental for issues ranging from agriculture relief to the State Children's Health Insurance Plan, among others. And knowledgeable Democratic aides have said they are considering including funds to improve conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

A spokesman for Pelosi said Democrats were hopeful Republicans would ultimately vote for the funding bill.

"Democrats want to make sure that our troops have the equipment and training they deserve and that the Iraqi government meets the benchmarks President Bush endorsed," said spokesman Nadeam Elshami. "Republican leaders should be supporting our efforts and not threatening to vote against the troops and accountability in Iraq."

If GOP leaders seek to make this vote a test of party loyalty, it will take a significant whip effort to get the rank-and-file Members to vote against a war supplemental. As one Democratic aide observed, it is difficult to explain the nuance of such votes to the public who see "a vote to shut down the supplemental as a vote to shut down the DOD." The aide said leaders and appropriators are so far not fearful of being able to pass the bill on the House floor. "If [Boehner] wants to whip against it he does so at his party's peril," the aide said.

DOJ_NMG_0139320

"If the Democrats insert language that really does hamstring our ability to fight and win this war, then I think it will be an easy whip," countered a GOP leadership aide, adding that Democrats will face great difficulties uniting their own Caucus. "If it does nothing to hasten troop withdrawal, they lose their Members in the left wing, and if they do put conditions on funding, they lose a whole different segment of the Caucus."

Meanwhile, Senate Republicans said the Democrats' apparent inability to forge a consensus on how to address the Iraq War in the supplemental and in other ways made their opposition to funding restrictions or cuts much easier.

"One of the first rules of politics is when your opponent is in disarray, don't stop them," said Senate GOP Conference Vice Chairman John Cornyn (Texas). "That's where the Democrats are right now. I don't think they have a coherent strategy."

Cornyn indicated that GOP opposition coupled with the possible objections of centrist Democrats likely would produce a supplemental "without any nonbinding resolutions or strings attached."

Indeed, Democrats said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has little appetite for including funding restrictions in the supplemental.

One Democratic Senator said that view was largely shared within the Democratic leadership and Caucus. Additionally, the Senator indicated that Senate Appropriations Chairman Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) and other members of the spending panel would face pressure to keep any language restricting funds out of the committee mark of the bill.

"What is done will be done on the floor, not in committee," said the Senator.

Byrd spokesman Tom Gavin said the topic of restricting funding in the supplemental has not even come up in talks among committee members.

"Has there been any discussion of putting strings on the supplemental? No," Gavin said.

If such language is not included in the committee version of the bill, it likely will be much harder for any Senator to add restrictive provisions on the floor, because it would almost certainly be filibustered by Republicans, several Senators indicated.

Still, Democrats said they would continue to look for ways — either on the supplemental or in other legislation — to force the White House to change its tactics in Iraq.

"We are continuing discussions on how best to affect a change in the administration's policy on Iraq," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley.

Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), who serves as the ranking member on the Appropriations subcommittee on Defense, said his discussions with Democrats gave him "the feeling that they want this bill to pass, but they really want to challenge the president on a number of things."

One of those "things," Stevens said, was the addition of funds for poor children's health insurance, continuing Gulf Coast hurricane disaster assistance, and other "emergency" funding issues that are not part of the Iraq War effort.

Stevens said Republican Senators may be forced to accept those add-ons, even if they oppose them, because Reid plans to vote on the measure in late March, which will leave precious little time to make sure the bill is reconciled with the House version and enacted before the Pentagon runs out of money on April 15.

"It will affect us and our willingness to accept things we might not otherwise accept under the circumstances," said Stevens.

Gavin acknowledged that the Senate bill likely will include money for non-war-related emergency expenses, such as for recovery from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita and for SCHIP.

Manley confirmed that Reid plans to bring up the supplemental during the last week of March, right before the Senate is scheduled to break for a week-long recess. The Senate Appropriations Committee will mark up the bill March 20, Gavin said.

Stevens said he was unsure of what Senate Republicans' reaction would be to any inclusion of funding restrictions in the bill, whether they were adopted in committee or on the floor. But he suggested that the restrictions might be easier to swallow if the president were given "the authorization to waive the restrictions in order to protect the forces."

Democrats Benefit From Public Shift On War (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0139321

By Christina Bellantoni And S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

As the war in Iraq and the broader battle against terror were being fought abroad, the political calculus at home changed, with public opinion shifting to favor the Democrats on an issue that long had been a Republican winner.

Republicans won the 2002 and 2004 elections in part because voters were convinced that Democrats were weak on defense and lacked the political will to protect the U.S. from terrorists. That changed as the war in Iraq grew more unpopular -- a major factor in the sweeping Democratic gains last fall, allowing the party to regain congressional power.

Anti-war sentiment has been bolstered lately, with polls showing the majority of Americans disapproving of President Bush's plan to send a "surge" of 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Most surveyed instead want to see troops withdrawn from Iraq with varying degrees of dispatch.

Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat, said oversight hearings and the House's nonbinding resolution showing disapproval with the surge plan were "long overdue," and helped the public to realize their calls for action on Iraq have been heard.

"The American people are way ahead of the politicians in Washington," he said. "In many cases, we're playing catch-up, but Democrats have been able to give some meaning to public dissatisfaction with the war.

"Now the challenge is how the war comes to an end," he said.

Despite assertions the Democrats are all on the same page when it comes to war strategy, party leaders have spent weeks trying to craft a unified position. They will give details today for a plan that would link funding to troop readiness and put more responsibility on the Iraqi government to meet benchmarks.

Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, who is chairman of the defense subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, yesterday acknowledged the Democrats "don't have the votes" to cut off troop funding.

"The public doesn't want, they don't want that to happen. They want the troops to be entirely funded," he said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

But that hasn't stopped Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio, a Democratic presidential hopeful, from pushing a bill to use existing funding to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq and seek to replace them with an international peacekeeping force.

"I don't look at polls," the outspoken war critic said. "I look at casualty counts. [The American people] are not interested in polls, either. They want the troops home."

Two national polls taken last week each showed 46 percent of respondents want Congress to use the power of the purse.

In a Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll, 46 percent said they would personally "vote against funding the war altogether to try to force a withdrawal." In the survey of 900 registered voters taken Tuesday and Wednesday, 45 percent wanted to keep funding the current level of troops and 9 percent were unsure.

In the other poll, an ABC News/Washington Post survey of 1,082 adults conducted Feb. 22-25, 46 percent said they would support "Congress trying to block Bush's [surge] plan" by "restricting funding for the war," versus 51 percent opposed and 3 percent undecided.

That same survey also showed more support -- 58 percent -- for Mr. Murtha's approach of putting onerous readiness rules that U.S. forces could not meet, thus choking off the war. And 56 percent said U.S. troops should be withdrawn even if Iraq is left unstable.

Both polls had a three percentage point margin of error.

A senior Republican aide said the tables had turned on the Democrats in terms of the war debate, even if the war itself remains unpopular.

"In terms of the PR campaign and in terms of the message to the American people, the Democrats have again come across as fractured and the Republicans have come across as unified," the aide said. "Republicans play politics better than Democrats."

The war has also turned the Republican presidential race on its head, dragging down the popularity of one-time front-runner and war hawk Sen. John McCain of Arizona and bolstering anti-war candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0139322

"I would much rather lose a campaign than lose a war," Mr. McCain has said in defending his stance of wanting to send more troops to Iraq.

The senator told The Washington Times he sees his party's rank and file recoiling from Democrats' anti-war rhetoric.

"Where I've been traveling -- which is talking to Republicans -- the Republican base is coming back and supporting the president because the Democrats have overreached," said Mr. McCain, a decorated Vietnam veteran.

Iraq: Silence Of The Sadrists (NSWK)

By Rod Nordland

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

So far the Mahdi Army is lying low. But for how long?

Early in the latest U.S. and Iraqi attempt to bring peace to Baghdad, one high-ranking Iraqi official included Moqtada al-Sadr in his prayers. "Allah, lo yehdih, lo yedahdih," he prayed, a pun that roughly translates as "Allah, show him the way, or kick him aside." As far as the official, who would only speak anonymously, is concerned, his prayer has been answered. Sadr has all but disappeared from the Iraqi scene the past three weeks, and Sadr's Mahdi Army has been notably quiet, too. Officially, the Iraqi government is attributing that to the new Baghdad security plan, part of a surge of forces that will eventually include 21,500 new American troops. But this official says what's really happening is the taming of Moqtada.

The U.S. military announced plans to set up a base inside Shia-dominated Sadr City only late last week. Most U.S. reinforcements are still en route. Yet despite an upsurge in suicide bombings by Sunni extremists, mostly aimed at Shia civilians, the number of reprisal killings is down dramatically since the security plan was launched on Feb. 14. Human Rights Minister Wijdan Salim said last week that "sectarian killings have dropped to a fourth what they had been [two weeks earlier], a very big decline." The senior Iraqi official credits pressure on Sadr from his former patrons in Iran, as well as from Ayatollah Sistani and the Marjaiyah, the Shia clerical leadership in Najaf. He says Iran is withholding military advice and aid to Sadrists as well as other rogue elements, and leaning on them to stop the killings. "Sadr is convinced that there's no real outcome of this struggle, and [death-squad reprisals have] backfired," he says.

Washington takes a less sanguine view of Iran's role in Iraq. U.S. military authorities have publicized a series of weapons seizures in recent days, including material for making the deadly "explosively formed projectiles," or EFPs, bombs allegedly of Iranian origin that can penetrate armored vehicles. But Iranian officials have publicly supported the Baghdad security plan, and have agreed to join a regional conference on Iraq's future with the United States and other nations. "Iran's strategy is to strengthen and support the [Shia-dominated] central government in Iraq," says a senior Iranian intelligence official who asked for anonymity because of his line of work, "when and how it sees appropriate."

The threat of American action certainly had something to do with Sadr's silence, too. Even before Feb. 14, U.S. and Iraqi troops had begun targeting top and middle-level officials in Sadr's organization, arresting several key ones and killing at least two who resisted. Even more critical may have been the intervention of Shia elders. Alarmed at the U.S. crackdown, Sadr had an 11 p.m. meeting with Sistani about a month ago, according to an aide to the grand ayatollah, speaking on condition of anonymity in keeping with practice in the cleric's office. "He asked the sayyid what he should do about the attacks against him, and [Sistani] told him, 'You have two options: bear the consequences, on you and Shias in general, or withdraw into a corner'."

The corner Sadr chose was likely somewhere in Iran. U.S. and Iraqi officials say he left for Iran two weeks ago. "As far as I know, he's still there," says Sami al-Askari, an adviser to Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki. "He's a secretive man." Both Tehran and Sadr's spokesmen vehemently deny he's hiding in Iran, but it's notable that he has been absent from his usual Friday sermons at the Kufah mosque for three weeks now, and hasn't appeared elsewhere in public. A former Mahdi Army commander in Baghdad, Abu Hazim, says, "Sadr is following a strategy called 'bending before the wind' because he's lost part of his control over the Mahdi Army. It's not like it was in 2004," when an uprising called by the young radical threatened to engulf much of the country.

Some analysts worry that Sadr and Shia extremists are just biding their time. But as additional U.S. troops arrive during the next two months, that may prove an uncomfortable wait. Already, in Karbala, a group of Sadrists recently split after one of them blamed other Sadr followers for killing civilians, including a prominent sheik close to Sistani. Police in Karbala went on to arrest 50 of Sadr's followers. "Even if they lie low, they will lose contact with their people," says the senior Iraqi official. "Even an organized army would lose its command and control." When the surge is over, says U.S. Embassy political officer Margaret Scobie, the Sadrists "may find their opportunities to resume are limited." In the meantime, authorities can breathe a little easier with only one set of extremists to fight.

DOJ_NMG_0139323

The Things That Get You (USNEWS)

By Alex Kingsbury

U.S. News and World Report, March 4, 2007

FORWARD OPERATING BASE KALSU—There are plenty of nasty ways to meet with death or injury in Iraq. Examples of some of the cleverest devices targeting American troops are mounted on large sheets of plywood outside a dining hall at FOB Kalsu, about 25 miles south of Baghdad. It's a sobering display of the ingenuity and resourcefulness of the enemy: antipersonnel mines hidden in household items, pressure-sensitive explosives fashioned from slats of wood and wire, garage door openers that trigger artillery shells to rip open tanks.

The letters IED, for improvised explosive device, have become forever associated with the war in Iraq. These weapons are the greatest day-to-day threat to U.S. forces. The military reported that at least 60 U.S. troops have been killed in IED attacks so far this year (the military doesn't report the cause of death in all instances). IEDs were responsible for more than half of American hostile-fire deaths in the past 12 months.

The military has struggled to develop practices and gear to counter the IED threat, with an array of devices designed to trigger the bombs prematurely or render them harmless. It's punch and counterpunch, as each new design breeds a new defense, and vice versa.

The display at FOB Kalsu, intended to help troops recognize common IEDs, is a poignant reminder of the dangers that soldiers routinely face in or out of their vehicles. The variety known as explosively formed penetrators—which American officials assert are coming from Iran—are particularly dangerous because of their ability to penetrate even armored vehicles. An EFP consists of a short tube that acts as a barrel for a machine-milled concave copper plate. When the explosive charge detonates, the force of the explosion creates a hot copper projectile that shoots from the barrel at hypervelocity and through nearly anything in its path.

"Getting clever." It's hard to fully appreciate the force of this small weapon, even seeing how it can punch a hole through a vehicle's armor. One EFP attack on an American light armored vehicle a few weeks ago sent a copper slug a distance of more than 70 yards, through a concrete wall, then through the rear of a car, tearing through the trunk and the front and back seats, and finally settling in the engine block. In this case, the slug missed its intended target, and no one was injured.

Increasingly sophisticated EFP attacks involve four or more such explosives timed to explode simultaneously or in sequence against a single target. "They are getting clever about aiming EFPs at the engine and troop compartments," says an American commander who witnessed an EFP attack.

But the EFPs against patrols and convoys are only the latest weapons of choice for targeting U.S. troops. Insurgents still use traditional military weapons like mortars as well. Either hand-held or mounted on the back of a pickup truck, mortars can fire an explosive shell a distance of a mile or so, delivering a powerful, if often inaccurate, punch.

The mortar alarms that sound in Camp Kalsu are sometimes ignored, as soldiers have become accustomed to the attacks. Playing dominoes in a large tent, a group of soldiers barely glance up as a mortar alarm begins to sound. The sharp whump of a nearby mortar hit sends them scrambling outside their tent into reinforced concrete shelters. "The worst is when you get four or five alarms and attacks in one night," says a sergeant, leaning on his rifle and peering out of the bunker. "It's hard to sleep through all of that, and you wind up running into the shelter wearing only your boxers."

Phil Hubbard doesn't show his office to many visitors, but the manager of an Internet cafe and coffee shop at FOB Kalsu has had some close calls. Looking at the 20 jagged shrapnel holes in his office wall, he gestures to the point of impact a few yards behind his trailer. "The guy who was working in here at the time just missed being turned into Swiss cheese," he says. Shrapnel tore through the wall, punching several holes into the faux leather chair at his desk, then through another wall on the opposite side of the room. Several soldiers were injured in the attack, one of the largest mortar attacks against FOB Kalsu.

DOJ_NMG_0139324

Incidentally, the camp itself was named for the only recently active professional football player killed in the Vietnam War. Robert Kalsu was a lineman from the University of Oklahoma who was voted the Buffalo Bills team rookie of the year in 1968, his first and only season with the team. He was killed two years later in the A Shau Valley in Vietnam during a mortar attack.

10 Questions For Ted Kennedy (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, March 5, 2007

As Ted Kennedy enters his 45th year in Congress, the arch-liberal senior Senator from Massachusetts has a lot on his plate. Between playing a lead role in the antiwar movement, working to push through a hike in the minimum wage and getting ready to reauthorize No Child Left Behind, Kennedy sat down with TIME's Massimo Calabresi to talk about politics, his ever-present Portuguese water dogs and, naturally, the Kennedy clan.

Are you the only Senator to keep dogs in your offices?

No. Bob Dole had a dog, Leader. Elizabeth Dole has a dog. And Bob Byrd has his dog. Elizabeth Dole and I are going to form a dog caucus, and we're going to be co-presidents. We don't think we're going to be president of anything else.

Admirable bipartisanship. Democrats have the country with them against the war in Iraq but aren't acting to end it. Why?

This war is the major blunder in American foreign policy. We ought to free ourselves from our troop involvement. But if you look back on Vietnam, it wasn't until 1973 that we passed the resolution that actually halted troops and money. There's no question that this is a slow-moving institution, and it's no new statement to say that we are behind what's happening out in the countryside.

But there was fallout for Democrats appearing weak on Vietnam.

It's been the Democrats who have been for armor for the troops. We have been for investing in our servicemen when they come back from Iraq. And it is the Democrats who want to get our American troops out of the civil-war cross fire. Democrats are concerned about the security of the fighting person. Too often Republicans are more interested in protecting the reputation of the President than protecting the troops.

Do you intend to endorse one of the Democrats running for President?

I have no plans. I just got re-elected. I'm going to spend my time here doing what I was elected to do.

It's easy to pick up a newspaper and see some comparison between your brothers and Barack Obama. Is there any validity to that comparison?

Barack is certainly an extremely gifted and talented individual. But my brothers are on a special plateau for me. They're my heroes.

You know Mitt Romney pretty well.

I've had my differences with Mitt, but I wouldn't underestimate him. That's certainly also true for Senator [John] McCain. I have differences with him--the Iraq war is the most obvious example--but I've worked with him quite a bit on the patients' bill of rights, and I've worked with him on immigration.

Your long-sought minimum-wage bill is stuck in conference, thanks to a debate on the size of small-business tax breaks. What's going on?

It's going to get through. The differences are not significant. We're not talking about hundreds of billions of dollars. We're talking about a few billion dollars. It's been 10 years since we've increased the minimum wage, and I want to get this increase to the beneficiaries. I'm convinced we'll get it done within the next two weeks.

Some on the left wing of the Democratic Party would like to see No Child Left Behind done away with. Are you going to deliver reauthorization this year?

The concept of including every child in education as a national goal is one that I wholeheartedly and completely agree with. But there are children left out. If this were the space program, we would have gone to the moon, landed and gotten halfway back. We have work to do in the reauthorization of No Child Left Behind and plenty of it. But do I believe we can get a reauthorization? Yes, I do.

You just celebrated your 75th birthday. Or rather the celebrations are ongoing.

DOJ_NMG_0139325

My sister Eunice wants to know why I have to have several, and I told her, Well, I was the ninth member of the family. I had two sisters who had their birthdays on Feb. 20, and mine's on Feb. 22, so the house was always lively on Feb. 20, and then [the next day] someone would say, Oh, my goodness, Teddy's birthday is coming up tomorrow. So I've been wanting to make up for it.

You had a costume party. Who did you go as?

Most people think I was John Quincy Adams. I'll probably leave it there.

Confronting Iraq's Exodus (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, March 5, 2007

The war in Iraq has driven nearly 4 million people from their homes. As many as 2 million have fled the country, in what Refugees International calls the fastest-growing crisis in the world. As detailed in the stories that follow, the burden of coping with this exodus has fallen most heavily on Iraq's neighbors, such as Syria, Jordan and Iran, who have absorbed the vast majority of exiles. But the war's reverberations are being felt beyond the Middle East, in places as seemingly distant and incongruous as Sweden, which has taken in more than 11,000 Iraqis since 2005.

The U.S., however, has been reluctant to open its doors, admitting just 18 Iraqi refugees in 2005 and 202 in 2006. In February the State Department announced that it would admit up to 7,000 more, giving special consideration to those Iraqis who worked for the U.S. government. But that's still just a fraction of the number of Iraqis in need. And although the Bush Administration has offered to cover about a third of the $60 million that the U.N. says is needed for the refugees, the U.S.'s European and Arab allies think Washington should cover far more of the costs resulting from what they view as America's war.

So why the parsimony? U.S. officials argue that resettling Iraqis will accelerate the country's brain drain. Admitting large numbers of Arabs also raises anxieties among some Americans that terrorists could slip in--even though refugees are among the most exhaustively screened migrants. But Bush Administration critics say the biggest reason Washington has been slow to act is that doing so would be an admission of failure in Iraq. Says Harold Koh, dean of Yale Law School and former Assistant Secretary of State for Democracy, Human Rights and Labor: "If the U.S. government were to do an active resettlement regime for Iraqi refugees, it would be conceding that its own rhetoric about the situation in Iraq becoming safe and stable anytime soon is a fantasy."

The U.S. has been cool to refugees before. In World War II, Secretary of State Cordell Hull infamously declined to accept Jewish Holocaust refugees, adhering instead to prewar immigration quotas. Thirty years later, the U.S. watched as a crisis built ahead of the April 1975 collapse of South Vietnam, in part because 54% of Americans were against admitting Vietnamese who were fleeing the communists.

In both cases, U.S. leaders calculated that the country's national interests trumped its moral responsibilities. But in Iraq, a more magnanimous stance toward refugees would help the U.S.'s broader interests. It would be good propaganda in the Arab world, where the U.S. image needs burnishing. It would be a tool to counter one of the root causes of terrorism: regional instability caused by mass migration. And it would provide Washington with a basis for talks with Iran and Syria, whose help the U.S. needs to stabilize Iraq. Despite the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, the Bush Administration has refused to negotiate directly with either country. But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has taken a first step toward engagement, announcing that the U.S. will participate next month in talks on Iraq's future that will include representatives from Iran and Syria.

Tackling the refugee crisis may be the Bush Administration's best chance to repair some of the damage to U.S. prestige caused by the Iraq war. After the fall of Saigon, Congress bucked public opinion and embraced its obligation to Indochinese asylum seekers, using refugee aid to countries like Thailand and Laos to build relationships and counter the spread of communism.

Opening the doors to Iraq's departed would be smart as well as moral. And it would allow this generation of Americans to live up to George Washington's pledge that "America is open to receive not only the opulent and respectable stranger, but the oppressed and persecuted of all nations and religions."

Syria. (TIME)

By Andrew Lee Butters

DOJ_NMG_0139326

Time, March 5, 2007

What happens to a country when its population grows by more than 10% in three years? In Syria, which has absorbed more than a million Iraqi refugees, you can see cosmetic transformations. Iraqi-accented Arabic is heard constantly in the cafÃ©s and streets of Damascus. Real estate prices have skyrocketed. Food prices are rising. There's even a neighborhood in the capital called Fallujah that's popular with Iraqis.

The Iraqi-refugee issue is also changing Syria in deeper ways, altering the country's image in the Middle East--and bolstering its leverage with the U.S. While the Bush Administration has accused it of supporting terrorism in Iraq, Israel and Lebanon, Syria has established itself as the lifeboat of the Arab world. Having taken in 180,000 temporary Lebanese refugees fleeing the war with Israel last summer, Syria is the only Arab country that has been equally welcoming to all of Iraq's religious sects, according to Syrian human-rights groups. Only Jordan--which has received 750,000 Iraqis but has stopped accepting more--comes close to matching Syria's largesse. "The price of this disaster is being paid mainly by the refugees themselves and by two countries: Syria and Jordan," says AntÃ³nio Guterres, the U.N.'s High Commissioner for Refugees. "The international community can't let [them] bear this burden alone."

Syria wants more than bromides for its openness. The humanitarian crisis in Iraq could be the issue that brings Syria out of international isolation and into semi-respectability. Although the Bush Administration has long resisted diplomatic engagement with Syria, cracks are appearing. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has authorized the U.S. embassy in Damascus to talk with Syrian officials as long as their discussions are limited to the refugee crisis. Syrian officials say their willingness to take in so many refugees has helped stabilize the region. Now they want something in return: a softer U.S. line on Syrian involvement in Lebanon and more pressure on Israel to give back occupied land in the Golan Heights. "One million refugees is a huge number," says Redwan Ziadeh, director of the Damascus Center for Human Rights Studies. "It is a card that Syria can play with the U.S."

Damascus may not have that card for long. Internally, the refugee issue poses long-term dilemmas for the Baathist regime of Syrian President Bashar Assad. The presence of so many needy Iraqis has exposed the government's failure to make economic reforms. The Syrian government--dominated by a secular core of Alawite Muslims who rule a country that is 74% Sunni Muslim--may have to stop the influx as a measure of self-preservation. Assad is particularly concerned about extremists re-entering the country from Iraq, according to Syrian security analysts. "We used to call them the Afghan Arabs," a security analyst says, referring to extremists who served with the Taliban and al-Qaeda in Afghanistan. "Now we are worried about the Iraqi Syrians."

The government has begun to limit the amount of time it allows Iraqis without residency status to stay in Syria, down from three months to two weeks. In mid-February, Syria shut its border with Iraq and wouldn't let any Iraqis enter for three days. The border is back open, but the message to Iraq and the U.S. was clear: Stop taking Syrian help for granted. The U.S. still needs to prove to Syria that playing a constructive role in the Middle East can pay off too.

Sweden. (TIME)

By Vivienne Walt

Time, March 5, 2007

The view from Alaa's apartment reveals streets and sidewalks carpeted in fresh snow, a tableau of tranquillity half a world away from the chaos of Iraq. But inside, the war is never far from his mind. The television set is turned at high volume to a talk show on Baghdadi TV, an Iraqi satellite channel. Only Arabic books line the bookshelves in the living room; Alaa and his roommate, Ali Hamad, an ophthalmologist from Baghdad, barely speak English, let alone the language of the country in which they have sought refuge. As he welcomes a visitor with the typical Iraqi drink of sugared mint tea, Alaa laughs. "This is Little Iraq," he says.

Alaa, 29, left Baghdad in January, a few days after Saddam Hussein was hanged. A group of gunmen had smashed in his front door and ransacked the house. Alaa, a Shi'ite television producer who was at work at the time, believes that Sunni militants wanted to kill him for covering Saddam's trial. And so, as hundreds of Iraqis do each day, Alaa decided to pack up his things and flee. At the time he wasn't sure where he was going or who would take him in. Now he finds himself sharing a two-room apartment with people who were complete strangers just weeks ago, in a country he knows little about--but that is, for the foreseeable future, his new home: Sweden.

DOJ_NMG_0139327

This country of 9 million has long prided itself on being one of the world's most hospitable to foreigners fleeing war and hardship. After the 1991 Gulf War, Sweden took in thousands of Iraqi Shi'ites and Kurds. But nothing could have prepared Swedes for the numbers of Iraqis who are pouring in today. While most of the 2 million Iraqis who have left since the U.S. invasion in 2003 have remained in the Middle East, a growing number are trying to make their way out of the region, in search of refuge and the promise of a new life in the West. Having granted asylum to 2,330 Iraqis in 2005, Sweden received nearly four times that many last year. In December, 1,566 Iraqis arrived, nearly five times the figure in February 2006. And with Iraq's civil war still raging, Swedish officials say they are bracing for a possible 35,000 this year.

For both the new Iraqi arrivals and their Scandinavian hosts, coexistence has not come easily. Swedish officials fret about the potential security risks and the costs posed by a swelling population of displaced Muslims. Although relieved to have escaped the grinding violence of Iraq, Sweden's Iraqis face the prospect of having to rebuild shattered lives and find work in an alien society. For many, the trauma of Iraq is inescapable. Recent arrivals like Alaa say they fear being hunted down by sectarian rivals in Stockholm. "We don't know who is who here," says Alaa. In a Swedish government asylum office, he was shocked to see Iraqis in "long beards and short pants" who looked like extremist Sunnis. "I'm scared that among those people who Sweden helps are crazy Salafis who might kill me," he says.

Yet the fact that Alaa made it to Stockholm at all qualifies him as one of the lucky ones. Among Western countries, Sweden is unique in allowing entry to all Iraqis who can prove they have fled central and southern Iraq, no matter what their political involvement or how they reached Scandinavia, according to officials at the Swedish Migration Board.

Being accepted into Sweden is relatively simple compared with what it takes to actually get there. Iraqis say the odyssey north typically costs $10,000 per person and involves relying on a network of nameless smugglers and middlemen. Most Iraqis flee first to Jordan; from there smugglers arrange flights to Istanbul, where it is easy to find illegal European Union passports--red passports, as the Iraqis call them, which contain the refugees' real photos but use other people's names. "Daniel," 23, a Christian Iraqi student sitting in a Stockholm cafÃ©, said he bought a fake Iraqi passport for $300 in Baghdad and used it to take a smuggler's ride through Syria to Turkey. In Turkey a smuggler traded Daniel's Iraqi passport for a false European passport for $8,000--paid by his parents in Baghdad. Then he hid in the back of a cargo truck with three other Iraqi men for the duration of the 3,000-mile journey into Sweden.

For many Iraqis, the initial relief of fleeing the war is replaced by the shock of being shipped to one of Sweden's overcrowded refugee camps, an hour's drive from Stockholm. Only Iraqis who can prove they will live with relatives in Sweden are permitted to stay outside government housing when they arrive; others slowly try to find accommodations once their refugee status is officially approved, usually within a few weeks of arrival. Most end up in Sweden's heavily immigrant ghettos, like the Stockholm neighborhood of Rinkeby. The area's expanse of characterless high-rise apartment buildings dates back to the 1960s, when the Swedish government poured billions into public housing. Driving into the area from Stockholm's gracious old city is like entering another country. In fact, there are few reasons that Swedes would ever visit. Little Swedish is heard in the Middle Eastern and African supermarkets, barbershops and call-service outlets; these days the street-side talk is increasingly in Arabic.

Government officials say they try to steer Iraqis to smaller towns, where housing is cheaper and their skills are in greater demand. But Iraqis resist. "It's a major problem for us," says Mattias SjÃ¶berg, a migration officer at the Swedish Migration Board in Stockholm. "We send people to the north or down south, but in the end many Iraqis end up in Stockholm, where there is a [Muslim] community."

Even in Stockholm, Iraqis often find their careers stalled while they spend months in Swedish-language classes. The government has made attendance in language classes a precondition for receiving asylum benefits. Then comes the slog of requalifying in their profession. While Iraqis in Stockholm praise the Swedes' welcome, they struggle to persuade locals to hire them for professional jobs. "We have a lot of highly educated people driving taxis," says Faried al-Suheil, who fled Baghdad for Stockholm in 1993, moved back in 2003, then returned to Stockholm last summer. He stood at the doorway of the Iraqi prayer hall in the Stockholm suburb of Jakobsberg late one evening. Six taxis were parked along the snowbound sidewalk while the drivers celebrated the Shi'ite holiday of Ashura inside. "The Swedes don't want to hire us" for skilled work, al-Suheil says.

DOJ_NMG_0139328

But as is true around the world these days, the Iraqis in Sweden reserve their most bitter words for one another. As Iraq's ethnic fighting has intensified, so have the tensions among refugees living thousands of miles from the war. "Before, in Sweden, we never talked about who was who," says Salam Karam, an ethnic Kurdish journalist from Baghdad who moved to Stockholm with his family in 1990. "Now people talk about who's a Shi'ite, who's a former Baathist. Have they come here to hunt us?" He says he was shocked to find that when he taught Swedish to Iraqi refugees last year, "my Shi'ite students never spoke to those who were Sunnis."

The Swedish government has opted to grant refuge even to Iraqis who enter illegally rather than pursue them for using forged documents. "We don't turn anyone back," says Gunn Sundberg-Hjelm, an asylum officer at the Swedish Migration Board. "Look at the circumstances they have left." But how long can the warm welcome last? Swedish voters last September ousted the leftist government, largely over fears about growing unemployment and the country's costly welfare system. That nervousness may increasingly be directed at the new Iraqi refugees, who benefit hugely from Sweden's social services. The country has spent tens of millions of dollars on the new arrivals, who receive a daily allowance, housing and free health care. Beyond the burden to Sweden's economy, the influx could also pose a security risk, says Magnus Norell, senior analyst for the government-funded Swedish Defense Research Agency and a former Swedish Secret Service special analyst on terrorism. "It's not just that Iraqis are swamping the system," says Norell. "The government realizes that there are several people in this country who should not be here, people who would not get in because they have involvement with Islamist organizations in Iraq and Europe." With the numbers of Iraqi refugees soaring, the government doesn't "have time to do the proper investigation."

But for both the thousands of Iraqis who have found their way to Stockholm and the European hosts who have taken them in, there is no going back. Hunched over a borrowed computer in his small apartment, Alaa, the television producer, spends hours a day looking at digital photographs of his small son playing on his bed back in Iraq. Alaa hopes to get his Swedish residence papers sometime this year, allowing his wife and year-old boy to join him in Stockholm--two more Iraqis seeking escape from a world gone wrong.

Japan Weighs Extending Iraq Mission (AP)

AP, March 5, 2007

Japan's top government spokesman said Monday that Tokyo is undecided about whether to extend the nation's air force mission in Iraq when it expires in July, but that a decision is expected by the end of this month.

Tokyo has been airlifting U.N. and coalition personnel and supplies into Baghdad and other Iraqi cities from nearby Kuwait since last year as part of efforts to support the reconstruction of Iraq.

The mission is set to end July 31, and debate is already gearing up about whether Tokyo will continue its contributions to a war increasingly unpopular at home.

"Discussions are going on, but we have not decided on any specific policy yet," Chief Cabinet spokesman Yasuhisa Shiozaki said. "A decision will be made by the end of this month."

Japan backed the U.S. invasion of Iraq and provided ground troops for a non-combat, humanitarian mission in the southern Iraqi city of Samawah from early 2004.

Japan withdrew the ground troops in July last year, and has since expanded its Kuwait-based air operations.

The Iraq mission is part of Japan's bid to boost its international profile. Tokyo also approved in late October a one-year extension of its naval mission in the Indian Ocean to support the U.S.-led anti-terrorism campaign in Afghanistan.

But some in Japan criticize the operations for violating the pacifist constitution, which prohibits the use of force in solving international disputes.

Bilateral Talks With U.S. Still On The Table (WT)

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

U.S. and Iranian officials, in separate remarks yesterday, both left open the possibility of bilateral talks on the sidelines of a regional meeting this week in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0139329

Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, said Washington had not decided whether it would meet one-on-one with the Iranians when regional countries and world powers meet Saturday to try to get Iraq's neighbors to contribute to stabilizing the country.

"We have not decided at this point with regard to anything bilateral [with Iran], but we will be prepared to play our role as constructively as possible," Mr. Khalilzad said in an interview with CNN yesterday.

"There have been some recent indications that [the Iranians] are interested in a dialogue with regard to Iraq," he said.

Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammed Ali Hosseini, meanwhile, said his country has not decided whether it will attend the Baghdad conference but did not rule out a decision to meet directly with Mr. Khalilzad.

"Recently, the United States has proposed negotiations with Iran through different channels over the Iraq issue," Mr. Hosseini was quoted as saying by the Associated Press. "Meeting with Americans on the sidelines of the Baghdad conference is not on the agenda of Iran, for the time being."

The meeting will bring together working-level officials in Baghdad before a second session, involving ministers, as early as next month, U.S. officials said. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said she would attend the later session.

Mr. Khalilzad said on CNN that the U.S. was "prepared to talk" with the Iranians about U.S. accusations that Iran is sending weapons to Iraqi militants.

He said he was concerned primarily about roadside bombs known as "explosively formed projectiles" (EFPs), which have killed a large number of U.S. soldiers.

"It is my understanding that EFPs do come across the border [from Iran] and there is continuing support and assistance from elements in Iran to elements in Iraq. That continues," he said. The U.S. military thinks the Quds Force, part of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, is behind the weapons shipments, he said.

"Should the opportunity arise to talk to the Iranians, we will focus on the weapons that come across the border," he said. "The purpose of any talks that take place, the bilateral talks, will be very much the security of our forces."

The United States has no diplomatic relations with Iran and is involved in a war of words to stop Tehran's nuclear program, which Iran says is aimed solely at producing electricity.

President Bush has stepped up accusations that Iran is backing Shi'ite militants in Iraq. The U.S. military has strengthened its presence in the Gulf and detained several Iranians in Iraq. Washington also is leading a push for stronger sanctions against Iran over its nuclear defiance.

Syria, which has agreed to attend the Baghdad meeting, indicated that its government is hoping to engage the United States.

The Al-Ba'ath state newspaper said in an editorial yesterday that the Baghdad conference should open the way for talks between the two countries, whose relations have been strained for years.

"How could attendees of a conference who are sitting at the same table ignore each other?" said Al-Ba'ath. "The entire region sees in the conference a glimpse of hope and optimism to start a series of solutions."

Washington accuses Syria of allowing militants to cross into Iraq, a charge Syria denies. Last week, a the Syrian government called Washington's decision to attend the conference a step toward comprehensive dialogue with Syria on the Middle East.

16 Civilians Die As U.S. Troops Fire On Afghan Road (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 4 — American troops opened fire on a highway filled with civilian cars and bystanders on Sunday, American and Afghan officials said, in an incident that the Americans said left 16 civilians dead and 24 wounded after a suicide car bombing in eastern Afghanistan. One American was also wounded.

The shooting sparked demonstrations, with local people blocking the highway, the main road east from the town of Jalalabad to the border with Pakistan. And there were differences in some of the accounts of the incident, with the Americans saying that the civilians were caught in cross-fire between the troops and militants, and Afghan witnesses and some authorities blaming the Americans for indiscriminately shooting at civilian vehicles in anger after the explosion.

DOJ_NMG_0139330

The United States military said the unit came under fire after a suicide bomber detonated his explosive-laden car near their convoy "as part of a complex ambush involving enemy small-arms fire from several directions."

Members of the unit, on patrol near Jalalabad airfield, returned fire, and the civilians were killed and wounded in the cross-fire during the battle, according to a statement from the military press office at Bagram Air Base, 40 miles north of Kabul.

"We regret the death of innocent Afghan citizens as a result of the Taliban extremists' cowardly act," Lt. Col. David Accetta, a military spokesman, said in the statement. "Once again the terrorists demonstrated their blatant disregard for human life by attacking coalition forces in a populated area, knowing full well that innocent Afghans would be killed and wounded in the attack."

Yet some of the wounded interviewed in the hospital by news agencies said the only shooting came from the American troops. A hospital official, who asked not to be identified, said all the wounded were suffering from bullet wounds and not shrapnel from the bomb explosion.

Hundreds of Afghans blocked the road and threw rocks at police officers in protest afterward, with some demonstrators shouting "Death to America! Death to Karzai!" a reference to President Hamid Karzai, The Associated Press reported.

The shooting will be a setback for American forces in Afghanistan, who have been working to contain the continuing insurgent attacks, in particular roadside bombs and suicide attacks, and win the support of the people with reconstruction and development projects. Deadly riots shook Kabul last May after American troops were involved in a fatal car crash and then opened fire on the crowd.

Among the dead on Sunday morning were a woman and two children in their early teens, said Dr. Ajmal Pardez, the provincial director of health, speaking by telephone from the Jalalabad city hospital. He said the hospital received 10 dead and 25 wounded people from the incident, with four people in critical condition.

After the suicide attack, the Americans treated every car and person along the highway as a potential attacker, though none of the people showed hostile intent, Muhammad Khan Katawazi, the district chief of Shinwar, told The A.P.

"They were firing everywhere, and they even opened fire on 14 to 15 vehicles passing on the highway," said Tur Gul, 38, who was standing on the roadside by a gas station and was shot twice in the right hand. "They opened fire on everybody, the ones inside the vehicles and the ones on foot."

Some of the wounded interviewed by The A.P. said the soldiers opened fire indiscriminately on passing cars and pedestrians on the busy main road.

"When we parked our vehicle, when they passed us, they opened fire on our vehicle," said 15-year-old Mohammad Ishaq, who was hit by two bullets, in the left arm and right ear. "It was a convoy of three American Humvees. All three Humvees were firing around."

In other fighting, two British soldiers were killed Saturday in southern Afghanistan, the British Defense Ministry said Sunday. The men were involved in heavy fighting that has raged for three days in the town of Sangin, said Col. Tom Collins, a NATO spokesman in Kabul. Townspeople have fled the town and abandoned their shops as Taliban insurgents and British forces stationed there have been trading artillery and rocket fire, according to a resident of the area.

Insurgents Strike Marine Convoy; 10 Dead In Melee (WT/AP)

By Rahim Faiez

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

BARIKAW, Afghanistan -- Insurgents struck a convoy of Marines with an explosives-rigged minivan and followed up with a fusillade from the roadside, U.S. officials said yesterday.

As many as 10 people were killed and 34 wounded as the convoy made a frenzied escape, and injured Afghans said many were killed by Americans who fired on civilian cars and pedestrians as they sped away.

DOJ_NMG_0139331

U.S. officials said militants' gunfire may have killed or injured civilians, but Afghanistan's Interior Ministry and wounded Afghans said most of the bullets were American. Hundreds of angry Afghans protested near the blast site, denouncing the U.S. presence.

As the Americans fled, they treated every car and person along the busy highway as a potential attacker, said Mohammed Khan Katawazi, the district chief of Shinwar in eastern Afghanistan's Nangarhar province.

"I saw them turning and firing in this direction, then turning and firing in that direction," Ahmed Najib, a 23-year-old hit by a bullet in his right shoulder, said of the U.S. forces. "I even saw a farmer shot by the Americans."

Lt. Col. David Accetta, the top U.S. military spokesman in Afghanistan, said gunmen may have fired on U.S. forces at multiple points during the escape. He said it was not yet clear how the casualties happened, though he left open the possibility that U.S. forces had shot civilians.

"It's not entirely clear right now if the people killed or wounded by gunfire were killed or wounded by coalition forces' gun fire or enemy attackers' gunfire," he said.

The accusation that U.S. forces killed or wounded so many Afghans was likely to cause an uproar in a country that has seen an untold number of civilians killed by international forces since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001. A high-level delegation was appointed to investigate.

President Hamid Karzai has pleaded repeatedly for Western troops not to harm civilians, and in December wept during a speech lamenting civilian deaths at the hands of foreign forces.

The U.S.-based Human Rights Watch estimates that more than 100 Afghan civilians died as a result of NATO and coalition assaults in 2006. An AP tally, based on reports from Afghan, NATO and coalition officials, puts the overall civilian death toll in 2006 at 834, most from militants' attacks.

Nine witnesses -- including five Afghans recuperating from bullet wounds in the hospital -- said in interviews that U.S. forces fired indiscriminately along at least a six-mile stretch of one of eastern Afghanistan's busiest highways -- a route often filled not only with cars and trucks, but Afghans on foot and bicycles.

"They were firing everywhere, and they even opened fire on 14 to 15 vehicles passing on the highway," said Tur Gul, 38, who was standing on the roadside by a gas station and was shot twice in his right hand. "They opened fire on everybody, the ones inside the vehicles and the ones on foot."

The tolls varied. The Interior Ministry said 10 persons were killed, while the provincial health chief said eight died.

The U.S. military said eight civilians were killed and 34 wounded after earlier saying 16 were killed and 24 wounded. It did not explain the revised, lower death toll, saying only that the new figures were "the most accurate numbers to date." A U.S. Marine was also injured in the suicide blast.

Interior Ministry spokesman Zemeri Bashary said the chief of the Interior Ministry's criminal division would lead a delegation including a U.S.-led coalition official to Nangarhar province today to investigate.

"The coalition says they have proof that gunmen opened fire," said Mr. Bashary. "But I think more of the gunfire was from the [U.S.] side."

Marines Open Fire After Afghan Ambush (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, March 4 -- At least eight Afghan civilians were killed Sunday in eastern Afghanistan when U.S. Marines traveling in a convoy were hit by a car bomb and responded by firing in a way that some witnesses called reckless.

The incident, which the U.S. military said resulted from a "complex ambush," was followed by angry demonstrations in which hundreds of Afghans took to the streets, many chanting anti-government and anti-American slogans.

According to Afghan and U.S. accounts, the Marine convoy was struck by a van packed with explosives as it traveled along a roadway connecting the eastern city of Jalalabad to the Pakistani border, in the district of Mohmand Dara. The portion of the road where the explosion occurred is flanked by shops and was crowded at the time of the blast.

DOJ_NMG_0139332

Immediately afterward, the convoy was attacked by "small-arms fire from several directions," said Lt. Col. David Accetta, a U.S. military spokesman. "The coalition forces returned fire in self-defense. It's unclear whether the casualties were from the car bomb blast or from the small-arms fire."

The Associated Press quoted several wounded Afghans as saying that the Marines fired indiscriminately as they fled the scene.

"They were firing everywhere, and they even opened fire on 14 to 15 vehicles passing on the highway," Tur Gul, 38, told the AP. Gul was standing on the roadside near a gas station and was shot twice in his right hand. "They opened fire on everybody, the ones inside the vehicles and the ones on foot."

The AP also quoted an Afghan police official who supported the civilian accounts.

Accetta said that the allegations would be investigated but that "at this point we don't have any information that there was any wrongdoing by the coalition forces."

Noor Agha Zuwak, spokesman for the provincial governor, said the roadway was shut down for two hours by the crowds of protesters that formed after the incident. They were shouting "Down with the U.S.!" he said, and "Down with Karzai!" a reference to Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

The U.S. military at one point said 16 civilians were killed but later changed that estimate to eight. An official at a local hospital said late Sunday that 14 people had died. The military said 35 people were wounded, among them a coalition service member.

Baz Mohammed Shirzad, deputy director of the hospital where the wounded were treated, said doctors saw both bullet and shrapnel injuries. He said four patients were in critical condition Sunday night, but others were lucid enough to talk about what they saw. "An explosion took place, then firing took place. After that, they don't know what happened," he said.

Accetta said the anger aimed at the foreign troops following the incident was misdirected. "It should have been directed against the extremist forces who initiated this attack in a crowded area when they knew there would be civilian casualties," he said.

The incident is the latest to spark public outrage over the perception that foreign troops are not taking enough precautions to avoid civilian casualties. Last May, for instance, a U.S. military cargo truck lost control and struck 12 vehicles, killing one person and injuring six. A riot ensued in Kabul, the capital, and 20 people died, 160 were injured and dozens of buildings were damaged or destroyed.

The United States has 27,000 troops in Afghanistan, 15,000 of whom are under NATO command. The incident Sunday involved Marine Special Forces who are not part of the NATO mission.

Also Sunday, the NATO-led force said that two of its soldiers were killed Saturday during a firefight in southern Afghanistan. Officials later said the soldiers were British.

8 Afghans Die After Attack On U.S. Convoy (LAT)

By Shafiqullah Azimi And Laura King, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

Protesters riot after a suicide blast targeting troops results in gunfire that claims civilian lives.

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN — A suicide bombing Sunday targeting an American military convoy triggered chaotic gunfire on a busy highway in eastern Afghanistan, leaving at least eight Afghan civilians dead and about three dozen wounded, officials said.

The incident outside the city of Jalalabad set off a riot in which hundreds of protesters, charging that American troops fired indiscriminately, threw stones and shouted slogans denouncing the United States and the Afghan government.

It was the highest civilian death toll this year in an incident involving U.S. or other foreign troops. Such casualties erode public support for Afghan President Hamid Karzai, who has repeatedly called on coalition forces to exercise greater care to avoid harming civilians.

The incident occurred as the five-vehicle U.S. convoy was on patrol near the Jalalabad airfield, a large base that lies just off a heavily traveled highway to the Pakistani border.

DOJ_NMG_0139333

U.S. military officials said American forces opened fire after a suicide attacker detonated a minivan packed with explosives as the convoy passed through the small market town of Bari Kot, whose bazaar was filled with morning shoppers.

Calling the ambush "complex," the military said that U.S. troops also came under fire from several directions during the suicide attack.

Witnesses, however, said the gunfire appeared to come mainly from U.S. troops whose convoy sped along the highway shooting other vehicles and pedestrians for up to five miles from the blast scene.

"They were firing everywhere," Tur Gul told the Associated Press. Gul, who was standing at the roadside and suffered gunshot wounds, said he saw more than a dozen cars hit.

"They opened fire on everybody, the ones inside the vehicles and the ones on foot," he said.

Two Afghan journalists working for the Associated Press said a U.S. soldier deleted their photos and video of a four-wheel-drive vehicle in which three people had been shot to death, about 100 yards from the suicide bombing site, the news service reported. The news service said it planned to lodge a protest with the American military.

Coalition officials blamed the Taliban for the civilian casualties, saying the attackers bore responsibility regardless of whether bystanders were hit by U.S. or insurgent fire.

"We regret the death of innocent Afghan citizens as a result of the Taliban extremists' cowardly act," said Lt. Col. David Accetta, a U.S. spokesman. "Once again the terrorists demonstrated their blatant disregard for human life by attacking coalition forces in a populated area, knowing full well that innocent Afghans would be killed and wounded in the attack."

Casualty counts varied, as is often the case in such attacks. Provincial police spokesman Abdul Ghafor said 10 people were killed and about three dozen injured. The U.S. military initially reported 34 civilians killed and 24 wounded, but it later revised its death toll to eight, with 35 hurt.

An American serviceman also was wounded. The dead were said to include at least one woman and two children.

After the incident, demonstrators blocked the roadway near Jalalabad and hurled rocks at police. "Death to America! Death to Karzai!" some shouted.

Afghan and U.S. military officials announced that they would investigate the shootings, which came as the country braced for a new round of fighting that often comes with the warming temperatures that will soon melt the snow in high mountain passes.

Both NATO generals and Taliban commanders have declared they will try to seize the offensive.

Coalition forces have overwhelming military superiority, but Taliban-led insurgents increasingly have turned to nonconventional tactics such as roadside bombings and suicide attacks.

The coalition troops are under orders to be extremely vigilant against suicide bombings, which are a near-daily occurrence. But increasing numbers of Afghan civilians have been shot when troops mistakenly believed they posed a threat.

Last year was the bloodiest in Afghanistan since the Taliban regime was toppled by U.S.-led forces in 2001. More than 4,000 people were killed in 2006, most of them militants.

Coalition forces in Afghanistan are at their highest levels since the fall of the Taliban, with U.S. and North Atlantic Treaty Organization troops now totaling more than 45,000.

laura.king@latimes.com

*

Special correspondent Azimi reported from Kabul and Times staff writer King from Istanbul, Turkey.

New Justice, No Peace (NYT)

By Richard May

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

Washington

LATE last month some 25,000 people held a rally in the Afghan capital, Kabul. Were they calling for more aid? Were they rallying to demand military action against the Taliban? No, they were urging President Hamid Karzai to sign a law providing legal amnesty for actions committed during the civil war that raged in Afghanistan during and after the Soviet occupation.

DOJ_NMG_0139334

While the law has passed both houses of Afghanistan's Parliament, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and several humanitarian groups have argued against it on the grounds that it eliminates any possibility for justice for the people killed, tortured and raped during that awful period. Some have made subtle threatens, saying that should Mr. Karzai sign the law, he might have a harder time getting international aid. I understand such humanitarian feelings and the calls for justice, but President Karzai should sign the law — for four good reasons.

First, while most international groups feel that the law is simply about absolving the most violent warlords, the fact is that almost all Afghans have blood on their hands. In a country that has been enmeshed in war for more than 25 years it is hard to find people who have not taken up arms at some point in their lives. Children drafted into militias and farmers who armed themselves to protect their homes could easily be called "soldiers" of the warlords at some point and face charges.

Second, political participation like the pro-amnesty rally is a good sign for the future. While many saw it as an effort to forgive warlords, I saw something much better: progress through participation. When the people of a country that has experienced only war and tyranny for 25 years feel free to go to the streets to have their voices heard, democracy is working.

It is worth noting that not a single person was hurt during this rally — not one police officer or soldier or marcher. Whatever the views of the crowd, they demonstrated their position through a nonviolent method — a tremendous advance in recent Afghan history. And, while the global humanitarian groups want to resolve the past, the rally showed that many of the survivors of those dark years want nothing more than to put it behind them and rebuild their country democratically.

Third, the rejection of the amnesty law could easily turn the people against the government and the coalition forces that operate in Afghanistan. Should Mr. Karzai refuse to sign, it would convince many Afghans that their government is more interested in the views of the international community than that of its own people.

Fourth, calls for justice tend to ignore the reality of the civil war. When Westerners hear the term "warlord" they think of tyrannical criminals who are self-serving instruments of death. But in Afghanistan things are more complex. Most warlords came to power protecting their families, clans and land from Soviet troops. The members of the militias the warlords commanded were cousins, sons and neighbors. The warlords were, and in many cases still are, closer to the people than the Kabul government has ever been. By negating the amnesty law, Mr. Karzai would effectively shun a large segment of the population and potentially turn it toward the Taliban.

The fragile government in Kabul cannot focus on dividing its country over past acts. It must look to the future with a vision that accepts all elements of its society. President Karzai should err on the side of unity and act not for the future of his government, but for the future of Afghanistan.

Cheney In The War Zone (TIME)

By Aryn Baker / Kabul

Time, March 2, 2007

A suicide bomber outside the main U.S. military base in Afghanistan on Feb. 27 killed about two dozen people--and underscored the mission of Dick Cheney, who had arrived less than 24 hours earlier to meet with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. The Vice President had just come from Pakistan, where he urged President Pervez Musharraf to crack down on the activities of the Taliban--which claimed responsibility for the attack, saying it was timed to Cheney's visit--and al-Qaeda.

U.S. National Intelligence Director Michael McConnell believes al-Qaeda is regaining a foothold in the border area of Waziristan. He told the Senate Armed Services Committee on Feb. 27 that "to the best of our knowledge, the senior leadership, No. 1 and No. 2, are there, and they are attempting to re-establish and rebuild." Tasneem Aslam, Pakistan's Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, says Pakistan is policing the region with 80,000 troops, some 800 of whom have died in skirmishes with militants. "We are doing our utmost to stop the cross-border activity," Aslam says. "What are the Afghans doing to combat this problem? Or the U.S.?"

Musharraf is in a bind. Even if he doubled the number of troops on the border, says a Western diplomat in Pakistan, it would probably just exacerbate regional violence by fueling antigovernment sentiment. "The only way you are going to solve the problem of militancy in the tribal areas is through a massive influx of development," he says. "And even then, we are talking 10 to 15 years." That's a grim analysis, given the claim of senior Taliban commander Mullah Dadullah that he will soon be able to field some 10,000 soldiers, including 2,000 suicide bombers. While few believe the Taliban has that kind of strength, it's still a worrying indication that the fighting will get worse this spring.

DOJ_NMG_0139335

Cheney Gets To See A Resurgent Taliban (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh And Sami Yousafzai

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

Dick Cheney was cool and collected, just as he had been on that September morning five years before when two Secret Service agents burst into his White House office and half-carried him into the bunker. Last week the vice president found himself under attack again—and rushed into a bomb shelter by his Secret Service detail. Only this time Cheney was in Afghanistan, and the perpetrators were the resurgent Taliban. "I was sitting in my quarters when I heard a loud boom," Cheney recalled later to a small group of reporters accompanying him on his weeklong trip to Asia. "Shortly after, the Secret Service came in and said there had apparently been an attack on the main gate."

When the barbarians are at the gate, it may be time to get serious. The Feb. 27 attack on Baghram air base during Cheney's surprise visit was the most vivid reminder to date that, half a decade after they were supposedly vanquished, the Taliban is back in force, along with its onetime Qaeda guests. And the jihadists are now confident enough to launch a frontal suicide assault on the main U.S. stronghold in South Asia. Cheney shrugged off the attack, which killed 23 people including a U.S. soldier, noting that it did not affect his plans to visit the badly weakened Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, later that day in Kabul. "Never an option," he told reporters before he boarded his plane home carrying a thick book ("A History of the English-Speaking Peoples Since 1900," by the Tory historian Andrew Roberts). Even so, Cheney's visit was ordered by a worried President George W. Bush, who announced two weeks ago that he was extending the deployment of 3,200 U.S. troops in Afghanistan amid a doubling of the size of the Afghan Army. The Bush team's main concern now is that the Taliban's "spring offensive" could topple Karzai or turn him into a more isolated figure, hunkered down in Kabul.

An even scarier prospect is that a newly Talibanized Afghanistan, along with sympathetic areas of neighboring Pakistan, could become a launchpad for the next plot against America. A senior administration official, briefing reporters on Cheney's plane after his meeting with Karzai, said Bush was preoccupied with a renewed "threat to the homeland" from the region. He has cause for concern. Taliban officials tell NEWSWEEK that they have carved out a huge border zone of their own. And they say Qaeda "foreigners"—mainly Arabs bent on killing Westerners—are being welcomed back into parts of Afghanistan and Pakistan's North Waziristan region, where Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf signed a controversial peace deal with tribal elders last September.

Under that pact, the Pakistan military agreed to end its military operations and dismantle its checkpoints. In return, the tribesmen promised not to allow militants to conduct cross-border operations and to expel all foreign fighters from the area. That latter pledge has been largely ignored. As NEWSWEEK has previously reported, informal terror training facilities have cropped up in the tribal area. In contrast to the open-air camps seen in pre-9/11 Qaeda videos, these sites are set up inside tribal-style compounds of mud-brick houses surrounded by high walls, so as to stay out of sight of U.S. and Pakistani reconnaissance aircraft. Several of those inside are being trained as suicide bombers. "I hope one day I will get my dream and hit the U.S. Army and that will be the best moment for my soul and spirit," one Pakistani trainee told NEWSWEEK last week.

NATO has expanded its forces in Afghanistan to more than 20,000, and it has had some success in recent campaigns. And in an interview last week, Pakistani Foreign Minister Mian Khurshid Mehmood Kasuri sought to counter the impression in Washington—especially in Congress—that Musharraf wasn't doing all he could to stop the Taliban from using his country as a base. "There is a lot of cooperation between the ISI [the Pakistan intelligence service] and the CIA," he said. But Kasuri also criticized the Bush administration, saying that it was failing at counterinsurgency by mounting a purely military response. "Let's be honest. There are a lot of people all over the Muslim world, from Indonesia to Somalia, who are hostile to what they regard as American foreign policy. You need to tackle the root causes." Further complicating such efforts is a bitter feud between Musharraf and Karzai, with each blaming the other for harboring Taliban leaders.

U.S. officials believe Karzai is only getting weaker and Musharraf generally takes a minimalist approach to reining in extremists, in part because he must balance U.S. demands for action with the rising Islamist sentiment in his country. Until last week, it had been more than a year since Pakistan had publicly offered up a high-level target to Washington (a U.S. airstrike took out one of Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar's top commanders in December, though Islamabad did not publicize its cooperation). But after weeks of denying that Mullah Omar or other senior Taliban officials were in the Pakistani city of Quetta—a known haven of jihadists—Pakistani officials said they arrested a senior Taliban official named Mullah Obaidullah Akhund there on Monday. That also happened to be the day of Cheney's visit. U.S. officials could not immediately confirm the arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0139336

Cheney may not have achieved much else on his trip other than to inspire his handlers at Baghram to rethink their security measures. Indeed, America is so constrained in Iraq, in terms of troops and resources, that it can't afford to lose Musharraf or Karzai as an ally right now. Mainly, said Kasuri, the Pakistani president and the American vice president "talked about the spring offensive. Naturally, we are worried, and the Americans are worried." And if they're worried, so should we be.

Senators: Pakistan Must Address Al-Qaida (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, March 5, 2007

Pakistan must do more to stem al-Qaida in its ungoverned territories amid growing signs operatives plan a spring offensive against allied forces in Afghanistan, lawmakers on the intelligence committees said Sunday.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., and Rep. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich., also said the U.S. must work to ensure that North Korea sticks to its promise to limit its nuclear program. They complained that Congress still lacks meaningful intelligence about the world's hot spots.

"We still don't have the intelligence community overall to give us, as policymakers, the information that we need to make good decisions in North Korea, Iran and other places," said Hoekstra, the top Republican on the House intelligence committee. "We've been disappointed with the stand-up from the leadership in the intelligence community."

In response, National Intelligence Director Mike McConnell's spokesman said that intelligence has been strengthened by changes intended to identify gaps in intelligence and ensure analysts have the information they need. Chad Kolton said one of McConnell's priorities "is to build on those reforms by improving penetration of our hardest intelligence targets."

Feinstein, the No. 2 Democrat on the Senate intelligence committee, criticized what she called half-measures by Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, at a critical moment for the United States and its allies. She said "pinpoint attacks" are needed against al-Qaida before a possible spring offensive.

"The Pakistanis either have to let us go in or go in themselves when they have intelligence," she said. "There's no question that there's going to be a spring offensive in Afghanistan, that they're trying to reach out, that training is going on, recruitment is going on."

Last week, McConnell told Congress that the U.S. is concerned that al-Qaida's top two leaders — Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri — may be hiding in the rugged frontiers of northwestern Pakistan and are attempting to establish an operational base.

McConnell's push for action along the Afghan-Pakistani border came after Vice President Dick Cheney met earlier in the week with Musharraf.

Hoekstra agreed that the Pakistan region was a growing threat but cautioned that a balancing act was required to ensure that Musharraf's government stays in power. Musharraf faces elections in September.

"We need stability in the regime. We need this regime to survive," he said. "The Pakistanis have been doing a number of things to help us go after al-Qaida."

On Iran, Feinstein said similar regional discussions are needed to stem that country's nuclear program. She said she believes the U.S. could exploit a leadership split in Iran's government to work out some agreement.

Hoekstra called Iran a very troubling area overall given its activities in Iraq and their relationships with Hamas and Hezbollah.

"This is not an ally in the war against militant radicalism. They're not an ally in getting us to be successful in Iraq," he said. "We need to focus on them and I think some of the changes and some of the steps that are being taken by the administration are very positive."

DOJ_NMG_0139337

As for North Korea, Feinstein praised the country's initial steps to comply with the Feb. 13 agreement on its nuclear program. She stressed the need for cooperation from neighboring Asian countries.

"I don't think you can underestimate the value of China in keeping the North Koreans on track now in seeing that this plutonium-based program is disassembled and that North Korea is brought into the mainstream," Feinstein said.

Like Hoekstra, Feinstein was highly critical of U.S. intelligence efforts aimed at understanding North Korea, specifically the lack of information on how many nuclear devices North Korea has assembled and where that work is happening.

"North Korea is a long way from us, and the intelligence infrastructure is not that good, to be very candid with you," she said.

In the past week, considerable attention has focused on whether U.S. intelligence analysts have softened their assessments on whether North Korea is pursuing a uranium enrichment program. That effort would be happening alongside the North's plutonium program, which resulted in a successful test of a nuclear device last year.

But McConnell's office pushed back on the notion that spy agencies' views had changed.

In a statement Sunday, the director's mission manager for North Korea, Joseph DeTrani, said there has been "considerable misinterpretation" of the spy agencies assessments on the uranium program.

He said U.S. intelligence had strong information in 2002 that allowed analysts to make a judgment with high confidence that North Korea was acquiring a uranium enrichment capability. That view has not changed.

At the time, the CIA found that North Korea secretly had purchased centrifuges and other equipment needed to construct a large-scale enrichment facility. The U.S. confronted North Korea with that information.

Since then, DeTrani said, "all intelligence community agencies have at least moderate confidence that North Korea's past efforts to acquire a uranium enrichment capability continue today."

Feinstein and Hoekstra appeared on "Fox News Sunday."

Where Does Al Qaeda Stand Now? (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON

Hidden in the harsh terrain of Pakistan's tribal lands near the Afghan border, Al Qaeda's senior leaders have quietly been rebuilding their terrorist network – including lines of command to cells in other nations.

This resurgence does not mean the group has regained its old strength, say US intelligence officials and outside experts. Al Qaeda's top levels are now filled with inexperienced commanders, and its new camps can train only a fraction of the recruits the pre-2001 infrastructure in Afghanistan could handle.

Al Qaeda's goals also remain murky. It is not clear whether the organization has a specific plan to strike within the United States or whether it considers Europe, or Iraq, more important in its war to impose its vision of Islam on the Middle East.

"We have no evidence that they have a coherent strategy" to attack US targets, says Martin Libicki, lead author of a recently published RAND Corp. study on the subject.

The capabilities of a possibly resurgent Al Qaeda became a hot topic in Washington last week following Vice President Dick Cheney's surprise trip to Pakistan. During his visit, Cheney told Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf of US concerns that Al Qaeda is regrouping in Pakistan's tribal regions, and that the group's Taliban allies may mount a spring offensive into Afghanistan.

Regrouping along the Afghan border

In a Senate hearing last week, US intelligence officials reiterated that terrorist groups remain their greatest challenge. Al Qaeda still tops the list of single threats.

"Its core elements are resilient," said the director of national intelligence, retired Vice Adm. Michael McConnell.

Al Qaeda would still like to inflict mass casualties upon the US, and it continues to seek weapons of mass destruction, Admiral McConnell said.

In addition, it is "forging stronger operational connections that radiate outward" from Pakistan to affiliated groups in the Middle East, North Africa, and Europe, according to US intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0139338

Still, Al Qaeda remains a loose network of like-minded individuals, instead of a tightly controlled terrorist hierarchy. Three-quarters of Al Qaeda's pre-9/11 leaders were killed or captured, according to US estimates. Aside from Osama bin Laden and his deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri, many of its leaders are relative rookies.

Nor has Al Qaeda's new Pakistani infrastructure replaced the multiple camps it operated in Afghanistan, capable of training thousands of recruits at once. "The numbers are not the same, but there are volunteers who are attempting to reestablish [training grounds]," McConnell said.

That Al Qaeda is resurgent in its remaining small corner of the world should not come as surprising news, some outside experts say.

"It's been true for a long time," says Jessica Stern, a terrorism expert at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government.

After all, US intelligence has long thought that Osama bin Laden disappeared into Pakistan's wild tribal frontier after the fall of the Taliban in Afghanistan. The area is so remote that for centuries it has largely remained beyond the control of central authorities. Border security is nonexistent.

Al Qaeda's reach

As to evidence of Al Qaeda regaining its ability to reach out and mount attacks, in a videotape released last year Mr. Zawahiri claimed responsibility for the July 2005 London bombings. Similarly, investigators have long believed that last year's' failed plot to blow up airliners from London was Al Qaeda-related, in part because it resembled a mid-1990s plan to explode airliners over the Pacific.

Some critics of the White House are surprised that many of the recent warnings about Al Qaeda come from administration officials. In essence, critics say, the White House confirms something they've long held to be true: the central front in the war on terror is along Pakistan's border with Afghanistan, not in Iraq.

"We went to Iraq and left the serious terrorist problem to fester," Ms. Stern says.

On the subject of Iraq and Al Qaeda, the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) estimates that less than 10 percent of the Iraqi insurgency consists of foreign fighters. Of those, most are suicide bombers.

Violence perpetrated by terrorists accounts for "only a fraction" of insurgent violence in Iraq, according to a written statement submitted to the Senate Armed Services Committee by DIA director Lt. Gen. Michael Maples. The attacks have a disproportionate impact on Iraq's stability because of the high-profile nature of the terrorist operations and tactics, the DIA says.

US remains a potential target

According to General Maples's statement, documents captured in a raid on a safehouse belonging to Al Qaeda in Iraq revealed that the group was planning operations in the US.

"Despite being forced to decentralize its network, Al Qaeda retains the ability to organize complex, mass-casualty attacks and inspire others," Maples wrote.

The DIA and other US intelligence sources maintain that Al Qaeda is still focused on striking the US. But that is not the same as having a specific plan or a discernable strategy for the goals it hopes to achieve by doing so, the RAND study says.

The study examined a number of hypothesis that might explain Al Qaeda's thinking with regard to hitting within the US: that the group's leaders might be interested in rallying supporters around the world or in coercing the US into leaving the Middle East.

The most likely scenario, RAND concluded, was that Al Qaeda would pick targets that would simultaneously create fear and damage the US economy. It might attack US agriculture or food industries, for instance; or employ radiological "dirty" bombs.

But, the study says, the terrorist organization itself has given few real clues about where or when it might strike, or if its leadership is even thinking in such terms, said the RAND study.

DOJ:

Domenici Says He Called Fired Prosecutor (AP)

By Jennifer Talhelm

AP, March 5, 2007

New Mexico Sen. Pete Domenici acknowledged Sunday that he called a federal prosecutor to ask about a criminal investigation several months after calling for his replacement, but insisted he never pressured nor threatened his state's U.S. attorney.

The prosecutor, David Iglesias, was fired by the Justice Department in December. Iglesias says he believes he was dismissed for resisting pressure from two members of Congress before last year's election to rush indictments in a Democratic kickback investigation.

Ethics experts said Domenici's conduct may have violated Senate rules, which generally bar communications between members of Congress and federal prosecutors about ongoing criminal investigations.

Iglesias, a Republican, has said he would not name the lawmakers unless asked under oath.

A House Judiciary subcommittee subpoenaed the prosecutor last week to appear Tuesday and testify under oath. He also was scheduled to appear before a Senate committee the same day. Domenici refused last week to say if he had contacted Iglesias, insisting in a brief interview with the Associated Press, "I have no idea what he's talking about."

But in his statement Sunday, the Republican senator said he called Iglesias last year and asked "if he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what time frame we were looking at.

"It was a very brief conversation, which concluded when I was told that the courthouse investigation would be continuing for a lengthy period," Domenici said in the statement.

"In retrospect, I regret making that call and I apologize," Domenici said. "However, at no time in that conversation or any other conversation with Mr. Iglesias did I ever tell him what course of action I thought he should take on any legal matter. I have never pressured him nor threatened him in any way."

Domenici noted in his statement that he had recommended Iglesias' appointment in 2001, but subsequently became disillusioned with him and recommended to the Justice Department "several months" before the telephone call that he be replaced.

Kenneth Gross, a Washington lawyer who specializes in congressional ethics rules, said Domenici's phone call to Iglesias could have violated Senate ethics rules if there was an element of pressure or coercion to his inquiry.

"It doesn't sound very good to me," Gross said. "But requests for the status of cases are generally considered permissible."

Punishment for such violations range from a warning and reprimand to expulsion from office.

Abbe D. Lowell, a criminal defense lawyer who served as special assistant to the attorney general during the Carter Administration, said it was hard to determine if there was a violation without knowing what Domenici knew about the investigation when he made the call and what exactly he said.

But Lowell added, "The safest course of a member of Congress is not to make inquiries of prosecutors about pending matters so their motives and actions cannot be misunderstood."

Iglesias said last week that he was shocked to receive two separate phone calls in mid-October from lawmakers who asked about details of the investigation and seemed eager to see an indictment before the 2006 election.

"I frankly felt violated," Iglesias said. "They were very troubling phone calls."

When Iglesias testifies Tuesday before the House panel, he is expected to say that Domenici and Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., contacted him to discuss moving forward on indictments in a high-profile corruption case involving a Democrat before the November congressional elections, according to a Democratic aide who is familiar with Iglesias' planned testimony.

The aide spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the issue publicly before the hearings.

Corruption in the New Mexico Democratic Party was a major issue in Wilson's re-election campaign and further indictments might have helped her. Wilson last week refused to say if she had contacted Iglesias, referring questions about "that personnel matter" to the Justice Department.

Iglesias is one of eight U.S. attorneys who were fired in December, some without cause, according to the department. Federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president and can be fired for any reason, or none at all.

Congressional Democrats say the firings indicate the Bush administration is using a new part of the terrorism-fighting Patriot Act to reward political allies with coveted jobs as U.S. attorneys without having to submit them to Senate confirmation.

This provision, enacted a year ago with the law's reauthorization, removes a time limit by which the Senate must confirm appointees to such jobs. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, however, has said he intends to submit the name of every nominee to vacant U.S. attorney job to the Senate for confirmation.

The House Judiciary subcommittee that subpoenaed Iglesias also issued subpoenas for three other dismissed U.S. attorneys — Carol Lam of California, H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Arkansas and John McKay of Seattle.

The Senate also has asked those four and two others, Daniel Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona to appear voluntarily at a hearing Tuesday.

Domenici Says He Contacted Prosecutor (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) acknowledged yesterday that he contacted the U.S. attorney in Albuquerque last year to ask about an ongoing corruption probe of Democrats, but said he "never pressured him nor threatened him in any way."

Domenici also said in a statement that he told the Justice Department it should replace U.S. Attorney David C. Iglesias, one of eight federal prosecutors fired in December. But Domenici said the recommendation came before his call to Iglesias about the criminal investigation.

"In retrospect, I regret making that call and I apologize," Domenici said of talking to Iglesias. "However, at no time in that conversation or any other conversation with Mr. Iglesias did I ever tell him what course of action I thought he should take on any legal matter. I have never pressured him nor threatened him in any way."

Legal experts say it violates congressional ethics rules for a senator or House member to communicate with a federal prosecutor regarding an ongoing criminal investigation.

Domenici's remarks came four days after Iglesias alleged that two New Mexico lawmakers called him in mid-October and pressured him about the pace of the investigation. Iglesias said he believes the calls were at the root of his dismissal.

When asked last week about Iglesias's allegations, Domenici said: "I have no idea what he's talking about."

Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) has yet to comment; the rest of the New Mexico congressional delegation has denied placing any calls to Iglesias.

Two sources with knowledge of the calls have said Wilson made the first contact, followed by Domenici about a week later. The sources spoke on the condition of anonymity because they did not want to be named discussing the matter before a congressional hearing tomorrow.

The Justice Department said last night that Domenici called Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty during the first week of October to discuss Iglesias.

This followed three calls to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales in September 2005, January 2006 and April 2006 during which, Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said, Domenici "expressed general concerns about the performance of U.S. Attorney Iglesias and questioned whether he was up to the job . . .

"At no time in those calls did the senator mention this corruption case," nor did he specifically ask for Iglesias's ouster, Roehrkasse said.

The spokesman said he is not aware of any similar calls or complaints to the Justice Department from Wilson.

Iglesias and five other fired prosecutors are scheduled to testify tomorrow before Congress. Iglesias declined to comment in detail yesterday on Domenici's statement, saying he was refraining from further public remarks before the hearings.

"As to Senator Domenici's apology, I accept it and look forward to testifying on Tuesday," he said in an e-mail message.

The Senate Ethics Manual advises senators that contact with prosecutors and regulatory agency officials is "generally permitted, where the communication is with the agency and not directed at the court, where the agency is not engaged in an ongoing enforcement, investigative or other quasi-judicial proceeding."

Stanley Brand, an ethics lawyer who served as House counsel in the 1980s, said a senator should contact a federal prosecutor about an ongoing investigation only if he or she has evidence or information related to the probe.

"It's going to precipitate a huge problem," Brand said, warning of a potential review by the Justice Department.

Staff members on the Senate Ethics Committee could not be reached to comment yesterday.

The firings, which had already sparked congressional interest, became more controversial last week with Iglesias's allegations of political interference.

Democrats allege that the Justice Department was sacking qualified prosecutors to reward political cronies, and they have proposed legislation to limit Gonzales's power to appoint interim replacements.

Administration officials acknowledged Friday that the White House approved the unusual firings, in which seven of the prosecutors were called Dec. 7 and asked to resign, even though most had positive job reviews. An eighth prosecutor, in Arkansas, was informed of his firing earlier, opening the job for a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove.

Domenici said in his statement that he called Iglesias to ask about a criminal probe of courthouse construction kickbacks, which the FBI had turned over to Iglesias's office. Officials say the probe centers on a former Democratic state senator; no charges have been filed in the case.

"I asked Mr. Iglesias if he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what time frame we were looking at," Domenici said. "It was a very brief conversation, which concluded when I was told that the courthouse investigation would be continuing for a lengthy period."

Domenici is not specific about when the call took place, saying only that he made it "late last year." Iglesias said the calls occurred in mid-October.

At that time, Wilson, a close Domenici ally, was locked in a tight reelection battle with state Attorney General Patricia Madrid (D). Their race included widespread discussion of alleged corruption among New Mexico Democrats.

Domenici said his unhappiness with Iglesias began before he inquired about the probe of Democrats. He said he was concerned about resource problems in the U.S. attorney's office and "an inability within the office to move more quickly on cases."

"This ongoing dialogue and experience led me, several months before my call with Mr. Iglesias, to conclude and recommend to the Department of Justice that New Mexico needed a new United States attorney," Domenici said.

Justice officials have said they were never notified that lawmakers had called Iglesias and have said the issue did not play a role in his firing. Iglesias has acknowledged he erred by not informing Washington officials about the calls, as Justice rules require.

The House Judiciary subcommittee has issued subpoenas for Iglesias, Bud Cummins of Little Rock, Carol Lam of San Diego and John McKay of Seattle. The Senate Judiciary Committee has also asked Daniel Bogden of Las Vegas and Paul K. Charlton of Phoenix to testify, in addition to the four others.

"No one believes anymore these U.S. attorneys were fired for any good reason," said Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, "and we will start to uncover the real truth at our hearing on Tuesday."

In a related matter, administration officials said they were mistaken in saying that McNulty consulted his predecessor, James B. Comey, about some of the U.S. attorneys before they were fired. Comey was not consulted, the officials said.

Senator Sought Dismissal Of New Mexico Prosecutor (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 4 — Senator Pete V. Domenici, Republican of New Mexico, said Sunday that he had urged the Justice Department to dismiss the state's top federal prosecutor, who in December was one of eight United States attorneys ousted from their jobs.

In addition, Mr. Domenici said in a statement that last year he called the prosecutor, David C. Iglesias, to ask about the status of a federal inquiry in New Mexico. The case centered on accusations of kickbacks in a courthouse construction project in which a former Democratic state official was said to be involved.

"I asked Mr. Iglesias if he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what time frame we were looking at," Mr. Domenici said. "It was a very brief conversation which concluded when I was told that the courthouse investigation would be continuing for a lengthy period."

Mr. Domenici apologized in the statement and said he regretted making the call, but added that he had not urged any course of action in any investigation. "I have never pressured him nor threatened him in any way," he said.

A Justice Department spokesman said on Sunday that records at the agency showed that the senator complained about Mr. Iglesias in calls to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales in September 2005 and again in January and April 2006. The senator made a brief call to Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, in October 2006 when the deliberations over Mr. Iglesias's dismissla began.

In each of these calls, said Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, Mr. Domenici expressed general concerns about Mr. Iglesias and questioned whether he was "up to the job." Mr. Roehrkasse added, "At no time did they discuss the public corruption case."

A Justice Department official said Mr. Domenici's criticism of Mr. Iglesias was a factor in the decision to remove the prosecutor, adding that the decision was also based on an internal evaluation at Justice Department headquarters regarding his handling of the job.

Mr. Iglesias, who is among five of the ousted prosecutors scheduled to testify in Congress on Tuesday, has said he interpreted the call from Mr. Domenici, and another from an unidentified federal lawmaker, as an effort to pressure him into bringing indictments before the November elections in an effort to embarrass Democrats.

He said that his unwillingness to be pressured into moving more quickly led to his removal.

The identity of the other lawmaker who contacted Mr. Iglesias remains unknown. Mr. Domenici is one of three Republican members of the state's Congressional delegation. One of the others, Representative Steve Pearce, has said he did not contact Mr. Iglesias. The third, Representative Heather A. Wilson, has said she will not comment on the matter.

Justice Department officials have said Mr. Iglesias did not report the call to the agency's headquarters and have insisted that none of the eight dismissed United States attorneys were removed because of their action or inaction in any political corruption cases. They have also said that the prosecutors were placed on the dismissal list for a variety of reasons, but have denied that any were removed because of political pressure from outside the Justice Department.

But repeated complaints from a veteran lawmaker like Mr. Domenici, who has been in the Senate since 1972 and is influential on law enforcement and border issues, would be unlikely to be easily dismissed by the Justice Department.

Mr. Domenici said that several months before his call, he recommended to the Justice Department "that New Mexico needed a new United States attorney," even though he had recommended Mr. Iglesias's appointment in 2001.

Mr. Domenici said that by 2004 and 2005, he and his staff had "expressed my frustration with the U.S. Attorney's Office to the Justice Department" because it was moving too slowly on prosecutions.

Justice officials have said that F.B.I. officials complained that Mr. Iglesias was not bringing corruption cases fast enough, but have not mentioned Mr. Domenici's efforts to remove him.

GOP Lawmakers Played A Role In U.S. Attorney Purge (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

The firings of eight U.S. attorneys has put the heat on top Justice Department officials—and some GOP members of Congress. The unusual mass dismissals took place late last year, but the controversy escalated last week when David Iglesias, the former U.S. attorney in New Mexico, went public with a dramatic charge: that he had gotten phone calls from two unidentified GOP lawmakers in D.C. last October, pressing him to bring indictments in a high-profile corruption case involving a prominent local Democrat before the November election. Iglesias—a former Navy prosecutor who was the model for Tom Cruise's character in "A Few Good Men"—said he refused to answer. Six weeks later, a Justice official ordered him to resign. This week, Iglesias has been subpoenaed along with three other fired prosecutors to testify before Congress. He plans to name the lawmakers who called him as Rep. Heather Wilson (who was in a tight re-election battle at the time) and Sen. Pete Domenici (who originally sponsored him for the job), according to two sources familiar with his account who asked not to be identified talking about the upcoming testimony. An aide to Wilson said "no comment." Domenici's office didn't return repeated phone calls. A senior Justice official, anonymous because of the confidential subject, confirmed to NEWSWEEK that Domenici "did express general concerns" about Iglesias to senior DOJ officials—but insisted he did not specifically complain about the corruption case. "It's absolutely 100 percent inaccurate" to suggest that Iglesias's failure to bring the corruption case against the Democrat led to his dismissal, department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

The decision to fire the U.S. attorneys en masse was made late last year by two top aides to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales—chief of staff Kyle Sampson and deputy A.G. Paul McNulty—according to a senior department official who asked not to be identified talking about personnel. McNulty may have fueled the controversy when he told the Senate last month that most of the fired prosecutors were let go because of "performance-related issues." That infuriated some of the dismissed prosecutors (all of them Bush appointees), prompting them to defend themselves. "When I heard him say that, I lit up like a tree," said one of the prosecutors, who asked not to be identified because of pending congressional testimony. In fact, internal Justice performance evaluations seen by NEWSWEEK show that those who were fired had gotten mostly glowing reviews. Congressional Dems now smell blood. After this week's hearings featuring the fired prosecutors, "I expect we will have 100 more questions for the Justice Department," said one Democratic staffer who requested anonymity.

Editorial: Stop The Bush Purge (MJS)

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, March 5, 2007

The administration is using its new anti-terrorism power to push out some federal prosecutors. Congress must rein this in and investigate the dismissal of the eight U.S. attorneys.From the Journal SentinelPosted: March 4, 2007

The Bush administration slipped a provision into the USA Patriot Act that Congress renewed last year allowing the attorney general to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods without congressional approval. Previously, such appointments could last for only 120 days. Lawmakers may have figured that the extra leeway might help in rare emergencies.

Well, surprise, surprise. The Justice Department has so far used this provision eight times - and not for emergencies. In a move unprecedented for its scope, the agency has fired eight U.S. attorneys. And indications are that the dismissed prosecutors were too independent, even though President Bush had appointed them. The administration appears to be replacing them with those more pliable.

Congress must stop the purge and reimpose the time limit. Commendably, a House judiciary subcommittee is issuing subpoenas to four of the dismissed prosecutors to appear before it on Tuesday, and the Senate Judiciary Committee is poised to follow suit. Sworn testimony should shed some light on what may be an administration effort to get prosecutors to toe the party line.

Among those called on to testify are prosecutors with stellar records.

Carol Lam, dismissed as U.S. attorney in San Diego, nailed Rep. Randy Cunningham, a California Republican, for accepting bribes from defense contractors. H.E. "Bud" Cummins III was removed as U.S. attorney in Little Rock, Ark., only to make room for an aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove, a Justice Department official has admitted. And New Mexico's David Iglesias charged that he was let go because he refused a request from two Republican congressmen to speed up a probe of possible Democratic wrongdoing to improve GOP election chances - an allegation the Justice Department vigorously denies.

The dispute is all the more reason to set the record straight in hearings.

Also, Congress must retract the permission it gave the Justice Department to appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely - permission the administration has abused.

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Helps Probe Kremlin Critic's Shooting (WSJ)

By Evan Perez And Alan Cullison

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

Federal agents joined local police in investigating the shooting in a Maryland suburb of an intelligence expert who suggested the Kremlin was involved in the poisoning death of a former Russian agent in London.

DOJ_NMG_0139344

Investigators haven't publicly suggested a motive for the shooting of Paul M. Joyal in Adelphi, Md., Thursday, and the case is being handled as a local criminal matter. A federal law-enforcement official said local police asked for help from the Federal Bureau of Investigation in part because of Mr. Joyal's activities in the Russian emigré community in the U.S. and his views on the poisoning in London last year of Alexander Litvinenko, who worked for the KGB and its successor agency, the Federal Security Service of Russia.

On "Dateline NBC," broadcast Feb. 25, Mr. Joyal said the Litvinenko murder was a message "to anyone who wants to speak out against the Kremlin: 'If you do, no matter who you are, where you are, we will find you and we will silence you -- in the most horrible way possible.' "

Mr. Joyal was shot in the groin as he stood on his driveway after emerging from his car. Witnesses told investigators he argued with two black males before the shooting and the two men fled. He was hospitalized in serious condition and breathing with a respirator, according to associates. No arrests have been made in the incident, which occurred in an area just inside the Washington Beltway where violent crime is a problem.

The Prince George's County (Md.) police department hasn't publicly released details of the case.

A Russian diplomat in Washington referred calls on the matter to a spokesman who didn't return calls seeking comment.

While the shooting doesn't bear all the hallmarks of a political attack, it comes at a time of tensions with Russia and doubts about the Kremlin's direction under President Vladimir Putin. Experts say Mr. Litvinenko's poisoning with a rare radioactive isotope, polonium 210, in November would have been difficult without some kind of government sponsorship.

Formal charges haven't been filed in Mr. Litvinenko's murder, but the British investigation has focused on a Russian security service veteran, Andrei Lugovoi, who met Mr. Litvinenko in a London cafe shortly before he fell ill.

Alexander Goldfarb, a friend of Mr. Litvinenko, said that Mr. Joyal telephoned him about an hour before the shooting, and that Mr. Joyal was "deeply involved" in the public debate over Mr. Litvinenko's death. Mr. Joyal had been pushing for Congressional hearings into the matter, he said.

Mr. Joyal was director of security for the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence from 1980 to 1989, according to a biography on the Web site of National Strategies Inc., a Washington consulting firm where he is a vice president. In recent years, he also ran business ventures in Russia and the central Asian nation of Georgia, while editing an intelligence newsletter on Russia.

With the U.S. presidential campaign heating up, American policy toward Russia could be fodder for critics of President Bush, who started his presidency by claiming a warm personal relationship with Mr. Putin.

Some in Congress have called for a tougher line against Mr. Putin, who has taken reprisals against his political opponents at home and a more strident stand against the U.S. internationally. Russia is also scheduled to hold elections of its own. Mr. Putin has pledged to step down after his term expires next year, but he is expected to name a successor whose victory will be assured in a carefully orchestrated electoral contest.

Within Russia, Mr. Putin's presidency has been troubled by a number of unexplained deaths, often people critical of the Kremlin. Until recently, assassinations abroad were thought to be a feature of Soviet times.

Last summer, Russia's parliament passed a law that essentially legalized targeted assassinations of people abroad who are deemed a threat to national security. The last confirmed "wet work" by Russia against an enemy abroad was in Qatar in 2004: Two Russian agents were convicted in Qatar of attaching a 4.4 pound bomb to the underside of a Toyota Land Cruiser owned by the former president of the breakaway region of Chechnya. The former president, Zelimkhan Yandarbiyev, was killed and his son seriously injured in the incident.

Write to Evan Perez at evan.perez@wsj.com1 and Alan Cullison at alan.cullison@wsj.com2

Doubts Over KGB Link To US Shooting (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Catherine Belton

Financial Times, March 5, 2007

A former senior KGB officer who met a Russia intelligence expert just hours before his shooting in the US, on Sunday expressed doubt that the incident was related to the case of Alexander Litvinenko, a former KGB officer poisoned last year in London.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation is assisting a police inquiry into the shooting on Thursday of Paul Joyal, a former Senate intelligence committee security director and editor of a newsletter on Russia. Mr Joyal recently accused the Kremlin on US national television of involvement in the Litvinenko death.

Oleg Kalugin, the former head of KGB counter-intelligence who on Thursday evening met Mr Joyal at Zola, a bar in the International Spy Museum building in Washington, said he would not rule out a connection with the Litvinenko case. But he said the shooting was more likely to be a local crime.

"I have doubts because of the way it went down," said Mr Kalugin. "It does not fit well with the pattern of security services [in Russia] as I know them."

Mr Joyal, an employee of National Strategies, told NBC's Dateline in a programme broadcast last month, that the Litvinenko killing was intended to send a message. "A message has been communicated to anyone who wants to speak out against the Kremlin. 'If you do, no matter who you are, where you are, we will find you and we will silence you in the most horrible way possible'," Mr Joyal said.

Police have not commented on the shooting. But a law-enforcement official said Mr Joyal, who remains in critical condition, appeared to have been the victim of a robbery. The official said he was shot after resisting two men who had robbed him.

The case has raised interest partly because Daniel McGrory, a reporter with The Times who appeared on the same NBC programme as Mr Joyal, died five days before the broadcast. There has been no official an-nouncement about the cause of death but he is believed to have died from a stroke.

Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Mr Litvinenko and acquaintance of Mr Joyal, was also sceptical about Russian government involvement but he too would not rule it out.

"It looks like a regular street mugging," he said. "But in Soviet times, when they wanted to organise a hit on someone they would hire someone local."

Mr Goldfarb, who met Mr Joyal several weeks ago, said Mr Joyal was pushing for Senate hearings on the Litvinenko affair and was hoping Mr Goldfarb would testify. He said he had received a text message from Mr Joyal before the shooting saying he was discussing the possibility of congressional hearings with Mr Kalugin.

The Kremlin has strongly denied any suggestions that it was involved in the poisoning of Litvinenko, a fierce critic of the Russian regime. British police are investigating his death.

NBC has provided bodyguards for reporters who worked on the programme about the Litvinenko case.

Analyst Robbed During Shooting (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

The noted expert in Russian intelligence who was shot outside his house in Prince George's County last week -- a crime that raised the possibility of international intrigue in the Washington suburbs -- also was robbed of his wallet and briefcase, law enforcement sources said yesterday.

That property was taken from Paul Joyal supports the theory that he was shot during a robbery rather than in retaliation for public criticism of the Kremlin, according to two sources who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

Joyal, 53, was critically wounded in the driveway of his home in the Adelphi area Thursday evening, four days after he alleged in a television broadcast that the government of Russian President Vladimir Putin was involved in the fatal poisoning last fall of Alexander Litvinenko, a former KGB agent who was living in London.

DOJ_NMG_0139346

Speaking on TV's "Dateline NBC" on Feb. 25 about the poisoning, Joyal said, "A message has been communicated to anyone who wants to speak out against the Kremlin: 'If you do, no matter who you are, where you are, we will find you and we will silence you -- in the most horrible way possible.' "

The timing of Joyal's shooting raised the possibility that he was targeted in an attack similar to the one he had publicly deplored. The disclosure the next day that the FBI was helping with the case seemed for many to reinforce that notion.

In addition, robberies are rare in the suburban area where Joyal lives, and police spokesmen have declined to talk about possible motives or say whether property was taken from Joyal.

But another law enforcement source, who also spoke on condition of anonymity, said yesterday that Joyal was driving a Chrysler 300, a vehicle sought by carjackers, suggesting that the assailants might have followed Joyal home rather than waited there to attack him. Police have described the suspects as two black males.

Joyal, a longtime critic of the Putin regime, said on "Dateline" that Litvinenko's poisoning -- with polonium-210, a rare radioactive isotope -- was an act of "political retribution." Speculation that Putin and the Russian government were involved in Litvinenko's death in November has been widespread, in part because Litvinenko was looking into the killing of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya. Putin and Kremlin officials have denied involvement.

For some, the possibility of a conspiracy in the shooting of Joyal was compounded by the recent death of another person featured in the TV segment.

Daniel McGrory, 54, a reporter for the Times of London, died at his home Feb. 20. MSNBC reported that McGrory's cause of death was a heart attack.

Joyal was shot hours after meeting with a former KGB general, Oleg Kalugin, near the Spy Museum in Washington. Kalugin, a family friend and a member of the museum's board, has said he was shocked when Joyal's wife called later that evening to tell him that Joyal had been shot.

Joyal, who was struck in the groin, remained hospitalized Saturday. His condition could not be determined yesterday.

Intelligence Specialist's Shooting Stirs Speculation (WP)

By Candace Rondeaux, Lori Aratani

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

No Motive Known As Comments on Putin Are Debated

In some ways, the shooting of Paul Joyal last week in a quiet, middle-class enclave of Prince George's County would seem like nothing more than a random act of violence.

But for those who know the 53-year-old expert on Russian intelligence and former staff member of the U.S. Senate's intelligence committee, the shooting has raised suspicions that his background might be behind the incident.

Law enforcement sources have said it is unclear whether the gunmen were trying to rob Joyal. He was shot in the driveway of his home shortly after returning from a trip to the International Spy Museum in the District with a friend.

Two men shot Joyal about 7:35 p.m. Thursday, sources said. The shooting occurred four days after Joyal alleged in a television broadcast that the government of Russian President Vladimir Putin was involved in the fatal poisoning of a former KGB agent in London.

Prince George's police officers have released few details about the incident, and several calls requesting comment were not returned yesterday. Joyal remained hospitalized yesterday.

But an FBI official confirmed yesterday that the agency is looking into the shooting. Joseph Persichini Jr., the FBI's assistant director in charge of the Washington field office, said his office is assisting Prince George's and the Baltimore office of the FBI in the investigation.

"We're pursuing this as hard as possible. We're not at all sure of the motive," Persichini said.

Joyal, who has long been an outspoken critic of the Putin regime, appeared in a segment on "Dateline NBC" Feb. 25 about the Alexander Litvinenko case. Litvinenko's death in November from radiation poisoning has caused widespread speculation that Putin and the Russian government were involved, because Litvinenko, a former KGB agent, was looking into the killing of a Russian journalist. Putin and Kremlin officials have repeatedly denied involvement.

DOJ_NMG_0139347

In the "Dateline" interview, Joyal pointedly accused the Putin regime of silencing its critics and poisoning Litvinenko with polonium-210, a rare radioactive substance.

"It's clear-cut. It has to be a state-run or a state-managed operation," Joyal said in the interview.

The circumstances of Joyal's shooting seem worthy of a spy novel.

"I would not rule out anything, but it's hard to believe that a few days [after the broadcast] that some guys would shoot him . It could be just a regular criminal assault," said longtime family friend and former business associate Oleg Kalugin.

Kalugin, a former KGB general and Putin's former boss in the agency, met with Joyal for drinks at a restaurant at the Spy Museum a few hours before the shooting. Kalugin, a member of the museum's board, said in a phone interview yesterday that Joyal seemed in good spirits before leaving for home.

Kalugin said he was shocked when he received a panicked phone call from Joyal's wife about an hour after the men had parted, saying that Joyal had been shot in front of his Adelphi area home.

"I could not believe my ears when she said he was shot. She said Paul drove up to the house, and as he opened the door and left [the car], there were two guys, and they shot him," Kalugin said.

A source close to Joyal, who requested anonymity because the investigation is ongoing, said the unidentified assailants shot Joyal in the groin and escaped.

Joyal's wife, who is a nurse, was at home at the time and ran to assist her husband as he lay bleeding in the driveway, the sources said.

Joyal was taken to a hospital, where he was initially in critical condition. A source said yesterday that Joyal had improved and that doctors were "cautiously optimistic" that he will recover.

Yesterday, four cars were parked in the driveway at Joyal's brick ranch on Lackawanna Road. A boy who answered the door declined to speak to a reporter.

Neighbors and friends said Joyal, who is a member of the Prince George's law enforcement task force, is the father of three and coaches youth basketball.

Prince George's State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey, who befriended Joyal through his work in local law enforcement, said he did not know details about the investigation.

"He's a wonderful man with a strong commitment to the community," Ivey said.

Attorney General To Investigate Maywood Police (LAT)

By Jessica Garrison, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

California Atty. Gen. Jerry Brown has announced plans to conduct a "top to bottom" review of the Maywood Police Department, following allegations of sexual misconduct, racism and brutality among officers in the small suburb southeast of Los Angeles.

The probe, made public Friday, comes amid residents' growing anger toward the 37-member department.

Officers have been accused of beating residents and stalking and sexually abusing women. One woman said an officer groped her 14-year-old daughter.

Critics have charged that the department's afternoon sobriety checks were designed to snare unlicensed illegal immigrants and generate money. About 96% of the city's population is Latino and more than half are foreign born.

The City Council recently stopped those checks, and said it would become a "sanctuary city" for illegal immigrants.

That sparked tension in town, with some opposed to having the Police Department cease its afternoon checkpoints.

Earlier this year, Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles), who represents the area, told the Maywood City Council he was troubled by the allegations against the Police Department.

Nuñez and the council then requested that Brown's office investigate.

In a March 1 letter to Nuñez, Brown said his office would review the department's training, supervision, use of force and citizen complaints.

DOJ_NMG_0139348

The Los Angeles County district attorney's office and the FBI also are investigating the department, Maywood City Councilman Sam Peña said.

Peña said he thought the Police Department had "done all the right things" in investigating internally and cooperating with outside investigations.

*

jessica.garrison@latimes.com

Matty 'The Horse' On His Last Ride (AP)

By Larry Mcshane, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 5, 2007

At an age when most of his contemporaries were long out to pasture or in prison, Matty "The Horse" Ianniello was still riding high.

Retirement held no appeal for the old man — and why would it? The notorious Genovese crime family captain, an eyewitness to gangland history from the slaying of "Crazy Joey" Gallo through the conviction of Vincent "The Chin" Gigante, ascended to family boss just three years before his 80th birthday.

It was 1997, and big money was rolling in from rackets in Little Italy, the garbage industry, a mobbed-up union local. The silver-haired Ianniello kept $130,000 in cash around his suburban home, adding a touch of green to his golden years.

It took almost a decade, but "The Horse" now faces the last roundup: He pleaded guilty in a pair of racketeering cases last year. Death behind bars is a possibility for the mobster, who eschewed a graceful exit and ignored organized crime history — the boss always becomes the No. 1 target of law enforcement.

Even if he's 86 years old. Even if he knows better.

"You know these mob guys — it's a way of life," said mob expert Howard Abadinsky, a St. John's University professor and author of several books on organized crime. "To leave is like walking away from family, except with quote marks around `family.'

"He's part of that life."

But Ianniello's life went beyond just "The Life." He was a decorated World War II veteran. In the 1970s, he joined authorities searching for a 6-year-old named Etan Patz after the boy disappeared on a Manhattan street. He was a businessman in a world where brutality often spoke loudest, operating like a CEO rather than a street thug.

And now, instead of cashing Social Security checks, he's facing 2 1/2 years in prison at a March sentencing.

When Ianniello pleaded guilty last year to corrupting a Queens bus drivers union, he arrived in court propped up by a cane. His voice was difficult to understand during his plea; Ianniello's lawyer blamed his client's garbled diction on a stroke.

Others were more skeptical, suggesting Ianniello was as healthy as — well, a horse.

"Don't let his age fool you," said assistant FBI special agent Matt Heron after one of Matty's arrests. "He's still an influential player."

___

During a crime career dating to the era of godfathers like Joe Bonanno and Carlo Gambino, Matthew Ianniello was known in their world as two things: A good earner, and a stand-up guy.

"Matty was basically a nice guy," recalled "Joe Dogs" Iannuzzi, a mob informant who knew Ianniello in the mid-1970s. "A powerful man, but helpful to people he liked."

His former attorney, Gerry Lefcourt, remembered Ianniello as a gentleman who enjoyed discussions about civil liberties and the ramifications of war.

"He was a businessman," said Lefcourt. "There's never been any suggestion of violence with him. ... He was one of those people who got what he wanted because he was smart about things."

Ianniello's nickname came from his build: 6 feet tall and 220 pounds at his fighting weight.

Before his move into organized crime, Ianniello was a World War II hero, winning a Purple Heart and a Bronze Star as an Army artillery gunner in the Philippines.

DOJ_NMG_0139349

Like many veterans, Ianniello lived on Long Island and commuted to work in Manhattan. He and his wife raised a family of five in Old Westbury.

While many in the mob made money through violence, Ianniello handled his affairs like a large corporation — albeit one where millions of dollars were skimmed. Authorities said he kept dual sets of books to hide his vast illegal income, and worked with a "board of directors" composed of Genovese associates.

"Joe Dogs" Iannuzzi recalled "The Horse" stopping a violent dispute in the mid-1970s by simply reaching out to another Mafiosi — diplomacy over death. "All politics, you know?" said Iannuzzi, whose preferred method of problem resolution was more physical.

By the mid-1970s, Ianniello's empire covered every bar, restaurant and sex shop from Fifth Avenue to the Hudson River between 34th and 59th Streets — they all paid "The Horse," part of the cost of doing business, authorities said. Two of his more infamous holdings were Hungry Hilda's, a topless bar on Eighth Avenue, and a nearby transvestite bar, the Gilded Grape.

Although law enforcement was aware of his business, the cigar-chomping Ianniello beat charges of narcotics and extortion. Even a 1971 conviction for criminal contempt — he declined to answer questions from a Manhattan grand jury probing police corruption — only produced a suspended one-year sentence and a $1,500 fine.

It was a year later when Ianniello lived through one of the most infamous mob hits ever.

Ianniello was in the kitchen at his Little Italy restaurant, Umberto's Clam House, when mobster "Crazy Joey" Gallo rolled in at 5 a.m. It was April 7, Gallo's last stop after a night on the town for his 43rd birthday.

Gallo took a seat with his back to the front door of the restaurant. It was a mistake he wouldn't live to repeat.

A hitman with a .38-caliber handgun fired on Gallo, who staggered to the street and died alongside his parked Cadillac. No one was ever arrested.

Gallo's bodyguard, "Pete the Greek" Diapioulas, charged into Umberto's kitchen and found Ianniello.

When the bodyguard accused "The Horse" of setting Gallo up, Ianniello quickly denied it. "You think I'm crazy?" Ianniello asked. "To let this happen in this place?"

The shooting in some ways "made" the restaurant. It operated on Mulberry Street for the next 24 years, drawing tourists who scanned the woodwork and kitchen door for bullet holes.

Seven years after Gallo's last meal, a 6-year-old boy on his way to school disappeared in Greenwich Village — the same neighborhood where Ianniello and Gigante shared their headquarters.

Etan Patz's name would soon become synonymous with missing children, but on the morning of May 25, 1979, police were simply looking for a lost little boy.

Authorities eventually reached out to Ianniello for help, and the mobster agreed to investigate things through his contacts. Despite the efforts, Patz was never found.

In 1985, when he became eligible for Social Security, Ianniello was convicted of skimming $2 million from an assortment of Manhattan restaurants and food suppliers — including one that provided the hot dogs for Yankee Stadium. Three years later, he was convicted of racketeering and sentenced to 13 years.

By 1986, when Fortune magazine rated the nation's 50 biggest Mafia leaders, Ianniello was listed at No. 35 — behind Gigante (No. 19) but ahead of Philadelphia's powerful "Little Nicky" Scarfo (No. 43).

And in 1987, Ianniello finally went to jail on his racketeering conviction.

Ianniello did his time and was released on Sept. 29, 1995, at the age of 75. But that wasn't the end of his career.

___

On April 7, 1997, 25 years to the day after the death of Joey Gallo, Gigante entered a Brooklyn courtroom in a typically grungy get-up. It was the end of a long run as the family's head when the bathrobe-and-slipper-wearing Gigante admitted feigning dementia to avoid prosecution.

Ianniello knew the top guy drew unwanted attention from law enforcement. But authorities say that didn't stop him from stepping up when the family asked him to take over following the guilty plea by Gigante, who died in prison in 2005.

"He's got to take `The Seat' because this is what the family needs," said mob expert Abadinsky. "He's a stand-up guy, who played by the family rules. ... Nobody around has the status like Matty has. Who's around?

DOJ_NMG_0139350

"Who are you going to turn to?"

Within three years, "The Horse" was deep into a Queens union representing city bus drivers. A medical center that rented space from Local 1181 was forced to pony up $100,000 to renew its lease. With Ianniello's backing, the center was forced to make regular cash payments.

In Connecticut, "The Horse" imposed a mob tax on various garbage businesses and collected more than $800,000 between 2001 and 2005. The money was paid by the companies to ensure no one infringed on their trash-hauling routes — a scenario right out of "The Sopranos."

His legal woes mounted, but Ianniello kept his mouth shut. He pleaded guilty to racketeering charges and tax evasion, but his plea agreement allowed him to avoid testifying against any of his two dozen co-defendants.

He's ready now to do his time, even at his age.

"What can I say, right?" Ianniello said after leaving court in Connecticut last year. "Nothing."

Mistrial Sought In Federal Capital Case (WT)

By Jim McElhatton, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 4, 2007

The defendant in a rare death-penalty case in the District is asking for a mistrial.

Larry Gooch, accused of being the enforcer for the violent M Street Crew drug gang in Northeast, last week asked the federal court judge in the case to declare a mistrial. He claims he is not receiving adequate legal representation.

Mr. Gooch said he wants a mistrial because one of his attorneys recently elicited "damaging" testimony from Metropolitan Police Department Detective Carlton Herndon, according to defense filings.

Under cross-examination by defense attorney Thomas Heslep, the detective told jurors he thought Mr. Gooch wasn't seen around 18th and M streets Northeast after April 30, 2003, "because he shot people" in an alley, defense attorneys say.

Mr. Gooch, 27, is accused of carrying out the fatal shootings of Yolanda Miller and her boyfriend, Calvin Cooper, on Feb. 21, 2003. Prosecutors said he shot them because he suspected they were stealing drugs or cooperating with police. Mr. Cooper was found shot three times in the back in an alley.

Mr. Gooch faces murder, kidnapping, racketeering and other felony charges.

He requested the mistrial after more than a month of testimony and the same week that Mr. Gooch's attorneys filed court papers stating they provided their client with "ineffective assistance of counsel."

Prosecutors say the request for a mistrial is "totally devoid of merit" and that the attorneys' filing only shows "disharmony" among them.

The death penalty is banned under D.C. law, but it can be sought for some federal crimes.

Mr. Gooch also is charged in the Aug. 1, 2000, shooting deaths of Christopher Lane, 19, and William Cunningham, 27, and the Sept. 13, 2002, shooting death of Miguel Miles, 34. Prosecutors say Mr. Gooch killed Mr. Cunningham during a home invasion robbery, while a co-defendant killed Mr. Lane.

More than two dozen people connected to the case were arrested by 2004. Several of the gang's leaders have been tried and convicted, including three men serving sentences of life in prison, but Mr. Gooch is the only M Street Crew defendant facing a death penalty.

Testimony began last month and is expected to resume today. U.S. District Judge Rosemary M. Collyer has not ruled on Mr. Gooch's request for a mistrial, according to court filings.

Even if the judge denies the request, Mr. Gooch has asked that Mr. Heslep be removed from the defense team, according to filings.

Prosecutor also object to that request.

"Defense [attorneys] should not lose focus on their ultimate obligation, which is to represent the interests of their client," Assistant U.S. Attorney John P. Dominguez stated in court pleadings. "They should subordinate all other concerns to fulfill this objective and should put aside any petty bickering and simply find a way to work together to achieve this objective."

Federal Act Preventing County Prosecutors From Trying Olsen (AP)

AP, March 5, 2007

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) - A federal act is preventing prosecutors from moving forward in the murder case against Timmy Brent Olsen.

He was charged with murder last January in the 1995 disappearance and death of 15-year-old Kiplyn Davis.

Olsen is in a federal prison in Phoenix, Arizona, serving a 12-year sentence for perjury for lying to a federal grand jury investigating the girl's disappearance. He is appealing that conviction.

Prosecutors can't force him to return to face the state murder charges without potentially having to dismiss the charges on a technicality. And Olsen won't sign a waiver of the federal act that is keeping him from facing the Utah charges.

Prosecutors say they are willing to wait for him to exhaust his federal appeals, at which time he would have no choice but to face the murder charge. They say that could take a year.

Nevada Governor Retains Top Lawyer (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons, facing a federal investigation of whether he accepted improper gifts or payments from a federal contractor, retained Abbe Lowell, one of the nation's best-known criminal defense lawyers.

Mr. Gibbons, a Republican, represented Nevada in Congress for five terms before his election as governor last year. He served on the House intelligence and armed services committees, and used his position to help a Reno software maker, eTreppid Technologies LLC, seek federal contracts.

Mr. Gibbons and eTreppid's owner, Warren Trepp, said they did nothing improper. Mr. Gibbons has said his advocacy for eTreppid was part of his efforts to help Nevada companies win government work.

Mr. Trepp, who was Michael Milken's chief bond trader at collapsed junk-bond dealer Drexel Burnham Lambert, has been a major contributor to Mr. Gibbons. The Wall Street Journal reported Nov. 1 that Mr. Trepp paid for private jet flights and a Caribbean cruise for Mr. Gibbons and his family two years ago; the matter is the subject of a preliminary investigation by federal prosecutors.

Mr. Lowell, a partner at Chadbourne & Parke LLP, is representing Jack Abramoff, the former Republican lobbyist who is cooperating with federal officials in a public-corruption probe. Mr. Abramoff is also serving a prison sentence for fraud.

Mr. Trepp has assembled a formidable legal team as well, including Reid Weingarten, a top white-collar defense attorney at Steptoe & Johnson LLP in Washington who previously served in the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section. Mr. Weingarten didn't return a call seeking comment. In a statement, Mr. Gibbons's attorneys said the governor will cooperate with any inquiry.

Nearly 20% Of Released Sex Felons Are Missing (SAEN)

By Polly Ross Hughes, Austin Bureau

San Antonio Express-News, March 5, 2007

AUSTIN — When Anselmo Pruneda Jr. left prison last May, the forwarding address he left to a Houston boarding house almost sounded like an invitation to the cops for tea.

"O Do Drop In," he wrote.

No such place exists.

Pruneda, who had spent a dozen years in prison related to the sexual assault of a 9-year-old boy and failing to register as a sex offender, didn't register as required with the Houston police, either.

Lawmakers created sex offender registries so people could check how close potential predators lived to their neighborhoods, playgrounds or schools. But these registries are not fool-proof.

The Houston Chronicle and San Antonio Express-News examined the whereabouts of more than 800 sex offenders released from prison to Harris or Bexar counties during the 18 months ending last December.

DOJ_NMG_0139352

All had been rejected for early release and had served their entire sentences. Almost 20 percent of them either failed to register as sex offenders or their addresses in the state registry were incomplete, "unknown," "absconded" "out of state" or "homeless."

And that's not counting how many false or out-of-date addresses are only detected when too few local police officers try to knock on too many sex-offender doors.

"You're going to send the citizens into a panic" when they learn police lack the manpower to keep track of sex offenders who frequently change addresses, predicted Houston Police Sgt. Glen Shepherd.

More than 46,000 adults in Texas are registered as sex offenders for crimes ranging from indecent exposure to aggravated sexual assault of a child.

As state leaders in Austin clamor to get tough on violent sex offenders who target children, calling for longer sentences with no possibility of parole or possibly the death penalty, police who work with sex offenders say politicians are overlooking a disturbing trend.

Increasingly, sex offenders deemed too dangerous for early parole return home unsupervised once they have completed their entire sentences. And under the current system, they are less scrutinized, not more.

When paroled, sex offenders aren't released until officials verify and approve where they will live. When registering with local authorities, they must prove their address with a state ID card or drivers license.

But sex offenders who complete their sentences can refuse to tell prison authorities where they will live. Or they can claim they will leave Texas or name a location in the vaguest of terms. They still are required to register with local law enforcement upon release, but police say they often go undetected if they don't.

Nearly 2,200 sex offenders are registered as living in San Antonio and Bexar County, according to the Texas Department of Public Safety.

Prison authorities aren't required to verify their whereabouts. Yet, the Texas Department of Criminal Justice will forward any information sex offenders volunteer to the Texas Department of Public Safety. It then appears on the state registry, accurate or not.

"It's like a giant chalk board. Whatever local agencies send to us, that's what goes on," said DPS spokesman Tom Vinger. "The sex offender registry is based on what sex offenders tell us, and sex offenders are known to be dishonest."

Also, since no parole officer will monitor their movements, police say unsupervised sex offenders seem the most adept at slipping from view.

"It's a total honor system, and you're relying on the most cunning, diabolical, secretive type of felon," said Andy Kahan, Houston Mayor Bill White's crime victim's director.

The U.S. Justice Department, in the most comprehensive study to date, found that 5.3 percent of sex offenders were re-arrested for another sex crime within three years of their release. When compared to non-sex offenders, they were four times more likely to be arrested for a sex crime.

John Walsh from the television show "America's Most Wanted" stressed during a January news conference with Lt. Gov. David Dewhurst that, as Texas leaders take aim at child sex offenders, they must close gaps in the state's sex offender registry.

"They have to know where these creeps are," Walsh said. "How do you find out if they're in compliance or noncompliance when they (flout) the law? When you give a bogus address or say you live in a homeless shelter or on the street, you're in noncompliance right off the bat. How can you track that sex offender?"

The Legislature's proposed "Jessica's laws," named after child murder victim Jessica Lunsford of Florida, don't answer those questions.

Some of the proposals would further restrict where sex offenders can live, barring residences too close to schools, school bus stops or public parks. But more restrictions could prove to be an even greater incentive for sex offenders to try thwarting the registry, authorities worry.

Plus, police and deputies complain that politicians talk tough, but they aren't offering local law enforcement more state money to beef up enforcement.

DOJ_NMG_0139353

"This is what's known as an unfunded mandate by the state upon local governments," said Capt. Jim Rickhoff at the Bexar County Sheriff's Department. "Lord knows I'm going to be banging the drum at the next budget session for some personnel."

Attorney General Greg Abbott, who operates a sex offender unit, has asked the House Appropriations Committee for $7.7 million over the next two years so he can send deputies out regionally to help local police.

"Not all these people play by the rules. Many of them abscond, many of them fail to register later, many of them are back out on the streets looking for their next victim to harm," Abbott told budget writers.

As for Pruneda, Houston police began looking for him last week, after the Houston Chronicle asked how he managed to elude authorities. Shepherd said he was surprised to hear his compliance team was checking up on Pruneda, also known as John Perez.

"He's not registered with us," Shepherd said. "Basically, he's just out there in the cracks until a police officer stops him or he has some altercation with the police."

It turns out Houston police did pick up Pruneda last December for a minor infraction but turned him back to the streets, not knowing he was a sex offender eluding the registry.

"Apparently, he knows the system," Shepherd said. "He's gambling and taking a chance."

His luck finally ran out, though.

Last Friday, Pruneda was arrested in Houston for failure to register, Abbott's office reported. He had been living in a tent behind a convenience store.

FBI Watching Mortgage Fraud (MBSN)

By Mark Morris

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News, March 5, 2007

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Mortgage fraud is being called the country's fastest-growing white-collar crime.

It costs lenders more than $1 billion a year and has turned increasing numbers of federal agents into experts on real estate paperwork. These days, they quickly crack cases that once took years to work, experts say.

Two Kansas City politicians recently learned just how quickly.

The very day last fall when Katheryn Shields, who was then county executive in Jackson County, Mo., and her husband signed paperwork selling their home, an FBI agent notified them they were the targets of a criminal investigation involving the sale.

The documents purportedly showed that the $475,000 house they purchased in 1999 somehow was worth a $1.2 million mortgage in 2006.

Agents also wrapped up an investigation of Kansas City City Councilwoman Saundra McFadden-Weaver just months after she unsuccessfully tried to refinance a $400,000 Lee's Summit, Mo., home. According to prosecutors, McFadden-Weaver had purchased it even though she had no plans to live there or make payments.

By contrast, the largest previous high-profile case in the area, involving a Belton, Mo., real estate investor, took years to develop.

Shields, who is campaigning to be Kansas City's mayor, and McFadden-Weaver have pleaded not guilty to conspiracy and wire fraud charges and have denied all wrongdoing. Shields, a Democrat, said she was the target of "political terrorism" by appointees in the Republican Bush administration. McFadden-Weaver said she innocently was trying to help a needy acquaintance in a real-estate transaction.

Though these relatively high-profile defendants cast new light on mortgage fraud, it already was a regular docket item in Kansas City and in federal courthouses throughout the country.

Mortgage fraud occurs when somebody lies or misrepresents a fact on a statement that a lender uses to make a loan. Banks and mortgage lenders generally are the prime victims when loans are not repaid, but the fallout from a large-scale scam also can devastate individual investors, who sometimes must file for bankruptcy.

Communities also suffer when swaths of properties sucked into a scheme go vacant and deteriorate.

DOJ_NMG_0139354

Estimates of mortgage fraud losses vary widely, but experts said trend lines pointed up. Although schemes can prosper during good times - such as the recent mid-decade boom when as much as $2.5 trillion in mortgage loans were made each year - they also can flower as the market cools.

The surge in cases in recent years has led investigators, regulators, lawmakers and industry groups to consider a number of solutions.

Many think that existing fraud statutes are adequate, but four states - New Jersey, Utah, Oklahoma and Colorado - are considering laws that would make mortgage fraud a specific crime, in part to spur more local enforcement.

Ultimately, tthe real estate industry must work harder to weed out fraud, and consumers must become better educated.

John Fougere, a spokesman for the Missouri attorney general's office, said if you don't understand what you're being asked to sign, ask questions until you're comfortable.

"Take that extra step," Fougere said. "You would be amazed at the amount of grief you can save yourself."

How to avoid fraud

The Kansas Association of Mortgage Brokers offers these tips:

Verify that the mortgage company is properly licensed in the state.

Thoroughly read all documents provided by your mortgage company. Question anything that might appear out of order.

Do not sign the loan application if you aren't comfortable with the information typed on it. Remember, any misrepresentation on the application could result in civil or criminal penalties.

While the loan is being processed, question anything that appears out of the ordinary.

At closing, read everything thoroughly. Don't sign if you're uncomfortable with any of the information represented. Review the final loan application to see if there is any incorrect information that might affect your approval, such as an investment property marked as your primary residence or a significant error in your income.

Arrest Sparks Worries Over Implications Of Corporate Law (HC/AP)

By John Christoffersen, Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, March 5, 2007

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — The arrest of a prominent attorney on charges of destroying evidence in a child pornography investigation is raising alarm bells that a law targeting corporate accounting schemes could be used to prosecute lawyers over work done on their clients' behalf.

"Every criminal defense lawyer in the country has to be alarmed at the indictment," said New York University law professor Stephen Gillers. "It's going to upset a lot of assumptions about how lawyers can represent clients. I think this is a boundary-pushing case."

Philip Russell was charged Feb. 16 with destroying a computer that contained child pornography at Christ Church in Greenwich. Former President George H.W. Bush attended the church while growing up and funeral services for his parents were held there.

Russell, the former attorney for the church, is accused of obstructing an FBI investigation that led to the January conviction of the church's music director, Robert Tate, for possessing child pornography.

Russell was charged under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which Congress passed in 2002 after a wave of corporate accounting scandals to make it easier to prosecute such cases. He faces up to 40 years in prison if convicted.

"The case will test the meaning of those new provisions," Gillers said.

The law, which was aimed at cases involving corporate document shredding, made it easier to prosecute obstruction of justice by requiring only that an investigation was foreseeable rather than already pending. Prosecutors also no longer have to show the defendant acted with corrupt intent to keep evidence from investigators, experts say.

While legal experts agree that lawyers can't destroy evidence, they are concerned that prosecutors' use of Sarbanes-Oxley will pressure defense attorneys to betray their clients' confidences and report potential evidence to authorities or risk prosecution themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0139355

"The most troubling aspect is it tries to make lawyers shills or hand maidens for police and government investigators," said Jon Schoenhorn, president of the Connecticut Criminal Defense Lawyers Association.

Future cases could be murkier than child pornography, involving bank records or other documents and items that might incriminate a client in a future investigation, experts say.

"Lawyers will have to be soothsayers," said Martin Pinales, president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers. "They will have to figure out what some prosecutor in the future may or may not be charging."

Russell, whose wife is a member of the church, does not dispute that he destroyed the computer, said his attorney, Robert Casale. But denies he broke the law.

"He didn't do it to interfere or compromise any government investigation," Casale said.

The case dates back to Oct. 7, when an employee at Christ Church discovered images of naked boys while using Tate's computer, according to the indictment. A day later, church officials sealed and wrapped Tate's laptop, treating it as evidence, authorities said.

Russell destroyed Tate's computer after learning it contained images of naked boys, according to the indictment.

"Those who possess child pornography or hinder the prosecution of those who do by destroying evidence and impeding investigations will be prosecuted, particularly when the obstructionists are attorneys and officers of the court," U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said.

Federal authorities declined further comment because the case is pending.

Schoenhorn said defense attorneys should advise their clients that it's illegal to possess child pornography, but should leave it up to their client on how to treat the evidence.

"Obviously a lawyer should not destroy evidence, but that begs the question what is evidence?" Schoenhorn said.

Russell plans to challenge the use of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act in his case. Others besides attorneys could be liable if authorities are allowed to apply the law broadly, Casale said.

Federal law has a provision designed to protect attorneys. That shield could be a defense for Russell, but it's rarely been tested, experts say.

The trial in April could spell the end of a career for Russell, whose recent clients included Andrew Kissel, a wealthy Greenwich developer charged in a multi-million dollar real estate fraud case. Kissell was found slain in his home last year days before he was to plead guilty.

"Any criminal conviction will devastate him," Casale said. "It's like capital punishment."

D'Amato Never Folds (NYT)

By Gary Rivlin And Matt Richtel

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

For years, Alfonse M. D'Amato, the former Republican senator from New York, was the host at a Thursday evening poker game at his Capitol Hill office, playing with other lawmakers, staff members and lobbyists late into the night over pots that ranged from a few dollars to a few hundred.

Once New Yorkers collectively informed Mr. D'Amato that it was time to find a new line of work, he graduated to a higher-stakes game, playing with Howard Stern, among others. He is now a stalwart of a weekly game on Long Island where a bad night might mean that a player drops $5,000 or more.

As Mr. D'Amato tells it, and as his card-playing cronies confirm, he rarely leaves a game a loser. Yet it is a safe bet that his love of poker never proved so lucrative as it did last week, when he signed a lobbying deal with the Poker Players Alliance, a nascent group that hopes that Mr. D'Amato will help them become players in Washington politics, too.

Most immediately, the group is hoping that Mr. D'Amato, long known for his connections to Washington insiders and his ability to deliver perks to his constituents and interest groups, can help them overturn a new federal ban on Internet gambling — or at least exempt poker from its provisions.

"John Smith, maybe he doesn't have the financial means or the ability" to travel to a casino, Mr. D'Amato said, gesturing with his hands and speaking volubly in his trademark accent. "The poor guy at home can't bet $50 because we pass this law."

DOJ_NMG_0139356

The first big assault on poker players came in October when President Bush signed a bill aimed at online gambling by making it a crime to use credit cards or online payment systems for poker and other online casino games and sports betting conducted over the Internet. The law did not make it impossible or illegal for Americans to bet online, but it did make it trickier for players to get their cash to the offshore casinos that run the Internet sites.

"I think it's fair to say that most poker players see themselves as nonpolitical," said Walt Thiessen, 49, an entrepreneur from Warrenton, Va., who recently joined the alliance. "But the more that the government does to impede poker players, the more angry and frustrated they're going to become."

The booming popularity of poker has spawned any number of cable television shows and made media figures of professionals like Chris Moneymaker and Daniel Negreanu. Tens of millions of Americans play, primarily in home games but also at casinos, legal and illegal card rooms, and at scores of Web sites.

So perhaps it was inevitable that poker enthusiasts would assert themselves as another special interest demanding to be heard in Washington. The Poker Players Alliance, which says it has more than 160,000 members, most paying at least $20 to join the group, will open an office in Washington in the next two months "to oversee our political efforts there," the group's president, Michael Bolcerek, said. It hopes to build a grassroots organization whose political presence is felt in all 50 states, he said.

But even though Mr. D'Amato's involvement in the lobbying effort is bound to generate plenty of talk, it is not expected to lead to overturning the new law anytime soon.

Moreover, Mr. D'Amato, for all his ability to attract attention and parlay his reputation into big money, may not have much sway in a Democratic-controlled Congress preoccupied with war, budget deficits and presidential politics. There is little interest there at the moment in turning back to a subject decided a year ago, when Republicans ruled.

Mr. D'Amato and his backers, said I. Nelson Rose, law professor at Whittier Law School in Costa Mesa, Calif., and an expert on gambling law, "think they have a pair of queens. But what have they really got? They don't even have a pair."

Still, former Representative Jim Leach, an Iowa Republican and one of the authors of the Internet gambling ban, said that Mr. D'Amato certainly added heft to the effort.

"Don't ever underestimate Al," he said on hearing of Mr. D'Amato's role.

Certainly, Mr. D'Amato's poker buddies have learned that lesson. "He's tenacious, he's fearless and he's aggressive," said Gary Melius, the host of the Monday game where Mr. D'Amato is now a regular. "He's also really good at reading people."

Subtlety has never been Mr. D'Amato's long suit, and he has already embraced his new role with characteristic fervor. During an interview in his offices in a high-rise on Park Avenue in Manhattan, Mr. D'Amato did not answer questions about online poker as much as filibuster on the issue.

To him the implications of prohibiting online poker are profound, touching on matters as wide ranging as the war on terrorism, national security, the rights of the elderly and the handicapped and equal protection under the law. At times, he pounded his desk to make his point.

The money being spent to outlaw poker and enforce the ban, Mr. D'Amato said, could be better spent "in the battle against money laundering, trafficking in drugs, or trafficking in terrorism."

He takes issue with Congress's decision to lump in poker, a game of skill as well as luck, with games of pure chance like roulette and craps. "It's really a great sport," Mr. D'Amato said, perhaps the country's favorite sport. "You don't have 70 million people participating in baseball."

It is not clear that poker has 70 million players, either. (Mr. D'Amato's source is a study commissioned by the poker association.)

But one of his trademark tactics is throwing around numbers that might or might not be considered, well, a bluff. He talks of the million players who have already joined the poker association — a misstatement that prompted his handler, presidential style, to clarify that what the former senator meant is that the group hoped one day soon to have that many names on its rolls.

After New York voters replaced Mr. D'Amato with Charles E. Schumer, a Democrat, in 1998, the former senator opened Park Strategies, a lobbying and corporate strategy firm whose client list includes banks, telecommunications companies and a few racetrack owners.

DOJ_NMG_0139357

He acknowledged that he did not understand the impulse that prompted a person to place a wager on a horse. But he spoke rhapsodically about the sense of community that poker has fostered in his life, and the banter, camaraderie and friendly competition that can make the game so engaging.

The intimacy of the game, in fact, produced some political headaches for Mr. D'Amato while he was chairman of the Senate Banking Committee after an article in The New York Times disclosed that he had invited lobbyists to play in his office. That gave extraordinary access, some charged, to those representing banks, securities firms and other financial institutions.

Mr. D'Amato has a different view, defending his activity as an innocent pastime that followed in the footsteps of President Harry S. Truman's poker games with cronies. "It was a great way to while the time away — to have fun and talk politics," he said.

Plenty of Americans are still playing poker online, if no longer at sites run by publicly traded companies, which fear reprisals from Washington despite being based overseas.

Instead, online players have shifted to smaller, privately owned sites. They are forced to find other means for transferring money in and out of their accounts, given that the new law more closely monitors financial institutions processing wagers.

"I play as much now as I did before the ban," said Ethan Ruby, a member of the poker alliance who lives and works in Manhattan. Mr. Ruby said he simply took the money he had on account at PartyPoker, his old site, and transferred it to Full Tilt. He then linked his poker account to his checking account instead of a credit card.

"It's a much more tedious process now," Mr. Ruby said.

Still, it only took a few days. "You can't cork this," Mr. D'Amato said. "You can't stop this through some silly bill."

Online poker will only go further underground, he continued, providing an opening for unscrupulous foreign operators seeking to take advantage of the hunger of Americans to play poker.

"When you have regulation, where you have openness, you can ensure you have a game that won't be unfairly cut or disadvantaged or manipulated," Mr. D'Amato said. You can also tax the winnings of players whose ups and downs are tracked online, a figure the poker alliance puts potentially in the billions.

Mr. Rose, the law professor, while doubtful of the chances for the lobbying effort in the short run, said Mr. D'Amato and his backers would be well served in keeping the issue alive until there is more interest in the matter. "If they stay active the next two years," he said, "then there could be a serious bill" to carve out an exception for poker.

Certainly, Mr. D'Amato has staying power.

"The later the game goes, the more Al is going to win," said Larry Elovich, a Long Island lawyer who said he has been playing poker on and off with Mr. D'Amato for 50 years. "He has the ability to stay awake when the rest of the players are all tired."

A Record Of Failure At Center For Sex Offenders (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough And Monica Davey

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

ARCADIA, Fla. — Inside a privately run treatment center here for pedophiles and rapists who have completed their prison sentences, where they are supposed to reflect on their crimes and learn to control their sexual urges, bikini posters were pinned to walls.

Two men took their shirts off, rubbed each other's backs and held hands, while others disappeared together into dormitory rooms. Some of the sex offenders appeared to be drunk from homemade "buck" liquor secretly brewed and sold here.

And some of the center's employees, who openly ignored the breaking of rules ("As long as they are happy, we let them go," one explained), reported that a high turnover rate among staff members was mostly because of female employees leaving their jobs after having had sex with the offenders.

These and other observations were included in a memorandum composed in 2004 by six employees on loan here from Pennsylvania. They had been dispatched by the Liberty Behavioral Health Corporation, which ran the facility, the Florida Civil Commitment Center, and a facility in Pennsylvania.

Nineteen states have laws that allow them to confine or restrict sex criminals beyond prison in a trend that is expanding around the country, with legislators in New York last week announcing agreement on a new civil commitment law there.

DOJ_NMG_0139358

The courts have upheld the constitutionality of such laws in part because they are meant to furnish treatment where possible. Most of the states run their own centers to hold and treat such predators, generally with meager results, but at a time when private solutions are popular for prisons, toll roads and other state functions, a few have teamed with private industry.

Yet as the story of the center here in Arcadia reveals, even a $19 million partnership between the state and a company that describes itself as "a national leader in the field of specialized sex offender treatment and management" failed to meet a central purpose: treating sex offenders so they would be well enough to return to society.

"It was like walking into a war zone," Jared Lamantia, one of the visiting workers who signed the memorandum, recalled in an interview. "The residents in that place ran the whole facility."

The memorandum is among thousands of pages of public and private documents about the Florida center reviewed by The New York Times, providing a rare window into the lives of civilly committed sexual predators and the people who guard and treat them. While programs like Florida's are popular because they keep sex offenders locked away past their prison terms, they cost far more than prison — in the case of Florida, on average twice as much — with no measurable benefit beyond confinement.

For more than seven years, Liberty was in charge of almost every facet of the Florida center, where more than 500 men are held beyond their criminal sentences in a crowded former prison surrounded by cow pastures.

That ended last June in a cloud of claims and counterclaims, investigations and legislative hearings. By the end, after the state did not renew Liberty's contract, the Florida Department of Children and Families was virtually at war with the company, with each side pinning blame on the other — the state accused of failing to properly finance the center, the company accused of failing to manage it.

"The place is a cesspool of despair and depression and drug abuse — of people being lost," said Don Sweeney, a mental health counselor in St. Petersburg who treats some former residents of the center, reflecting on Liberty's tenure there.

Many outside experts, even some of the center's critics, said the state's insufficient financing of the center made Florida as much to blame as Liberty for the many failings, many of which are common in other states. Florida spends less than $42,000 a year per resident, one of the lowest rates in the country.

"There was no money to support that facility and to do what had to be done," Dr. Robert Bellino, a psychiatrist who worked at the center here, said of the company. "It's a political football. They were always turning the screws on Liberty — 'Cut this, cut that, don't spend this, don't spend that.' "

Ambitious Private Contractors

As legislators across the nation have answered public outrage about heinous sex crimes with civil commitment laws, a bevy of companies and well-paid specialists have cropped up like constellations around the expanding demand.

Liberty Behavioral Health and Liberty Healthcare Corporation, affiliates with common ownership, have emerged as the most ambitious private contractors in the commitment center arena. As recently as last year, the affiliates had accumulated contracts worth up to $26 million a year in California, Illinois, Pennsylvania and Florida, which was the biggest both in terms of compensation and responsibility.

Growing out of a company that provided emergency room employees to hospitals starting in the mid 1970s, Liberty Healthcare Corporation was founded in 1986 as a provider of mental health, developmental disability and primary care services. In its earliest days, it had no experience treating sex offenders and, its officials said, there was never a particular moment when company officials said to one another, "Let's go into the sex offender business."

Yet as Shan Jumper, Liberty's clinical director in Illinois, tells it, after "analyzing market trends and seeing what areas they could jump into," Liberty executives apparently recognized the potential.

By 1998, the company, which is privately held and based in Bala Cynwyd, Pa., won its first contract to provide services inside a civil commitment center, in Illinois. Rick Robinson, executive vice president and chief operating officer of Liberty Healthcare, described the move as a natural outgrowth of its work, which included creating an adolescent sex offender unit in an Arkansas hospital in 1995.

DOJ_NMG_0139359

The states that have hired private companies reason that outside experts have more background in the complex realm of detaining and treating sex offenders than most public workers, and in several states where Liberty holds contracts, officials say they have been impressed with the company's expertise.

But at the Florida center, even beyond a string of embarrassing failures — an escape, the death of an offender after a fight with another over a bag of chips, a sit-in that the state ultimately quashed with hundreds of law enforcement officers — the treatment record was poor.

In Liberty's tenure, only one of the hundreds of men here progressed far enough in therapy to earn a recommendation from company clinicians that he be released. At various points, many residents were not attending the group therapy specifically addressing sex offending; in May 2005, 35 percent of the center's 484 residents fell into that category.

In written responses to questions from The New York Times, as well as court depositions, legislative testimony, e-mail messages, letters and memorandums, Liberty defended its treatment record, blamed Florida as insufficiently financing its commitment program and, for years, failing to define exactly what it expected of Liberty.

Early Praise and Promise

Liberty's early tenure in Florida won praise from independent evaluators who said the treatment program showed promise. Over the first four years the state asked for few changes, and on matters such as the treatment of mentally ill residents, had a "just do the best you can" attitude, as Susan Keenan Nayda, vice president of operations for behavioral health programs at Liberty, said in a court deposition.

But problems began to surface publicly in June 2000 in dramatic fashion when a resident escaped in a helicopter that an accomplice had landed inside the center's perimeter. The helicopter crashed after departing with the escapee, who was caught 26 hours later in a canal with the pilot, 2 handguns and 28 rounds of ammunition. The pilot, a longtime friend, had visited the escapee 10 times in the five months before the escape.

The bizarre incident raised worrisome questions and the first hints of a conflict over the center's combined goals of security and treatment. Too few Liberty staff members were in the yard when the escape occurred, a report by state officials found, and the center's director had ordered razor wire removed from a security fence because, he said, the wire was damaging volleyballs from a nearby court the residents used.

The report also complained about the state's role, questioning why corrections officers, who were in charge of security on the perimeter, were unarmed. Commitment centers across the country have wavered between following the legal mandate to run a therapeutic program, as laid out by the courts, and the politically acceptable alternative of a more prisonlike one.

In Florida, the conflict emerged again and again. The state's emphasis swung, at various points, toward and away from a "correctional" approach, company officials suggested. At one point, Ms. Nayda told a Florida State Senate committee that even she was not entirely sure what the center was trying to be.

"There's a little bit of confusion," Ms. Nayda said. "What is this place? Is it a prison? Is it a mental health center? A residential treatment facility where people are clients? What is it? We ask that question sometimes too. We really don't have a lot of guidance around what it is the state wants the facility to be, and we would encourage the state to look at that."

By the end of 2000, the state moved its civil commitment center from Martin County on the state's East Coast to its current home here in Arcadia, a 14-acre compound with eight dormitories and other buildings.

From there, the population rose swiftly, even as staff levels mostly stayed put. Liberty repeatedly sought more money from the state for the center's operations, for special treatment of its large severely mentally ill population and for creation of a supervised release program.

Asked to respond to Liberty's complaints about financing, Rod Hall, director of the mental health program office for the state Department of Children and Families, said, "The funding provided to operate the facility was the amount negotiated and agreed upon by Liberty prior to its signing of the contracts."

Liberty's monthly reports began suggesting that the company was feeling the crunch. The reports noted frequent troubling incidents: residents having sex, assaulting staff members and each another, hiding knives in their rooms.

DOJ_NMG_0139360

Liberty also said it faced an unusual challenge in Florida, where hundreds of the center's residents are not formally committed, but awaiting trials for commitment. These "detainees," the company said, often reject treatment to focus on their legal battles.

Some critics, meanwhile, began questioning the treatment. Ted Shaw, a forensic psychologist who evaluates civilly committed sex offenders, complained that Liberty held men back in treatment as punishment for minor infractions.

Liberty officials deny the allegations, but Michael Canty, a child molester who was detained at the center but was never formally committed, concurred with Dr. Shaw, saying Liberty staff members would "harass, taunt — try to get you in trouble so you would get kicked out of treatment."

Rising Tensions, and Violence

By the time the six workers from Liberty's facility in Pennsylvania arrived here in 2004, tensions inside the center and with the state authorities were reaching a peak.

In April of that year, a mentally ill man jumped off the center's roof and was injured after staff members rushed at him to get him down. In June, a resident stabbed another 12 times and the staff had residents mop up the blood, destroying evidence before outside law enforcement officials arrived, an internal report showed.

"It was basically a free-for-all prison, out of control," said Josh Stiles, another of the visiting workers from Pennsylvania.

Liberty officials said they investigated and immediately took "appropriate actions" regarding all that their Pennsylvania employees reported. But they also said the atmosphere in the center at the time was "probably very conducive for allegations that were either unfounded or exaggerated," and noted that a second group from the Pennsylvania facility, including its director, returned to Florida several weeks later and reported no similar problems.

Nonetheless, Lynda Sommers, a consultant hired by the state to monitor the facility over a number of years, also found it in disarray in the period after the second Pennsylvania group.

Ms. Sommers reported suspected sexual relationships between staff members and offenders, staff members who slept on the job, crumbling facilities, and vague policies on punishing troublemakers and treating the mentally ill.

Liberty's own internal investigator, Kenneth Dudding, was also deeply critical of hiring decisions for low-level staff members, whose salaries started at a base rate of $12.89 an hour.

"You could have worked at Wal-Mart last week, they put you in front of a computer to read policy for a few hours, then they send you to a dorm and let you go," said Mr. Dudding, who left after clashing with Liberty's management.

As for female security workers, Mr. Dudding said they were easily manipulated by the sex offenders. "It's like putting candy in front of a baby," he said.

Mr. Dudding said he ultimately called a state whistle-blower's hot line.

The inspector general of the Department of Children and Families investigated and issued stinging reports, saying that the facility's safety director had tried to cover up wrongdoing by tampering with evidence, that an employee was suspected of selling marijuana, and that alcohol was being made and sold there.

Liberty officials said the safety director was fired for "failure to properly function in her role" before they received the inspector general's critique, and they said they fired the worker suspected of drug sales — on whom no contraband was found — for an unrelated reason.

Then a group of residents, angry when the fire marshal demanded that they not have so many personal items, moved into a yard. For months, the staff could not persuade them to go back to their rooms, creating a scene one law enforcement officer called "Woodstock gone amok."

Liberty said it first asked for help from the Department of Corrections and was turned down, only to ultimately get a response the company called "excessive." In February 2005, several hundred corrections and law enforcement officers in riot gear arrived and restored order.

That spring, Liberty's requests to the state grew more insistent. The company asked for $31.1 million for the next fiscal year; it received $18.7 million, the same as the year before.

By April, having described an "alarming" set of "chronic and serious" issues at the facility, the state was preparing to end its relationship with Liberty.

DOJ_NMG_0139361

New Company Takes Over

In the end, the struggle between security and treatment may help explain Liberty's doomed tenure at the Florida center.

"I had imagined that we would be trying to do research or publish or be innovative or at least use state-of-the-art equipment," said Dean Cauley, a former therapist at the center. "When I arrived, the equipment wasn't being used, tests were outdated and treatment was very much secondary to maintaining security."

Liberty officials said that treating patients had always been their company's reason for being. Most of the company leaders, including Dr. Herbert T. Caskey, the founder, were originally clinicians, not business people.

If states wanted simply to lock up, not treat, the worst sexual predators, Kenneth Carabello, Liberty's director of regional operations for California and the western United States, said, "We'd let somebody else do this."

Despite the center's history, Don Ryce, the father of Jimmy Ryce, the 9-year-old boy whose 1995 rape and murder spurred the Florida Legislature to adopt a civil commitment law in his name three years later, said the law's "overall intention" had been accomplished.

"There are a lot of people who are confined who otherwise I guarantee you would be out there reoffending," Mr. Ryce said, though he added, "I'm not going to pretend there aren't serious problems that need to be addressed."

As Liberty departed, Florida picked another private company, the GEO Group Inc., to run the center here.

The GEO Group, once known as Wackenhut Corrections Corporation, has more than 23 years of experience running prisons. Of 63 centers GEO operates worldwide, 58 are correctional and detention facilities.

Last fall, under GEO's watch, a new glimpse of turmoil began emerging. Early one morning, a resident said he was attacked by another in his bunk. His screaming, kicking and banging on his door went unanswered for almost 15 minutes before staff members responded, other residents said.

GEO officials said workers from the company and the Department of Corrections "responded promptly" to what GEO described as a "resident upon resident" fight, an assessment echoed in a DeSoto County sheriff's report.

But some 100 residents signed a letter calling for an end to the practice of housing two residents in a single room. The center "is supposed to be a mental health facility, not a prison," the residents wrote. "We are to be treated as patients, not state convicts."

Early Struggles Helped Forge Lanier's Resilience (WP)

By Allison Klein

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Cathy L. Lanier's career could have dead-ended in her fourth year with the D.C. police department.

A new sergeant, she was sent east of the Anacostia River to the 6th Police District, one of the city's most crime-ridden areas. From the start, things were bad.

Lanier's supervisor, a lieutenant, propositioned her sexually and humiliated her in public by making lewd remarks about her, she said. Once, during a meeting with Lanier and a group of male officers, the lieutenant grabbed her ponytail and made a comment about pulling a woman's hair during sex.

It was 1995, and, Lanier said, she had no clue about the law on sexual harassment. Some officers urged her to file a complaint. But another supervisor warned that the department's good-old-boy culture would ensure that if she took action, she would never be promoted.

She retained a lawyer and, along with another woman making similar allegations, went to court. The city settled their lawsuit, and each woman got $75,000. The lieutenant was shifted to a different police district.

Lanier thought her career was over. But there were no repercussions, she said, because she had a solid track record. "Your reputation in the department is either as a hard, loyal worker or someone who will do anything to get out of work. I was a worker," she said.

Now, at 39, she is awaiting D.C. Council confirmation as the city's first permanent female police chief and one of the youngest leaders to head the department.

DOJ_NMG_0139362

She has achieved success after struggles in her personal and professional life, including a teenage pregnancy that led her to drop out of high school and an early marriage that failed. Her resiliency will be tested as she inherits a police department in a high-crime city that residents say is out of touch with the community. She is already facing extra scrutiny as a white, female chief of a force that is mostly black and male.

Running the 3,800-member department requires a commanding presence, stamina and the ability to plan while dealing with the inevitable crises. As her predecessor, Charles H. Ramsey, put it: "There are things coming at you all the time and nobody to pass it off to. The buck stops there."

D.C. Council member Phil Mendelson (D-At Large), who heads the Public Safety and Judiciary Committee, said that Lanier gets high marks since taking over as acting chief in December but that "the proof will be over time."

"To the average citizen, the chief of police is the personification of crime fighting. In reality, the chief of police is the manager of a large bureaucracy," Mendelson said. "That's the role she's got to play."Challenges From the Start

Lanier was raised by her mother after her father left when she was 4. She and two older brothers lived with their mother in a modest home in the D.C. suburb of Tuxedo, in Prince George's County.

She dropped out of high school at 14 to have a baby. She wed the boy's father, a marriage that lasted two years, then went on welfare. At 16, she received her GED and became a secretary. She later sold awnings and canopies, worked in real estate and waited tables. Her mother helped her care for the baby.

At 23, she followed her father and two brothers into public service. Her late father, Walter Lanier Sr., was deputy fire chief in Prince George's. One brother is a captain in the county fire department, the other a detective with Greenbelt police.

As a police officer, she came into her own, said her mother, Helen Lanier, a retired legal secretary. "She seemed to blossom."

Cathy Lanier's first assignment was as a foot patrol officer in the 4th District in Northeast and Northwest Washington. A 6-foot-tall blond woman in uniform, she stood out. She remembers stopping by neighborhood playgrounds, shooting hoops with the kids for a few minutes and letting them wear her police cap. She'd give them bubble gum, and they knew she'd be back.

She got to know every street and alley, said her former commander, Robert C. White, now chief in Louisville. "She knew the good people and the thugs. She wasn't afraid or intimidated."

Lanier grew frustrated, however. Some officers were slacking off, she said. "I felt like everybody wasn't pulling their weight."

So she decided to become a training officer, teaching rookies how to work a beat.

"My rule was we didn't take lunch," Lanier said. "We ate, but we didn't take lunch."

Sgt. Brett Parson vividly remembers Lanier's training when he joined the force in 1994. The first day they were out together, they patrolled the lower Georgia Avenue area, and she was teaching him to watch for drug dealing.

"All of a sudden, she slammed on the brakes, jumped out of the car and handcuffed a guy," Parson said. "I had no idea what happened. I hadn't even gotten out of the car."

Diane Groomes, now commander of the 1st District, recalls competing with Lanier to see who could make more arrests. "We'd usually tie," Groomes said.Changes Won Attention

By 1998, the harassment case was settled, and Lanier began a steady ascent. She became a captain after ranking third on a promotion exam; she has always excelled at such tests. "I wasn't as smart as everybody else, but I would out-study them," she said.

Ramsey took over the department the same year, and he identified a handful of go-getters. Ramsey said he was looking for bright, enthusiastic leaders with at least 10 years ahead of them in the department. Lanier had all of that.

"If there was anything lacking in Cathy at all, it was self-confidence," Ramsey recently recalled.

The meteoric rise was set in motion: five new commands over the next eight years -- leading to chief.

Lanier burnished her police credentials with outside studies, receiving bachelor's and master's degrees from Johns Hopkins University. She also had management training at Harvard University.

Ramsey promoted her to inspector and put her in charge of narcotics. Then, when the department was accused of not doing enough to investigate fatal traffic accidents, Ramsey put Lanier in charge of that unit, too.

DOJ_NMG_0139363

She went to every fatal crash and made changes to improve the unit's performance. The unit was staffed round-the-clock, and investigators were ordered to regularly update victims' families.

Lanier took a similar approach when Ramsey put her in charge of the 4th District -- the place she began her career. She blanketed high-crime areas with officers in marked police cars, lights flashing. Crime dipped within 90 days. And she met with residents so that they bought into the strategy.

Her gung-ho personality and self-assured manner earned her praise from neighborhood leaders and caught the attention of Adrian M. Fenty, then a Democratic council member representing Ward 4. They realized they had the same style: Both were responsive to community needs, loved talking to people and had a habit of working through the night.

Lanier moved on, but Fenty would remember the impact she made on the police district.A Surprising Choice

Ronald Reagan's funeral. George W. Bush's inauguration. Countless demonstrations. Lanier oversaw security for big events as head of the Special Operations Division, a 250-member unit she took over in 2002. Among other duties, the division investigates bomb threats, deals with armed standoffs and escorts dignitaries in the city.

As she expanded her reach, Lanier also headed the police board that reviews the use of force and helped negotiate two union contracts. Her final assignment under Ramsey came last year, when he put her in charge of the force's first homeland security division.

Her rise has not been without controversy. Still pending are two lawsuits, one accusing Lanier of unfairly breaking up a canine squad and the other of illegally demoting officers from the mounted unit after they complained about mismanagement. She would not comment on the cases.

After Fenty won the mayoral election in the fall, he made it clear that he would not keep Ramsey. But Lanier said it was one of the biggest shocks of her life when Fenty offered her the job in November -- she hadn't applied.

The choice was also a surprise for another reason: After years of criticizing Ramsey, Fenty chose one of the chief's proteges for the top job.

There were complaints from some in the black community that Fenty passed over African American candidates who they felt would better represent the mostly black city. The force is 76 percent male and 63 percent black.

Some doubts remain. Ronald E. Hampton, executive director of the National Black Police Association and a former D.C. police officer, said picking Lanier was "risky" for Fenty.

"The chief of police ought to be a person of color," Hampton said. "We've got a lot of white people in these positions, and that becomes problematic for recruitment. You wonder why young kids in the black community don't want to be police officers."

Lanier said she should be judged on her performance. "People who know me realize it's not an issue," she said of the racial question.

She is adding foot patrols in neighborhoods that have been craving them for years and tailoring new crime-fighting programs with input from the community.

As a show of support for beat officers, Lanier began a policy that ones who live in the District are the first to have take-home police cars. She is also trying to streamline arduous paperwork.

That goes a long way, said Officer Kristopher Baumann, chairman of the Fraternal Order of Police's Labor Committee. "Officers like that she is the real police, she's out there on the street and she's out in the districts," Baumann said.

As she learns to manage her position, Lanier has been in near-constant motion, typically starting work early in the morning and winding up late at night. She shows up at crime scenes, has endless meet-and-greets with community groups and still finds time to spend with her boyfriend, D.C. police Sgt. Jim Schaefer, who inspects city trucks, as well as her mother and son, now 24.

At a recent event at an elementary school in Southeast Washington, she agreed to mentor a child for four hours a week. A worried look crossed the face of her aides, familiar with her overpacked schedule.

"Who doesn't have four hours a week to spare?" she asked.

Besides, she still eats her meals in the car on the way to meetings. She eats lunch -- but she doesn't take lunch.

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ_NMG_0139364

FEDERAL DIARY: Slowing Down The Revolving Door (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Adjusting the spin of the revolving door is never easy.

A House committee has approved legislation that would lengthen employment restrictions for federal procurement officials who take certain jobs when they leave government, from one year to two years. It also would prohibit newly hired procurement officials from awarding contracts to their former employers for two years.

Tightening employment restrictions will bring more accountability to government, contends Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee. Recent lobbying and procurement scandals are proof that something needs to be done, he points out.

But Paul A. Denett, the procurement policy chief at the Office of Management and Budget, argues that the proposed restrictions "would do great damage" to the government's ability to hire and keep qualified contracting personnel.

"They will have the unintended effect of harming the career prospects of the overwhelming number of honest, experienced government employees and encourage them to leave government service early," Denett said in a recent letter to Waxman. An estimated 20 percent of the government's 28,000 contracting professionals are eligible to retire, Denett noted.

Congress has been trying to regulate the revolving door -- the rotation of federal officials and business executives into and out of government -- since at least 1872, according to the Congressional Research Service.

Over the decades, Congress has sought to protect the government from former employees who took sensitive information with them and used it to promote the interests of a private party. Congress also has devised rules to discourage federal employees from cashing in on their inside knowledge or becoming snarled in conflicts of interest with companies doing business with the government.

"The question here is priorities," said Dave Nadler, a partner at Dickstein Shapiro. "It requires Congress to balance two important policy considerations."

One set of considerations is based on the very real concerns about the federal workforce and whether workforce shortages will increase over time; the other considerations involve the need to respond to the perception that industry and government are becoming too cozy, Nadler said.

"Given the recent high-profile scandals in the procurement community, Congress is clearly focused on addressing ethics and standards of conduct in government contracting," he said.

The scandals include last year's influence-peddling case involving convicted former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the 2004 scandal involving former Air Force acquisition official Darleen A. Druyun, who had negotiated a job with an airplane manufacturer and admitted in federal court to favoring the company in several procurement decisions.

Currently, federal procurement officials dealing with contracts worth more than $10 million may not receive compensation from a company involved in that contract for one year after leaving the government. The House bill would extend that compensation ban to two years.

This "procurement integrity" ban augments other cooling-off periods that limit contacts and lobbying by former federal officials.

The bill also would stop a "reverse revolving door," prohibiting federal executives who worked for private contractors from awarding contracts to their former employers after entering the government.

Denett said that provision would make it hard for the government "to obtain experienced procurement officials from the private sector" and use their knowledge to evaluate contractor proposals and their work.

Stan Z. Soloway, president of the Professional Services Council, which represents companies that hold federal contracts, agreed, saying the provision would hamper recruitment of mid-career professionals who might come into government to work on a project but have little interest in a long-term federal career.

"There has to be some balance," Soloway said. "You run a risk of over-regulating in a way that is a disservice to the federal workforce of today and tomorrow."

DOJ_NMG_0139365

He added, "Before we start adding restrictions, I really think it ought to be underpinned by some clear, cogent evidence that the current system doesn't work."

But James A. Thurber, an American University professor who testified in support of the House bill, said changes are needed, noting that loopholes in some laws permit a federal procurement official to be hired by a company to which he awarded contracts.

Though most federal employees moving to the private sector "do so with good intentions," he said in prepared testimony, "the temptations of future employment in the private sector are there and when acted upon, the public loses."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Neighbors Of Ruined Store Call For Healing (OWH)

By Jennifer Greff, WORLD-HERALD STAFF WRITER

Omaha World-Herald, March 5, 2007

The arson fire that blew a wall off Bob's Food Mart last month exposed not only the store's contents but also racial tension in the surrounding community of east Omaha.

And as with Hurricane Katrina, underlying problems surfaced, north Omaha leader LaVon Stennis Williams said at a community meeting Sunday at St. Therese of the Child Jesus Catholic Church.

The Feb. 18 robbery and arson at Bob's Food Mart, which police said may have been a racially motivated hate crime, sparked community outcry - and now, an avenue for change.

Two white men robbed the store and ordered Kassahun Goshime, an Ethiopian immigrant, into the basement. His hands and mouth were bound with duct tape and the store was set on fire. Goshime escaped.

His family owns the store. Racist graffiti has been found spray-painted on his home as well as on the store, at 16th and Fort Streets.

Bill Whitcomb, a race relations mediator with the Kansas City office of the U.S. Department of Justice, will be in Omaha next week to lead three discussions on race relations and develop a plan to address the issue, Stennis Williams said.

One of those meetings, a forum scheduled for March 15 at 6:30 p.m., is open to the public. Whitcomb also will lead a meeting with community leaders and another with elected officials.

Stennis Williams said others have told her of racial tensions in the area.

"It was an embarrassment to me to realize we're dealing with this in the 21st century," Stennis Williams said.

More than two dozen people attended Sunday's community meeting. Contributing to Sunday's discussion were Tommie Wilson, president of the Omaha chapter of the NAACP; Tristan Bonn, Omaha's former public safety auditor; and representatives of the Anti-Defamation League.

Some of the neighbors attending were interested in talking about the racism that they say plagues their community. But at least one, an older woman, was fearful enough of reprisal in the neighborhood that she asked not to be identified.

Others expressed exasperation at continuing vandalism, retaliation and slow police response in east Omaha neighborhoods.

Most people came to support Goshime, who allowed neighbors to remove goods from the damaged store.

"Here is a community that is pissed off at what is going on and what happened," said the Rev. Ken Vavrina, pastor of St. Therese. "(Goshime) is a great example for us all."

One woman, moved to tears, invited Goshime to her home for dinner. A man in the audience likened Goshime to Mother Teresa and the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

Vavrina suggested that Goshime be elected businessman of the year, then went a step further and hailed him the next president of the United States as the audience applauded.

"If you have the courage and wherewithal to reopen, 99 percent of the community will support you and patronize you," Vavrina said.

DOJ_NMG_0139366

Goshime said he had not yet decided whether to rebuild in the same location. And concerning the racist people in the world, he said: "We have to teach them peace and love."

Police have not yet made an arrest.

Ruling Awaited On Contested Ga. Tech Policies (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

Two women whose 2006 lawsuit against the Georgia Institute of Technology led to the repeal of the school's speech code await a federal judge's opinion on two other unresolved issues in their civil rights case.

Plaintiffs Ruth Malhotra and Orit T. Sklar -- both conservative student leaders at Georgia Tech -- say a ruling is pending by U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester of the Northern District of Georgia on their requests to overturn a school policy that bans funding of religious and political groups with student activity fees and to shut down an administration-run program that challenges biblical doctrine concerning homosexuality.

"The clock is ticking away" on the rest of Judge Forrester's decision, which "could come at any time," said David French, director of the Alliance Defense Fund Center for Academic Freedom, which is representing Miss Malhotra, a graduate student in international affairs from Georgia, and Miss Sklar, a senior in Tech's undergraduate civil-engineering program.

Mr. French describes ADF as a "Christian public-interest legal organization" that promotes religious liberty on college campuses.

The plaintiffs and ADF brought the lawsuit a year ago, claiming that Tech's policies designed to protect students from intolerance actually discriminated against conservative religious students who speak out against issues such as homosexuality, abortion and feminism.

Miss Malhotra accused Georgia Tech of "unlawfully promoting its own [left-wing] agenda while stifling the free expression" of students who hold positions the institution does not share. Both women have been active in College Republicans.

A spokesman for Georgia Tech declined last week to discuss the students' suit, saying the case is in the hands of the Georgia state Attorney General's Office.

"We got a great victory in August, when Judge Forrester repealed Georgia Tech's speech code," Miss Malhotra said.

She said her Christian faith compels her to denounce homosexuality. But Tech had a policy that banned speech about sexual orientation that people may find offensive.

Charging "viewpoint discrimination," Miss Malhotra cited prior incidents in which Tech blocked protests she staged against an affirmation-action rally and a play.

In his ruling last summer, Judge Forrester ordered Tech to delete wording from its speech code that prohibits students from any attempt to "injure, harm" or "malign" a person because of "race, religious belief, color, sexual/affectational orientation, national origin, disability, age or gender."

Miss Malhotra said she is eager to have the court address the school's involvement in a program called "Safe Space" that she says "endorses some religions and denigrates others," depending on their view of homosexuality.

Miss Malhotra points out that she is a Southern Baptist and knows that members of her faith have been condemned in the program because of their objections to homosexuality.

As for the plaintiffs' bid to force Tech to allow private religious and political groups to receive funding from student activities fees, Mr. French and Miss Malhotra said they find it inconsistent that the school recently funded "Islamic Awareness Week."

Disabled Woman Is Able Ally For Parents (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

A Denver mom is legally blind, in a wheelchair and determined to keep her children. As a lawyer, she battles for others in similar spots.

Denver — CARRIE Ann Lucas is confined to a wheelchair. She breathes with the aid of a ventilator. She cannot hear and can see only at close range.

DOJ_NMG_0139367

She begins most days about 4 a.m. with newspapers and e-mails. About 5:30, she wakes her three disabled daughters. She and an aide dress the two who use wheelchairs. The girls cannot feed themselves, so Lucas and the aide plug feeding tubes into their bellies. She pours cereal for the one daughter who can eat on her own. She puts the girls on their school buses, the last leaving by 7:10.

Lucas cherishes these mornings, tough as they are, because she knows how hard it is to keep a family together.

She is one of a handful of attorneys in the country whose specialty is representing disabled parents like herself. Her mission: making sure they get the same chance as everyone else to be moms and dads.

According to the U.S. Census Bureau, 15% of all parents with children in the household have some disability. These parents are far more likely to have the government try to take their children away. Even Lucas lives in fear that social services may seize her children. She knows the sorrow of losing a child — a 7-year-old girl whom she wanted to adopt was taken from her after a difficult court fight.

"I love my kids so much and I love being a parent so much, and I know my [clients] do too," said Lucas, 35, a wisecracking woman who once wrote an essay titled "one of the many joys of crip parenting."

"My clients have fought and fought and fought" to raise their children, she said. Her brassy voice wobbled as her eyes watered behind her tinted glasses. "It's just discrimination."

Lucas works her cases out of a seventh-floor office at the Colorado Cross-Disability Coalition in central Denver. The walls are papered with magazine articles about disabled parents. A bumper sticker in the shape of a shark that reads "Lawyer" is prominently displayed. More disabled people seek help from the coalition than Lucas, who carries about a dozen cases at a time, can handle.

Among those she has worked with was a deaf woman in suburban Denver, whose two toddlers were taken away and put up for adoption after social workers deemed her an unfit mother because she could not hear her children's cries for attention. Lucas could identify with her — she sleeps with a sound-activated pager that vibrates when one of her daughters calls for her.

She advised attorneys for a wheelchair-bound mother in Montana who fended off requirements from social services that someone who could walk be in the house 24 hours a day if her kids were to live there.

Another client, a blind woman in Denver, was refused treatment at a fertility clinic because the staff there did not think she could be a proper mother. She was asked: "How are you going to drive your kid to soccer practice?" The woman lost: A jury ruled that the clinic had no obligation to treat her.

"It's really indicative of how people view parents with disabilities," Lucas said.

STILL, Lucas readily acknowledges that some disabled people should not be parents. She herself admits that she's not a perfect parent. "I'm sure there are people who can do a better job than I can," Lucas said. A wealthier mother could afford to stay home with the children, but that wouldn't be a legitimate reason to take them, she said.

"We shouldn't be social-engineering families," Lucas said, "on the basis of things like poverty and disabilities."

The Lucas family lives in a middle-class neighborhood in south Denver, with a huge honey locust tree in the frontyard and a short ramp to the front door. With ample space to turn wheelchairs, all Lucas had to do to make the house accessible was widen doorways to accommodate wheelchairs and lower kitchen and bathroom sinks and counters.

On a recent Sunday afternoon, Lucas wheeled into the living room, where bookshelves overflowed with law books. Propped on a shelf was a stuffed figure of Timmy, a character in a wheelchair from the cartoon "South Park." Heather, the oldest child, lay on the floor. She suffers from a rare condition that has left her deaf, unable to walk or fully sign, and looking far younger than her 16 years. Lucas pivoted Heather to face a box of toys and games, but the teen seemed uninterested. "She's mad about something," Lucas guessed.

In the middle of the room, transfixed by images on the flat-screen television, were Lucas' two other children, Adrianne, 8, who has cerebral palsy and uses a wheelchair, and Asiza, 11, who has a mild developmental disability. Asiza was bouncing as she watched a singsong segment showing children how to communicate in sign language.

Lucas turned to Adrianne and asked, "Can you sign 'imagination'?" Lucas tickled her daughter, who smiled and turned back to the show.

DOJ_NMG_0139368

At the kitchen table, Lucas' younger sister, Courtney Lucas, 32, was making cookies. Courtney was working as Lucas' aide that Sunday. (Lucas gets assistance at home every day from helpers paid by Medicaid, and an assistant drives her to court appearances.) Courtney proudly talked about her sister: "She has, as long as I can remember, been the most stubborn person I've ever met. She's never been one to let anyone tell her she can't do something."

CARRIE Ann Lucas grew up in a small town 57 miles northeast of Denver. She was healthy in her youth, playing basketball and running track. She went to college in Washington state and studied sports medicine. There she began developing unexplained bone tumors and excruciating muscle pain.

After graduation in 1993, Lucas moved to Saipan, where she taught at a beachfront school and scuba-dived regularly. Her illness advanced, and she had to go to Guam and Hawaii for medical treatment. She returned to Colorado after two years, and was eventually diagnosed with a rare degenerative disease called central core disorder that she knew would impose limits on her. She began using a wheelchair and lost her hearing.

She enrolled in seminary, but found that a pastor's life was not for her. "I'm just not that much of a touchy-feely person," she said.

Then, in 2000, Heather entered her world.

Social workers had taken Heather from Lucas' half-brother in Tennessee and placed her in foster care. When Lucas heard this, she made a snap decision. "I wasn't about to let my niece stay in foster care," she said.

Tennessee was skeptical Lucas would be a good parent. The caseworker made Lucas demonstrate repeatedly that she could care for the girl and required that she prove she could lift Heather's wheelchair into her rented van. She visited her niece several times and filled out form after form for almost a year — while the child was in a Tennessee foster home — before Tennessee let her adopt Heather.

Back in Colorado, Lucas ran into trouble. The straps on Heather's wheelchair clearly made her uncomfortable, so Lucas got rid of the restraints. One of Heather's teachers reported Lucas to social services for modifying the chair. Another reported Lucas for failing to cut her daughter's hair, saying she had unrealistically high expectations for the child's social life by letting her hair grow out.

The complaints, though resolved in her favor, were an indication of the scrutiny that disabled parents face.

But that did not stop her from wanting to adopt Ariana, a 7-year-old in a wheelchair whose biological parents were giving her up. In Lucas' home with its lowered sink, Ariana was able to get herself a glass of water for the first time. "It was a level of mobility and access she'd never experienced," Lucas said.

Then Ariana's aunt and uncle decided they wanted to adopt the child. As biological relatives, they had priority. After 10 months, Lucas lost custody.

"Losing my kid was one of the worst things I've been through," Lucas said. It took three years before she was emotionally ready to adopt her other two children.

At the time, Lucas was working as a legal assistant at the Cross-Disability Coalition, where disabled parents sought help to hold on to their children. Even some of the group's disabled executives and board members found themselves fighting for their rights as parents.

"We realized if that's happening to us, who're really connected, who know our stuff, are professionals with advanced degrees, what's happening to other people?" Lucas said.

SHE enrolled in law school at the University of Denver. Her vision began to fail, and she added Braille to civil procedure and evidence as study subjects. She graduated in 2005, by then legally blind but able to scan documents and lip-read at close range.

The Cross-Disability Coalition has another lawyer who mainly handles accessibility and employment discrimination cases, but was eager to have Lucas help parents full time. The group struggled to find a way to fund her position, finally securing a grant from the law firm Greenberg Traurig.

Lee Dancer, 39, feels lucky that he found Lucas. The airport concession worker has an IQ of 73, and social services took his newborn daughter more than two years ago. After years of court battles, Dancer went online and searched for attorneys who could help. "Even though she's got all these disabilities," Dancer said of Lucas, "she doesn't let anyone walk over her."

DOJ_NMG_0139369

It was just in time — the state had moved to terminate his parental rights, which could prevent him from seeing his daughter again.

"This is a very heartbreaking case," Donna Schmalberger, an assistant Arapahoe County attorney, told a judge last month as the trial opened in a suburban courthouse. Dancer and the girl's mother, who has a mild developmental disability, "desperately want to be able to parent [the child] but simply are not able to."

The case is ongoing, and Lucas sees it as another example of the government being too critical of disabled parents. She noted that Dancer had no problems helping to raise a 13-year-old son from another relationship. "Every parent can improve," she said, "but his skills are adequate."

Dancer's daughter is developmentally disabled, and one of Lucas' arguments for disabled parents is that they can serve as strong role models. It's why Lucas has gone out of her way to adopt disabled children.

Back in the Lucas home on that Sunday afternoon, Lucas and her sister split feeding duties. Courtney inserted a syringe of high-protein fluid into the tube that plugs into a shunt in Adrianne's belly while Lucas did the same with Heather. Asiza and Courtney's son Gavin frolicked around the living room.

Talk turned to past family camping trips in wheelchair-accessible cabins and an upcoming vacation to Florida. Then Asiza dashed up to Lucas and said, out of the blue: "Can I be a cowboy?"

Lucas turned in her wheelchair, fixed her glasses at Asiza, and reassured her child with words mothers have used for ages. "You," Lucas said firmly, "can be whatever you want to be."

nicholas.riccardi@latimes.com

NAACP Leader Quits Over Group's Focus (WT/AP)

By Erin Texeira

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

NEW YORK -- NAACP President Bruce S. Gordon is quitting the civil rights organization, leaving after just 19 months at the helm, citing growing strain with board members over the group's style and operations.

"I believe that any organization that's going to be effective will only be effective if the board and the CEO are aligned, and I don't think we are aligned," Mr. Gordon said yesterday. "This compromises the ability of the board to be as effective as it can be."

Mr. Gordon said he will give up his duties before month's end. He spoke to AP by phone from Los Angeles, where he had attended the NAACP Image Awards.

Dennis C. Hayes, general counsel of the Baltimore-based National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), is expected to serve as interim president, Mr. Gordon said. Mr. Hayes filled the same role after Kweisi Mfume resigned the presidency in 2004 after nine years.

Mr. Gordon said that while the NAACP is an advocacy organization, it needs to be more focused on service and finding solutions.

"I'm used to a CEO running an organization, with the board approving strategy and policy," Mr. Gordon said. "But the NAACP board is very much involved."

He said he made the decision in recent weeks and told the board at its annual meeting in New York in mid-February. NAACP leaders were surprised by his decision and engaged in hours of discussion, he said.

"They expressed disappointment," Mr. Gordon said. "We attempted to see whether there was a way to continue, but that didn't happen."

Asked about his plans after leaving the NAACP, Mr. Gordon said: "I'm going to catch my breath."

"What I've clearly learned in my tenure here is that all is not well in black America, that's for sure," he said. "I believe I have a lot to offer. I've got to find a way to be engaged that optimizes what it is I bring to the table. My intention is not to disengage, but to find a different way."

NAACP spokesman Richard McIntire declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0139370

Mr. Gordon, 61, was a surprise pick for the NAACP's top post. When he took over on Aug. 1, 2005, he had no track record in traditional civil rights circles. He had spent 35 years in the telecommunications industry and retired in 2003 from his post as president of the Retail Markets Group for Verizon Corp.

Critics said he wouldn't be a good fit for the nearly 98-year-old organization.

However, he smoothed strained relations between the NAACP and the White House, meeting with President Bush three times in less than a year. He used his corporate ties to lend quick assistance to black New Orleans residents after Hurricane Katrina in 2005. And he hired a number of key national employees whose reputations inspired staff members.

Mr. Gordon "brought a level of competence that we hadn't had," Julian Bond, chairman of the board, said last year.

Mr. Bond has acknowledged that, with 64 members, the NAACP's board of directors is large and sometimes unwieldy. But he has defended it, saying it allows a wide range of members' voices to be heard.

Ronald Walters, a University of Maryland political science professor, was surprised at the news but added that he had suspected that Mr. Gordon may not fit in at the NAACP.

"I thought very early on that there might be a cultural conflict," Mr. Walters said. "Somebody who came out of a corporate culture and was used to a set of agenda items and management style in one field might not have been able to make the adjustment totally to another field."

Willis Edwards, a board member from Los Angeles, said: "We tried a certain type of guy, a business guy. We didn't have a civil rights guy. Maybe he had a different philosophy of what a civil rights organization is about."

Rupert Richardson, a board member from Louisiana, said it was clear Mr. Gordon wanted the NAACP to do more social service work, but that was not the decades-old mission of the group.

"I think he saw his job as remaking us to make us more effective, but his job was to do what the board and management wanted," she said. "He was not a good fit for us."

President Is Leaving N.A.A.C.P. (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 4 — The president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People said on Sunday that he was stepping down after only 19 months on the job, signaling divisions within the organization, the nation's oldest and largest civil rights group.

The president, Bruce S. Gordon, 61, a former Verizon executive who was relatively unknown in the civil rights community when he was tapped to run the N.A.A.C.P., said he resigned because of differences with the board over his role and the direction of the organization.

"In order for any organization to be effective, there has to be a tight alignment between the C.E.O. and the board," Mr. Gordon said. "That alignment in this case does not exist."

In interviews, black leaders close to the organization said the reasons behind his departure stemmed from a dispute over its future role in a nation where the battlefront for civil rights has shifted.

"We want it to be a social justice organization; he wanted it to be more of a social service organization," said Julian Bond, the chairman of the N.A.A.C.P. board. "Our mission is to fight racial discrimination and provide social justice. Social service organizations deal with the effects of racial discrimination. We deal with the beast itself.

"There are many organizations that provide social services," Mr. Bond continued. "We say, 'Good for them.' But we are one of the very few that provide social justice. It is popular to say that we are in a post-civil rights period, but we don't believe that."

Mr. Gordon said he did not believe that the organization should abandon its civil rights mission but rather that it should expand its role to include providing social services. "This is not an either/or," he said. "There needs to be the right balance between advocacy and service."

"It would be insane to give up on advocacy," he continued. "I just think we can do more than that, and should."

DOJ_NMG_0139371

The news of Mr. Gordon's resignation came on a pivotal day for civil rights advocates, as hundreds of people, including longtime civil rights activists and politicians, traveled to Selma, Ala., to commemorate the 42nd anniversary of Bloody Sunday, a police attack on civil rights protesters that became a turning point in the struggle for black voting rights.

The news shook civil rights advocates and diverted attention from the celebrations in Selma, where Senators Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton, who are running for president, were among those on hand to pay homage to the leaders of the Bloody Sunday march.

"On a day when you had so many positive signs that there was new life in the civil rights movement, to hear of Bruce's departure is surprising and shocking," said Donna Brazile, a Democratic strategist who is black. "We all pray that the N.A.A.C.P. is able to recover and regroup."

Ms. Brazile added, "To have the nation's oldest and largest civil rights organization without a leader is troublesome."

Mr. Gordon made the decision to resign in recent weeks and told the executive committee at its annual meeting in New York City in mid-February, Mr. Bond said.

Mr. Gordon said he would leave the post before the end of the month. Mr. Bond said Dennis C. Hayes, the organization's general counsel, would serve as interim president until a permanent replacement was selected.

When he was named in June 2005 to succeed Kweisi Mfume, a former member of the House of Representatives, as president of the N.A.A.C.P., Mr. Gordon took over a 500,000-member organization that was beset by a series of problems that raised serious concerns about its long-term viability, including revenue shortfalls and stagnant membership.

The organization also faced ethical questions about Mr. Mfume, who had been accused of giving raises and promotions to women at the N.A.A.C.P. with whom he had had relationships. Mr. Mfume denied the accusations and cited the need to spend more time with his youngest son when he resigned.

In taking the helm at the organization in July 2005, Mr. Gordon said he would apply his 35 years' experience in corporate America to push the N.A.A.C.P. toward a more economic-based approach to civil rights, including prodding pension funds and corporations to hire more black managers.

"We've got to get the right emphasis placed on economic equality," Mr. Gordon said in an interview shortly after being named president. "I happen to think that when you have economic stability and equality that often becomes an enabler for social equality."

From the start, there were questions about whether he was a good fit for the organization. Since its founding in 1909, it had been led by lawyers, ministers and, in Mr. Mfume's case, a politician, with backgrounds in the civil rights struggle.

But Mr. Gordon was a creature of the corporate boardroom. After earning a bachelor's degree from Gettysburg College and a master's from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Mr. Gordon went to work at Bell of Pennsylvania and spent the rest of his corporate career in the telecommunications industry. Before retiring from Verizon in 2003, he was president of the retail markets group.

His supporters said his lack of overt political activism and his corporate ties would make it easier for him to work with Republicans, particularly President Bush, who had a strained relationship with the organization. But others in the civil rights movement questioned whether he would lead the group away from its tradition of political confrontation.

Mr. Gordon's difficulties with the board went beyond philosophical differences. Several people close to the organization said he thought the board was too meddlesome and did not give him the authority he felt he should have to run the organization. Members of the board, in turn, resented what they regarded as his belief that they were merely there to rubber-stamp his policies, these people said.

Mr. Gordon made reference to these tensions on Sunday. "I did not take this role to follow orders," he said, while acknowledging that he needed the board to approve his agenda.

The news of Mr. Gordon's resignation caught many people in and out of the organization off guard.

Alice Huffman, a national board member from California, said that she was "stunned" by news of Mr. Gordon's resignation on Sunday and noted that board members had told him before he was hired that the organization's focus was civil rights, not social services.

"He knew that coming in," Ms. Huffman said. "I'm really sad he opted to bail out so soon."

DOJ_NMG_0139372

NAACP President Quits, Cites Conflicts (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Bruce S. Gordon, the former telecom executive who was named NAACP president in a surprise choice less than two years ago, has resigned after a long-running disagreement with the group's 64-member board over how to steward the nation's oldest and largest civil rights organization.

Gordon's confirmation yesterday in Los Angeles that he quit the NAACP's leadership caught numerous members by surprise, including Lorraine Miller, president of the District's chapter, and the Rev. Morris L. Shearin, the chapter's vice president, who also is a member of the national board of directors.

Friction between the president and a micromanaging board is a fact of life at the NAACP, members said, but Shearin said "I never knew" things were this bad.

The Rev. Benjamin Hooks of Memphis, who served as NAACP president for more than 15 years, said in a telephone interview that he was "very surprised" by the resignation because "I thought things were moving along smoothly."

Hooks said his relationship with the NAACP board was also strained when he took over the organization in 1977, but within a short time that changed. "After I had been there a year or two, when they trusted me, I ran it lock, stock and barrel," he said. "But they have to believe in you. I had no trouble for a number of years, but I had trouble at first."

When Gordon, 61, was selected president in June 2005, succeeding former congressman Kweisi Mfume (D-Md.), Hooks said he offered some advice: "I cautioned Brother Gordon that he would have some problems. The board wants to do a number of things."

Dennis C. Hayes, who ran the Baltimore-based organization as interim president after Mfume resigned in December 2004, after nine years at the helm, will again assume that role as a search committee looks for a replacement. Gordon is expected to leave the job by month's end.

Gordon was en route to New York yesterday and could not be reached for comment. NAACP Chairman Julian Bond did not respond to messages.

The Associated Press first reported Gordon's resignation. "I believe that any organization that's going to be effective will only be effective if the board and the CEO are aligned, and I don't think we are aligned," Gordon told the news agency.

In choosing Gordon, the NAACP veered from its tradition of selecting ministers, politicians and civil rights figures. Gordon's strong management skills and fundraising ability as a former Verizon Communications Inc. executive factored into why he was selected to run the 500,000-member NAACP. The organization struggled financially in the mid-1990s before Myrlie Evers-Williams, widow of slain Mississippi civil rights leader Medgar Evers, took over as chairman and began to eliminate massive debt.

The group's $27 million operating budget has been criticized as paltry, and the size of its membership has been the same since the 1940s.

During his tenure, Gordon closed the rift between the 98-year-old NAACP and the White House. In July, President Bush addressed the organization's annual convention in Washington. With the speech, Bush avoided becoming the first president since Warren G. Harding not to address the most recognized black American rights group throughout his term.

The NAACP was among the organizations that strongly challenged the results of the Florida balloting in the 2000 presidential election, which was ultimately decided in Bush's favor. In the run-up to his reelection, Bond referred to far-right members of the Republican Party as "the Taliban wing." Mfume routinely criticized the administration's policies.

In 2004, the Internal Revenue Service threatened to revoke the NAACP's nonpartisan, tax-exempt status because Bond "condemned the administration policies of George W. Bush" in a speech, according to documents provided by NAACP lawyers.

Gordon's push to move the NAACP's headquarters to Washington was embraced by numerous board members, including Bond, but was unpopular with executive committee members because it would increase costs, according to a member who is familiar with the talks.

Education, Education, Education (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0139373

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

It's an article of faith that the key to success in real estate is location, location, location.

For young black boys looking ahead to a difficult walk in life, the mantra should be education, education, education.

We've watched for decades — watched in horror, actually — as the lives of so many young blacks, men and boys especially, have been consumed by drugs, crime, poverty, ignorance, racial prejudice, misguided social pressures, and so on.

At the same time, millions of blacks have thrived, building strong families and successful careers at rates previously unseen. By far, the most important difference between these two very large groups has been educational attainment.

If anything, the role that education plays in the life prospects of black Americans is even more dramatic than in the population as a whole. It's the closest thing to a magic potion for black people that I can think of. For boys and men, it is very often the antidote to prison or an early grave.

A new report from the Center for Labor Market Studies at Northeastern University in Boston tells us that young adults in general have been struggling in the labor market. Many have been left behind by the modest economic recovery of the past few years, especially those with limited education credentials.

The report, which focuses on black males, emphasizes the importance of education in overcoming this tough employment environment:

"For males in each of the three race-ethnic groups (blacks, Hispanics and whites), employment rates in 2005 increased steadily and strongly with their educational attainment. This was especially true for black males, for whom employment rates rose from a low of 33 percent among high school dropouts to 57 percent among high school graduates, and to a high of 86 percent among four-year college graduates.

"The fact that only one of every three young black male high school dropouts was able to obtain any type of job during an average month in 2005 should be viewed as particularly distressing, since many of these young men will end up being involved in criminal activities during their late teens and early 20s and then bear the severe economic consequences for convictions and incarcerations over the remainder of their working lives."

There is no way, in my opinion, for blacks to focus too much or too obsessively on education. It's the fuel that powers not just the race for success but the quest for a happy life. It represents the flip side of failure.

The differences in rates of employment between white men and black men narrow considerably as black men gain additional schooling. After comparing the percentage of the male population that is employed in each race or ethnic group, the Northeastern study found:

"The gap in [employment to population] ratios between young white and black males narrows from 20 percentage points among high school dropouts, to 16 percentage points among high school graduates, to eight percentage points among those men completing 1-3 years of college, and to only two percentage points for four-year college graduates."

For anyone deluded enough to question whether education is the ticket to a better life for black boys and men, consider that a black male who drops out of high school is 60 times more likely to find himself in prison than one with a bachelor's degree.

Black males who graduate from a four-year college will make, over the course of a lifetime, more than twice the mean earnings of a black high school graduate, which is a difference of more than a million dollars.

According to the study, "Black males with college degrees and strong literacy/math skills also are far more likely to marry and live with their children and pay substantially more in taxes to state and national government than they receive in cash and in-kind benefits."

This is not a close-call issue. It is becoming very hard for anyone to succeed in this society without a college education. To leave school without even a high school education, as so many males — and especially black males — are doing, is extremely self-destructive.

The effort to bolster the educational background of black men has to begin very early. It's extremely difficult to turn a high school dropout into a college graduate. This effort can succeed on a large scale only if there is a cultural change in the black community — a powerful change that acknowledges as the 21st century unfolds that there is no more important life tool for black children than education, education, education.

DOJ_NMG_0139374

Governor Gunslinger (NYT)

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

A sleepy breakfast with New York City business and civic leaders last week turned into another lively battleground for Gov. Eliot Spitzer. As he defended his efforts to rein in Medicaid spending, representatives of the hospitals and health workers fumed in the front row, especially when he contradicted their mawkish television ads. When a reporter later mentioned how Mr. Spitzer had come out "guns blazing" at the health establishment, he smiled and warned, "that wasn't guns going."

Using such tactics, the governor has an impressive list of victories so far. In his first two months, he has chalked up reforms of the budget process, state ethics, and a workers' compensation system widely viewed as the worst in the country. A campaign finance reform agreement is also said to be close. These are problems that have been mired for years in Albany's political quicksand.

As with all such successes, there are some problems. In the case of workers' comp, for example, there are still questions about how insurance companies can be persuaded to lower costs of compensation insurance. Mr. Spitzer has also had one notable loss so far, his effort to get an experienced hand to take over as the new state comptroller. The Assembly Democrats chose one of their own.

Mr. Spitzer's one reform to date that is troubling is last week's agreement on civil confinement legislation for dealing with sexual predators. It would be a profound shift in how the state treats those who have already served their time, and would mean locking people up for crimes they might commit in the future. The Legislature should hold new hearings to assess the wisdom of this specific proposal. The Spitzer confinement laws should not become this administration's version of the unfair Rockefeller drug laws.

For all of his early successes, Mr. Spitzer has not yet managed to change the way things get done in Albany. These reforms were largely worked out the old-fashioned way — in the back rooms of the State Capitol. It makes sense that Mr. Spitzer wanted to push through some early victories, but if he plans to succeed over time, he should be doing more to bring the public into the discussion.

Polls show that Mr. Spitzer is enormously popular, and that the public backs his efforts to shake up state government. When the going gets rough, as it surely will, having the strong support of the public may be the most powerful weapon in his arsenal.

ANTITRUST:

The Big Deal Goes Green (TIME)

By Cathy Booth Thomas

Time, March 5, 2007

Al Gore, take another bow. Hollywood is not the only place concerned about global warming. Now Wall Street is worried too. On Feb. 25, the Texas utility TXU Corp. agreed to a proposed $45 billion buyout--the biggest deal ever to take a public company private--with major environmental initiatives attached.

Turns out the barbarians at the gate--Henry Kravis of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and David Bonderman of Texas Pacific Group (TPG)--have a little tree hugger in them. Even before the deal with TXU was sealed, the buyout shops called up environmentalists and, in a 17-hr. meeting at San Francisco's Mandarin Oriental Hotel, agreed to roll back carbon emissions from all TXU power plants to 1990 levels by 2020. Four days later, the company's board accepted the buyout offer, agreeing to drop controversial plans for eight of 11 new coal-fired power plants and to support a federal cap on carbon emissions.

TPG's man in the negotiations, William Reilly, who was Environmental Protection Agency chief under the first President Bush, tells TIME the pre-deal deal with Environmental Defense and the Natural Resources Defense Council was not just a nicety. "Although this might have been doable without an environmental commitment, it would not have been done with us," says Reilly. "If you're going to do an energy investment today, you have to take into account the concerns people have about climate change." The motive is one part caring about the planet and one part turning around the p.r. nightmare that was threatening TXU's future projects.

DOJ_NMG_0139375

The deal has implications far beyond Texas. The Lone Star State is No. 7 in the world for greenhouse gases (emitting more CO2 than Britain), and TXU is the state's biggest corporate contributor. Those 11 coal-fired plants would have thrown off 78 tons of carbon dioxide a year--double the savings expected from California's Clean Cars legislation, passed last year. The buyout firms promised not only to halt eight of the Texas plants but also to terminate plans for coal-fired operations in New Jersey, Virginia and Maryland--a recognition that momentum is growing in Washington for legislation to mandate caps on carbon emissions. On Feb. 26, California and four other states agreed to establish within 18 months a market to trade emission credits. TXU, as part of its agreement, plans to join DuPont, Alcoa, General Electric and seven other firms in pushing Congress for a national cap-and-trade program, that would give companies "credits" for carbon emissions to use--or sell at a profit. It's a win for the environment, notes Reilly, and not bad for the bottom line either.

Intellectual Property Verdicts Exceed $1.3 Billion In 2006 (LAW)

By Sheri Qualters, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, March 5, 2007

Companies -- especially in the tech sector -- are prepared to go to the mat to protect intangible assets

Finisar Corp. employs dozens of Ph.D.-level scientists to create technology for its high-speed data communication components and testing business, but one of the company's most lucrative inventions may be a patent outside of its core business that generated a court victory worth $117.3 million last year.

In June 2006, the Sunnyvale, Calif.-based Finisar won a $78.9 million jury verdict in a patent infringement case against broadcast satellite company The DirecTV Group Inc. of El Segundo, Calif. Although appeals are in the works, fines are racking up, including a judge's $25 million enhancement for willful infringement and $13.4 million for prejudgment interest, post-judgment interest and a compulsory license. Finisar Corp. v. DirecTV Group Inc., No. 05-00264 (E.D. Texas).

Amid a worldwide market expansion for technology products, the Finisar case is one of a burgeoning number of blockbuster verdicts in intellectual property cases. These verdicts exceeded $1.3 billion in 2006, according to VerdictSearch, an affiliate of the National Law Journal, and our own research.

There's a direct correlation between intellectual property jury verdicts and the importance of the technology protected by the patent, said Eric Maschoff, a shareholder at Workman Nydegger of Salt Lake City, who served as Finisar's lead patent prosecution counsel on the case. "Companies are looking more and more towards their intellectual property portfolio as an asset, and they're exploiting that asset," Maschoff said.

Lawyers report that the sheer market size of high-technology products based on the patents in those portfolios can lead to massive infringement verdicts. Companies' rising inclination to bring such cases to trial, and the emergence of high-tech courtrooms that enable the use of animation and other visual aids, also boost the possibility of gargantuan verdicts.

The verdict in Finisar was much lower than Finisar's requested $1.7 billion, an amount representing 3 percent of its gross revenue during the alleged infringement period of about six years, said DirecTV's lead trial lawyer, Victor Savikas, a partner in Jones Day's Los Angeles office.

Savikas also noted the link between a company's sales and a jury verdict in a patent infringement case.

"Successful businesses generate lots of money and become big targets," he said. "DirecTV has millions of subscribers and the damage period is a six-year time span. Creative plaintiffs get a chance to put lots of numbers in front of the jury."

Similarly, annual sales of tens of millions of dollars in the dynamic random access memory (DRAM) computer memory chip market was a factor in Rambus Inc.'s $306.9 million jury verdict against Hynix Semiconductor Inc., said Rambus lawyer Gregory Stone of Los Angeles-based Munger, Tolles & Olson. The Los Altos, Calif.-based Rambus develops and licenses DRAM while Hynix, of Icheon, Korea, makes DRAM chips. Hynix Semiconductor Inc. v. Rambus Inc., No. 00-20905 (N.D. Calif.).

Even after the judgment was reduced on remittitur, Hynix still owes $133.6 million. Another phase of the trial is under way, so it's too soon for an appeal.

"My case reflects a very large industry being involved in a series of problems, from price-fixing to patent infringement," Stone said.

DOJ_NMG_0139376

As of December, the U.S. Department of Justice had fined companies in the DRAM industry more than $732 million for price-fixing.

Hynix lawyer Daniel Furniss of the Palo Alto, Calif., office of San Francisco-based Townsend and Townsend and Crew agreed that DRAM's "huge royalty base" played a role in the numbers.

"There's DRAM in every computer in the world," Furniss said. "Every computer has at least five and more likely 15 or 20. You have a large base."

A global market and colossal sales of technology products are part of the story. A willingness to take disputes all the way through a trial is another factor, said Larry Laycock, a Workman Nydegger partner who led Finisar's trial team.

Earlier in his career, Laycock saw many cases like Finisar settle before trial. "The rise in the number of large verdicts is due to the number of cases wending their way to trial," he said.

Finisar, for example, decided several years ago to develop its patent portfolio to protect its technology development, and a court case is the next step in that process, said Maschoff. "The [case against] DirecTV is an example of seeing some advantage come out of Finisar's effort," he said. "They're able to use the court system as a means to do that."

Litigation goes through cycles, said Ernie Brooks, president of Southfield, Mich.-based intellectual property boutique Brooks Kushman. Antitrust verdicts were common in the 1960s and 1970s, but today they're rarely seen. These days, the culture is receptive to intellectual property litigation. "It's a question of cultural or societal set of conditions and what legal barriers are in sync and supported by the culture," he said.

Brooks' team won a $115 million verdict against Microsoft Corp. of Redmond, Wash., and $18 million against San Rafael, Calif.-based software company Autodesk Inc. for z4 Technologies Inc., an anti-piracy technology company. Microsoft's verdict has since been enhanced by $25 million for willful infringement, and the Commerce Township, Mich.-based z4 reached a confidential settlement with Autodesk. z4 Technologies Inc. v. Microsoft Corp., No. 06-00142 (E.D. Texas).

Although verdicts of more than $10 million are increasingly common, Professor Paul Janicke at the University of Houston Law Center, who has tracked jury verdicts in the Eastern District of Texas, concluded that tales of runaway patent juries are "strictly anecdotal." Janicke has seen plenty of verdicts below $3 million, including some below $1 million.

Janicke is studying intellectual property verdicts at such top jurisdictions as the Central and Northern districts of California and the Eastern District of Texas, along with Delaware, a lower-ranked but popular East Coast venue.

"My feeling is that [verdict averages are] a lot lower than the financial press has been suggesting," Janicke said.

Because ending the infringement is often the chief objective, many companies file patent infringement cases soon after a violation begins. Quick filings produce small accumulated damages, he said. "For ongoing business entities, the injunction is what is mainly moving them," Janicke said.

In Finisar's case, the patent covering data transmission via satellite was invented during the company's startup days, but the company never commercialized the technology. Finisar offered licenses to DirecTV's predecessor company and then DirecTV when it learned of the infringement, Laycock said. Finisar has grown into a public company with $364.3 million in annual sales, and enforcing the patent through the courts was "the right thing to do for its shareholders," Laycock said.

Using plain, everyday language is key, said one of Texas Instruments Inc.'s trial lawyers, Liza Walsh of Roseland, N.J.-based Connell Foley. In a case against GlobespanVirata Inc., the team for Dallas-based Texas Instruments used visuals that depicted digital subscriber line (DSL) signals, which are used for high-speed Internet service, as trucks and cars passing each other in lanes.

The visuals helped Texas Instruments seal a $112 million infringement verdict against GlobespanVirata, which was acquired by Newport Beach, Calif.-based Conexant Systems Inc. before the trial, said Walsh, who served as co-counsel on the case with Heller Ehrman attorneys. GlobespanVirata Inc. v. Texas Instruments, No. 03-02854 (D.N.J.).

"If I had any advice it would be make it simple, through plain speaking, plain language, and reduce the technology to something everyday men and women understand," Walsh said.

N.Y. Federal Judge Rebuffs Recusal Motion Citing Clients Of Husband's Firm (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

DOJ_NMG_0139377

New York Law Journal, March 5, 2007

A federal judge has rejected a request that she recuse herself from a high-profile litigation involving the music industry on the ground that her attorney husband and his firm have represented some of the defendants in other matters.

Lead attorneys for plaintiffs in the case expressed concern that because Southern District of New York Judge Loretta A. Preska's husband, Thomas J. Kavaler, and his firm, Cahill Gordon & Reindel, represented several of the music company defendants in other litigation, she might be inclined to tilt toward the defendants.

But Preska rejected the argument in In re Digital Music Antitrust Litigation, 06 MDL 1780, finding that the plaintiffs' motion for recusal was not only time-barred, but was wrong on its merits.

"Courts have uniformly rejected the argument that an appearance of impropriety exists in the following situation: (i) a judge's spouse is a partner in a law firm that represents a litigant in other matters before the judge; and (ii) the spouse did not perform any work at the law firm for the litigant or worked for the litigant on unrelated matters," she said.

Numerous lawsuits have been filed by online music downloaders who claim that the music divisions of Sony, Bertelsmann, Universal, Time Warner and EMI Music North America "conspired artificially to fix or maintain prices" of digital music recordings offered for sale over the Internet in violation of federal and state antitrust laws.

Two of those cases were originally assigned to Preska. She presided over Seley v. Universal Music Group, 06 Civ. 1887, after the case was filed on March 9, 2006, and in Devine v. Universal Music Group, 06 Civ. 4211.

On June 12, 2006, Preska issued a memo in the Devine case informing the parties that her husband and his firm "from time to time" represent Sony, Warner and Universal.

On July 3, 2006, Christopher Lovell, a partner at Lovell Stewart Halebian who represents a plaintiff in the case, sent a letter to the judge asserting a possible conflict. But Lovell did not formally request that the judge recuse herself.

Preska held a conference to discuss the issue on July 26, 2006, and concluded that, because neither her husband nor Cahill Gordon was representing any of the defendants pending before her, "no further action on this issue was warranted." Lovell said his clients agreed, and he did not pursue the matter.

Meanwhile, in March 2006, the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation (JPML) consolidated the more than 30 related lawsuits and transferred them to Preska for pretrial motions. She said it "does not appear" that the recusal issue was raised with, or considered by, the JPML.

The parties participated in a pretrial conference in November 2006, but her purported potential conflict was not raised. Rather, attorneys for the plaintiffs were seeking discovery of information already provided by the music companies to law enforcement agencies in connection with those agencies' investigations relating to the distribution of digital music. Preska ultimately denied the request.

She said the recusal issue was raised for the first time in the consolidated action one month after the initial conference. On Dec. 20, 2006, plaintiffs attorneys John J. Stoia Jr., a partner at Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, and Lovell, in their capacity as co-lead counsel for the plaintiffs, sent Preska a letter requesting additional information concerning "the scope and substance of Mr. Kaveler's and Cahill Gordon's former and/or current representation of [Sony, Warner and Universal]."

Because the judge's husband and his firm had represented some of the music companies in what Stoia and Lovell said was prior similar litigation, they suggested that Preska was more likely to rule in the music companies' favor.

'LIKELIHOOD OF OVERLAP'

Stoia and Lovell stated that "there is a significant likelihood of overlap and interplay between th[e] [Consolidated Action] and the [action] where Kavaler and Cahill Gordon represented Sony Music Entertainment, and ... a companion state action where Cahill Gordon represented Sony Music Entertainment."

They also stated that "[b]ased upon press reports ... [t]he New York Attorney General and the Department of Justice Antitrust Division are investigating whether [D]efendants have restrained trade in the market for digital downloads," and said that they "do not know whether Mr. Kavaler and/or Cahill Gordon have been consulted or are representing one or more of the [d]efendants in these ... investigations."

The music companies responded, arguing that the issue of recusal was untimely, and in any event, meritless. On Jan. 18, 2007, they offered an affidavit by Kavaler, Preska's husband, stating that, during 2006 Cahill Gordon logged fewer than 30 hours out of a total of 200 hours chargeable to Sony BMG on the supposedly overlapping cases.

"Moreover, my husband averred that he 'was not the partner with day to day involvement in the matters,'" Preska said. "My husband further averred that billable hours chargeable to Sony BMG Music Entertainment represented fewer than approximately .05 percent of Cahill Gordon's total hours billed in 2006."

Stoia and Lovell wanted to know if Cahill Gordon was involved in representing any of the major music companies in any "governmental investigations relating to digital music." In his affidavit, Kavaler said it did not.

The co-lead plaintiffs attorneys then sent a Jan. 31, 2007, letter asking for additional information from Kavaler.

He submitted a supplemental affidavit on Feb. 8, 2007, in which he said the partner at Cahill Gordon with "day to day" involvement with certain possible overlapping cases and issues was Dean Ringel. Kavaler therefore said he would not be the "appropriate person" from the firm to testify as to these issues.

Stoia and Lovell did not formally make a motion for recusal, but Preska construed the two letters sent by them as one.

FOUR FACTORS

In reviewing the timeliness of the recusal motion, the judge cited to Apple v. Jewish Hosp. & Med. Ctr., 829 F.2d 326, 333 (2d Cir. 1987), in which the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals set out four factors to consider when deciding whether a recusal motion is timely: (i) "the movant has participated in a substantial manner in trial or pretrial proceedings"; (ii) "granting the motion would represent a waste of judicial resources"; (iii) "the motion was made after the entry of judgment"; and (iv) "the movant can demonstrate good cause for delay."

Preska said the third factor was not relevant in this case, but the remaining factors all weigh in favor of finding the motion for recusal untimely. She said both Lovell and Stoia participated in a substantial manner, and held that it would be "inefficient and contrary to the purpose of the rules of multidistrict litigation" for her to recuse herself.

"Granting the motion for recusal would clearly represent a waste of judicial resources of this Court and the JPML," she said.

Noting that the recusal issue was not raised until after she ruled against the plaintiffs on the discovery requested at the initial conference, the judge said she could not exclude the possibility that the plaintiffs were "dissatisfied with this decision and now seek a second bite at the apple before a different judge."

In reviewing the merits of the request, Preska said her husband has worked for some of these defendants in prior, assertedly related litigation.

"Nevertheless, courts which have addressed this situation have concluded that a spouse's or child's work on ongoing, related litigation does not rise to the level of an appearance of impropriety," she said, citing to Microsoft Corp. v. United States, 530 U.S. 1301, 121 S.Ct. 25, 26 (2000).

Preska finally said she had no financial interest in outcome of the case because her husband's firm was not appearing in the matter.

Kavaler declined to comment on his wife's decision, as did Kenneth R. Logan, a partner at Simpson Thacher & Bartlett who represents defendant Warner Music Group.

Stoia did not return calls for comment, but Lovell called the situation unpleasant and "awkward."

He said he signed the letters to Preska in the consolidated case not on behalf of his clients, but as co-lead counsel for the class.

Judge Dismisses Lucent Patent Suit Against Microsoft (WSJ)

By Roger Cheng And Carmen Fleetwood

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

A federal judge ruled that Microsoft Corp. did not violate an Alcatel-Lucent patent for speech recognition.

This is the second of several patent disputes between the two companies. Last week, a jury awarded1 Alcatel-Lucent $1.5 billion from Microsoft in regards to violating two patents involving MP3 technology.

DOJ_NMG_0139379

U.S. District Court Judge Rudi Brewster in San Diego dismissed all claims late Thursday regarding the speech-recognition dispute so that the jury trial set to start later this month will not happen. But Alcatel-Lucent intends to continue pursuing its options in the case.

"We plan to appeal this decision and are comfortable with our chances of success as the case makes its way through the legal system," said Alcatel-Lucent spokeswoman Joan Campion.

"This ruling reaffirms our confidence that once there's judicial review of these complex patent cases, these Alcatel-Lucent claims ultimately won't stand up," said Tom Burt, Microsoft corporate vice president and deputy general counsel.

Open Call From The Patent Office (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

The government is about to start opening up the process of reviewing patents to the modern font of wisdom: the Internet.

The Patent and Trademark Office is starting a pilot project that will not only post patent applications on the Web and invite comments but also use a community rating system designed to push the most respected comments to the top of the file, for serious consideration by the agency's examiners. A first for the federal government, the system resembles the one used by Wikipedia, the popular user-created online encyclopedia.

"For the first time in history, it allows the patent-office examiners to open up their cubicles and get access to a whole world of technical experts," said David J. Kappos, vice president and assistant general counsel at IBM.

It's quite a switch. For generations, the agency responsible for awarding patents, one of the cornerstones of innovation, has kept its distance from the very technological advances it has made possible. The project, scheduled to begin in the spring, evolved out of a meeting between IBM, the top recipient of U.S. patents for 14 years in a row, and New York Law School Professor Beth Noveck. Noveck called the initiative "revolutionary" and said it will bring about "the first major change to our patent examination system since the 19th century."

Most federal agencies invite interested parties to weigh in on proceedings, and even the patent office allows some public comment, but never to the degree now suggested .

Until now, patent examiners rarely sought outside opinions, instead relying on scientific writings and archived records of previous patents. For security reasons -- in particular, out of concern that examiners could inadvertently reveal proprietary information if their online searches were tracked -- patent officials have at times even been barred from using the Internet for research.

But their mission has grown increasingly unwieldy. Last year, the agency's 4,000 examiners, headquartered in Alexandria, completed a record 332,000 applications. The tremendous workload has often left examiners with little time to conduct thorough reviews, according to sympathetic critics.

Under the pilot project, some companies submitting patent applications will agree to have them reviewed via the Internet. The list of volunteers already contains some of the most prominent names in computing, including Microsoft, Intel, Hewlett-Packard and Oracle, as well as IBM, though other applicants are welcome.

Brigid Quinn, a spokeswoman for the patent office, said the program will begin with about 250 applications from the realm of software design, where it is especially difficult for examiners to find related documentation. Unlike specialists in many other fields, software designers often forgo publishing their innovations in technical journals and elsewhere.

Anyone who believes he knows of information relating to these proposed patents will be able to post this online and solicit comments from others. But this will suddenly make available reams of information, which could be from suspect sources, and so the program includes a "reputation system" for ranking the material and evaluating the expertise of those submitting it.

With so much money riding on patent decisions -- for instance, a federal jury ordered Microsoft last month to pay $1.52 billion for infringing two digital-music patents -- the program's designers acknowledge that the incentive to manipulate the system is immense.

"I'm sure there will be a degree of gaming. There always is," Kappos said.

DOJ_NMG_0139380

Maintaining a reliable Web-based reputation has become an increasingly pressing concern for Web companies as they seek to reassure users that they can trust the strangers they do business with online. So the designers of the new patent-review system consulted some of the Internet's leading experts on reputation, Noveck recounted. These included specialists from eBay and Rob Malda, aka CmdrTaco, the founder of the popular technology Web site Slashdot.org.

EBay, for example, established its position as the Web's premier auctioneer after pioneering a public feedback system that has buyers and sellers rate one another based on customer service, the quality of the goods, and timeliness of delivery and payments. Amazon.com, the Web's leading bookseller, provides reviews of its offerings, then allows readers to rank its reviewers based on the usefulness of their evaluation.

The new patent system will try to help separate experts from posers by offering extensive details about the people sending information to the site. To help others evaluate the quality of this information, called prior art, each posting will include several measures gauging the quality of his other contributions to the site. Patent examiners, for instance, will award "gold stars" to people who previously submitted the most useful information for judging earlier applications, Noveck said.

Ultimately, those registered to participate in this online forum will vote on all the nominated information, and the top 10 items will be passed on to the examiner, who will serve as the final arbiter on whether to award a patent.

Noveck said the online program would not only produce better information for examiners to consider but also make the patent process more democratic. "The idea is to make something as important as decision-making about innovation more transparent to the public and more accountable to the public," she said.

During discussions about the patent review project, its developers initially considered limiting or weighting the votes to reflect the expertise of the participants. For the time being, they have instead decided to go with one person, one vote.

But Noveck and others involved in creating the online review system said it was likely to evolve. To assure that the outcome can be trusted, some of those involved in designing the program say some kind of weighted voting system may eventually be required.

"If voting is necessary, you'll have to have some rules about who gets to vote," said Paul Resnick, a professor of information at the University of Michigan.

INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Tribe Slave Descendants Face Uncertainty (HC/AP)

By Sean Murphy Associated Press Writer, The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, March 5, 2007

OKLAHOMA CITY — The Cherokee Nation vote this weekend to revoke the citizenship of the descendants of people the Cherokee once owned as slaves was a blow to people who have relied on tribal benefits.

Charlene White, a descendant of freed Cherokee slaves who were adopted into the tribe in 1866 under a treaty with the U.S. government, wondered Sunday where she would now go for the glaucoma treatment she has received at a tribal hospital in Stilwell.

"I've got to go back to the doctor, but I don't know if I can go back to the clinic or if they're going to oust me right now," said White, 56, a disabled Tahlequah resident who lives on a fixed income.

In Saturday's special election, more than 76 percent of voters decided to amend the Cherokee Nation's constitution to remove the estimated 2,800 freedmen descendants from the tribal rolls, according to results posted Sunday on the tribe's Web site.

Marilyn Vann, president of the Descendants of Freedmen of the Five Civilized Tribes, said the election results undoubtedly will be challenged.

"We will pursue the legal remedies that are available to us to stop people from not only losing their voting rights, but to receiving medical care and other services to which they are entitled under law," Vann said Sunday.

"This is a fight for justice to stop these crimes against humanity."

DOJ_NMG_0139381

Cherokee Nation spokesman Mike Miller said Sunday that election results will not be finalized until after a protest period that extends through March 12. Services currently being received by freedmen descendants will not immediately be suspended, he said.

"There isn't going to be some sort of sudden stop of a service that's ongoing," Miller said. "There will be some sort of transition period so that people understand what's going on."

In a statement late Saturday, Cherokee Nation Principal Chief Chad Smith said he was pleased with the turnout and election result.

"Their voice is clear as to who should be citizens of the Cherokee Nation," Smith said. "No one else has the right to make that determination. It was a right of self-government, affirmed in 23 treaties with Great Britain and the United States and paid dearly with 4,000 lives on the Trail of Tears."

The petition drive for the ballot measure followed a March 2006 ruling by the Cherokee Nation Supreme Court that said an 1866 treaty assured freedmen descendants of tribal citizenship.

A similar situation occurred in 2000 when the Seminole Nation voted to cast freedmen descendants out of its tribe, said attorney Jon Velie of Norman, an expert on Indian law who has represented freedmen descendants in previous cases.

"The United States, when posed the same situation with the Seminoles, would not recognize the election and they ultimately cut off most federal programs to the Seminoles," Velie said. "They also determined the Seminoles, without this relationship with the government, were not authorized to conduct gaming."

Ultimately, the Seminole freedmen were allowed back into the tribe, Velie said.

Velie said Saturday's vote already has hurt the tribe's public perception.

"It's throwback, old-school racist rhetoric," Velie said.

"And it's really heartbreaking, because the Cherokees are good people and have a very diverse citizenship," he said.

Miller, the tribal spokesman, defended the Cherokees against charges of racism, saying that Saturday's vote showed the tribe was open to allowing its citizens vote on whether non-Indians be allowed membership.

"I think it's actually the opposite. To say that the Cherokee Nation is intolerant or racist ignores the fact that we have an open dialogue and have the discussion, he said.

___

On the Net:

Cherokee Nation: http://www.cherokee.org/

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Sending Investigators To Guatemala Ahead Of Bush Visit (MCT)

By Nancy San Martin, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, March 5, 2007

GUATEMALA CITY - Three murdered Salvadoran legislators. Four cops, suspected in the killings, themselves shot to death in a maximum security prison. Broken government agencies. And more questions than answers.

That's what FBI investigators will face when they arrive this week to help sort out the stunning murders, which have highlighted the wave of drug-fueled corruption and crime lashing a country President Bush will visit in seven days.

"The number of murders in this country is offensive and, unfortunately, authorities have done little to stop the blood bath," said the government's own Human Rights Ombudsman Sergio Morales.

Authorities and activists say the problems date back to a decade-old peace treaty that ended a bloody civil war but did little to cleanse the ranks of a historically violent police and other security forces.

"We had 30 years of war, with more than 100,000 dead, and no tribunals were ever carried out," said Interior Minister Carlos Vielmann. "Then we had 10 years of the formation of a new police force, but again, there was no serious action to resolve internal problems."

DOJ_NMG_0139382

Luis Ramirez, an analyst with the watchdog Guatemalan Institute of Comparative Studies on Penal Science, said that while the 1996 peace accord called for dismantling the old police force, a new one was never really created.

"They changed uniforms but everything stayed the same," Ramirez said. "Historical problems have now come to surface. These murders are like an x-ray: They show the profound problems that exist."

Add the corruption and crime generated by drug smuggling - U.S. estimates show that 75 percent of the Colombian cocaine hitting American streets passes through here - and security agencies can be easily overwhelmed.

"It's not that organized crime has penetrated the police force or the Interior Ministry," said Ramirez. "Organized crime is directing the police, the ministry and the military."

The murder rate in this country of 12.7 million rose each year since 1999 and now stands at 45 per 100,000 residents, compared to Florida's five per 100,000 in 2005. Many say that if the recent victims had not been well-known Salvadorans, they would have received little attention.

The gruesome drama began Feb. 19, when the Salvadorans and their driver were found shot and burned to death 20 miles southeast of the capital. They served on the Central American Parliament, which meets in Guatemala City, and were members of El Salvador's ruling ARENA party.

Initially, speculation that a settling of political scores from Central America's old civil wars was sparked by the fact that one of the victims, Eduardo D'Aubuisson, was the son of the late Roberto D'Aubuisson, a founder of ARENA and accused death squad leader in the 1980s.

Three days later, four police officers - including the head of the Guatemalan National Police organized crime unit - were arrested in the killings and jailed in the El Boqueron maximum security facility 40 miles east of the capital.

Three more days later, the cops were shot dead in their cells - killed by either fellow inmates or what witnesses described as a heavily armed group of men wearing prison guard uniforms who drove to the prison in a dark vehicle.

Authorities have arrested 24 prison officials, including its director, lending credence to the allegation that the cops' murders were carried out with inside help. Guatemala's head of criminal investigations was removed from his post and the country's second-highest ranking police official resigned.

Last week, another cop suspected in the Salvadorans' killings turned himself in. Authorities say they are still looking for another policeman and a seventh unidentified person in the first killings.

And on Friday, authorities said they believe other inmates may have killed the four cops. Four guns were found hidden inside a DVD player, a television and speakers.

Evidence clearly points to the four dead cops' involvement in the Salvadorans' murders - their car was reportedly equipped with a Global Positioning System that puts them at the place and time of the killings.

But the rest remains unknown. Why were the Salvadorans killed? Was one or more of them involved in a drug deal gone bad? Was it a simple case of highway robbery? And who killed the jailed policemen?

The FBI team arriving this week will provide technical and scientific support to try to find some answers.

Interior Minister Vielmann said all lines of investigation remain open - from a possible case of mistaken identity "to something much more profound," including ties to organized crime.

"All we've resolved is the part of the operation that ends with the assassinations," Vielmann told The Miami Herald.

Alvaro Matus, the public prosecutor in charge of the Salvadorans' case, told the Herald that while nailing corrupt officers will be difficult "because they know how to operate and try not to leave any evidence behind, we are not going to conceal anything or anyone - not civilians, not police, not military."

But even if that case is solved, the underlying problem persists. Among other incidents in the past six months:

Eight men were shot to death in a restaurant by gunmen who arrived in three cars and opened fire with automatic rifles and pistols.

More than 3,000 police and soldiers stormed the Pavon penitentiary east of the capital, sparking a fierce battle with grenades and automatic rifles that killed seven inmates.

Two former senior anti-narcotics agency officers pleaded guilty in federal court in Washington. They were busted in 2005 after accepting $25,000 from undercover U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents to protect cocaine shipments.

DOJ_NMG_0139383

Guatemalan President Oscar Berger is pressing Congress to create an independent commission to investigate corruption and present its findings for prosecution. And there's a push to reverse laws that require police fired for suspicion of corruption be reinstated unless there's substantial evidence. More than 1,000 police officers have been dismissed on corruption charges in the past 2 1/2 years and about 250 are currently in jail.

But both measures are sure to face resistance from opposition political parties, and activists fear that politics will get in the way of much-needed reforms.

"These cases have presented two doors: one of danger and one of opportunity," said Iduvina Hernandez, director of the independent Association for the Study and Promotion of Security in a Democracy.

"We want to open the door of opportunity to renovate the security system and strengthen the democratic framework," she said. "We want a Guatemala in peace, with social justice."

In Guatemala, Officers' Killings Echo Dirty War (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

GUATEMALA CITY, March 3 — After three Salvadoran congressmen were waylaid and killed on a road in Guatemala last month, it did not take the authorities long to find the culprits: they were Guatemalan police officers, and their unmarked police car had a tracking device that proved they were at the scene.

They quickly confessed, saying they thought their victims were drug dealers, and were sent to a maximum-security prison.

It is a measure of the weakness of the crime-plagued Guatemalan state that what happened just four days later remains something of a mystery — aside from the indisputable fact that the four who confessed ended up dead.

The police and the interior minister say that rioting gang members inside the prison shot and stabbed them. But other inmates and their visitors that day say a group of heavily armed men in military garb and ski masks made their way through seven locked doors and executed them, with no interference from guards, removing any possibility that they could identify co-conspirators.

The two sets of brazen killings set off a vicious diplomatic conflict between Guatemala and El Salvador — heightened by news reports suggesting that the congressmen were indeed drug dealers — and ignited a political scandal here. It shed light on how corrupt the National Police has become, and raised questions about links between drug dealers and high-level police officials, as well as whether the government can contain drug trafficking without international help.

One assistant police chief has been forced to resign and another has been suspended. On Thursday, the interior minister and top police officials appeared before Congress, where they were grilled not only on whether death squads exist inside the police force, but on how the state failed to protect the four officers.

Perhaps more important, the whole episode has exposed to the world the rampant police corruption, lawlessness and drug trafficking that plagues much of Central America, and Guatemala in particular.

This small country of 12.3 million people has more than 5,000 homicides a year, many of them vigilante killings or gangland murders, human rights advocates say. Arrests are made in only 2 percent of the cases.

Drug trafficking fuels the violence, and United States officials say Guatemala's record on taking down drug lords leaves much to be desired. At least two-thirds of the cocaine used in American cities — much of it made from coca cultivated in Colombia and Bolivia — passes through Guatemala, American officials report, and several former military officers have been accused of trafficking.

President Óscar Berger and his minister of interior say they are attacking the problem and point out it was Guatemalan police officers who caught the rogue officers in the first place. Mr. Berger has also backed a proposal to create an international commission to investigate human rights abuses by the police.

Since 1993, the United States has twice helped set up special antinarcotics forces here, only to watch their commanders become embroiled in the drug trade themselves. President Bush is scheduled to visit next week, and American diplomats say the lack of public security here is near the top of his agenda.

DOJ_NMG_0139384

Human rights advocates and opposition politicians have taken the two sets of killings as proof that criminal gangs have corrupted Guatemala's national police force and that groups of officers are operating like drug syndicates, robbing and killing competing dealers.

The squads of rogue officers, human rights experts and others say, are in a sense an outgrowth of Guatemala's long internal conflict. Some former military officers who came of age during the bloody counterinsurgency operations of the 1980's are members of the new rogue squads, according to human rights experts and opposition politicians. They say other members are younger, but have adopted the old practices of assassination and terrorism to combat crime and, sometimes, to line their own pockets.

"The truth, I think, is the problem comes from the end of the armed conflict, when the state tried to protect itself against rebels," said the editor of La Hora newspaper, Óscar Clemente Marroquín. "When the war stopped, the apparatus kept operating the same way but now it doesn't protect the military. Now it protects organized crime."

A high-ranking United Nations official here, who requested anonymity to protect his diplomatic neutrality, said he believed the Interior Ministry and the National Police created death squads over the last three years, trying to combat the wave of violent crime by gangs like the notorious Mara Salvatrucha, a group started in Los Angeles by the children of Central American civil-war refugees of the 1980s.

The officers in those squads belong to evangelical churches, the official said, and see the extrajudicial killings of gang members, known here as "social cleansing," as holy work. But they have also begun to commit crimes for their own profit. "It gets out of their hands," the official said. "They create a Frankenstein."

Otto Pérez Molina, the leader of the Patriotic Party and a candidate for president, has also charged there are at least two separate groups of rogue officers operating within the National Police, each controlled by a deputy commissioner.

Erwin Sperisen, the national police chief, denies that the force harbors death squads, though he acknowledges that his department is riddled with corrupt officers who sometimes commit crimes. Because of strong labor laws and poor vetting procedures, he said, he has not been able to purge the 19,000-member force of officers who came from the two main police forces that controlled the country during the civil war and were schooled in torture and assassination.

"One has to break with this kind of schooling," he said.

At first, the killings of the Salvadoran congressmen appeared to be politically motivated. One of the three was Eduardo José D'Aubuisson, son of Roberto D'Aubuisson, the late Salvadoran right-wing leader and founder of the current governing party. But now many here say Eduardo and the others, along with their driver, were the latest victims of rogue police officers run amok. The three were there to attend a meeting of the Central American Parliament, a regional body.

About 10:30 a.m. on Feb. 19, Luis Arturo Herrera, a decorated officer who was head of the Guatemalan National Police organized crime unit, and three other officers used their unmarked sedan to cut off the congressmen's luxury four-wheel-drive car in front of a shopping center on the outskirts of Guatemala City, prosecutors say.

They forced the driver and Mr. D'Aubuisson into their sedan, leaving the other two congressmen in their car, and then drove both vehicles back down the highway toward El Salvador, where a traffic camera filmed them, according to the prosecutor in charge of the inquiry, Álvaro Matus.

A short time later, witnesses told prosecutors, they also stopped at a gasoline station, where they were joined by at least two other police officers and two people in civilian clothes.

The two cars then continued to an empty stretch of road near the town of Santa Elena Barilla, where according to statements by the four officers, they searched the car and beat the victims, Chief Sperisen said. Later in the afternoon, around 4:30, they went down a dirt road to a farm, where called Las Conchas. There they executed the four men with gunshots, then burned the car and the bodies. Some people living nearby found the remains about two hours later, prosecutors said.

The officers who confessed said they had been told that the congressmen were Colombian drug dealers carrying cash, according to Chief Sperisen. The whole episode appeared to be a botched robbery based on misinformation, he said.

El Salvador's chief of national police, Rodrigo Ávila, agreed that the officers probably intended to rob the group and panicked when they learned who their victims were. "When they realized they were really congressmen is when they made the decision to kill them," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0139385

Mr. Ávila said his government had not ruled out the possibility the police officers were tricked. “They could have been manipulated by someone to hit the congressmen, but we don’t know,” he said.

The Salvadoran president, Elías Antonio Saca, and top security officials have accused Guatemalan authorities of allowing the four officers who confessed to be killed as part of a cover-up. The Salvadorans have also bristled at theories put forward by Guatemalan investigators that the congressmen might have been carrying drugs or illicit cash.

Mr. Matus, the prosecutor, says he still has not determined why the three congressmen were killed.

Nor have prosecutors made much progress getting to the bottom of what happened at El Boquerón prison on Feb. 25.

The warden at El Boquerón and more than 20 guards have been arrested but have shed no light on the matter. The police have discovered pistols hidden in the inmates’ quarters that may have been used in the killings, though some of the shells recovered inside the prison came from assault rifles.

For their part, the inmates maintain they rioted only after the killings, fearing they would become scapegoats. They took hostages and forced the government to send in a television news crew and the country’s human rights ombudsman to hear their version of events.

Family members of the inmates, meanwhile, told local reporters they were ordered out of the prison before visiting hours were over, which they took as a sign the guards knew something was about to happen.

The country’s top prosecutor, Juan Luis Florido, has promised to get to the bottom of both crimes, even if they reach to the upper echelons of the police or government.

But human rights advocates are skeptical. The attorney general’s office does not have the resources, the independence or the strength to investigate the National Police, they say.

“I wouldn’t go so far as to call it a failed state, but it’s very dysfunctional,” said Dan Wilkinson of Human Rights Watch. “The main thing is the drugs and corruption. There is a huge amount of money there. And you have extremely weak institutions that are no match for these organized crime groups.”

Reddit Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, March 5, 2007

A Nelson Mandela for an Earlier Time

Most White House reporters stick to what they know when it comes time to pen a book. But Cox Newspapers correspondent Bob Deans thought bigger. "I found it fascinating to write about the first great leader we know of in English America—Chief Powhatan. "Yes, the father of Pocahontas and the first native big shot the British encountered. In The River Where America Began, Deans charts civilization along Virginia's James and finds the chief to be more than the despot others have called him. If Powhatan had been born today, Deans thinks he knows whom the chief would be compared to: "It's not hard to imagine Powhatan as a kind of 17th-century Nelson Mandela, standing boldly for the cause of his people."

Juicing the GOP Message

Florida's Rep.Adam Putnam, the No. 3 House Republican, isn't shy about his Sunshine State pride. After his alma mater University of Florida Gators won the national football championship, he met with reporters in the Capitol sitting next to an alligator head. Since then, he's talked politics with reporters over jugs of Florida's Natural orange juice, produced from a farming co-op begun in 1933 that his family is a part of. "We try to sweeten the reporters' dispositions," he jokes, and he thinks it's working. "We've been having a couple of good-message weeks."

What's With Watts and Richardson?

It could have been the environment, the Clinton School of Public Service in Little Rock, or the brash frankness of an ex-politician. But former Rep. J. C. Watts, once the House GOP's main communicator and a sometimes entry on Republican vice presidential lists, fessed up at the University of Arkansas last month that he likes Democratic New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson in the 2008 presidential race. "Personally, I'm a Bill Richardson fan," he admits. "I think he has the Bill Clinton touch with people."

A G-Man's Version of Oprah's List

DOJ_NMG_0139386

He's no Oprah. But FBI Director and avid reader Robert Mueller has started a new bureau reading list to help his G-men broaden their horizons. The list has more than 60 books about the FBI's history, terrorism, intelligence, and professional development. "He just thought," says an insider, "that we must have more formalized intellectual stimulation." Some gems: Public Enemies, by Bryan Burrough, about the birth of the FBI; The Looming Tower, Lawrence Wright's book about al Qaeda's road to 9/11; China, Inc. by Ted Fishman; and Louis Gerstner's Who Says Elephants Can't Dance? about IBM's historic turnaround. We also hear that Mueller's a big fan of former GE bigwig Jack Welch. So naturally, Welch's Winning also gets top billing.

Brown-on-black Violence Plagues South State (SACBEE)

By Aurelio Rojas, Bee Capitol Bureau

The Sacramento Bee, March 5, 2007

Slaying of girl, 14, put a face on city's growing problem.

LOS ANGELES -- It took political officials nearly a month to respond to the slaying of Cheryl Green. Since then, the 14-year-old African American girl has become the face of brown-on-black violence in this city.

The FBI has joined the Los Angeles Police Department in cracking down on gangs. The Police Department, breaking with tradition, has publicly named the city's worst 11 gangs.

And a city-sponsored report has called for an anti-gang Marshall Plan, a reference to the post-World War II strategy of making massive investments to win the peace in former enemy territory.

The racially motivated shooting of the eighth-grader, which occurred Dec. 15 in broad daylight as she chatted with friends, was one of 269 gang-related murders citywide in 2006.

Outside the African American community, widespread outrage that a schoolgirl could be killed because of her color was muffled by the cacophony of the holiday season.

"She was my baby," Charlene Lovett said recently of the youngest of her four children. "She wasn't raised to see colors. I couldn't understand how everyone wouldn't be horrified by this."

African American activists came to her aid, holding rallies to call attention to similar attacks in South Los Angeles neighborhoods where Latinos have supplanted African Americans as the dominant group.

Hate crimes rose 34 percent in 2005 in Los Angeles, the latest year for which statistics are available, and African Americans were the main target. Overall crime is down in the city for the fifth straight year, but gang crime rose 14 percent in 2006.

On Jan. 18, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa held a news conference near where the teenager was killed to announce a plan to "dismantle" the Latino gang blamed for the girl's slaying. He was joined by Police Chief William Bratton and FBI Director Robert Mueller.

By then, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger had delivered his second inaugural address, which he began by boasting that "people from all over the world live in harmony" in California.

In an interview with The Bee two weeks later, the governor conceded "we have a big gang problem." But he said the girl's death did not represent a larger problem in California.

"No matter which country you go to, you always have some instances like that," he said. "You know, the Russian mafia or some kind of gang violence in some country.

"Or if it is soccer fans going crazy and trying to kill each other on the soccer field. ... You know, there's crazy things all over the world."

Members of the California Legislative Black Caucus responded to Schwarzenegger's comments with dismay.

The governor, said state Sen. Mark Ridley-Thomas, needs "to raise his IQ about the problem."

"This is an urgent matter and it needs to be addressed," the Los Angeles Democrat said, adding that the Senate Public Safety Committee on which he sits would take up the issue.

Assemblywoman Karen Bass, D-Los Angeles, said that during town hall meetings she held in black communities around the state she collected "anecdotal" evidence that brown-on-black crime is on the rise elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0139387

"We know that every time there is a study about hate crime, that African Americans are the No. 1 figure," she said when the caucus recently released its "State of California" report. "I think it's absolutely important that we address that."

Assembly Speaker Fabian Núñez, D-Los Angeles, told the caucus that racial violence is escalating in other cities as well and will require a unified response.

"We've got to put our heads together and work hard to eliminate what we're seeing in places like Oakland, San Diego, Fresno, Santa Ana and Los Angeles, where we see far too much brown-on-black crime," Núñez said. "We have to put an end to that."

Cheryl Green was gunned down in a hail of bullets while standing near her scooter in the Harbor Gateway area of Los Angeles, east of Torrance.

She was with a group of friends when they were approached by two men. Witnesses and police said that without a word, one man pulled a gun and opened fire, killing Green and wounding three others.

Cash And Cocaine, But No Conviction (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Jurors, Lawyers Reflect on Where Case Prosecuting District's Largest Drug Seizure Faltered

The haul was unprecedented. A wiretap on the cellphone of a reputed drug kingpin led police to a stash house where they found almost 100 kilos of cocaine and nearly $1 million. A force of more than 100 federal and local agents swept up nearly a dozen suspects in raids across the region.

The evidence to put everyone away seemed strong. There were the drugs, the cash and the wiretaps, filled with curious talk of "tickets" -- "little tickets," "VIP tickets" -- code, prosecutors said, for wholesale quantities of cocaine.

And there was the Global Positioning System device, secretly planted in the suspected kingpin's car, tracking his comings and goings between the stash house in Fort Washington and his supposed customers in and around Washington.

Then the case went before a jury in U.S. District Court. The outcome was hardly what authorities would have expected on that October morning a year and a half ago when they found themselves staring at the biggest seizure ever made in a D.C. drug investigation.

The jurors, after deliberating for weeks, deadlocked earlier this year on many charges against alleged kingpin Antoine Jones, including the most serious: conspiracy. And on more than a dozen other counts, the jury came back with verdicts of not guilty. The three men on trial with him, charged with conspiracy as well, fared even better.

Kevin L. Holland and Adrian Jackson were acquitted of all charges; Michael A. Huggins was acquitted of all but one lesser charge, and that eventually was dismissed by the government. All three men, jailed for more than a year pending trial, are now free. Jones remains in jail, awaiting retrial.

It was a stunning loss for prosecutors and police, who claimed they had busted a major drug-trafficking ring with direct links to suppliers in Mexico. But the case had weaknesses that became apparent once it went to trial.

First was the profile of the alleged conspiracy. Unlike cases against other such enterprises, this one did not allege that anyone was killed or even assaulted by Jones or his alleged co-conspirators. Although the absence of violence was a relief for investigators, it also could have had consequences with the jury, lawyers said.

"If there's blood in the case, it kind of spreads out to everybody," said Jon W. Norris, who won an acquittal for Jackson. "But when there's not, the jury can really evaluate the evidence against each person -- as they're supposed to."

Nothing in the law requires prosecutors to present evidence of violence to prove a conspiracy to distribute narcotics. And whether the lack of bodies was pivotal in this case is a question that veteran prosecutors debate.

But experience tells many prosecutors that a body, or two or three, can make juries more apt to tie defendants together in a conspiracy and return verdicts in which everyone shares blame.

Without the sort of violence people have come to expect from major drug gangs, a case such as the one against Jones can seem more like an elaborate financial crime, lawyers say. A jury may see a lot of money and perhaps a bit of greed, but it doesn't see any pain and perhaps doesn't feel much emotion. And that could sway a case.

DOJ_NMG_0139388

Before they were convicted in 2003 of murder, racketeering and other offenses, Kevin Gray and Rodney Moore, two of the biggest players in the District's drug trade, left a long trail of blood that ultimately landed them in prison for the rest of their lives.

"Everything that I had was somehow connected to drug violence," said Timothy J. Heaphy, the lead prosecutor in the trial of Gray, who was convicted of 19 murders, and Moore, who was convicted of 10.

Prosecutors faced other obstacles in Jones's case. Although all four defendants had previous drug convictions, in this case none of them was caught with or near especially large quantities of cocaine, and Jones was not caught with any drugs. Only the testimony of cooperating co-defendants tied the defendants directly to the supply of drugs passing through the stash house. It wasn't enough for jurors.

"We all just thought the government didn't present the case like they should have," Esther Roberson, 68, said in an interview. It's not that she wasn't troubled by some of what she heard, she said; she just wasn't persuaded. "Sometimes it was a little suspicious, but it wasn't really proved to me."

She and another juror noted that Jones was never photographed entering or leaving the stash house, which was secluded and difficult for investigators to stake out. So what jurors got was video footage of Jones's Jeep outside the house, which he did not own or rent, and the data from the GPS device, which placed the vehicle in the immediate area of the house.

When police arrested Jones at his home in Waldorf, they found more than $60,000 in the Jeep, money prosecutors argued was surely the profits of a drug enterprise but the defense suggested could have been from a club he owned. The jurors interviewed said the source of the cash was unclear.

And if Jones were running so much cocaine, one of the jurors asked, why couldn't police catch him with drugs in hand? "If they're saying he was selling drugs to all those people, I'm sure they could have intercepted him one of those times," said the juror, asking to be identified only as a senior citizen.

In 2005, the activities looked more than compelling to the FBI agents and D.C. police investigators, who concluded that Jones was a key broker for cocaine coming into the Washington area from a Mexican cartel operating around the Texas border town of McAllen. For weeks, investigators monitored Jones's cellphone calls.

Jones, who has drug convictions in the District and Virginia, lives in Waldorf and owned a nightclub in Northeast Washington called Levels. The now-closed club, prosecutors argued, was the hub of the conspiracy, providing a place to launder drug proceeds and a pretense for all the coded telephone talk of "tickets" and "music" -- allegedly terms for drugs.

But "tickets" and "music" can also mean just that. A. Eduardo Balarezo, Jones's defense attorney, said that Jones was a businessman and that his contacts with Holland, Jackson, Huggins and others were business-related and hardly part of any criminal conspiracy.

"My client ran a legitimate nightclub, a successful nightclub," Balarezo said in an interview. "He was a businessman, and the government quite frankly tried to make hay where there wasn't any."

A music promoter, Holland recently said that his ties to Jones were legitimate business dealings and that his past is in the past. Prosecutors are trying to lock him up again, this time as a probation violator -- using the same set of facts already considered by the jury.

At least six people have pleaded guilty in the case, including two who testified for the prosecution. But Jones was the biggest target. He is to be retried on the remaining charges in November. Three other defendants, including one from Mexico, will be tried with him.

When he is back in court, he will face a lot of familiar evidence -- evidence that the prosecutors, Assistant U.S. Attorneys Rachel Carlson Lieber and John V. Geise, argued reflect the unmistakable actions of a drug trafficker, checking on incoming shipments, arranging drop-offs and collecting payments.

In one call to Jones from a cellphone registered to a man in McAllen, the subject is music, ostensibly related to the nightlife business.

Jones is told that the caller is trying to find "some new music" but that it is getting a little rough, according to court papers in the case. But the caller tries to reassure Jones, telling him that he has "good people" who make "good music" and that he is just waiting for them. Jones goes on to tell the caller that he is satisfied with the music he's received so far, that "they love the sound, they love the entertainers, they love it," the papers stated.

DOJ_NMG_0139389

Norris suggested that by putting everyone into the same pot with Jones and charging them all with conspiracy, the government overreached and undermined its case.

"I think they really thought that evidence was going to carry the day," Norris said. But in the end there was very little evidence against the three co-defendants, and the jury acquitted them, he said. "And I think the lack of evidence against those defendants undermined the evidence against Mr. Jones."

Texas Man Convicted Of Cocaine Distribution, Money Laundering (SHREVET)

Shreveport Times, March 5, 2007

A Rowlett, Texas man has been convicted by a Shreveport jury on cocaine distribution and money laundering charges.

Ronald King, 40, was convicted Friday, charged with one count of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine, one count of money laundering and one count of forfeiture, according to a press release from Donald Washington, United States attorney for the western district of Louisiana.

His sentencing is set for June 21 at 1:15 p.m. where he faces a sentence of life in prison, a $4 million fine or both.

“Testimony at trial revealed that King had been distributing cocaine in Shreveport for approximately 20 years,” the release said. “King used a small fleet of vehicles with hidden compartments to transport drug proceeds from Shreveport back to the Dallas area where he and other co-conspirators used financial institutions to launder the proceeds.”

Evidence obtained also showed that King invested some of the money in real estate in Shreveport.

As a result of the investigation, the task force seized more than $40,000 in cash, a house in Shreveport and several firearms, the release said.

King was caught after an investigation conducted by the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force which includes Shreveport and Bossier City police departments, the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Shreveport and the Caddo Parish Sheriff's Office.

Top Bodybuilders Allegedly Received Steroids From Internet Pharmacy (NYDN)

New York Daily News, March 2, 2007

It may shock no one to learn that two world champion bodybuilders may have been using steroids or growth hormone, but two giants of that well-muscled world were among the athletes who received drugs in a shady Internet pharmacy operation, sources have told the New York Daily News.

Eight-time Mr. Universe Ronnie Coleman, a former BALCO client, and top Mr. Universe contestant Victor Martinez were among the many clients in an ongoing, multistate investigation that led to the raids on several pharmacies in Florida this week, a source said. But like the other athletes whose names have been leaked, Coleman and Martinez are not targets.

"We know that thousands of people in New York alone have been getting steroids this way over the Internet," said a law enforcement official involved in the investigation. "But you have got to go after the source, and that is what we are doing."

Also Thursday, baseball officials said they want to talk to Albany County District Attorney David Soares about Angels outfielder Gary Matthews Jr.'s alleged links to a pharmacy in Mobile, Ala., that is part of the investigation.

However, whether the subject is sources or users, the current investigation keeps overlapping with the more famous BALCO case from the San Francisco area. Coleman, listed among clients on the Web site for BALCO founder Victor Conte's nutritional business, shares the record for Mr. Olympia titles with fellow former BALCO client Lee Haney, who worked out with Evander Holyfield, one of the athletes reportedly connected to the newest raids. While both Coleman and Haney have ties to BALCO, neither was ever accused of receiving drugs from the lab.

Returning from Florida Thursday, Soares said as many as 24 people will be rounded up in the days ahead. Rather than finding a hero's welcome, however, Soares was immediately hit with criticism from local law enforcement officials over his tactics, and with complaints from local reporters that he had favored the Albany Times-Union with a scoop when the raids were carried out Tuesday.

In the days since the highly publicized raids and arrests of pharmacists, Albany cops have challenged Soares' claims that steroid abuse is a growing problem in upstate communities, and thus justified his decision to lead raids in Florida. Soares fired back Thursday, saying his police critics have "never focused on anything other than the guy they can pick up and make $500 of overtime on," a strategy he said has doomed the war on drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0139390

"If every member of law enforcement in Albany County was focused on actually putting away criminals instead of arguing with each other and engaging in turf battles, we would have a reduction in the crime rate of about 50 percent," Soares said.

A source with knowledge of the probe said another one of the steroid customers is a supervisor with the Albany Police Department's narcotics squad. Albany cops have been among Soares' most vocal critics.

With Soares and about 2,000 pounds of confiscated documents arriving in Albany Thursday, sources said other pharmacies are soon to be raided, and several employees of Florida pharmacies are expected to surrender to authorities in Albany on Monday. But while Soares defended his decision to go after suppliers and not users, as is the case with most drug prosecutions, attention will remain on the documents and the names they may contain.

"You won't find another Barry Bonds, but there are some names people will know," a source close to the investigation said. But only if the documents are unsealed or if the names are leaked.

The four people arrested Tuesday at Signature Compounding Pharmacy in Orlando - Stan and Naomi Loomis, Michael Loomis and Kirk Calvert - waived extradition Thursday and must surrender themselves in Albany by Thursday.

So far, the names of Holyfield - the former heavyweight boxing champion - Matthews, ex-major league pitcher Jason Grimsley and retired slugger Jose Canseco reportedly have been connected to Applied Pharmacy Services in Mobile.

Mobile-based DEA agents searched Applied in August with a federal warrant, and the Albany Times-Union reported Thursday that two Applied owners had been indicted by an Albany County grand jury. But Arthur Madden, an attorney for the pharmacy's owners, said he had not been told his clients are targets in the investigation or have been indicted.

"I know nothing about a New York State proceeding," he said. "I read this stuff with horrid fascination."

Madden said he doesn't know why his clients, Jason and Sam Kelley, would be targets.

"Applied is not an Internet pharmacy where you go online and fill out a form and some doctor writes a prescription," he said. "It's a real pharmacy, it's a brick and mortar place, it's regulated by the FDA and DEA. It's a licensed pharmacy that dispenses prescriptions written by real doctors."

Internet Brings Drug Dealing Into The Home (ALBANYTU)

By Brendan J. Lyons, Senior Writer

Albany Times Union, March 4, 2007

Placing orders online becomes an easy way to get controlled substances

ALBANY -- Ryan Haight was just 17 when he began suffering from back and joint pain.

He was an honors student, a gifted athlete and, like many teenagers, he knew how to navigate the Internet. When his pain worsened, Haight used his computer to find an Oklahoma pharmacy from which he ordered painkillers and anti-depressants.

A medical doctor he never met provided a prescription for the drugs, and the pharmacy mailed them out.

On Feb. 21, 2001, Haight, a resident of La Mesa, Calif., died at the age of 18 after mixing morphine and two prescription anti-depressants with Hydrocodone, a highly addictive painkiller.

Haight's tragic story has been told to various congressional committees, and it underscores what many federal agencies have acknowledged for years: Internet pharmacies are fast becoming one of the nation's primary delivery systems for controlled substances. The issue took on heightened awareness last week with the raid of several Orlando, Fla., pharmacies that were selling drugs to customers in New York.

The problem is bad, federal authorities say, and becoming worse each year. While police continue to wage their war on street drugs, many law enforcement experts say more needs to be done about Internet pharmacies.

Indeed, a 2005 study by the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse (CASA) showed that abuse of pharmaceutical controlled substances has grown at a rate twice that of marijuana, five times that of cocaine, and 60 times that of heroin, between 1992 and 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0139391

"Perhaps most disturbing is that many of these Internet pharmaceutical sites ... are hiding behind a facade of legitimacy by pretending to ask customers health questions," said Joseph T. Rannazzisi, a Drug Enforcement Administration deputy assistant administrator, in testimony in 2005 before before a House subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations.

"After customers fill out a superficial questionnaire, which is given an even more cursory review, if any, by a doctor employed by the Internet pharmacy, these sites provide pharmaceutical products with no face-to-face medical examination, no tests, no drug interaction screening, and no follow-up care," Rannazzisi added.

Last week, when Albany County District Attorney David Soares helped steer the arrest of several doctors, pharmacists and business owners in a multi-state investigation of illicit pharmacies, he was subsequently criticized, in a politically charged attack, for his decision to prosecute the case.

Yet a review of dozens of reports to Congress in the past eight years shows that federal sentencing guidelines for a conviction of distributing pharmaceutical drugs are weak when compared to the penalties many states impose. In addition, the Food and Drug Administration and other federal agencies have encouraged states to prosecute Internet pharmacy cases, citing a lack of resources at the FDA and other oversight agencies.

The U.S. Government Accountability Office issued a report two years ago showing "that although extensive time and resources are required to locate, charge and convict criminal anabolic steroid dealers, the penalties under the federal sentencing guidelines faced by persons convicted of such offenses do not reflect the seriousness of their crimes or provide adequate deterrence."

The Albany County case has drawn national attention because of its revelation that many professional athletes allegedly obtained performance-enhancing drugs, including steroids, from some of the pharmacies involved. But an agent in the case, and court records, show that many of the pharmacies and doctors targeted in the investigation also routinely prescribed controlled substances that include Hydrocodone, Vicodin and other addictive substances.

In some ways, the investigation is similar to a law enforcement initiative to detect and arrest pedophiles who troll the Internet for victims. To combat the problem, the Albany and Guilderland police departments and several other area law enforcement agencies have assigned officers to a cyber-crime task force at the Albany FBI facility.

There, the officers comb Web sites for pedophiles, routinely arresting suspects from other areas and states who are then prosecuted locally. The Internet, law enforcement experts say, has blurred jurisdictional boundaries and is forcing many local prosecutors to take on multi-state prosecutions of crimes such as identity theft, fraud, sexual misconduct and drug dealing.

James A. Dahl, the retired assistant director of the FDA's Office of Criminal Investigation, warned Congress two years ago that Internet pharmacies had become the next front in the war on drug abuse.

"The problem of foreign and domestic Internet sales of controlled substances and other dangerous pharmaceutical products is a large and complex issue that appears to be growing exponentially," Dahl said. "The only real concern of the owners of these Internet operations is not the health and well being of the consumer, but their ability to collect payment through the credit card used for the purchase."

In February 2005, an article in U.S. News and World Report magazine disclosed that prescription-drug abuse was rising in all age groups, especially among teenagers. The magazine reported that one in 10 high school seniors has tried the pain killer Vicodin without a prescription, and 1 in 20 has taken the potent pill OxyContin.

Another study by the federal government has shown that nearly 3 percent of high school seniors use steroids, a figure that is climbing. In addition, children as young as 13 now experiment with steroids, according to an FDA report.

"For young people in particular, online pharmacies seem especially seductive. For this generation, the Internet is a familiar medium and it feels safe," said U.S. Rep. Ed Whitfield, R-Ky., during a hearing on Internet pharmacies in December 2005 before the House Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations. "The seduction and convenience of the Internet coupled with the wide availability of controlled substances raises a disturbing prospect of many young people hooked on drugs with the ease of logging on to a computer."

The prosecution undertaken by Soares' office, which began in 2005, has resulted in several arrests of New York residents, including a Colonie man, Daniel Mori, who was arrested in January on charges of insurance fraud, drug possession and hindering prosecution for allegedly trying to warn others about the Albany County grand jury investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0139392

Signature Pharmacy of Orlando, which was raided Tuesday, is a registered out-of-state pharmacy in New York and did nearly $10 million in sales here over the past two years, authorities said.

Orlando's Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation, staffed by federal and state law enforcement agencies, is one of the lead agencies in the case. The bureau convinced Albany County authorities to get involved in the investigation after Orlando investigators found "many of Signature's doctors, as well as a large part of their business, were located in New York," according to an internal memorandum provided to state officials recently by Albany prosecutors.

Several people arrested in the case are scheduled to appear in Albany County Court this week on sealed indictments charging them with felonies that include criminal diversion of prescription medicines and insurance fraud.

Schumer Calls For HGH Regulation (NSDY)

By Daniel Wagner

Newsday, March 4, 2007

Following last week's steroid bust that implicated professional and college athletes, and high school coaches, Sen. Charles Schumer yesterday proposed additional federal regulation of a substance he said has become the "drug of choice" for those seeking a quick boost in athletic performance.

"All of a sudden, there are these illegal online pharmacies that have been set up ... and they have engaged in a crooked scheme with doctors," Schumer (D-N.Y.) said. "The doctors have become no more than drug dealers -- they've given up their oath."

He said human growth hormone, or HGH, is popular because it is harder to detect in drug tests and more difficult to prosecute than anabolic steroids, which are illegal to possess without a prescription. Distributing HGH for non-approved medical uses is already illegal under federal law.

Under Schumer's proposal, HGH regulation would be put on a par with current steroid laws, and federal law enforcement would be able to prosecute doctors who write prescriptions "in bad faith" -- an act already illegal in New York State.

Schumer made the announcement with Albany County District Attorney David Soares, whose year-long, multistate investigation led to last week's sting in Florida. Soares' office took the lead because those implicated could be prosecuted under tougher New York laws, spokeswoman Heather Orth said. She said federal prosecutors need a law like New York's to "get these drugs out of the hands of anyone from professional athletes to kids in high school."

Schumer also said in an interview that there would be "many more" arrests today in addition to four in Florida last week. Those defendants will be arraigned in Albany today. Neither Schumer nor Orth would elaborate; she said there will be more information today.

Governmental concern about HGH is nothing new.

In 2001, the Drug Enforcement Administration acted against a California doctor who had given an agent HGH during a 1994 investigation. And last year, the federal sentencing commission requested public comment on how HGH violations should be punished under amendments to a 2004 anti-steroid law.

Marigolds Make Way For Marijuana In Suburbia (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 5, 2007

SNELLVILLE, GA.

The only permanent residents in the manicured, multigabled ranch east of Atlanta were illegal.

No, not that kind. They were little green creatures of the cannabis family – in short, marijuana plants.

Raids on 40 houses in 12 suburban Georgia counties over the past two weeks are one recent sign of what police say is a national trend in marijuana marketing: growing the illicit crop year-round indoors, using suburban homes as "grow-houses."

Grow-houses – a spacious incarnation of the old grow-room – have proliferated like suburban-garden gnomes, as antidrug squads have chased growers off remote mountainsides and out of cornfields. In these basements, lights hum with thousands of watts across a sea of plants lodged in a hydroponic soup of nutrients. Upstairs, there's usually no furniture, police say, except a cot, a chair, and a rabbit-ear TV.

"It's the most impressive thing I've seen in 20 years of law enforcement," says Lt. Jody Thomas of the Fayette County Drug Taskforce.

Police say the 'burbs give growers a degree of solace and safety, protected by suburbia's premium on privacy and even a 2001 US Supreme Court ruling that prevents law officers from aiming heat-sensing equipment at homes unless they first obtain search warrants.

The trend also signals that "production is moving closer to consumption" – a path that leads straight to the suburbs, says Jon Gettman, editor of the Bulletin of Cannabis Reform in Lovettsville, Va., which promotes legalizing marijuana for medicinal use.

Alarm about suburban pot-growing is rising, and some worry that efforts to eradicate crops grown outdoors are driving the illicit industry to become more entrenched in middle-class America, a la Showtime's hit TV show "Weeds," about a suburban mom who sells pot.

"This is horrifying," says Sue Rusche, president of National Families in Action, which works to help children and teens resist drug use.

In the early 1980s, 80 percent of marijuana on US streets was imported, mostly from Mexico, according to the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML), which works to stop arrests of marijuana smokers. Today, 40 percent of the supply is grown domestically – about half of it indoors under high-wattage lights that turn dank basements into sweltering hothouses.

While outdoor growing is risky and the results inconsistent, indoor growing, which began 30 years ago, has become a science, as amateur botanists produce potent varieties in controlled environments. Experts say it was only a matter of time before syndicates began applying basic black-market principles: higher potency and consistent yields equal more profit.

"It's Adam Smith 101," says Allen St. Pierre, executive director of NORML in Washington. "In a world of prohibition, if you can grow it in your little suburban home and cure it properly, it goes right to the top of the market and you see an incredible level of profit that all the other dealers don't enjoy."

Here's how it worked, according to Fayette County's Lieutenant Thomas: A wealthy buyer tied to a group of Cuban nationals in Miami bought homes in the endless suburbs of metro Atlanta. So as not to raise suspicion, growers illegally cut into public utilities such as water and electricity. Fences would go up in the backyards, and basement windows would be blacked over. "Baby sitters" would arrive late at night in pickup trucks, often talking on cellphones. Sometimes they would live in the homes on cots.

Harvested at 90-day intervals, the cured "buds" fetched as much as $6,000 a pound in New York City, where most of the suburban Atlanta crop was shipped. Police say a single house could yield more than $1 million in profit a year. Others say the figure is probably lower because authorities often overestimate per-plant yields.

Georgia has lagged behind in indoor busts, with just one last year. The US government eradicates some 3.5 million marijuana plants each year, mostly outdoors, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration. Of some 800,000 marijuana-related arrests in 2005, 90,000 were for trafficking or growing, according to the FBI. The bureau does not further break out its numbers, but experts say growers by far make up the fewest number of arrests.

"We would never have found it without this tip from Florida," says Thomas, referring to a similar series of busts of the same organization in the Miami area earlier this year. "It's so extravagant, yet it has some amount of legitimacy. There's often a car parked in the yard, but no traffic in and out, no buyers."

Growers may have had several reasons for setting up shop in subdivisions like Summit Chase here in Snellville. A key one, though, is the privacy ethos. Darrell Lamb, a local high schooler, says the smell of pot would "slap me across the face" as he and some friends shot arrows in the nearby woods. But he never called the police.

Pat Edwards, who lives across the street, says privacy and anonymity trumped suspicion of the "unfriendly" men who tended the house at 2851 Creekwood Drive, but who evidently did not live there.

"Nobody really speaks to each other on this street, and that's how we all like it," she says. "Maybe these guys sensed that."

Still, people talk. Pre-bust, the biggest gossip in the neighborhood was how the house at 2851 Creekwood fetched one of the highest sales prices in the subdivision, $219,000. Post-bust, speculation centered on whether it would affect property values.

DOJ_NMG_0139394

Closing up a yard sale across the street, Ms. Edwards struck a pragmatic note as she looks to leave the city for her childhood home in south Georgia.

"Maybe they want to buy my house," she jokes. "I've got a big basement."

Bust Yields Bumper Crop Of Pot Farms In Basements (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 5, 2007

Until the cops showed up, people living in the Cloister subdivision in Lawrenceville thought lawns were the most pampered grass in their neighborhood.

But, as it turned out, in the basement of the quiet home at 2350 Friars Gate Drive, somebody was growing marijuana. This wasn't your garden variety home-stash plant under a grow light.

This was big.

About 500 plants worth of big, said police.

Each four feet tall, the potted plants were arrayed like row crops in the huge basement. They were hydroponic — grown without soil — and irrigated and fed by a elaborate network of pipes. Grow lights were set up to burn at different intensities and hours to imitate the seasons.

The growers had invested tens of thousands of dollars in heating and air conditioning upgrades to create a semitropical climate where the air was a slightly humid 81 degrees.

To save money — the operation can burn about $2,500 worth of electricity a month — and avoid detection by electric meter, the growers had hotwired the power system, digging a hole and tapping into an underground electrical line.

The discovery of the basement pot farm shocked residents. But for authorities, last week's bust was part of an improbably predictable pattern.

The Friar's Gate raid — which resulted in the arrest of Eduardo Rodriguez-Ibarra, 43, Jose Felipe-Bruno, 35, and Jorge Gonzalez-Sanchez, 36 — was the 34th home basement marijuana farm found in 13 metro Atlanta counties in the last three weeks.

"This is amazing, and it's not over yet," Capt. Mike Pruitt, commander of the Fayette County Sheriff's Office Drug Task Force. "It's like a snowball rolling down a hill. It just keeps getting bigger and bigger."

Pruitt, a 27-year veteran of drug enforcement, has become the defacto drug enforcement czar of the case by channeling information his investigators obtained after the Feb. 13 arrests of Merquiades Martinez, 35, and Blanca Botello, 34, in Fayetteville, to other police agencies. The husband and wife team masterminded the network of underground pot farms, police say.

The couple, and 24 others nabbed in the first bust, are charged with manufacturing and trafficking marijuana.

Steve Harris, an attorney for Botello, said she knew nothing about the pot growing operation. She and Martinez are scheduled to appear in Fayette Magistrate Court on Tuesday.

When Fayette County District Attorney Scott Ballard held a press conference on Feb. 14, he said it was a $12 million drug enterprise, involving 12 homes. The number of homes has since almost tripled, and the number of people arrested is more than 40.

Friday morning, Pruitt's office was a hubub of activity. The phone rang constantly. One minute, it was an investigator. Another minute, it was the Fayette DA calling about the case. After another call, Pruitt hung up wearily.

"Looks like there could be two more, maybe, in Barrow County," he said. "And now it sounds like somebody from Lawrenceville drove a truck down there and dumped a load of pot in Tampa [Fla.] — they're running scared."

Authorities still won't say how long Martinez and Botello allegedly have been in the basement-grown pot business. She was a licensed ReMax Realtor who sold at least six of the houses that have been seized by police. Those purchases were made in 2005, Pruitt said.

Police say Botello was in on the scam and found and sold houses to operatives knowing they would convert basements to pot farms.

DOJ_NMG_0139395

But cops didn't pick up the scent until they got a call about three months ago from an investigator with the Drug Enforcement Agency in Miami. "All he gave us was a name, Merquiades Martinez, and information that he was a master grower," Pruitt said.

Martinez ran a garden supply store just north of Fayetteville in a rundown strip shopping center on Georgia 85, next door to an alternator repair shop and an abandoned pool hall.

According to county business records, he obtained the business license for Panoramic Garden Hydroponics in Botello's name, in June 2006.

From the outside, the store appears anything but prosperous. A sign on the door reads "Walk-ins welcome." But few did, said investigators who staked out the place.

The store — which had shelves of plant food and books on hydroponic gardening — was usually closed during the day. Martinez would drop by at night, often pick up a few things, then head off to destinations around metro Atlanta.

"To be honest with you, we thought we'd find three or four houses at most," Pruitt said.

But after two months of tracking Martinez's movements, the investigators had connected him to 11 homes in Fayette, Henry, Coweta, Butts, Newton and Rockdale counties. The houses all had a similar setup.

They were new homes, pricey ($300,000 to $450,000), had big finished basements (1,500 to 2,500 square feet) and were in upper middle class neighborhoods, often widely spaced from neighbors.

Every home had a "baby sitter" who slept upstairs with spare accommodations — often just an inflatable mattress, a TV, a few pots and pans in the kitchen — and monitored the plants. The sitter followed instructions, written in Spanish, on the care of the crop. Many of the homes had red ribbons on front doors or on mailboxes, and good luck symbols of Santeria, an African-based religious practice, similar to voodoo, that originated in Cuba and Brazil. Investigators also found garlic cloves placed behind TV sets and in other locations in some of the houses.

The crops were harvested in 90-day cycles, said Pruitt. The marijuana is a potent hybrid, water-grown under controlled conditions and known as "hydro." It sells for six times as much as Mexican outdoor grown pot, said Pruitt.

"This hydro stuff goes for $3,600 a pound in Atlanta," he said. "But a lot of this is being shipped to New York City, where it sells for $6,000. It's really potent. The THC (the active ingredient that makes a user high) just drips off the leaves."

When investigators arrested Martinez at a pot house he allegedly set up in Coweta, they also served a search warrant on his garden supply store and seized his computer and paper records.

Those records became the blueprint for investigations and arrests across the rest of the metro area, including four drug house busts last week in Gwinnett. The revelation that the pot houses were stealing electricity alerted power companies who are also now a part of the investigation.

"They were having power surges, and they couldn't figure out why all the fuse panels were getting blown," said Pruitt. "Now they know. So, anywhere they're having transformer problems, they're letting us know. We've hit a few houses based on their information and haven't missed yet."

Ruth Porter-Whipple, a DEA spokesperson, said the indoor scheme was unusual for Georgia, where agents routinely find outdoor crops.

"The indoor grown is more desirable because it's more potent. But it's more expensive because of the electricity," she said.

As the number of busts grows, law enforcement agents are finding some of the basement pot farms abandoned, and the equipment left behind.

Some marijuana is being dumped, too. A worker discovered trash bags of discarded pot in a trash bin behind a Lawrenceville deli last week and alerted police.

Harris, Botello's lawyer, said his client was not involved in the pot-growing scheme.

"She was just a front so Martinez could get a license," he said. "The first time she even heard about this was the night agents showed up in the middle of the night and arrested her. She is just a real estate agent and had no idea these houses were for growing pot."

"They don't have a shred of evidence that she has ever used the word 'marijuana,'" he said, "let alone grows it."

DOJ_NMG_0139396

Police: Couple Ran Pot Farm At Home (PL)

Patriot Ledger, March 2, 2007

BRAINTREE - A local couple has been busted for running a marijuana farm worth hundreds of thousands of dollars in their suburban home.

Peter Sakalis, 35, and his wife, Cynthia, 37, were arrested after police found 367 marijuana plants growing in the basement of their rented 250 Elm St. home.

Police also found dozens of boxes of harvested plants, cocaine and pills, drug packaging materials, a handgun and rifle ammunition.

The grow house operation is believed to be the largest ever uncovered in Braintree, according to Deputy Chief Russell Jenkins.

''(Sakalis) had a pretty good operation going for himself,'' he said. ''For an indoor grow, this is pretty significant.''

The charges are reminiscent of the popular HBO cable television series ''Weeds,'' which features a suburban housewife who turns to selling marijuana after her husband's death. In the show's second season, characters start a grow house out of a leased home in a gated bedroom community.

The Sakalises pleaded innocent in Quincy District Court yesterday to a series of charges including drug possession with intent to distribute, conspiracy to violate the Controlled Substances Act, intent to distribute within 1,000 feet of a school, possession of a large capacity magazine and possession of ammunition.

Following his arraignment, Sakalis was arrested again for allegedly failing to pay child support.

The couple's 6-year-old daughter, who was home at the time of the bust, was placed in the care of a grandmother.

Jenkins said while Sakalis was known to Braintree drug detectives, they had no idea about his alleged green thumb. Detectives Brian Cohoon and Michael Reynolds went to the Elm Street home early Wednesday morning as part of a multi-agency task force looking to arrest Cynthia Sakalis and her 17-year-old son on non-drug-related warrants.

''It was quite unexpected, to say the least,'' Jenkins said of the discovery.

Sakalis answered the door and told police that his wife was upstairs but that her son had spent the night at his father's house in Roslindale. While searching the house for the son, officers were ''overcome'' by the odor of marijuana inside the house, according to a police report.

When questioned about a locked door leading to the basement, Sakalis allegedly told police that the landlord kept it locked and that he had no key. Officers broke the lock and found hundreds of marijuana plants as well as equipment needed to grow the plants, such as high-intensity lights, an ozone generator and fertilizers.

According to town records, the house is owned by Demetra Poursanidis of Boston. Jenkins said there are no plans to charge her in connection with the grow house.

Reached by telephone, Poursanidis, who bought the house in June, declined to comment.

Jenkins said detectives plan to search electricity records for the house to determine how long the growing has been going on. The lights used to grow the plants consume a large amount of electricity.

Jenkins said police did not immediately know how much the seized crop was worth.

According to outside law enforcement agencies interviewed by The Patriot Ledger, the value could be anywhere from a couple hundred thousand to as much as $1 million, depending on the variety of marijuana being grown, and how much of the drug each plant yielded.

The Drug Enforcement Administration places a standard $1,000 price tag on each individual marijuana plant.

Lt. Paul Hayes, a detective with the Massachusetts State Police narcotics unit, said skilled growers can cultivate up to a pound of marijuana from each plant. A pound goes for $4,000 on the street, he said.

Jenkins said that Peter Sakalis told police that he had kept his wife in the dark about the growing.

''No one in that house could have been unaware of what was going on down there,'' Jenkins said.

Lafayette Man Pleads Guilty In Pot-candy Case (SFC)

By Henry K. Lee, Chronicle Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0139397

San Francisco Chronicle, March 2, 2007

OAKLAND -- The ringleader of an Oakland group that made marijuana-laced candy and soft drinks resembling popular confections was sentenced today to 70 months in prison, authorities said.

Kenneth Affolter, 39, of Lafayette pleaded guilty in September to a single count of conspiring to manufacture and distribute marijuana for making doctored treats that authorities said were packaged for shipment throughout the West Coast.

Affolter admitted that under the product name Beyond Bomb, he made a range of pot-laced treats with names like Buddahfingers, Munchy Way, Rasta Reece's, Puff-a-Mint Pattie, Keef Kat, Stoney Ranchers, Puffsi, Trippy, Pot Tart, Budtella and Toka-Cola. At a hearing today in Oakland, U.S. District Judge D. Lowell Jensen also ordered Affolter to pay a $250,000 fine and placed him on four years of supervised release.

The case was the latest pitting federal officials against medicinal marijuana advocates.

According to the Drug Enforcement Administration, marijuana is illegal regardless of why someone uses it and no matter what form it takes, especially marijuana candy products that mimic mainstream candies and are attractive to youths.

But angry medicinal marijuana users have said that the raids proved that the DEA and other law-enforcement agencies are running roughshod over local and state laws that allow for medicinal cannabis use.

In 1996, California voters approved Proposition 215, which allows the use of marijuana for medical purposes with a doctor's recommendation. Despite the law, authorities -- from the California Highway Patrol to the DEA -- have regularly pounced on local marijuana-growing operations in the Bay Area.

One of those raids was on March 16, 2006, when drug agents searched two adjoining warehouses at 1055 and 1071 Yerba Buena Ave. and at 3960 Adeline St. in Emeryville.

Investigators learned that a $3,913 PG&E balance for a month's period covered all three locations and was billed to Affolter, Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent William Armstrong wrote in an affidavit.

Affolter told Oakland police officers who responded to a silent alarm at one of the Yerba Buena warehouses in February 2006 that "he made soaps and candles," agents wrote.

Investigators also searched Affolter's Lafayette home and a location on Telegraph Avenue in Oakland.

During the raids, investigators seized about $100,000 in cash, 11,692 rooted marijuana plants, 17,736 unrooted "clone" plants, marijuana-growing equipment, three weapons, an electronic money counter and hundreds of sodas and candy laced with marijuana, authorities said.

Yet Affolter, in a monitored telephone call to his parents from Santa Rita Jail in Dublin, boasted that the DEA "got a lot of money, but they didn't get it all!" Assistant U.S. Attorney Dana Wagner wrote Thursday in a sentencing memorandum.

In the same phone call, which took place shortly after his arrest, Affolter told his mother, "I am financially taken care of" and discussed spending "a couple of years" traveling the world, Wagner wrote.

Citing Affolter's apparent access to "significant undisclosed financial resources," the federal prosecutor urged the judge to impose a $500,000 fine.

A number of Affolter's former employees, who are codefendants, have also been convicted in the case.

Amy Teresa Arata of Oakland and Jesse Monko of Walnut Creek both admitted to performing supervisory roles in Affolter's marijuana operation. Each pleaded guilty to felony conspiracy counts. On Thursday, Jensen sentenced Arata to 18 months in prison; Monko received the same sentence today.

Nathan Woodard was sentenced today to two months in prison.

Jaime Alvarez-Lopez, Barbara Alvarez and Elizabeth Ramirez pleaded guilty to misdemeanor marijuana offenses. Each was sentenced in January to a year in prison.

Camilo Ruiz-Rodriguez was sentenced to eight months for a misdemeanor marijuana offense.

Last month, Maria Alarcon-Romero was placed on probation for a year.

Teresa Rojas will be sentenced on March 9, and James White and Robert Blackwell are scheduled to be sentenced on March 23.

Drug Smugglers Reroute Shipments Via Central America (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

MANAGUA, NICARAGUA — Central America has become a crucial way station in the billiondollar cocaine business, with traffickers shipping hundreds of tons northward from Colombia along the isthmus and increasingly infiltrating police and government agencies, U.S. and regional sources say.

The recent killings of three Salvadoran legislators in Guatemala underscored the shift, intelligence sources say. The lawmakers were shot and their bodies set ablaze last month, allegedly by a group of Guatemalan policemen working on behalf of Mexican drug traffickers.

All sorts of people have been swept up in the drug trade as the smuggling routes have changed, including impoverished fishermen, small-town mayors, legislators and high-ranking police officials. In years past, the favored route was across the Caribbean to the southeastern United States. Now, with greater Mexican cartel involvement, the cocaine often moves up the coasts of Central America and overland through Mexico.

Although it remains unclear whether the dead Salvadorans had ties to traffickers, other lawmakers from the country have been linked to the trade. Guatemalan officials have said the killings point to widespread infiltration of the country's police force by organized crime.

The four police officers charged in the killings, including the head of Guatemala's organized-crime unit, were later slain in their prison cells, in a stunning raid by armed men who may have entered the facility with the aid of guards and prison officials.

An intelligence official working in the region said the slain police officers worked for a Mexican cartel that ships drugs along the Pacific coast of Central America. The officers were enforcers dedicated to "knocking down" rival traffickers, the source said.

"This is a crime that can best be understood as part of the dynamic that sees drugs flow between Mexico and Colombia," said a second intelligence official, referring to the killing of the legislators. The officials asked not to be named, given the sensitive political nature of the crime — one of the victims was Eduardo Jose D'Aubuisson, the son of the founder of El Salvador's ruling party.

Although drug trafficking has long been common in remote areas of the region, such as the Caribbean coast of Nicaragua, the growing power of Mexican cartels has increased the importance of Central America as a transshipment point.

Smuggling routes across the Caribbean have largely fallen into disuse thanks to U.S. interdiction efforts there, and Colombian drug producers have ceded the bulk of the transportation business to Mexicans.

About 90% of the estimated 780 tons of cocaine entering the United States each year passes through the hands of Mexican drug traffickers, according to U.S. studies. Mexican traffickers see Central America as a natural hub between their Colombian suppliers and the smuggling routes the Mexicans control on the U.S. border.

The "Mexico-Central America corridor is … the predominant transit route for cocaine destined for the United States," U.S. officials wrote in the 2007 National Drug Threat Assessment.

Michael A. Braun, chief of operations for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said in a 2005 congressional hearing that "the corrupting power of illicit drug trafficking organizations on the governmental institutions of Central America significantly increases the difficulty of successful drug interdiction efforts."

Central America will remain the primary transit zone for U.S.-bound drugs "for the foreseeable future," Braun added.

The growing trade has reached areas of Central America where drug trafficking was rare just a few years ago. Police and military forces there are often undermanned and outgunned.

Nicaragua's small navy, for example, only has enough boats to patrol its coastline 12 days a month, officials say, a fact that helps shape the traffickers' strategy. "They know what our limitations are," said Capt. Roger Gonzalez Diaz of the Nicaraguan navy.

On the Pacific coast, the Nicaraguan navy has no craft larger than 40-foot-long "go fast" boats with outboard motors, vessels nearly identical to those the drug traffickers use. In fact, many of the navy's boats are vessels that were discarded by smugglers, Gonzalez Diaz said.

DOJ_NMG_0139399

Operatives of Mexico's Sinaloa cartel arrived on the Pacific coast two years ago, officials with Nicaragua's National Police said.

With their Mexican accents, the men stood out. They were eager to buy old, abandoned farms along the beach. They didn't look like farmers, but they bought several tractors. They collected boats, too, but they didn't look like fishermen.

"The tractors were to build new airstrips and also to rehabilitate old ones," said a Nicaraguan police officer who specializes in drug intelligence.

One of the men was Samuel "Sammy" Gutierrez, a Colombian with Mexican identity documents, police said. He and two brothers from Mazatlan, Jorge and Roberto Garcia Villasenor, were air and sea "transportation specialists," police said.

The drug cartel operatives soon found themselves in a cat-and-mouse game with police leading to a plane crash on a rural highway and the arrest of a Mexican couple with nearly $300,000 in cash at a Managua airport.

"We confiscated three tons of cocaine," said an intelligence official with Nicaragua's national police. "We hit them hard."

Nearly all of the cocaine that enters the United States is produced in Colombia, according to U.S. studies. Most of it enters the U.S. through a two-stage process in which it is offloaded and stored at least once in Mexico or Central America.

Cocaine is shipped out of Colombia by sea and air, usually in amounts of a ton or more, through what U.S. officials call "the transit zone" — the stretch of ocean between Colombia and Mexico. Sometimes the traffickers hopscotch up the coast from Colombia to Panama, Costa Rica and other countries in the "go fast" boats.

Or they may take a more circuitous route in a larger ship that will travel around the Galapagos Islands in the Pacific southwest and later offload to smaller vessels.

Once in Mexico, the drug traffickers benefit from well-traveled smuggling routes protected by corrupt state and local officials, as they move their shipments northward overland to the U.S. border. A war among competing cartels to control those routes, known as "plazas" in Mexico, led to more than 2,000 killings last year.

The various routes through the "transit zone" pass through the beaches of Belize, seaside villages in Honduras and ports along the Pacific coast of Mexico and many other places, according to data from the U.S. government's Joint Interagency Task Force South, based in Florida.

In 2005, U.S. officials discovered, via satellite imagery, an "aircraft graveyard" in the Peten jungle of Guatemala where drug traffickers had disposed of light aircraft that brought shipments from South America. The drugs were eventually smuggled overland into Mexico.

U.S. officials said that Central American organized-crime groups, working with the Mexican and Colombian cartels under a subcontracting system, are reaping huge profits. That money, in turn, is fueling a crime wave, especially in Guatemala and El Salvador.

In El Salvador, sources pointed to a key killing that went largely unnoticed in the local media: the 2005 shooting death of Jose "El Cranky" Cortes outside a San Salvador nightclub.

According to a Salvadoran academic who has studied the drug trade, Cortes controlled the retail drug trade in an urban region of El Salvador and was assassinated for trying to make connections with Colombian suppliers without the permission of other gang leaders.

It was the first time officials had documented contacts between high-level Salvadoran gang leaders and Colombian traffickers, the source said.

Along the impoverished Pacific coast of El Salvador and Guatemala, mayors and other low-level officials in seaside towns find that the sums of money offered by the traffickers are often too tempting to resist.

"This guy tells you that you can make $60,000 easily, very quietly," said one intelligence official who was not authorized to speak publicly.

The same networks that smuggle drugs northward are responsible for shipping several billion dollars in cash southward, usually in $20 bills, DEA officials said. So vast is the money flow that it is routine to arrest couriers carrying $1 million in cash or more in Central America.

The huge sums of money involved in the drug trade have already ensnared top officials in El Salvador.

DOJ_NMG_0139400

Last year, William Eliu Martinez, a former Salvadoran congressman, received a 29-year prison sentence from a U.S. judge in Washington after being convicted of smuggling more than 30 tons of cocaine into the United States.

If the privileged can be drawn into the drug trade, then what hope is there that a poorly paid policeman, soldier or sailor can resist the temptation?

Capt. Gonzalez Diaz of the Nicaraguan navy asks himself that question often.

"It's a constant struggle with our personnel," he said. "We tell them, 'Anyone would be tempted if they offered you $500 or $5,000. But for that, you're disgraced…. And if you owe them anything, they'll come after you or your wife and kids.' "

Drug Smugglers Reroute Shipments Via Central America (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

Most Colombian cocaine entering the U.S. comes through the area, with cartels infiltrating security forces and government agencies.

MANAGUA, NICARAGUA — Central America has become a crucial way station in the billiondollar cocaine business, with traffickers shipping hundreds of tons northward from Colombia along the isthmus and increasingly infiltrating police and government agencies, U.S. and regional sources say.

The recent killings of three Salvadoran legislators in Guatemala underscored the shift, intelligence sources say. The lawmakers were shot and their bodies set ablaze last month, allegedly by a group of Guatemalan policemen working on behalf of Mexican drug traffickers.

All sorts of people have been swept up in the drug trade as the smuggling routes have changed, including impoverished fishermen, small-town mayors, legislators and high-ranking police officials. In years past, the favored route was across the Caribbean to the southeastern United States. Now, with greater Mexican cartel involvement, the cocaine often moves up the coasts of Central America and overland through Mexico.

Although it remains unclear whether the dead Salvadorans had ties to traffickers, other lawmakers from the country have been linked to the trade. Guatemalan officials have said the killings point to widespread infiltration of the country's police force by organized crime.

The four police officers charged in the killings, including the head of Guatemala's organized-crime unit, were later slain in their prison cells, in a stunning raid by armed men who may have entered the facility with the aid of guards and prison officials.

An intelligence official working in the region said the slain police officers worked for a Mexican cartel that ships drugs along the Pacific coast of Central America. The officers were enforcers dedicated to "knocking down" rival traffickers, the source said.

"This is a crime that can best be understood as part of the dynamic that sees drugs flow between Mexico and Colombia," said a second intelligence official, referring to the killing of the legislators. The officials asked not to be named, given the sensitive political nature of the crime — one of the victims was Eduardo Jose D'Aubuisson, the son of the founder of El Salvador's ruling party.

Although drug trafficking has long been common in remote areas of the region, such as the Caribbean coast of Nicaragua, the growing power of Mexican cartels has increased the importance of Central America as a transshipment point.

Smuggling routes across the Caribbean have largely fallen into disuse thanks to U.S. interdiction efforts there, and Colombian drug producers have ceded the bulk of the transportation business to Mexicans.

About 90% of the estimated 780 tons of cocaine entering the United States each year passes through the hands of Mexican drug traffickers, according to U.S. studies. Mexican traffickers see Central America as a natural hub between their Colombian suppliers and the smuggling routes the Mexicans control on the U.S. border.

The "Mexico-Central America corridor is … the predominant transit route for cocaine destined for the United States," U.S. officials wrote in the 2007 National Drug Threat Assessment.

DOJ_NMG_0139401

Michael A. Braun, chief of operations for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said in a 2005 congressional hearing that "the corrupting power of illicit drug trafficking organizations on the governmental institutions of Central America significantly increases the difficulty of successful drug interdiction efforts."

Central America will remain the primary transit zone for U.S.-bound drugs "for the foreseeable future," Braun added.

The growing trade has reached areas of Central America where drug trafficking was rare just a few years ago. Police and military forces there are often undermanned and outgunned.

Nicaragua's small navy, for example, only has enough boats to patrol its coastline 12 days a month, officials say, a fact that helps shape the traffickers' strategy. "They know what our limitations are," said Capt. Roger Gonzalez Diaz of the Nicaraguan navy.

On the Pacific coast, the Nicaraguan navy has no craft larger than 40-foot-long "go fast" boats with outboard motors, vessels nearly identical to those the drug traffickers use. In fact, many of the navy's boats are vessels that were discarded by smugglers, Gonzalez Diaz said.

Operatives of Mexico's Sinaloa cartel arrived on the Pacific coast two years ago, officials with Nicaragua's National Police said.

With their Mexican accents, the men stood out. They were eager to buy old, abandoned farms along the beach. They didn't look like farmers, but they bought several tractors. They collected boats, too, but they didn't look like fishermen.

"The tractors were to build new airstrips and also to rehabilitate old ones," said a Nicaraguan police officer who specializes in drug intelligence.

One of the men was Samuel "Sammy" Gutierrez, a Colombian with Mexican identity documents, police said. He and two brothers from Mazatlan, Jorge and Roberto Garcia Villasenor, were air and sea "transportation specialists," police said.

The drug cartel operatives soon found themselves in a cat-and-mouse game with police leading to a plane crash on a rural highway and the arrest of a Mexican couple with nearly $300,000 in cash at a Managua airport.

"We confiscated three tons of cocaine," said an intelligence official with Nicaragua's national police. "We hit them hard."

Nearly all of the cocaine that enters the United States is produced in Colombia, according to U.S. studies. Most of it enters the U.S. through a two-stage process in which it is offloaded and stored at least once in Mexico or Central America.

Cocaine is shipped out of Colombia by sea and air, usually in amounts of a ton or more, through what U.S. officials call "the transit zone" — the stretch of ocean between Colombia and Mexico. Sometimes the traffickers hopscotch up the coast from Colombia to Panama, Costa Rica and other countries in the "go fast" boats.

Or they may take a more circuitous route in a larger ship that will travel around the Galapagos Islands in the Pacific southwest and later offload to smaller vessels.

Once in Mexico, the drug traffickers benefit from well-traveled smuggling routes protected by corrupt state and local officials, as they move their shipments northward overland to the U.S. border. A war among competing cartels to control those routes, known as "plazas" in Mexico, led to more than 2,000 killings last year.

The various routes through the "transit zone" pass through the beaches of Belize, seaside villages in Honduras and ports along the Pacific coast of Mexico and many other places, according to data from the U.S. government's Joint Interagency Task Force South, based in Florida.

In 2005, U.S. officials discovered, via satellite imagery, an "aircraft graveyard" in the Peten jungle of Guatemala where drug traffickers had disposed of light aircraft that brought shipments from South America. The drugs were eventually smuggled overland into Mexico.

U.S. officials said that Central American organized-crime groups, working with the Mexican and Colombian cartels under a subcontracting system, are reaping huge profits. That money, in turn, is fueling a crime wave, especially in Guatemala and El Salvador.

In El Salvador, sources pointed to a key killing that went largely unnoticed in the local media: the 2005 shooting death of Jose "El Cranky" Cortes outside a San Salvador nightclub.

DOJ_NMG_0139402

According to a Salvadoran academic who has studied the drug trade, Cortes controlled the retail drug trade in an urban region of El Salvador and was assassinated for trying to make connections with Colombian suppliers without the permission of other gang leaders.

It was the first time officials had documented contacts between high-level Salvadoran gang leaders and Colombian traffickers, the source said.

Along the impoverished Pacific coast of El Salvador and Guatemala, mayors and other low-level officials in seaside towns find that the sums of money offered by the traffickers are often too tempting to resist.

"This guy tells you that you can make $60,000 easily, very quietly," said one intelligence official who was not authorized to speak publicly.

The same networks that smuggle drugs northward are responsible for shipping several billion dollars in cash southward, usually in $20 bills, DEA officials said. So vast is the money flow that it is routine to arrest couriers carrying $1 million in cash or more in Central America.

The huge sums of money involved in the drug trade have already ensnared top officials in El Salvador.

Last year, William Eliu Martinez, a former Salvadoran congressman, received a 29-year prison sentence from a U.S. judge in Washington after being convicted of smuggling more than 30 tons of cocaine into the United States.

If the privileged can be drawn into the drug trade, then what hope is there that a poorly paid policeman, soldier or sailor can resist the temptation?

Capt. Gonzalez Diaz of the Nicaraguan navy asks himself that question often.

"It's a constant struggle with our personnel," he said. "We tell them, 'Anyone would be tempted if they offered you $500 or $5,000. But for that, you're disgraced…. And if you owe them anything, they'll come after you or your wife and kids.' "

Special correspondent Alex Renderos contributed to this report from San Salvador.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush's Last Chance On Immigration (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi / Washington

Time, March 5, 2007

People say a lot of things on the campaign trail, but when Texas Governor George W. Bush stood before conservative Iowa crowds in 1999 and talked about the urgency of immigration reform, it was hard not to believe he was speaking from the heart. "Family values do not stop at the Rio Grande," he said back then, and the felicitous phrase became a touchstone of compassionate conservatism for his campaign and his presidency. For Bush, making immigration fair and safe "is a matter of very strong personal commitment," says his spokesman, Tony Snow.

Bush is about to get his last chance to prove that that commitment is real. Immigration reform stands out as the unfulfilled promise of the Bush presidency, and as Congress prepares to debate a compromise bill in the coming weeks, Democratic leaders in the House and Senate say Bush's help is crucial. "We're going to need Republican votes," says Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate majority leader Harry Reid. "And we're going to need the President." But power is sluicing out of the White House, Iraq is draining the Administration's remaining energies, and the President is entering a difficult period with a Congress he has never treated with much respect.

November's Democratic victory in Congress should have improved Bush's odds of getting what he calls "comprehensive immigration reform": tightened border controls and work-site enforcement, a new guest-worker program and a solution to the problem of the U.S.'s 12 million illegal immigrants. Although some Democrats side with unions in opposition to the President's proposed guest-worker program, a majority favor his broad immigration reforms. At the same time, some of Bush's most outspoken Republican opponents lost in races to Democrats who back his position. Post-election polls showed Hispanic voters punishing Republicans, abandoning the G.O.P. in larger numbers than the rest of the electorate in what some analysts saw as a backlash against tough G.O.P. rhetoric on immigration. That impression may drive fence-sitting Republicans who represent Latinos to support Bush's moderate plans.

DOJ_NMG_0139403

The election effect alone is not enough to deliver Bush the votes he needs, though, especially in the House. Privately, lawmakers and key aides in both parties are skeptical that he can make up those votes. Republicans say Bush's political weakness is too great to coerce enough wavering G.O.P. lawmakers to risk their seats out of loyalty to the President. "What leverage does he have? Not a lot," says a senior Senate Republican aide. Bush's influence has ebbed since the last Congress, when he failed to rally Republicans behind an immigration deal. Democrats say Bush's biggest problem is his style of dealing with Congress. "He likes to be the closer, bringing in the last five fence-sitters," says a senior House Democratic aide. "But this time he needs to engage early in the process to prove this is a real priority for him."

Bush's hardest challenge will be selling a fix for the 12 million illegal immigrants already living in the U.S. The new immigration bill, to be introduced in the Senate as early as next week by Democrat Ted Kennedy and Republican John McCain, will set most of them on a "path to citizenship." Opponents call that amnesty. Bush has been vague in his support for legalization. But Kennedy says that at a private meeting on Jan. 8, Bush gave him a commitment to back "comprehensive" legislation, which Kennedy believes is a commitment to granting them eventual citizenship.

One last opportunity for Bush may have come thanks to G.O.P. hard-liners. The only immigration bill that Congress managed to push through last session cracked down on illegal border crossing. At the same time, the Department of Homeland Security has stepped up work-site enforcement of laws banning the employment of illegal immigrants. The effect has been a marked labor shortage, especially in agriculture. Growers nationwide blame the shortage for losses in the hundreds of thousands of dollars. With business leaning on lawmakers to do something, the crackdown has "increased the chances of comprehensive immigration reform," says a senior Senate Republican aide.

Bush doesn't have much time. Democratic aides say Reid plans to get the new bipartisan bill to the floor this spring in the hope of forcing it through Congress before the presidential campaign paralyzes Washington. If it's not done by August, says one, "it's dead."

TAX:

Here Comes The AMT (USNEWS)

By Leonard Wiener

U.S. News and World Report, March 4, 2007

If your 2006 tax return is among the 3.5 million to 4 million that are projected to be hit by the alternative minimum tax, your only choice may be to grit your teeth. But don't feel neglected. Virtually everyone agrees that the AMT is out of control and needs to be fixed. The big question is how and at what cost in lost potential tax revenue—roughly $1.2 trillion over 10 years if the AMT is totally repealed.

So far, Congress has enacted short-term boosts in exemptions from the tax to slow its expanding reach from only about 1.3 million taxpayers five years ago. If a new temporary or permanent fix isn't enacted for 2007, the number of returns affected could soar to 23 million.

Good intentions. The AMT is an auxiliary tax with fewer deductions than regular tax and kicks in if your tax figured under its formula is greater than your tax figured normally. It was originally aimed at upper-income taxpayers who were avoiding very large amounts of tax through shelters and other manipulations, and it was never intended to be the nuisance it has become.

A failure to index the AMT to inflation and reductions in regular tax are among factors now extending the AMT's reach to some middle-class families.

The original purpose of closing tax shelters has in fact become a much smaller factor in the AMT's impact. Large payments of property tax and state income tax can trigger the AMT since those items aren't deductible when figuring it. People with many dependent exemptions are also susceptible.

"You could just be a normal person living your life and fall into it," says Bill Stone, investment director at PNC Bank's wealth management operation.

The AMT can erase part of the benefits of tax reductions and the cut in the capital-gains rate.

DOJ_NMG_0139404

Dealing with the AMT can involve planning the year in which to take certain deductions, timing the receipt of income, manipulating the type and amount of debt, and other arcane issues. The tax is fertile ground for selling tax software or professional help, since you may have to go through complex calculations to figure out if you are hit by it, and tactics to minimize or avoid it in the future can be fraught with gotchas.

But maybe for those already affected, and those who soon could be, this all will turn out to be a tax horror story with a happy ending.

This story appears in the March 12, 2007 print edition of U.S. News & World Report.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senators Vow Quick Action On Walter Reed (AP)

By John Heilprin

AP, March 5, 2007

Lawmakers promised a quick response and sought an independent commission as they expressed outrage Sunday over the poor conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center for soldiers wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"I'm worried about if it's this bad at the outpatient facilities at Walter Reed, how is it in the rest of the country? Because Walter Reed is our crown jewel," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

In a letter Sunday to Defense Secretary Robert Gates on Sunday, Schumer asked for an independent commission, possibly headed by former Secretary of State Colin Powell, to investigate all post-combat medical facilities and recommend changes.

"To think that men and women are serving their country in the most honorable and courageous way possible and all we give them is a dilapidated, rat-infested, run-down building to recover is a disgrace," Schumer wrote. "My fear is that Walter Reed is just the tip of the iceberg, and merely highlights the pervasive and systemic mistreatment of our service members."

President Bush last week ordered a comprehensive review of conditions at the nation's network of military and veteran hospitals. They have been overwhelmed by injured troops from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The White House said the president would name a bipartisan commission to assess whether the problems at Walter Reed exist at other facilities. Last week, Gates created an outside panel to review the situation at Walter Reed and the other major military hospital in the Washington area, the National Naval Medical Center at Bethesda, Md.

Gates also dismissed Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey, who had fired the medical center's previous commander, Maj. Gen. George Weightman, and replaced him with Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the Army's surgeon general and a former commander of Walter Reed. Gates said that Harvey's response was not aggressive enough.

The Army announced that Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker will be the new commander of Walter Reed, which is in Washington.

In addition, the Army took disciplinary action against several lower-level soldiers at Walter Reed, but officials have declined to publicly confirm any details of those actions. Peter Geren, the undersecretary of the Army, will serve as Harvey's temporary replacement until Bush nominates a new secretary.

The moves came in response to a series of Washington Post reports about substandard conditions and bureaucratic snafus affecting the care of injured soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan to Walter Reed, one of the military's highest-profile and busiest medical facilities, and its outpatient facilities.

The reports embarrassed the Army and the Bush administration at a time when the White House is scrambling to shore up eroding support for the Iraq war. They have prompted numerous calls in the newly Democratic Congress for more information, and sullied the reputation of what is supposed to be one of the military's foremost medical centers.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said the scandal is emblematic of the Bush administration.

"I believe this disgraceful neglect has been the result of two things. One is a lack of accountability," said Levin, who is chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. "Almost no high-level people have ever been held accountable until Secretary Gates came along."

DOJ_NMG_0139405

Levin said the second factor "is the overoptimism which just symbolized this administration right from the beginning of this war, that the mission was accomplished."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., also praised Gates' quick response. "He's taken action, and not only low-level people but high-level people have been replaced, and I think that's welcome action."

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., said he probably would support a commission such as what Schumer proposes. "Investigations are not always the best way to go, but I think we ought to do whatever's necessary," he said.

Lott said the revelations show that President Bush and Congress should take a look at all Veterans Affairs hospitals and military hospitals to be sure they are providing adequate services.

"It is indefensible and appalling," Lott said. "Why didn't we know more and do more? I'm not, you know, trying to fix blame. I want to know how we're going to fix it."

Rep. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich., called it an "appalling situation. Hopefully they're putting in place the leadership that will make sure that our troops get exactly the kind of quality care that they make. The sooner they get focused on this, the better."

Schumer and Lott spoke on ABC's "This Week." Feinstein and Hoekstra appeared on "Fox News Sunday." Levin was interviewed on CBS' "Face the Nation."

Democrats Fume Over Walter Reed Scandal (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey,

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

Sen. Charles Schumer says he fears this 'is just the tip of the iceberg.'

WASHINGTON — Congressional Democrats on Sunday kept up their attacks on substandard care for injured soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center as they prepared for hearings on the issue this week.

"If it's this bad at the outpatient facilities at Walter Reed, how is it in the rest of the country?" Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said on ABC's "This Week." "Walter Reed is our crown jewel."

In a letter sent Sunday to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, Schumer called for the creation of an independent commission to examine conditions at all medical facilities treating military personnel and veterans. He suggested that former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, a retired Army general and former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, lead the panel.

"To think that men and women are serving their country in the most honorable and courageous way possible and all we give them is a dilapidated, rat-infested, rundown building to recover is a disgrace," he wrote. "My fear is that Walter Reed is just the tip of the iceberg, and merely highlights the pervasive and systemic mistreatment of our service members."

Schumer's call for an independent panel follows a promise from President Bush last week to name a bipartisan commission for the same purpose.

The scandal over the living conditions and care for soldiers at a Walter Reed outpatient facility, detailed in a recent series of articles in the Washington Post, claimed two generals and the Army's top civilian last week. On Thursday, in response to the articles, Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey replaced the hospital's commander for the last six months, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, with Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who had headed the hospital from 2002 to 2004. But veterans groups and legislators criticized that appointment, saying Kiley had known about problems and failed to act; a day later, Kiley lost the command and Harvey resigned under pressure, attacked for appointing Kiley.

Members of Congress from both parties have expressed outrage at the substandard care. The revelations have also embarrassed the Bush administration as it has been laboring to build support for sending 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles), who heads the powerful Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, plans to hold a hearing at the hospital today. Weightman and Kiley are to testify.

The Senate Armed Services Committee plans a hearing on the matter Tuesday.

Meanwhile, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a staunch Iraq war critic, said that today he would unveil his plan to put new restrictions on the administration's war effort.

DOJ_NMG_0139406

Murtha, chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense, has been working on ways to attach conditions to a nearly $100-billion emergency supplemental bill that would require troops to be fully trained and equipped before they are deployed.

"We should not send troops into combat if they don't have equipment and if they don't have the training they need," Murtha, a Vietnam veteran, said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Murtha has also suggested requiring the withdrawal of U.S. forces unless the Iraqi government meets benchmarks showing progress toward reducing sectarian strife.

The proposal has been attacked by Republicans and some Democrats as an effort to micromanage the war, a critique reiterated Sunday by Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a leading supporter of the president's plans to boost the number of U.S. forces in Iraq.

"Some of these resolutions are just nightmares for a commander. You can fight Al Qaeda, but you can't fight people involved in sectarian violence. You can go here, and you can't go there," Graham said on NBC. "There's a reason there's only one commander in chief."

noam.levey@latimes.com

Walter Reed Hearing To Put Spotlight On Kiley's Leadership (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

When the first congressional hearing about the care of wounded soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center opens this morning in a campus auditorium, many eyes will turn to Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who has served as the Army's top doctor since he gave up command of the hospital in 2004. The hearing will allow Kiley to explain why bureaucratic tangles and horrid conditions made life so difficult for outpatients at the Army's premier hospital, while also likely putting him in a position of defending his job.

Though members of Congress have called for Kiley to step down and take responsibility for the problems at Walter Reed, he has been spared so far. Other leaders have not been so fortunate: Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, the hospital's commander the past six months, was fired on Thursday, and Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey was forced to resign on Friday, in part because he appointed Kiley to temporarily take over Weightman's job.

Kiley, the commander of Walter Reed from 2002 to 2004, has been accused of being brash and indifferent to concerns raised about problems there. After a series of Washington Post articles described the outpatient conditions at Walter Reed, Kiley said the problems "weren't serious and there weren't a lot of them," and that they were not "emblematic of a process of Walter Reed that has abandoned soldiers and their families."

People close to Kiley say he realizes he could lose his job over the problems that occurred on his watch, but many who have known him over the past several decades said it would be unlike him to give up. Many colleagues and former commanders described him as a dogged and aggressive leader -- sometimes to a fault. Others described him as constantly career-minded and focused on personal success. Through Army spokesmen, Kiley declined to be interviewed for this article.

Now at the pinnacle of Army medicine as the service's 41st surgeon general, Kiley is capping a diverse career with the challenge of a devastating scandal. Critics argue that his indifference exacerbated the problems; supporters say that he is the only person who can turn the situation around.

"Even if there were sins of omission on the part of General Kiley as he was focused on the soldiers' primary care, now that this will receive his attention in a way that he is uniquely capable of applying it, the Army couldn't have a better guy to do it," said Mike Sullivan, a retired Army colonel who has known and worked with Kiley since the early 1990s and considers him a friend. "He will be utterly ruthless in approaching the problem. I've seen him utterly ruthless any number of times, and it's a thing of beauty."

After graduating from medical school at Georgetown University, Kiley began his Army career as an obstetrics and gynecology specialist, a clinical area that doesn't often produce top Army brass. But he became the division surgeon with the 10th Mountain Division and later deployed to Saudi Arabia as commander of the 15th Evacuation Hospital in support of operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm, giving him wartime field experience.

DOJ_NMG_0139407

Gen. William W. Crouch, who retired after serving as the Army's vice chief of staff and worked with Kiley at several commands, praised his ability to motivate staff members. Crouch said Kiley, an avid runner, was able to whip a group of doctors and nurses into shape before they deployed from Fort Polk, La., to the Middle East.

"I particularly remember him leading doctors, nurses and staff on early-morning runs," said Crouch, who in the early 1990s commanded the 5th Infantry Division at Fort Polk. "They probably did not like it, but he was preparing them for the rigors of war."

After graduating from the Army War College, Kiley went to Germany and as a colonel took command of the Landstuhl Regional Medical Center. There, he supervised the military's largest hospital outside of the United States and dealt with medical issues surrounding missions in the Balkans.

While there, he both impressed colleagues and irked them. In interviews, some said he was a deft leader, but others criticized his apparent desire to stick to the budget and increase productivity while sacrificing care.

"His last concern was his concern for the patient," said retired Col. Robert M. Tabachnikoff, chief of obstetrics and gynecology under Kiley at Landstuhl in the mid-1990s. Tabachnikoff said Kiley wanted to discharge new mothers within 24 hours of delivery to keep beds free and counted phone calls as office visits. "He was more concerned for meeting requirements and advancing his own career. . . . At last, it's catching up with him. His leadership style is being exposed."

Carolyn Bulliner, a retired colonel who has known Kiley since 1993, said he is a strong leader who has always thought the soldiers in his care were the most important aspect of his job. Bulliner, who now works down the hall from Kiley in the Army Health Facility Planning Agency, also said he is a dedicated family man, devoted to his three children. Two have followed Kiley into military service.

"All I can say is that he absolutely worked his best to ensure the right things were done for his soldiers," said Bulliner, who was director of nursing at Landstuhl. "He trusted and relied on us as his staff to do what we were supposed to do. . . . He got involved when he needed to get involved."

Retired Lt. Gen. Ronald R. Blanck, who commanded Walter Reed from 1992 to 1996 and then served as the Army's surgeon general until 2000, said he always found Kiley on top of things. In conversations with Kiley over the past few years, Blanck noticed that he was particularly interested in front-line care for the wounded and appeared to delegate responsibility when the wounded returned to the United States.

"I don't think he saw himself as someone who should micromanage," Blanck said, adding that he thinks Kiley and Weightman were weighed down by the ballooning casualties from Iraq and Afghanistan. "It's just tragic all around. The problems could have easily been addressed by people paying attention. They were overwhelmed by the number of casualties and they unfortunately let that kind of thing slip."

Kiley's comments about Walter Reed are not the first time he has played down allegations of concerns with the Army medical community. In 2005, when Kiley's office reviewed detainee medical operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, after the Abu Ghraib prison abuses, he said that no systemic problems were found but did not mention that his office found serious flaws in detainee health care overseas, and that it had identified dozens of abuse cases.

"The majority of medical personnel interviewed did not observe any abuse, and with few exceptions, those medical personnel who did observe suspected abuse reported it," Kiley said at a Pentagon news conference in July 2005. "The assessment results demonstrate that the nation can be proud of our military medical professionals."

The report, released the next day, showed that there were major gaps in detainee care and that there was little official guidance on how to treat detainees. Kiley also said he supported using psychiatrists and physicians on Behavioral Science Consultation Teams that were using medical information from detainees to guide military intelligence interrogations -- against the recommendations of a two-star general who led the assessment.

Leonard S. Rubenstein, executive director of Physicians for Human Rights, said that Kiley was not necessarily responsible for coming up with tactics that cross ethical boundaries, but that he defended them. "He did not oppose the use of physicians in military interrogations," Rubenstein said. "It's an invitation to abuse, because the involvement of physicians tends to aggravate the situation."

DOJ_NMG_0139408

Kiley, as a three-star general, has gone as high as he can go within the Army's medical hierarchy, and most surgeon generals retire at the end of their four-year terms. Should Kiley weather this storm, he could hold his position until September 2008.

US Army Scrambles To Clean Walter Reed (CSM)

By Gordon Lubold

The Christian Science Monitor, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON

The abrupt departure of the secretary of the Army, taking place as an angry Defense secretary responded to public criticism of how the Pentagon has treated its war wounded, is giving Congress fresh reasons to look more closely at war operations.

Monday, lawmakers are to begin a week of hearings that will look into the situation at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington – how conditions worsened there and why it appeared, at least, that no one was paying attention. The Army's surgeon general, Army Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, and the commander of the hospital who was relieved of his duties, Army Maj. Gen. George Weightman, are to appear Monday on Capitol Hill. Intense questioning is expected from lawmakers on a subcommittee of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee.

The Army, meanwhile, is scrambling to rectify the situation: It's moving patients out of certain areas of Walter Reed in preparation for those places being refurbished, and it's creating new support initiatives to help wounded veterans of the war in Iraq.

"We've got to make sure that our VA hospitals and our military hospitals in this country are equipped to provide the services [so] that our men and women in uniform and our veterans can be confident that they're going to get the help they need," said Sen. Trent Lott (R) of Mississippi, appearing on "This Week" on ABC.

It's important to find out what happened, not to point fingers, Senator Lott said. "Why didn't we know more and do more?" he said. "I'm not ... trying to fix blame. I want to know how we're going to fix it."

The unraveling at the Pentagon began after a story in the Feb. 18 editions of The Washington Post, which detailed problems at what's been considered the nation's premier military medical facility. The story outlined issues with the physical condition of one of the buildings, Building 18, where troops recuperate, receive counseling, or await outprocessing from the military. The report included details of rotting walls and mold and pest infestation, as well as bureaucratic bungling that delayed services or support.

The portrayal of the hospital in the story sparked a furor in Washington. Within days, the Army had relieved General Weightman, and its leadership had identified General Kiley as the acting commander. A number of other, lower-level military personnel were also reassigned.

But that was not enough for Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who didn't like the way the Army, which runs the hospital, was responding. For example, Kiley, in a press tour of the hospital in the wake of the newspaper article, criticized the report for being too one-sided.

"I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to the outpatient care at Walter Reed," Secretary Gates said in a briefing last Friday. "Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems."

Following Gates' remarks, the Army announced that Maj. Gen. Eric Schoomaker, a physician, would be named as the permanent commander of the hospital. General Schoomaker's older brother, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, is the Army's chief of staff. Another flag officer who is not a physician is expected to be named to the hospital's command structure to ensure someone without a medical background can keep an eye on the improvements, according to a Washington Post report Sunday.

Weightman's side of the story may emerge during the hearings. This may include the information that he did in fact listen to internal warnings last year about problems with staffing.

The Army released a statement Saturday that indicated Weightman had responded to those internal warnings from Army Col. Peter Garibaldi, the Walter Reed garrison commander. Colonel Garibaldi had warned that "patient care services are at risk of mission failure" due to a privatization effort that left the hospital short-staffed. According to media reports, Garibaldi said that Weightman had addressed each of three issues raised.

DOJ_NMG_0139409

Rep. Henry Waxman (D) of California, who leads the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said the Garibaldi memo raises "a new dimension to the problems at Walter Reed."

The problems at Walter Reed could be symbolic of the kind of neglect that many lawmakers believe exists across the military. Funding for a war that costs up to $7 billion per month has strapped resources that normally would be spent elsewhere.

Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, a respected Marine veteran who is pushing to bring troops home, asserted Sunday that the problems at Walter Reed have occurred because war costs have trumped so many other needs.

"It happened because the resources are so much in Iraq. They've spent so much money that they've ignored the very thing that is so important to our troops at home," Representative Murtha said on "Meet the Press."

'It Is Just Not Walter Reed' (WP)

By Anne Hull And Dana Priest, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Soldiers Share Troubling Stories Of Military Health Care Across U.S.

Ray Oliva went into the spare bedroom in his home in Kelseyville, Calif., to wrestle with his feelings. He didn't know a single soldier at Walter Reed, but he felt he knew them all. He worried about the wounded who were entering the world of military health care, which he knew all too well. His own VA hospital in Livermore was a mess. The gown he wore was torn. The wheelchairs were old and broken.

"It is just not Walter Reed," Oliva slowly tapped out on his keyboard at 4:23 in the afternoon on Friday. "The VA hospitals are not good either except for the staff who work so hard. It brings tears to my eyes when I see my brothers and sisters having to deal with these conditions. I am 70 years old, some say older than dirt but when I am with my brothers and sisters we become one and are made whole again."

Oliva is but one quaking voice in a vast outpouring of accounts filled with emotion and anger about the mistreatment of wounded outpatients at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Stories of neglect and substandard care have flooded in from soldiers, their family members, veterans, doctors and nurses working inside the system. They describe depressing living conditions for outpatients at other military bases around the country, from Fort Lewis in Washington state to Fort Dix in New Jersey. They tell stories -- their own versions, not verified -- of callous responses to combat stress and a system ill equipped to handle another generation of psychologically scarred vets.

The official reaction to the revelations at Walter Reed has been swift, and it has exposed the potential political costs of ignoring Oliva's 24.3 million comrades -- America's veterans -- many of whom are among the last standing supporters of the Iraq war. In just two weeks, the Army secretary has been fired, a two-star general relieved of command and two special commissions appointed; congressional subcommittees are lining up for hearings, the first today at Walter Reed; and the president, in his weekly radio address, redoubled promises to do right by the all-volunteer force, 1.5 million of whom have fought in Iraq and Afghanistan.

But much deeper has been the reaction outside Washington, including from many of the 600,000 new veterans who left the service after Iraq and Afghanistan. Wrenching questions have dominated blogs, talk shows, editorial cartoons, VFW spaghetti suppers and the solitary late nights of soldiers and former soldiers who fire off e-mails to reporters, members of Congress and the White House -- looking, finally, for attention and solutions.

Several forces converged to create this intense reaction. A new Democratic majority in Congress is willing to criticize the administration. Senior retired officers pounded the Pentagon with sharp questions about what was going on. Up to 40 percent of the troops fighting in Iraq are National Guard members and reservists -- "our neighbors," said Ron Glasser, a physician and author of a book about the wounded. "It all adds up and reaches a kind of tipping point," he said. On top of all that, America had believed the government's assurances that the wounded were being taken care of. "The country is embarrassed" to know otherwise, Glasser said.

DOJ_NMG_0139410

The scandal has reverberated through generations of veterans. "It's been a potent reminder of past indignities and past traumas," said Thomas A. Mellman, a professor of psychiatry at Howard University who specializes in post-traumatic stress and has worked in Veterans Affairs hospitals. "The fact that it's been responded to so quickly has created mixed feelings -- gratification, but obvious regret and anger that such attention wasn't given before, especially for Vietnam veterans."

Across the country, some military quarters for wounded outpatients are in bad shape, according to interviews, Government Accountability Office reports and transcripts of congressional testimony. The mold, mice and rot of Walter Reed's Building 18 compose a familiar scenario for many soldiers back from Iraq or Afghanistan who were shipped to their home posts for treatment. Nearly 4,000 outpatients are currently in the military's Medical Holding or Medical Holdover companies, which oversee the wounded. Soldiers and veterans report bureaucratic disarray similar to Walter Reed's: indifferent, untrained staff; lost paperwork; medical appointments that drop from the computers; and long waits for consultations.

Sandy Karen was horrified when her 21-year-old son was discharged from the Naval Medical Center in San Diego a few months ago and told to report to the outpatient barracks, only to find the room swarming with fruit flies, trash overflowing and a syringe on the table. "The staff sergeant says, 'Here are your linens' to my son, who can't even stand up," said Karen, of Brookeville, Md. "This kid has an open wound, and I'm going to put him in a room with fruit flies?" She took her son to a hotel instead.

"My concern is for the others, who don't have a parent or someone to fight for them," Karen said. "These are just kids. Who would have ever looked in on my son?"

Capt. Leslie Haines was sent to Fort Knox in Kentucky for treatment in 2004 after being flown out of Iraq. "The living conditions were the worst I'd ever seen for soldiers," he said. "Paint peeling, mold, windows that didn't work. I went to the hospital chaplain to get them to issue blankets and linens. There were no nurses. You had wounded and injured leading the troops."

Hundreds of soldiers contacted The Washington Post through telephone calls and e-mails, many of them describing their bleak existence in Medhold.

From Fort Campbell in Kentucky: "There were yellow signs on the door stating our barracks had asbestos."

From Fort Bragg in North Carolina: "They are on my [expletive] like a diaper. . . . there are people getting chewed up everyday."

From Fort Dix in New Jersey: "Scare tactics are used against soldiers who will write sworn statement to assist fellow soldiers for their medical needs."

From Fort Irwin in California: "Most of us have had to sign waivers where we understand that the housing we were in failed to meet minimal government standards."

Soldiers back from Iraq worry that their psychological problems are only beginning to surface. "The hammer is just coming down, I can feel it," said retired Maj. Anthony DeStefano of New Jersey, describing his descent into post-traumatic stress and the Army's propensity to medicate rather than talk. When he returned home, Army doctors put him on the antipsychotic drug Seroquel. "That way, you can screw their lights out and they won't feel a thing," he said of patients like himself. "By the time they understand what is going on, they are through the Board and stuck with an unfavorable percentage of disability" benefits.

Nearly 64,000 of the more than 184,000 Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans who have sought VA health care have been diagnosed with potential symptoms of post-traumatic stress, drug abuse or other mental disorders as of the end of June, according to the latest report by the Veterans Health Administration. Of those, nearly 30,000 have possible post-traumatic stress disorder, the report said.

VA hospitals are also receiving a surge of new patients after more than five years of combat. At the sprawling James J. Peters VA Medical Center in the Bronx, N.Y., Spec. Roberto Reyes Jr. lies nearly immobile and unable to talk. Once a strapping member of Charlie Company, 1st Battalion, 5th Cavalry, Reyes got too close to an improvised explosive device in Iraq and was sent to Walter Reed, where doctors did all they could before shipping him to the VA for the remainder of his life. A cloudy bag of urine hangs from his wheelchair. His mother and his aunt are constant bedside companions; Reyes, 25, likes for them to get two inches from his face, so he can pull on their noses with the few fingers he can still control.

DOJ_NMG_0139411

Maria Mendez, his aunt, complained about the hospital staff. "They fight over who's going to have to give him a bath -- in front of him!" she said. Reyes suffered third-degree burns on his leg when a nurse left him in a shower unattended. He was unable to move himself away from the scalding water. His aunt found out only later, when she saw the burns.

Among the most aggrieved are veterans who have lived with the open secret of substandard, underfunded care in the 154 VA hospitals and hundreds of community health centers around the country. They vented their fury in thousands of e-mails and phone calls and in chat rooms.

"I have been trying to get someone, ANYBODY, to look into my allegations" at the Dayton VA, pleaded Darrell Hampton.

"I'm calling from Summerville, South Carolina, and I have a story to tell," began Horace Williams, 62. "I'm a Marine from the Vietnam era, and it took me 20 years to get the benefits I was entitled to."

The VA has a backlog of 400,000 benefit claims, including many concerning mental health. Vietnam vets whose post-traumatic stress has been triggered by images of war in Iraq are flooding the system for help and are being turned away.

For years, politicians have received letters from veterans complaining of bad care across the country. Last week, Walter Reed was besieged by members of Congress who toured the hospital and Building 18 to gain first-hand knowledge of the conditions. Many of them have been visiting patients in the hospital for years, but now they are issuing news releases decrying the mistreatment of the wounded.

Sgt. William A. Jones had recently written to his Arizona senators complaining about abuse at the VA hospital in Phoenix. He had written to the president before that. "Not one person has taken the time to respond in any manner," Jones said in an e-mail.

From Ray Oliva, the distraught 70-year-old vet from Kelseyville, Calif., came this: "I wrote a letter to Senators Feinstein and Boxer a few years ago asking why I had to wear Hospital gowns that had holes in them and torn and why some of the Vets had to ask for beds that had good mattress instead of broken and old. Wheel chairs old and tired and the list goes on and on. I never did get a response."

Oliva lives in a house on a tranquil lake. His hearing is shot from working on fighter jets on the flight line. "Gun plumbers," as they called themselves, didn't get earplugs in the late 1950s, when Oliva served with the Air Force. His hands had been burned from touching the skin of the aircraft. All is minor compared with what he later saw at the VA hospital where he received care.

"I sat with guys who'd served in 'Nam," Oliva said. "We had terrible problems with the VA. But we were all so powerless to do anything about them. Just like Walter Reed."

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Army Hospitals: Finally, Some Action (NSWK)

By John Barry And Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

For a lot of soldiers, tangled bureaucracy and shabby living quarters are a way of life. Perhaps that's why the brass didn't respond to reports of mismanagement and decay at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center with more urgency. But the grim stories, first reported in The Washington Post, appalled the one person who really mattered: the new secretary of Defense, Robert Gates. He promised President Bush that high-level officials would be held accountable—and seemed to get that when the commander of the hospital, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, was fired. But then Gates found that the temporary replacement—Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, named after Weightman was sacked—had earlier run the place himself. According to a senior Defense official who didn't want to be named discussing personnel matters, a furious Gates demanded the resignation of the secretary of the Army, Francis J. Harvey.

Will it end there? Before he resigned, Harvey told reporters he had broadened the Army's own inquiry to include facilities such as Landstuhl Regional Medical Center in Germany, a target of complaints by some vets. Bush created a commission to study soldiers' health care, asking for "concrete recommendations" within months, and a final report within the year, according to a White House aide who couldn't be named discussing internal deliberations. It can't come too soon.

Reddit Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

DOJ_NMG_0139412

U.S. News and World Report, March 4, 2007

Nothing screams change to an old setting like a new set of furniture and edgy decorations. President Bush signaled a new, more formal tone when he junked former President Clinton's gaudy Oval Office furnishings. Nancy Pelosi returned grace and style to the House speaker's office with flowers and bowls of chocolates. And Bob Gates, the latest defense secretary, is doing it at the Pentagon.

Distinguishing himself from Don Rumsfeld's combativeness, Gates held his first press conference around a big table in a small conference room. But it was too cramped, so he set his sights on making the larger briefing room cozier. Gone is the lone podium, replaced by a set that would better fit a morning TV news show: a big table for himself and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in front of a world map. And unlike Rummy, Gates likes to sit, despite formerly heading Texas A&M University, where the "12th Man" tradition keeps students on their feet for Aggie games. "Frankly," says Gates, "I get tired when I stand up too long."

Now the decorations. Gates thinks the office looks better with a few trinkets from Aggieland, says spokesperson Hollen Wheeler. That, naturally, riled the larger corps of brass, who hail from the University of Texas. But Wheeler, herself a Longhorn, says the UT gang doesn't feel too threatened: They outnumber Aggies 9 to 2.

Breaking Bread Now, Heads Later

The groundwork is being laid for the first meeting between the two party chairmen, longtime Democratic boss Howard Dean and GOP newbie Sen. Mel Martinez. But it's not just to gab over a cup of Starbucks. Both sides want to make sure that the other won't let states hold primaries before New Hampshire's first. We hear that the GOP will activate a rule to punish state parties if they do by slashing their number of delegates at the nominating convention in half. The Democrats don't have a similar rule.

No Retreat, and a Plan to Get Even

Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay is joining the activist world with a plan to return conservatives to dominance. DeLay calls his new group the Coalition for a Conservative Majority, and it has one mission: recruiting and electing conservatives in all 50 states. He plans to begin building it during an April book tour to promote No Retreat, No Surrender, his blueprint for victory. Ironically, DeLay was inspired by Democrats who followed their loss to President Bush in 2000 with what he calls a liberal shadow party that ousted the GOP last year and is aimed at installing Sen.Hillary Rodham Clinton in the White House.

Don't Mess With This Texan's Picks

Katrina cleanup czar Donald Powell didn't get his Super Bowl picks right, but he did correctly predict the vastly underrated New Orleans Saints and San Diego Chargers would make the playoffs. So considering those creds, we asked him his pick for the World Series. "The Houston Astros vs. the California Angels," he tells us. It's an authoritative guess: He talks baseball with former President Bush, a longtime fan, and current President Bush, a former Texas Rangers partner.

A Nelson Mandela for an Earlier Time

Most White House reporters stick to what they know when it comes time to pen a book. But Cox Newspapers correspondent Bob Deans thought bigger. "I found it fascinating to write about the first great leader we know of in English America—Chief Powhatan. "Yes, the father of Pocahontas and the first native big shot the British encountered. In The River Where America Began, Deans charts civilization along Virginia's James and finds the chief to be more than the despot others have called him. If Powhatan had been born today, Deans thinks he knows whom the chief would be compared to: "It's not hard to imagine Powhatan as a kind of 17th-century Nelson Mandela, standing boldly for the cause of his people."

Juicing the GOP Message

Florida's Rep.Adam Putnam, the No. 3 House Republican, isn't shy about his Sunshine State pride. After his alma mater University of Florida Gators won the national football championship, he met with reporters in the Capitol sitting next to an alligator head. Since then, he's talked politics with reporters over jugs of Florida's Natural orange juice, produced from a farming co-op begun in 1933 that his family is a part of. "We try to sweeten the reporters' dispositions," he jokes, and he thinks it's working. "We've been having a couple of good-message weeks."

What's With Watts and Richardson?

It could have been the environment, the Clinton School of Public Service in Little Rock, or the brash frankness of an ex-politician. But former Rep. J. C. Watts, once the House GOP's main communicator and a sometimes entry on Republican vice presidential lists, fessed up at the University of Arkansas last month that he likes Democratic New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson in the 2008 presidential race. "Personally, I'm a Bill Richardson fan," he admits. "I think he has the Bill Clinton touch with people."

DOJ_NMG_0139413

A G-Man's Version of Oprah's List

He's no Oprah. But FBI Director and avid reader Robert Mueller has started a new bureau reading list to help his G-men broaden their horizons. The list has more than 60 books about the FBI's history, terrorism, intelligence, and professional development. "He just thought," says an insider, "that we must have more formalized intellectual stimulation." Some gems: Public Enemies, by Bryan Burrough, about the birth of the FBI; The Looming Tower, Lawrence Wright's book about al Qaeda's road to 9/11; China, Inc. by Ted Fishman; and Louis Gerstner's Who Says Elephants Can't Dance? about IBM's historic turnaround. We also hear that Mueller's a big fan of former GE bigwig Jack Welch. So naturally, Welch's Winning also gets top billing.

Paul Bedard's blog is at www.usnews.com/whispers

With Anna Mulrine, Silla Brush, Suzi Parker and Chitra Ragavan

Focus Is On Veterans' Chief As Inquiries On Care Begin (NYT)

By Lynette Clemetson

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 4 — As President Bush ordered an investigation of the military's care of wounded soldiers and veterans last week, Jim Nicholson, secretary of veterans affairs, darted between events, seeking to put a positive public face on his beleaguered agency.

In Chicago on Friday, Mr. Nicholson spoke to a group of Navy boot camp graduates, toured the North Chicago V.A. Medical Center, and visited a private trauma clinic to gather ideas on providing special care for injuries like brain trauma.

"If there is even one injured veteran that falls through the cracks then that is too many," he said in a telephone interview at the end of the day. "It pains me to hear about problems in our system, but I am a competitor, and I am finding that it is strengthening my resolve and deepening my commitment."

In the wake of the shake-up last week in the Defense Department medical system — which included the firing of the two-star general in charge of Walter Reed Army Medical Center and the resignation of Francis J. Harvey as secretary of the Army — the Department of Veterans Affairs is facing intense political and public scrutiny. The agency operates the country's largest health care system, serving more than 5.5 million veterans a year.

On Monday, the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform is to conduct a hearing at Walter Reed on the problems there, and the Senate Armed Services Committee has set a hearing for Tuesday. Mr. Nicholson's agency is also likely to come under scrutiny at the hearings.

"I welcome Congressional oversight, and the oversight of the president and the commission he is forming," Mr. Nicholson said. "I welcome them looking at us and taking a measure of how we are doing, so we can improve any deficiencies that are found."

Mr. Nicholson, 69, a Vietnam War veteran and past chairman of the Republican National Committee, was appointed by Mr. Bush to lead the department in 2005.

He has been accused by some veterans and the organizations that represent them of being primarily a mouthpiece for the Bush administration and of being slow to respond to increasing strains on his agency as returning soldiers move from facilities like Walter Reed, which is run by the Defense Department, into the veterans affairs system.

Critics say he has under-emphasized his agency's budget needs to Congress, has not responded to calls for more mental health workers and brain trauma specialists and has failed to overhaul disability claims procedures. Some leaders of veterans groups say Mr. Nicholson is less communicative than his predecessors.

"We're supposed to be partners, but there is no free flow of information since he took over," said Bill Bradshaw, director of National Veterans Service for the Veterans of Foreign Wars. "We often learn about changes after they are done, and there is little consultation."

Mr. Nicholson says his agency is making changes. It is putting procedures in place to screen all veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan for signs of brain trauma and the agency is also researching how to shorten the claims process, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0139414

"I am willing to take responsibility for the mistakes in the system, but at the same time I am entitled to credit for all the good things and advances happening at the V.A.," Mr. Nicholson said. He said the V.A. system had been cited "as among the best, if not the best" integrated health systems in the country. Mr. Nicholson called the 2008 budget request of nearly $87 billion "a landmark request" and said that V.A. financing had increased by 77 percent since Mr. Bush took office in 2001. (Critics point out that there are also increased demands from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.)

Friends and colleagues say that Mr. Nicholson, a deeply religious man from dirt-poor Iowa roots, has maintained a chin-up response. But his wife, Suzanne, said the scrutiny and criticisms had shaken him.

"He's not one to show his emotions. When he is upset and worried a calmness comes over him," said Suzanne Nicholson, 62. "But it keeps him awake at night. It is terribly distressing and awful for him."

His stoicism and determination, said his wife and close friends, are an outgrowth of his tough childhood. Born in the small, rural town of Struble, Iowa, he was the third of seven children of an alcoholic father and a devout Catholic mother who taught her children nightly catechism lessons by kerosene lamp because the family had no electricity and no car to get them to daily Mass.

After high school, he was accepted to West Point. He was an Army ranger and was awarded a Bronze Star in Vietnam. Later, after law school, he became a legal counsel for the Denver Home Builders Association, and later a developer.

Mr. Nicholson was viewed skeptically by some in Washington when he was elected in 1997 to succeed Haley Barbour as Republican Party chairman. But he eventually won respect, even praise, as a skilled fund-raiser and a tough, credible leader. Mr. Bush appointed him ambassador to the Vatican in 2001.

Through his varied careers, Mr. Nicholson has never run anything even close to the size of the Department of Veterans Affairs, which operates 155 medical centers and roughly 900 outpatient clinics. With a staff of 235,000, it is the second-largest government agency behind the Defense Department.

His detractors, including some leaders of veterans groups, say Mr. Nicholson has a far less cooperative relationship with their groups than his predecessors had. Some say he is more attentive to his bosses in the administration than the veterans he serves and that he lacks deep experience in veterans affairs.

"Mr. Nicholson is purely a political appointee who comes from a background of no involvement in veterans issues," said David W. Gorman, executive director of Disabled American Veterans. "He very much wants to do what he believes is the right thing to do, but not knowing the system as one needs to, he is at a distinct disadvantage."

Not all veterans representatives are as critica. John F. Sommer, executive director of the Washington office of the American Legion, the largest veterans service organization, said Mr. Nicholson had been attentive to his organization's needs.

"Are there problems with the V.A.? Sure. But did Jim Nicholson cause the problems? I don't think so," Mr. Sommer said. "Especially when it comes to funding, you have to look at the amount of money the V.A. is getting from Congress."

Some Congressional leaders say Mr. Nicholson and his agency are victims of political maneuvering. "Mr. Nicholson just happens to be in the wrong party," said Senator Larry Craig, Republican of Idaho, the ranking member of the Committee on Veterans Affairs. "People now want to say that not only are they against the war and the way the president has handled it, but now they want to take aim at the way the government takes care of the veterans."

More serious than complaints about Mr. Nicholson's style are charges that he has not sufficiently addressed efficiency and preparedness. Linda J. Bilmes, a professor of public finance at Harvard, recently completed a study of the long-term costs of providing medical care and benefits to veterans of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. The Department of Veterans Affairs, she said, "is overwhelmed in every area."

Valor And Squalor (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

When Salon, the online magazine, reported on mistreatment of veterans at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center two years ago, officials simply denied that there were any problems. And they initially tried to brush off last month's exposé in The Washington Post.

DOJ_NMG_0139415

But this time, with President Bush's approval at 29 percent, Democrats in control of Congress, and Donald Rumsfeld no longer defense secretary — Robert Gates, his successor, appears genuinely distressed at the situation — the whitewash didn't stick.

Yet even now it's not clear whether the public will be told the full story, which is that the horrors of Walter Reed's outpatient unit are no aberration. For all its cries of "support the troops," the Bush administration has treated veterans' medical care the same way it treats everything else: nickel-and-diming the needy, protecting the incompetent and privatizing everything it can.

What makes this a particular shame is that in the Clinton years, veterans' health care — like the Federal Emergency Management Agency — became a shining example of how good leadership can revitalize a troubled government program. By the early years of this decade the Veterans Health Administration was, by many measures, providing the highest-quality health care in America. (It probably still is: Walter Reed is a military facility, not run by the V.H.A.)

But as with FEMA, the Bush administration has done all it can to undermine that achievement. And the Walter Reed scandal is another Hurricane Katrina: the moment when the administration's misgovernment became obvious to everyone.

The problem starts with money. The administration uses carefully cooked numbers to pretend that it has been generous to veterans, but the historical data contained in its own budget for fiscal 2008 tell the true story. The quagmire in Iraq has vastly increased the demands on the Veterans Administration, yet since 2001 federal outlays for veterans' medical care have actually lagged behind overall national health spending.

To save money, the administration has been charging veterans for many formerly free services. For example, in 2005 Salon reported that some Walter Reed patients were forced to pay hundreds of dollars each month for their meals.

More important, the administration has broken longstanding promises of lifetime health care to those who defend our nation. Two months before the invasion of Iraq the V.H.A., which previously offered care to all veterans, introduced severe new restrictions on who is entitled to enroll in its health care system. As the agency's Web site helpfully explains, veterans whose income exceeds as little as $27,790 a year, and who lack "special eligibilities such as a compensable service connected condition or recent combat service," will be turned away.

So when you hear stories of veterans who spend months or years fighting to get the care they deserve, trying to prove that their injuries are service-related, remember this: all this red tape was created not by the inherent inefficiency of government bureaucracy, but by the Bush administration's penny-pinching.

But money is only part of the problem.

We know from Hurricane Katrina postmortems that one of the factors degrading FEMA's effectiveness was the Bush administration's relentless push to outsource and privatize disaster management, which demoralized government employees and drove away many of the agency's most experienced professionals. It appears that the same thing has been happening to veterans' care.

The redoubtable Henry Waxman, chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, points out that IAP Worldwide Services, a company run by two former Halliburton executives, received a large contract to run Walter Reed under suspicious circumstances: the Army reversed the results of an audit concluding that government employees could do the job more cheaply.

And Mr. Waxman, who will be holding a hearing on the issue today, appears to have solid evidence, including an internal Walter Reed memo from last year, that the prospect of privatization led to a FEMA-type exodus of skilled personnel.

What comes next? Francis J. Harvey, who as far as I can tell was the first defense contractor appointed secretary of the Army, has been forced out. But the parallels between what happened at Walter Reed and what happened to New Orleans — not to mention parallels with the mother of all scandals, the failed reconstruction of Iraq — tell us that the roots of the scandal run far deeper than the actions of a few bad men.

At The Pentagon, Gates Seen As Liberator (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139416

Robert M. Gates is finding Donald H. Rumsfeld an easy act to follow, as the new defense secretary wins hearts and minds throughout Washington and overseas.

"Stylistically, it's night and day," said Rep. Mark Udall (D-Colo.), a member of the House Armed Services Committee. With Gates's modest manner, Udall said, "He's the anti-Rumsfeld."

At the Pentagon, where Gates has been greeted as a liberator, "you can already feel the stability," said retired Air Force Lt. Gen. Charles F. Wald, formerly the deputy U.S. commander in Europe. He said he considers the appointment of Gates to be the Bush administration's best move in years.

At the same time, Gates has shown that he can act decisively, as when he fired Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey on Friday over the handling of the growing patient-care scandal at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Expressing disappointment, Gates said that "the problems at Walter Reed appear to be problems of leadership."

Former national security adviser Brent Scowcroft urged caution on Gates's honeymoon. "How much of it is Bob Gates as a personality, manager and leader, and how much of it is Rumsfeld being gone, is hard to say," said Scowcroft, who has known Gates for 30 years. "Rumsfeld was a difficult man to work for."

Indeed, in his first months at the Pentagon, Gates has been welcomed largely because of who he is not rather than what he has done, noted a longtime friend who has held top national security posts. In the months ahead, however, Gates will be judged on his own decision-making in the war he has inherited from Rumsfeld. Speaking privately with members of Congress, Gates has said he has three priorities in his new job: "Iraq, Iraq and Iraq."

It isn't clear that the goodwill Gates has engendered will help him manage the war. "I don't know that anybody can do that job," former defense secretary William S. Cohen said. "I think he'll do as well as anyone can do."

Gates said he finds it "amusing" to see people parsing out whether he is distinguishing himself from his predecessor. Rather, he told reporters in Spain last month, "I'm just going along doing what feels right for me."

One thing that apparently feels right is slyly alluding to Rumsfeld's memorable statements. Speaking at a recent security conference in Germany, Gates said that divisions such as "Old Europe versus New" were "characterizations [that] belong to the past" -- a reference to a crack made by Rumsfeld in January 2003 that rankled some longtime NATO allies.

One major difference for Gates from his previous work in intelligence -- he spent 27 years at the CIA, serving as director from 1991 to 1993 -- is the amount of time he must spend in the public eye, testifying before Congress, holding news conferences and visiting foreign capitals. In his first 2 1/2 months as defense secretary, he has visited Iraq, Afghanistan and Europe.

He has made it clear he doesn't intend to emulate Rumsfeld's bravura-filled televised briefings. "I feel more at ease in a more informal setting," he said last month. "I like a setting that is more of a conversation than a one-way means of communication."

Some experts worry that Gates's inexperience in military affairs will make him rely too much on a defense establishment that was slow to adjust to reality in Iraq. Others argue that his expertise will help. "This is an intelligence war," said Andrew Krepinevich, a retired Army officer who directs the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments. "How many tanks we have doesn't matter. So Gates being an intelligence guy might be a real advantage." Gates was also a member of the Iraq Study Group, which in December called for the United States to withdraw most combat forces from Iraq early next year -- a move the Bush administration has rejected.

In contrast to Rumsfeld's damn-the-torpedoes style, Gates conceded in the conference in Germany that the United States sometimes makes mistakes and must better explain its actions, especially with issues such as the treatment of terrorism suspects held at the detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The audience of 250 security officials and experts applauded enthusiastically.

A significant step Gates took at the Pentagon early on was putting the word out that he would keep almost everyone in their jobs -- including some officials seen as Rumsfeld men. "His choice to work with people already in place rather than bring in a new team sent a very strong signal of confidence in the professionalism of the organization, and they were thirsting for that after Secretary Rumsfeld's erratic irascibility," said Kori Schake, who worked with the Rumsfeld Pentagon as a White House defense official and now teaches at West Point.

DOJ_NMG_0139417

Despite some departmental friction over the burdens of Iraq, Gates seems to have a better relationship with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice than did Rumsfeld. Both are Soviet experts, and they have known each other since they were on the staff of the National Security Council during the George H.W. Bush administration. Last year Rice asked Gates to be her deputy. "I think they have a real compatibility," Cohen said.

World Bank Slow To Inform Employees Of Baghdad Shooting (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

World Bank employees were surprised late Thursday by an e-mail advising them that a bank driver in Iraq had been seriously wounded in a shooting in Baghdad the previous week, and had been evacuated from the country.

Usually, news of serious staff injuries goes up quickly on the internal intranet. "When anything like this happens in a country it's supposed to go up there immediately," one staffer explained. "People are concerned, maybe it's someone they know, and injuries can often occur while working in Third World countries. And they want to know the bank is looking out for them."

But Thursday's e-mail, sent at 6:16 p.m. from Daniela Gressani, a vice president for the Middle East and North Africa (MENA), came hours after employees had been passing around a story by the Inter Press Service news agency about the shooting -- and accusing the bank of keeping it quiet so as not to disturb efforts to recruit employees to work in Iraq.

In her e-mail, Gressani -- who recently replaced another vice president who had questioned World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz's decision to go big-time into nation-building in Iraq -- said that MENA employees at a Feb. 22 meeting "were informed that we had just evacuated a bank driver from Baghdad who had been injured when caught in a cross-fire at a checkpoint.

"Many of you have asked about his progress," she wrote, reporting that he had been "evacuated and treated in a hospital" in Amman, Jordan. The employee's name and that of his family were being withheld for his privacy and their safety, she said. His condition was "stable and improving daily and we expect a full recovery."

The bank's rank and file were upset because the Inter Press article was the first time many headquarters employees -- for example, those who work in the Asia, Africa or Latin America regions -- and others stationed around the world -- had heard of the shooting. The intranet postings, we're told, are the first thing bank employees check every morning when they get to work.

We began calling the bank Thursday afternoon about the incident in order to knock down the accusation that the bank had kept the matter under wraps, but have not gotten a response.

First Lady Weighs In on Iraq, Then Finds Safety in Seals

First lady Laura Bush raised a few eyebrows last Monday when she weighed in on the Iraq war during an interview with CNN's Larry King.

She acknowledged that the war was "wearying," and "probably" would continue after she and her husband leave town, and then reminded us that the media make things seem worse than they really are.

"Many parts of Iraq are stable now," she told King. "But, of course, what we see on television is the one bombing a day that discourages everybody."

Even President Bush, who used to make the press-bashing argument, no longer does so.

But, judging from a White House release Friday, she was back on message.

"This is a great way to end today, with the monk seals," she told reporters after visiting the Hawaiian Monk Seal Captive Care Project at Midway, "because so far today it's looked like this is all really bird life, but the real huge number of species, and one of the reasons this has been named a national monument, is because of the marine life -- the fish that we didn't get to see today, of course, we didn't snorkel, but if you were here in the summer, you probably could do that -- and all the other algae and other things that are below the water that are so important to this national marine monument."

A reporter asked a question about the visit.

"Well, I love the monk seals, of course, everyone loves them, loves the way they look," she said. "And then I fell in love with all those little albatross chicks. You feel very protective of them, they're so vulnerable, sitting on their nests. It's so important that they don't have -- they don't have any natural predators here in their natural life, and it's really important that no invasive predators ever come."

DOJ_NMG_0139418

Can't argue with that.

Bob Ney, Still Glad He Didn't 'Miss the Dance'

Some people, reflecting on a particularly bad patch in their lives, often turn to poets, writers, spiritual leaders and the like for philosophical ballast.

Former representative Bob Ney (R-Ohio) -- heading to the federal pen last week for 30 months for taking free meals, gifts and trips from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff-- turned to Garth Brooks.

In an e-mail to supporters obtained by Gannett News Service, Ney said he would "not have access to e-mail so this will be my last for awhile. i wanted to drop you a short e-mail to give you my address," in Morgantown, W.Va., he wrote, including his inmate number -- 28882-016. The e-mail, typed in all lowercase letters, can be found at http://www.zanesvilletimesrecorder.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20070301/NEWS01/70301003. Ney said, "someone asked me the other day, if i wish i had never ran for office. i answered that i am glad that i did. nothing can erase the wonderful memories . . . working to bring jobs to the district, helping constituents . . . trying to change law to help people. . . ." Not to mention that wonderful golf trip to Scotland.

Then he did a Rumsfeld-style self-interview. "would I change things if i could,sure. am i sorry for things that happened, absolutely, and i will pay the price."

He closed: "As garth brooks said in his song the dance:

and now I'm glad I didn't know

the way it all would end, the way it all would go

our lives are better left to chance,

i could have missed the pain,

but i'd have had to miss, the dance."

Cheney Takes His Line, if Not His Cue, From Gore

Former U.N. ambassador John Bolton has been trashing the administration lately, but Vice President Cheney had only praise for him at the Conservative Political Action Conference here last week, saying he wanted "especially" to recognize Bolton, "who did a superb job for America at the United Nations."

Cheney even stole a line from Al Gore. "Like it or not," he said, "the enemy we face in the war on terror has made Iraq the primary front in that war. To use a popular phrase, this is an inconvenient truth." The crowd laughed and applauded.

Out Of Stocks, And Into ...? (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

All dressed up with no place to go.

That's the problem confronting the investment dollar in the wake of last week's stock slide.

As billions of dollars came out of the world's stock markets last week, the money didn't just evaporate. It is trying to decide where to alight.

The economy continues to grow, generating profits. Market interest rates remain low -- in fact they have been falling again -- making it cheap to borrow money. So there is no shortage of cash.

The question is where, once the dust settles a bit, the cash will go. Some lately has been heading for safety, to such things as Treasury bonds. In the longer run it is likely to go elsewhere as well, and where you think it will go depends a lot on what you think just happened to the financial markets.

Analysts see at least three ways to view last week's trouble, which resulted in a 4.2% drop in the Dow Jones Industrial Average. Goldman Sachs economists Ed McKelvey and Andrew Tilton outlined three competing views in a report last week.

1. A much-overdue short-term pullback. The Dow Jones industrials hadn't fallen as much as 2% from a high in more than seven months, and hadn't fallen 10% in almost four years. That is an exceptionally long time without a serious hiccup.

If last week's trouble was just a hiccup, then stocks should rebound in the next few weeks, and the trick is to pick out the stocks likely to rebound the most.

DOJ_NMG_0139419

"This does not mark the end of the cyclical bull market," wrote veteran money manager Steve Leuthold, chairman of Leuthold Weeden Research, in a special report to clients after Tuesday's 416-point Dow selloff.

"I am extremely doubtful that this big down day marks the start of the market's widely anticipated 7%-10% correction phase," Mr. Leuthold wrote. "Why? Because far too many CNBC pundits now expect this to happen." He said he would be looking for stocks to buy, including adding to his investments in China.

Some analysts think that even if the problems are just temporary, they could last a little longer. In this view, hedge funds -- large, loosely regulated pools of private capital -- had more money invested in stocks than they really wanted, to avoid being left behind by the market's rampant gains. Now, with the market clearly no longer rampant, hedge funds will take the opportunity to pull back and bet on declines -- and while they do so, stocks could remain under pressure.

2. A flight from risky investments. If that is what is going on, then the market shift is more serious.

At least for now, this appears to be happening. Investors suddenly have pulled back from a raft of risky securities, from developing-country stocks and bonds to junk bonds and small stocks in the U.S.

"I would caution people not to say that this is over," says Marc Stern, chief investment officer at Bessemer Investment Management in New York. His view is that investors had become blasé about risky securities, paid too much for them, and now are seeing the prices of those assets fall back to a more normal level. "One should naturally expect heightened volatility to persist. A healthy correction in this time period wouldn't surprise us," he says -- meaning he thinks risky investments could fall further.

Mr. Stern, in other words, won't be following Mr. Leuthold into China anytime soon. He won't be buying developing-country bonds until their prices have fallen to a level he considers more realistic. Earlier this year, Mr. Stern had built up his cash hoard and has pulled back from risky securities. Once the storm seems to be passing, he says, he likely will buy larger, blue-chip stocks that can withstand the possibility of more stormy weather as the year progresses.

"Some of the easy money that went elsewhere may be coming back to the U.S.," says Richard Sichel, chief investment officer at Philadelphia Trust, who also thinks the stocks of big U.S. multinational companies could come back into favor. Big-stock bulls have been predicting such a shift for more than a year, and big stocks generally have lagged behind other investments, but the bulls think they will come into their own now.

Nervousness about risk also is evident in the way investors have been using stock options. For months, investors didn't feel much need to buy and sell stock options to protect themselves from sudden market changes. An index measuring the use of options, called the Vix and tracked by the Chicago Board Options Exchange, has been unusually low for months. Last week it jumped 70%, an almost unheard-of gain in percentage terms. In absolute terms, however, the Vix is still well below its historic average.

3. A sign of a weaker economy to come. This could be the most troubling prognosis. Some investors took former U.S. Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan at his word last week when he said a recession later this year couldn't be ruled out. These investors see the flight to bonds as another sign conservative investors are hunkering down for a period of economic trouble.

Until last week, investors who had bet on a softening economy hadn't done very well. Consumer spending and corporate profits repeatedly have come in stronger than most pundits expected. Reports of the consumer's demise have been exaggerated.

Despite this, the Goldman economists say in their report that they think economic growth, the housing market and consumer spending all may be softer this year than more bullish analysts are forecasting. They also don't rule out the possibility that default problems in the lower end of the mortgage market could bleed into other lending markets.

The Goldman economists see a silver lining: They expect the Fed to step in by June and begin cutting its target interest rates.

Early this year, before the U.S. government slashed its once-strong estimate of fourth-quarter economic growth, many investors thought the robust economy would prevent the Fed from cutting interest rates until year's end, if then. Today, with the economy appearing to be growing more like 2% than 3% annually, bond yields and interest-rate futures suggest many investors think the Fed will cut rates by summer to give the economy a boost.

Lower interest rates support stronger economic growth. They also support home sales because they make it cheaper to invest in land and to take out a mortgage.

DOJ_NMG_0139420

And cheap money makes it easier for people to borrow money and invest in financial markets. A big source of support for the stock market over the past four years, and for a wide variety of riskier investments, has been the huge amount of cash sloshing around, looking for a place to go. The availability of cheap money has made investors a lot more comfortable about taking risk.

As long as the Fed is expected to cut rates -- rather than raise them, as it was doing in 2000, when the last bear market began -- the cheap money can continue supporting stocks. Cheap money would help offset some of the worries these days about slowing economic growth, a credit crunch, a weak housing market and investor exposure to risky assets.

Mortgage Crisis Spirals, And Casualties Mount (NYT)

By Julie Creswell And Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

Even in affluent Orange County, Calif., the growing wealth of executives and brokers in the booming mortgage industry was hard to miss.

For Kal Elsayed, a former executive at New Century Financial, a large lender based in Irvine, driving a red convertible Ferrari to work at a company that provided home loans to people with low incomes and weak credit might have appeared ostentatious, he now acknowledges. But, he says, that was nothing compared with the private jets that executives at other companies had.

"You just lost touch with reality after a while because that's just how people were living," said Mr. Elsayed, 42, who spent nine years at New Century before leaving to start his own mortgage firm in 2005. "We made so much money you couldn't believe it. And you didn't have to do anything. You just had to show up."

Just as the technology boom of the late 1990s turned twenty-something programmers into dot-com billionaires, and leveraged buyouts a decade earlier turned Wall Street bankers into Masters of the Universe, the explosive growth in subprime lending turned mortgage bankers and brokers into multimillionaires seemingly overnight.

Now an escalating crisis in the market, which seemed to reach a new crescendo late last week, is threatening a wide band of people. Foremost are the poor and minority homeowners who used easy credit to buy houses that are turning out to be too expensive for them now that mortgage rates are going up, but the pain is also being felt widely throughout the business world.

Large companies that bought subprime lenders during the boom, like H&R Block and HSBC, are now scrambling to sell them or scale back their exposure. Many investors are also likely to suffer: Wall Street firms made billions in fees, commissions and trading revenue from packaging and selling subprime mortgages to them as bonds.

New Century has emerged as a poster child for the lenders that rode that boom to the top and are now in free fall. The company disclosed on Friday that federal prosecutors and securities regulators were investigating stock sales and accounting errors. The latter could jeopardize billions of dollars in financing for the company, which issued $39.4 billion in subprime loans in the first nine months of last year.

Weakening home prices and rising default rates have rocked the subprime business. But for those who cashed out before the market turned, the ride up was particularly sweet. The three founders of New Century, for example, together made more than $40.5 million in profits from selling shares in the company from 2004 to 2006, according to an analysis by Thomson Financial. They collected millions of dollars more in dividends, salaries, bonuses and perks.

The company said in a statement yesterday that the founders were "still significant shareholders," noting that they collectively owned about 7 percent of the company at the end of last year.

New Century's stock price, which seemed to mirror the trajectory of the subprime business, peaked at nearly $66 a share in December of 2004 and traded in the $40s most of last year; on Friday, it was trading at $11 a share after the market closed. In a series of sales from August to November, two of the company's founders sold shares for an average price of about $40 a share, for a total profit of $21.4 million.

It is not known whether the stock sales by the founders are among the sales being examined by federal investigators. Some of them had been part of scheduled stock sales that are often used by executives to diversify their portfolios. But some of the sales occurred on the same day that the executives entered the plans. A New Century spokeswoman, Laura Oberhelman, said that executives declined further comment.

DOJ_NMG_0139421

The founders' stock also rose in the social circles of southern California, the epicenter of the boom in subprime. Five of the 10 biggest providers of subprime mortgages last year had their headquarters in the region.

Robert K. Cole, 60, a co-founder who retired as chairman and chief executive last year, lives in a 6,100-square-foot oceanfront home in Laguna Beach that is valued at tens of millions of dollars and was once owned by the chief executive of Pimco Advisors, the giant bond trading and management firm. Edward F. Gotschall, 52, another co-founder who is vice chairman of the board, donated $3 million for an expanded trauma center at Mission Hospital that will be named for him and his wife Susan.

The executives from New Century are by no means alone in cashing in on the bonanza, and they do not appear to have scored the biggest profits. That title may be claimed by Angelo R. Mozilo, the chief executive of Countrywide Financial, the nation's largest stand-alone mortgage company and one of the largest subprime lenders last year. He reaped more than $270 million in profits from sales of stock and the exercise of stock options from 2004 to the start of this year, according to the Thompson analysis.

Of course, most of the 500,000 people who work in the mortgage industry did not cash in so grandly. The wealth was concentrated among executives, loan officers and brokers, because the greatest rewards were meted out in the form of commissions, bonuses and stock awards.

"In the hot times, it was not unusual to see a broker make a million bucks," said Guy Cecala, publisher of Inside Mortgage Finance, a trade publication. "You can carry that up further to people who ran the companies. The whole business revolves around personal compensation."

The hot times are clearly over.

New Century's disclosure of the federal investigations on Friday was the most serious in a string of shocks to have rocked the industry in the last three months.

A handful of lenders have sought bankruptcy protection, several have been acquired and a few have been shut down. Also on Friday, Fremont General, a top-five lender, said it planned to leave the business.

Industry officials say they are seeing an exodus of executives and salespeople as companies fold, cut jobs and push out early leaders.

"Everyone has run for the hills," said William D. Dallas, whose company, Ownit Mortgage, filed for bankruptcy protection in December after it lost financing from Merrill Lynch and other banks.

For the borrowers of these mortgages, it may become more difficult to refinance if lending standards are tightened significantly. Many are already facing the prospect of payment shock when low, fixed-interest mortgage rates adjust to higher, variable rates.

On Wall Street, big investment banks could lose a significant source of revenue if the appetite for bonds backed by mortgages dries up.

In the last two years many skeptics began warning that the red-hot housing market and adjustable-rate loans would blend into a toxic brew. Last year, subprime loans totaled $600 billion, or about 20 percent of all mortgages, up from $120 billion and 5 percent in 2001, according to Inside Mortgage Finance. More than half of subprime loans have adjustable rates.

Many of the problems that have surfaced thus far are not tied to the resetting of rates. Rather, they stem from a sharp and early spike in the default rates among loans issued last year.

For example, about 13.8 percent of the loans in a group of mortgages New Century sold to investors in April were behind in payments or in foreclosure by January. By comparison, only 6 percent of loans in a pool sold to investors in March 2005 had met that same fate by January 2006.

Investors and regulators fear that the problems will only worsen as so many borrowers have fallen behind so quickly, especially at a time when the overall economy is healthy. The phenomenon suggests that lending standards were significantly weakened last year and that lenders were not as watchful for fraudulent transactions.

For New Century, the early payment defaults pose significant financial problems. In the first nine months of last year, Wall Street banks and investors that it does business with forced it to buy back $469 million in loans it had sold to them, up from $240 million for the same period in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0139422

The company was able to sell back about half of those loans at a discount of 26.5 percent. How it handled the remainder — about $227 million — is now under scrutiny. According to accounting rules the company should have valued the loans on its books for what they were worth today, not their previous face value. But it did not.

If it had, the company would have seen its earnings fall by about $60 million before taxes, wiping out most of its profit in the third quarter, according to Zach Gast, an analyst at the Center for Financial Research and Analysis, a forensic accounting firm.

This is important, because the company's financing agreements require that it not lose money for any rolling six-month period. On Friday, New Century said it did not expect to make a profit in the six months that ended in December and that it was negotiating with lenders to waive the requirement but has only secured six of 11 waivers it needs.

"They had losses sitting on their balance sheets," Mr. Gast said.

In August, the company's chief financial officer, Patti M. Dodge, announced she was stepping down from her post to oversee investor relations, a department that typically reports to the chief financial officer. Taj S. Bindra, a former executive at Washington Mutual, replaced her in November.

For the second time in a decade, New Century finds itself fighting to survive. The firm's roots were planted at Plaza Home Mortgage Bank where the three founders of New Century — Mr. Cole, a longtime mortgage executive; Mr. Gotschall; and a lawyer named Bradley A. Morrice — worked together. The three formed New Century in 1995 after Plaza was sold to Fleet Mortgage Group, now a part of Washington Mutual.

In the late 1990s, New Century narrowly survived accounting concerns and a scare in the bond market after Russia's default in 1998. It pulled through thanks to an investment by U.S. Bancorp, a bank based in Minneapolis.

With interest rates at historic lows, it quickly grabbed a big share of the fast-growing subprime market during the housing boom.

"They walked into a niche industry at a time when everything was lining up perfectly for what they did," said W. Scott Simon, a managing director at Pimco Advisors. "In 2001, 2002 and 2003 the subprime business was just phenomenally profitable. Home prices kept appreciating and it seemed that no loans ever went bad."

From Serving In Iraq To Living On The Streets (WP)

By Christian Davenport

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

It was a bad week for Aaron Chesley. He talked back to the staff at a Baltimore homeless shelter, got into an argument with a fellow veteran and missed an appointment for his post-traumatic stress disorder counseling session.

"Are you still watching the news?" his counselor, Anthony Holmes, asked.

Maybe that's what had set Chesley off. He had been showing progress since he came to the program last fall. But television footage from the war could cast him back in Iraq in an instant, back to fingering the trigger of his machine gun, scanning the horizon for insurgents. And Holmes knew it wouldn't take much for Chesley to land back on the streets.

"No. If the news is on, I turn my back," Chesley said.

In a homeless shelter filled with Vietnam War veterans, Chesley, 26, a former Catonsville High School honors student who joined the West Virginia Army National Guard in 2000 to help pay for college, was the only one in the facility who fought in the country's latest conflict. But across the nation, veterans of recent combat in Iraq and Afghanistan are slowly starting to trickle into shelters, officials say.

The number of homeless veterans from recent wars is hard to gauge. From 2004 to 2006, the Department of Veterans Affairs provided shelter to 300 veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan tours, out of the tens of thousands who have served.

That figure "is not even close to accurate," said Paul Rieckhoff, executive director of the Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, because it doesn't include the "others sleeping in buses, their cars or on the streets."

In New York City alone, he said his organization has helped 60 homeless veterans since 2004.

As in the Vietnam War era, when thousands of vets ended up homeless, there are already signs that the recent conflicts are taking a traumatic psychological toll on some service members. Many veterans' advocates said that despite unprecedented attempts by the military and Veterans Affairs to care for veterans, increasing numbers of the new generation of warriors are ending up homeless.

DOJ_NMG_0139423

"This is something we need to be concerned about," said Cheryl Beversdorf, president of the National Coalition for Homeless Veterans, a Washington-based nonprofit.

Not everyone agrees, however, that the wars will spark a significant uptick in homelessness. Peter H. Dougherty, director of Veteran Affairs' Homeless Veterans programs, said that the administration is "light years ahead" of where it was during the Vietnam era. Without a draft, today's all-voluntary military is "better physically and mentally prepared" for combat, he said. The department now also provides free health care for two years after Iraq and Afghanistan vets get out of the military, and it's focusing on preventive services that help veterans and their families cope.

"We are continuing to expand services, but we don't see any influx yet," he said.

* * *

The debate comes as Army studies have found that up to 30 percent of soldiers coming home from Iraq have suffered from depression, anxiety or PTSD. A recent study found that those who have served multiple tours are 50 percent more likely to suffer from acute combat stress.

Veterans' homeless shelters across the country, such as the Maryland Center for Veterans Education and Training in Baltimore, are bracing for increased demand. "The wave has not hit yet, but it will," said retired Army Col. Charles Williams, MCVET's executive director.

Nearby, the South Baltimore Station shelter is doubling the size of its program in anticipation of the Iraq war vets it expects to serve, said Woody Curry, the center's program director. He thinks it will be several years before they start showing up in large numbers.

"Usually it takes a period of time before it surfaces -- the PTSD," he said. "And the military mentality leads you to try to tough it out and not say anything."

He said he was particularly worried about members of the National Guard and Reserves who return to their civilian lives after their service. "A lot of these guys were just everyday working people, and then you put them in a situation like that," he said. In Iraq, "you're on a hyper-vigilant state all the time. You can't turn that off. It becomes who you are."

Meanwhile, a report by the Democratic staff of the House Veterans Affairs Committee found that from October 2005 to June 2006, the number of Iraq and Afghanistan veterans seeking services from walk-in veterans centers doubled, from 4,467 to 9,103.

"It's clear from the report that Vet Center capacity has not kept pace with demand for services, and the administration has failed to properly plan and prepare for the mental health needs of returning veterans and their families," U.S. Rep. Michael H. Michaud (D-Maine), a member of the committee, said in a statement.

But Dougherty said the increase shows that more veterans were receiving treatment, and that the department's efforts to reach out them has succeeded. It has started sending letters to vets returning from Iraq and Afghanistan with the location of the nearest veterans center and "encouraging them to go," he said.

"One of the big differences now is we're much more in a preventative health-care mode than we were in the past," he said. "We're hoping by getting that early intervention we'll be able to take care of them."

Although many vets suffer from PTSD, "epidemiologic studies do not suggest that there is a causal connection between military service, service in Vietnam, or exposure to combat and homelessness among veterans," according to the Veteran Affairs Web site. Rather, homelessness in veterans is cause by an amalgam of forces: family support, finances, education, mental illness -- the same factors that cause homelessness in the general population.

The veterans department is going to considerable lengths to reach out to Iraq and Afghanistan veterans and their families, Dougherty said. There are also specialized services for women, who are an increasing part of the military force and are seeing combat in Iraq. Meanwhile, the total number of homeless veterans has gone down from about 250,000 10 years ago to about 194,000 this year.

The Army has increased the number of mental health professionals in Iraq and Afghanistan, and a pilot program where primary care physicians at Army bases screen patients for PTSD and other disorders is expanding. The military has also started following up on service members three to six months after they return from war to check on their overall physical and mental health.

DOJ_NMG_0139424

* * *

In Iraq, Chesley's unit provided convoy security, which meant the Army specialist was out on the roads exposed, always wondering when the next roadside bomb would explode.

He became hardened, he said, prepared to die: "It was kind of like you embrace death to stay alive. If you were going to die, you were going to die."

When he got home in March 2005, he struggled to adapt from the first day. He was excited to be home, and he knew his family was waiting, but as he got off the plane he felt dizzy.

Once gregarious and engaging, Chesley was withdrawn and sullen. This was not the young man who was a star athlete and an honors student, whose walls were adorned with plaques and certificates, whose principal, Robert Tomback, recently remembered him as "bright, quite charming and enormously popular."

Chesley started drinking heavily, he said, "putting coffee in my vodka just to get going in the morning." Drinking led to drugs and that led to trouble.

He stole about $600 from his mother. He was arrested twice for DUI, once after he hit a police car, the other after he flipped the truck with the windows he tinted so no one could see him drinking and smoking pot as he drove. He ended up floating between family members' homes.

He tried to resume his studies at West Virginia University, but he couldn't regain his old life.

Finally, his stepfather brought him to a VA Hospital in Baltimore, and Chesley was diagnosed with PTSD and bipolar disorder. Later, he enrolled in MCVET, the nonprofit shelter that provides drug and alcohol counseling and other services.

Sitting across from Holmes at the counseling session, Chesley was a model of contrition and promise. He vowed to take his medicine, to talk to someone if he felt rage creeping up, to "work on being respectful even if I'm angry."

Holmes finally let him go but worried.

"He's still got a lot of anger from the war," Holmes said after Chesley left. "He's on thin ice. He's on real thin ice."

A few weeks later, Chesley left the program, and its director of student services said he didn't know what happened to him.

Chesley's stepfather, Bennie Price, said he recently enrolled in a veterans program in West Virginia after "hitting rock bottom again."

Reached by phone last night, Chesley admitted he had slipped. "But I know I need help," he vowed. "And I want to succeed."

For Rep. Sanchez, A Hot-tomato Label Means A Hot Potato (LAT)

By Ashley Powers

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

Pacing next to the desk and U.S. flag in her district office in Garden Grove, the paradox that is Rep. Loretta Sanchez was on full display.

The congresswoman ticked off a meaty legislative to-do list: immigration reform, port safety, stopping sex trafficking, revamping "terrible management" at the Department of Homeland Security. She was articulate and sharp, even magnetic.

At the same time, she was shedding a red St. John Knits suit and shimmying into an ao dai, a traditional Vietnamese tunic and pants, for her next event. Meaning that she was telling a female reporter about her chairmanship of the House Subcommittee on Border, Maritime and Global Counterterrorism while wearing only pants and a black bra.

Was this a glimpse of Loretta Sanchez, siren, a politician known for her strenuous workout regimen and fondness for come-hither heels? Or was this Loretta Sanchez, harried congresswoman, too wrapped up in important national issues to take a break in the name of modesty?

Few members of Congress, if any, are such a walking Rorschach test. In the decade that Sanchez has represented central Orange County, the Democrat has been viewed alternately as a masterful fundraiser, legislative lightweight, political mentor, headstrong politician, leading Latina voice and one of Congress' "babes."

DOJ_NMG_0139425

Her latest headline-maker, quitting the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, mixes two familiar elements in Sanchez's career: politics and the risque.

Sanchez had told Politico, a new website covering Capitol Hill, that her departure was due in part to Rep. Joe Baca's demeaning manner toward women and his gossiping that she was a "whore," both of which he has denied.

Comedy Central's Stephen Colbert then devoted an entire "Colbert Report" segment to pondering, "Is Loretta Sanchez a whore?" (No, the comedian decided.) Last week, several caucus members unsuccessfully tried to oust Baca, a Democrat from Rialto, as the group's chairman, the Hill newspaper reported.

In the coming months, Sanchez will be tested on whether her reputation will be more coquette or congresswoman. Entrenched in the House majority for the first time, she is allied with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and sits on two of the most prominent committees: Armed Services and Homeland Security, being the second-ranking Democrat on the latter.

Sanchez, 47, has also recently considered a gubernatorial run, creating a committee, People for Loretta 2010, that allows her to raise money. Among her biggest hurdles to a statewide win, she said while rushing from her office to Little Saigon's Tet Festival: "I don't sit on the fence and nuance things, and sometimes voters don't like that." The plain-speaking Sanchez is an intriguing study at a time when female politicians have reached new heights — House speaker and viable presidential contender, to name but two — but she still gets criticized for a flirtatious nature.

"I think that traditionally what the public has seen as far as a woman in politics is someone that dresses a certain way and has a certain demeanor and is always very serious, because that's what it took to break through," Sanchez said. "I think you're seeing a whole new set of women … feeling much more comfortable about being themselves versus being some blob that will blend in."

Fred Smoller, a Chapman University political scientist who backed the appointment of Sanchez to the school's Board of Trustees in 2001, said that if the congresswoman were male, she would be described as "feisty and independent" and be taken more seriously.

"My God, if we can have a former action hero as governor, why not someone who served 10 years in Congress?"

Sanchez sauntered onto the national stage in 1996 with the nickname "Dragon Slayer" after ousting longtime incumbent Republican Rep. Robert Dornan. Her victory coincided with the national emergence of Latinos as a voting power — within once-homogenous Orange County, as well — and gave her a prominent platform.

She trumpeted a rousing personal narrative: shy second child of seven born to Mexican immigrants who won a scholarship to Chapman University in Orange, earned an MBA from American University in Washington, D.C., and became a financial consultant. (Sanchez's husband of 14 years, Stephen Brixey, filed for divorce in 2004, citing irreconcilable differences.)

After taking office, she expressed a disappointment in an interview with the New York Times: "The news stories tend to say I won because I'm Latina or because Bob Dornan was extreme — not because I was strategic or smart."

That disappointment lingered, even as Sanchez pummeled a new GOP challenger every two years in a district where Democrats hold a slight registration edge, but which President Bush won in 2004 and which Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger took last year, according to an analysis by the nonpartisan California Target Book.

A close talker with a penchant for patting arms and gripping shoulders, Sanchez has a style that some label friendly and others flirtatious. With animated eyes and a build she describes on her MySpace page as "5'4"/Slim/Slender," she was initially labeled by Washingtonian magazine as one of the House's new "babes."

But the magazine's subsequent surveys of Capitol Hill aides have also placed Sanchez on lists such as "No Altar Boy/Girl" and "No Rocket Scientist." A reporter once asked Sanchez who would play her on television. Jennifer Lopez, she replied, since "I've got a big booty."

Rep. Linda T. Sanchez (D-Lakewood) said critics fixate on her sister's personality because they "can't pick apart the substance of who she is as a person or her work…. Everyone complains about how boring members of Congress are, but as soon as someone exhibits a personality, puts their own stamp on something, everyone comes out with a dagger."

DOJ_NMG_0139426

Sanchez has indeed been skewered as squandering her national platform — and reaping publicity for, of all things, her cheeky holiday cards. Starring her long-haired cat, Gretzky, they have shown the pair in a red convertible, in bed and most recently on a beach chair — with the feline in her lap — under the phrase "Pet the Cat."

"She is not accused of anything except being in-your-face: 'She stands too close. She's too flirtatious,' " said Carol Hardy-Fanta, director of the Center for Women in Politics and Public Policy at the University of Massachusetts. "There are so few women in Congress that when one's a little flamboyant, she stands out."

Other sore spots: Sanchez doles out endorsements sparingly, despite being one of the GOP-dominant county's few Democrats with little competition. And a onetime business associate who was her first campaign manager, Howard Kieffer, had gone to prison for federal tax fraud in 1989.

Then there is Bunnygate. During the 2000 Democratic National Convention, Sanchez riled party members by scheduling a fundraiser at the Playboy Mansion; the Bunnies were to don more modest cocktail attire. Democratic leaders took away her speaking slot at the convention. Sanchez moved the event and again was offered a speaking slot. She declined. A staffer for the congresswoman christened the office goldfish "Hef."

"Show me three important national pieces of legislation that have come out of her office," said UC Irvine political scientist Mark Petracca. "If I were her, I'd be scared. You had an excuse all these years" — being in the minority party — "and you could play frivolous. Not anymore."

Among her legislative accomplishments, Sanchez lists a resolution that rebuked the Vietnamese government for confiscating private property; voting against the Iraq war and opposing the president's plan for a troop surge; and made an issue of military sexual assault laws and — before it dominated headlines — how military tribunals operate.

There is little dispute about her fundraising prowess. In her most recent race, Sanchez pocketed $1.3 million, a formidable war chest for an election that was dismissed as a cakewalk. Republican challenger Tan Nguyen mustered a little more than $500,000, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

Backed heavily by unions, Sanchez helped sister Linda, a former labor organizer, top a tough Democratic field in 2002. Sanchez's mentoring is often credited with launching fellow O.C. Democrats Lou Correa and Joe Dunn to Sacramento.

"She could charm wallets out of pockets," said John Hanna, a trustee for the Rancho Santiago Community College District in Santa Ana. It's a skill that has blocked county Republicans from wooing a viable challenger.

Though Sanchez's key supporters are Latino, she has won over the district's Vietnamese American leaders by so doggedly criticizing their homeland's human rights record that she has been repeatedly denied a visa.

When Nguyen asked Tony Lam, a former Westminster councilman, for his endorsement in their November race, Lam said: "I told him, 'You're not ready yet. There's no way you can run against her.' "

That hasn't kept some from speculating that a strong Vietnamese American candidate such as Assemblyman Van Tran (R-Garden Grove) could unseat her. But Sanchez has also nurtured a strong relationship with her district by spending her weekends jumping from parades to banquets to festivals to ribbon-cuttings — events that Dornan, her predecessor, often eschewed.

On a recent Saturday, after she shook hands at the Tet Festival, Sanchez again donned the red knit suit and headed to the Veterans Affairs hospital in Long Beach before attending a formal event in her district. As Sanchez chatted with a patient about his mother's enchiladas and planted a kiss on his forehead, a hospital staffer whispered that the congresswoman shows up far more often than other politicians.

Sanchez also helped another patient dial his cellphone and later teased a doctor: "You're Vietnamese? Why aren't you at the Tet Festival?"

In the lobby, punctuating each word with a gesture, she said she couldn't grasp the policy wonks in Congress dreading time among the kind of constituents who relish her candor and unpredictability.

"They say I'm a legislator. She crinkled her nose for emphasis. "Well, I'm a politician and a legislator."

A Senator's Railroad No-Brainer (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139427

The Federal Railroad Administration handed a rare victory to the American taxpayer last week by denying a questionable $2.3 billion loan application by the Dakota, Minnesota and Eastern (DM&E) Railroad. What makes this news of special interest is the paramount role Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) played in boosting the loan. Here is a cautionary tale of political life in Washington and how it corrupts.

Thune guided through Congress legislative changes that made the loan possible. But an assessment that DM&E was a poor credit risk was shared by two other conservative senators -- Tom Coburn of Oklahoma and Jim DeMint of South Carolina -- who took the extraordinary step of advocating rejection of a colleague's pet project. Making matters worse, Thune worked as a paid lobbyist for the South Dakota-based railroad before his election to the Senate and has received political contributions from company executives.

Thune entered the Senate in 2005 as a rising GOP star after defeating Democratic leader Tom Daschle. He declared himself eager to rein in spending in a Republican-controlled government. But instead of aligning with his party's reformers, Thune has been energetic in promoting pork for South Dakota. After the embarrassment of the DM&E loan rejection, a Republican Senate source who did not want to be identified said: "One can hope this episode helps Thune recover his revolutionary zeal."

DM&E applied for the loan guarantee under the Railroad Rehabilitation and Improvement Financing (RRIF) program to build and renovate a railway from the Powder River Basin in Wyoming, across South Dakota and into Minnesota to carry coal, ethanol and other agricultural products. This area is already served by two railway giants, Union Pacific and Burlington Northern Santa Fe.

The fact that RRIF still exists is testimony to Thune's energy and skill. The program was zeroed out of President Bush's 2005 and 2006 budgets, but it was saved and revised behind closed doors under Thune's leadership as part of the 2005 transportation appropriations bill (which contained the infamous "Bridge to Nowhere"). Indeed, Thune took credit for it, traveling through South Dakota in November 2005 to spread the good news.

Whether this qualifies as an earmark is a matter of opinion. Coburn and DeMint contend that the loan is about policy. Normally, when senators dislike a colleague's protected project, they follow the chamber's politesse and swallow their objections. Not Coburn and DeMint, who since their election in 2004 have waged war on pork.

On Jan. 23, without telling Thune, they wrote Transportation Secretary Mary Peters: "Because the applicant could not secure private funding, we are concerned that a loan of this size unnecessarily puts taxpayers at risk." Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), the leading House opponent of earmarks, opposed the loan for the same reason, as did the conservative National Taxpayers Union and Citizens Against Government Waste.

Last Monday, Federal Railroad Administrator Joseph H. Boardman indicated he agreed, denying the loan application because there was "too high a risk concerning the railroad's ability to repay."

None of these critics mentions Thune's connections with DM&E. Since 2001, the railroad's executives have given him $21,750 in contributions (all but $2,000 before his election in 2004). In 2003 and 2004, when Thune was a private citizen between service in the House and Senate, he received $220,000 as a lobbyist for DM&E. (Thune says he never worked on the loan application as a lobbyist.)

If he had it to do over again, I asked the senator last week, would he still advocate the loan project? Thune replied: "I don't know what else I could do. I was strong for my state. It was a no-brainer."

The DM&E loan cannot prove a cautionary tale for Thune unless he knows he went in the wrong direction and admits it, at least to himself. If he has not come to terms with this, he is not alone. Well-meaning conservatives such as Thune get caught up in procuring the benefits of the federal leviathan for their states and their constituents. It is much of what ails the Republicans.

Going Down With The Ships (WP)

By Craig Hooper

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Over the past six years, 79 condemned Navy ships have been towed out to sea and destroyed by Air Force bombs, submarine-launched torpedoes or hails of gunfire. These exercises, long considered the most cost-effective way to dispose of unwanted naval vessels, have eaten away at America's inventory of still-useful retired warships. Soon every vessel capable of serving in America's reserve combat fleet could vanish, leaving an overextended Navy with no viable backup forces. This unwise drawdown goes against Navy tradition.

DOJ_NMG_0139428

As the Navy budget, already under pressure because of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, is hoarded for new shipbuilding initiatives, the inactive reserve, an emergency fleet of second-string warships, is quietly becoming a sham.

Denied maintenance funding and protected only from "fire, flooding and pilferage," decommissioned warships are quickly deteriorating past any hope of recall. The aircraft carrier USS Constellation, "mothballed" in 2003, went from the battle fleet to designation for the artificial-reef donation program in a mere three years.

Since being sworn in early last year, Secretary Donald C. Winter, a former Northrop Grumman executive, has headed a Navy that is continuing to dispatch vessels with an efficiency unseen since just after World War II, when the battle fleet was chopped from 6,768 ships to 634.

Important reserve warships are disappearing. The USS Belleau Wood, an amphibious assault vessel used to carry helicopters and Marines, returned from a Persian Gulf deployment in 2004, was decommissioned in 2005 and was sunk just eight months later.

At one time, prudent thinking would have dictated that the Belleau Wood undergo a life-extending refit and return to service for 15 more years. But that mind-set is long gone. Meanwhile, a better candidate for target practice, the former USS New Orleans, a helicopter carrier decommissioned in 1997, rots away, still waiting to be sunk.

As the United States confronts an enormous budget deficit and a looming shortage of already overtasked amphibious assault vessels, the expense of mothballing -- and in an emergency, repairing and operating -- venerable Marine "Gators" might seem trivial compared with the cost of the replacement vessels, the Northrop Grumman LHA(R) assault ship.

Even relatively fresh vessels are being wrecked. According the Naval Vessel Registry, the ex-USS Valley Forge, a billion-dollar antiaircraft and missile-defense cruiser (also made by Northrop Grumman), was blasted after serving barely half of an expected 40-year lifetime. Four other recently decommissioned Aegis cruisers will probably follow suit.

This flurry of ship disposal suggests the administration is getting rid of useful warships to compel construction of pricey new vessels such as the next-generation CG(X) anti-missile cruiser or the $3.3 billion DDG-1000 land-attack destroyer. When the Clinton administration pruned the national stockpile of reserve destroyers, only eight feeble, 46-year-old hulks went to the bottom. But the Bush administration has sunk (so far) a 31-year-old fleet of 27 destroyers. Twenty-two others have been scrapped or sold, and additional disposals are pending.

In this carnage, virtually all 31 of the country's middle-aged submarine-hunting Spruance-class destroyers have been sunk, scrapped or scheduled for destruction. As China readies a deep-ocean submarine fleet and more navies deploy cruise missiles on ultra-quiet diesel submarines, the rationale for eliminating a mothballed reserve fleet of sub-killing destroyers is scanty at best. The administration is destroying a cheap insurance policy.

An inactive reserve has always been a national safety net. The country's first large warship, the frigate USS United States, was maintained in mothballs after the Revolutionary War and returned to fight during the War of 1812. In the early days of World War II, when Britain and Canada needed anti-submarine escorts to fight Germany, reserves provided 50 World War I-era destroyers on short notice.

After World War II, prudent Navy leaders invested $213 million to mothball a "Ghost Fleet" of 2,000 surplus vessels. That supplied 381 much-needed warships during the Korean War, including 13 aircraft carriers and two battleships. Other ships were recalled for Vietnam, and even the enormous Iowa-class battlewagons returned to finish out the Cold War.

Some tired Navy assets will always be sunk. Sinking exercises grant an unparalleled opportunity to hone ship-killing skills while simultaneously collecting data that can make new vessels less vulnerable. Real battle data are so valuable that during World War II, the Navy shipped a bombed-out destroyer, the former USS Welles, back from Europe for research. But now, rather than extract all possible value from stricken ships, America appears uneager to study many of its sinking exercises.

This is no way to run a navy. With each sinking, the Navy risks becoming a hollow force, dependent on the construction of pricey ships that, given America's overextended finances, may never arrive.

DOJ_NMG_0139429

The writer is a lecturer at the Goldman School of Public Policy at the University of California at Berkeley. He served on the Chief of Naval Operations' Maritime Strategy Working Group at the Naval War College last fall.

Deep Trouble For Deepwater (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, March 4, 2007

At the time, it looked like a triumphant moment for the U.S. Coast Guard. Last Veterans Day, about 1,000 people joined Coast Guard Commandant Thad Allen and Michael Chertoff, the homeland security chief, at a shipyard owned by defense giant Northrop Grumman in Pascagoula, Miss., to christen the first major cutter—or large enforcement ship—the agency had acquired in 35 years. As a peppy military band played, Allen predicted the cutter would "be the most capable" the agency had ever had.

It was a heady time. The Coast Guard was still riding a wave of goodwill inspired by the service's response to Hurricane Katrina, when its helicopter rescuers hoisted more than 33,000 people to safety while the rest of the federal effort floundered. President George W. Bush had sworn in Allen—a popular admiral who took over the federal government's response to Katrina from Federal Emergency Management chief Michael Brown—as head of the Coast Guard in May 2006.

Lemons. But now that November gathering is starting to look like a party on the deck of the Titanic. Audits have revealed that the cutter's cost has grown by millions of dollars since it was commissioned and that it has potentially fatal design flaws. And that's only part of the bad news. The 38,000-person military service has been accused of buying what one member of Congress called "a series of lemons" with a $24 billion megacontract to replace nearly all its ships and planes. Meanwhile, the Coast Guard is also dealing with the shocking deaths of two rescue swimmers and allegations of assault at its academy. The Coast Guard's motto is semper paratus—or "always ready"—but its supporters wonder if even Allen can fix all this.

The Coast Guard had traditionally been known for doing more with less. Back in the 1990s, slim budgets left the service with a badly aging fleet that was "a huge embarrassment," says former Rear Adm. George Naccara. By 2002, of the 39 similar cutter fleets around the world, only two were older than the Coast Guard's. Yet the agency's mission was rapidly expanding; after 9/11, it joined the Department of Homeland Security, took over some new port and chemical-plant security roles, and saw its budget grow by 50 percent.

Those new responsibilities added urgency to the massive Deepwater program, an unprecedented effort kicked off in 2002 to upgrade virtually all of the service's fleet. Two large defense contractors—Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman—led the team that won a contract to provide a catalog of 91 ships, 49 aviation drones, 124 small boats, and 195 new or upgraded helicopters, all connected by a new communications system. The contracting team advises the Coast Guard on what to buy, chooses the parts providers, and serves as prime builder. Because of staff shortages, the Coast Guard restricted itself initially to a mostly advisory role. "We thought this was a way to eliminate redundancy and save a whole pile of money," says Tom Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste.

Today, that sentiment seems more than a bit ironic. Originally a $17 billion contract, Deepwater was repegged at $24 billion in 2005. A recent DHS inspector general report said that the cost of the first two of the largest cutters—originally estimated at $517 million together—has risen to $775 million and is headed higher still. Allen says much of the swell was caused by his agency's "evolving needs" in an age of terrorism. That 418-foot national security cutter christened in November, for instance, now must be able to sail even if a nuclear bomb is dropped nearby.

But Deepwater has other problems as well—like the need to rework designs for ships that have already been partially built. The national security cutter is getting an upgrade because of fatigue concerns; auditors say it won't survive its 30-year life span, a notion Northrop officials strongly deny. Congress, however, has reason to be skeptical: The Coast Guard used about $90 million to overhaul eight patrol boats, only to withdraw them from service in November when fissures in the hulls and engine troubles made them unseaworthy.

The contractors have defended their work. Leo McKay, Lockheed Martin's lead executive on the project, has said Deepwater has "already resulted in measurable progress with the Coast Guard's rescue, enforcement, and interdiction missions on the high seas." And experts point to the non-drone aircraft—including newly engined helicopters that can carry twice the weight of their predecessors—as bona fide Deepwater successes. But the program's bottom line still seems troubling: The Coast Guard has spent about $4 billion on the contract so far but today has fewer operational cutters than it had before 9/11. "This didn't need to happen," Capt. Kevin Jarvis, a retired Coast Guard engineer, said recently. He described government employees futilely writing memos about already-visible safety problems even before ships were built. Rep. Henry Waxman, chairman of a House oversight committee, calls Deepwater "one of the worst contract organizations that I've ever seen."

DOJ_NMG_0139430

All that comes on top of other difficulties. Last summer, for the first time in its history, the service court-martialed an academy cadet for sexual assault. Then in August, two of the service's storied corps of rescue swimmers died during a routine training dive in the Arctic Ocean, the first such drownings since 1974. Sen. Maria Cantwell, the top Democrat overseeing the Coast Guard, has promised to investigate. The service's own probe revealed that some members of the divers' support team had been drinking and misinterpreted distress calls. The number of dive teams more than tripled after 9/11, causing oversight challenges: Some of their equipment was years overdue for inspection.

Allen, who's garnered kudos for a no-nonsense style, is attacking the problems vigorously. "We will not accept," he wrote to the entire Coast Guard in January, "preventable [life] loss or injury." In the days after the drownings, he halted all diving until every piece of underwater equipment in use was reinspected. To clean up troubles at the Coast Guard Academy in New London, Conn., he created a task force in September to study the climate there after reports of drinking and promiscuity. A related investigation has already resulted in the reprimand of a senior Coast Guard official.

Deepwater, however, is arguably more daunting. "We'll never have the organizational structure you'll find in the [U.S.] Navy," Allen says of the service's ability to coordinate massive purchases, "but ... I'm trying to create as much of that capability in the Coast Guard as I can." He recently gave the service's chief engineer the authority to veto designs. He's also incorporating regular third-party evaluations of contracting work, calling for robust training of oversight personnel, and reorganizing the entire Coast Guard to limit layers of bureaucracy that may have contributed to Deepwater's problems. And more is coming: Between now and June, Allen can rewrite portions of the contract. Last week, the Coast Guard revealed it would reach outside the contract for one of the ships, which was to be provided by the Lockheed-Northrop team. The reason: Coast Guard officials think they can get similar boats for $100,000 less apiece than the price quoted by the contracting team.

Still, some wonder if it'll be enough. "At this point," Cantwell says, "I think we need legal advice" on recouping contract costs. Rep. Bob Filner, formerly the ranking House Democrat overseeing the service, has urged dropping the contract arrangement altogether. "The first thing you do when you've dug yourself into a hole," Filner says, "is stop digging."

That Film's Real Message? It Could Be: 'Buy A Ticket' (NYT)

By Michael Cieply

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

LOS ANGELES, March 4 — Three weeks ago a handful of reporters at an international press junket here for the Warner Brothers movie "300," about the battle of Thermopylae some 2,500 years ago, cornered the director Zack Snyder with an unanticipated question.

"Is George Bush Leonidas or Xerxes?" one of them asked.

The questioner, by Mr. Snyder's recollection, insisted that Mr. Bush was Xerxes, the Persian emperor who led his force against Greek's city states in 480 B.C., unleashing an army on a small country guarded by fanatical guerilla fighters so he could finish a job his father had left undone. More likely, another reporter chimed in, Mr. Bush was Leonidas, the Spartan king who would defend freedom at any cost.

Mr. Snyder, who said he intended neither analogy when he set out to adapt the graphic novel created by Frank Miller with Lynn Varley in 1998, suddenly knew he had the contemporary version of a water-cooler movie on his hands. And it has turned out to be one that could be construed as a thinly veiled polemic against the Bush administration, or be seen by others as slyly supporting it.

In the era of media clutter, film marketers increasingly welcome controversy as a way to get attention for their more provocative fare. The companies behind the Dixie Chicks documentary "Shut Up & Sing" and "Borat: Cultural Learnings of America for Make Benefit Glorious Nation of Kazakhstan," for example, positively reveled in it.

DOJ_NMG_0139431

But the dance can be more delicate when viewers find a potentially divisive message in big studio movies that were meant more to entertain than enlighten. The danger is that an accidental political overtone will alienate part of the potential audience for a film that needs broad appeal to succeed.

Spontaneous debate on the Internet and around the office can be a film's best friend when, as with a picture like "The Passion of the Christ," even potential negatives, like accusations of anti-Semitic undertones, feed curiosity.

"Whatever the question is, it's wonderful for the movie," said Peter Sealey, a former Columbia Pictures executive who is now an adjunct professor of marketing at Claremont Graduate University's Drucker School of Management.

Yet studios can be wary of seeming to foster it. Walt Disney largely sidestepped arguments about whether its Pixar-created animated film "The Incredibles" was quietly channeling Ayn Rand. "We feel that the longer we either refute or debate a subject like that, the more the story will live," said Dennis Rice, senior vice president of marketing for Disney's Buena Vista Pictures unit. "So we chose to do nothing."

Executives at Warner, which is releasing "300" in the United States on Friday declined to discuss the studio's approach in marketing the film. Billboards and trailers, seeming to mirror Disney's tack with "The Incredibles," have focused heavily on the picture's battle action and visual flamboyance — "Prepare for Glory!" runs the most oft-repeated advertising line — while avoiding some deeper story elements that are stirring unexpectedly heated reactions, especially abroad.

Shortly after his press-junket grilling Mr. Snyder — an established commercials director, whose best-known previous credit was a remake of George Romero's "Dawn of the Dead" — ran into some surprising reactions at the Berlinale film festival in Germany. Some attendees walked out of a screening there, while others insisted on seeing its presentation of the Spartans' defense of Western civilization in the face of a Persian horde as propaganda for America's position vis-à-vis Iraq and Iran. (By contrast it drew applause at a Los Angeles screening last month.)

"Don't you think it's interesting that your movie was funded at this point?" Mr. Snyder recalled being asked in Berlin. "The implication was that funding came from the U.S. government."

When a Feb. 22 report on Wired.com carried a brief mention of the question about Mr. Bush's proper parallel in the film, Web commentators in the United States began to lock on its supposed political vibe. Yet attempts by both the left and the right to appropriate the lessons of Thermopylae clearly predated the movie.

Mr. Bush has been compared to Xerxes at least since his "axis of evil" speech in the wake of 9/11, for instance, while the Spartan cry "Molon labe," or "Come and take them," has long been a rallying call for supporters of the right to bear arms.

According to Deborah Snyder, Mr. Snyder's wife and an executive producer of "300" (which has more than a dozen credited producers of various levels, including Mark Canton and Gianni Nunnari), some changes to Mr. Miller's original story may have inadvertently amplified its political resonance.

In a key twist Mr. Snyder and his collaborators expanded the presence of Gorgo, the Spartan queen and Leonidas's wife, including, among other things, a sequence in which she inspires a wavering populace and weak-willed council to resist the Eastern armies even at the cost of battle deaths. "Her story is that she is trying to rally the troops," said Ms. Snyder, who dismissed as irrelevant a question about her and her husband's personal political philosophies.

Mr. Snyder acknowledged that Mr. Miller — who declined to be interviewed for this article — had opened the door for contemporary comparisons with his passionate, if not entirely accurate, portrayal of the ancient Spartans as saviors of Western civilization. "He'd be on their side regardless of who they were fighting, because he just loves them," Mr. Snyder said.

Thanks to computer-generated effects that contribute to "300's" highly stylized look, the film's cost, according to its makers, was considerably less than the outsized production budgets of "Troy," which did relatively well for Warner, and "Alexander," which did not. But Warner could use a hit after finishing last year behind several competitors at the domestic box office. (A success in the second half of 2006, like "Happy Feet," could only do so much to make up for duds like "Poseidon.")

And the enormous expense of making and marketing any major studio picture — the combined costs appear likely to exceed $100 million in the case of "300" — sharpens the risk in alienating a portion of the hoped-for audience.

In any case Mr. Snyder said he was pleased about the debate, though he never meant the movie to provoke it. "If that's a by-product, that's good," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0139432

Blog The Debt Away (NYT)

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

Public humiliation in the stocks long ago fell out of fashion. A virtual version is making a comeback. This time it's a self-imposed punishment for debtors trying to abase their way back into the black.

As John Leland reported recently in The Times, people have started their own debt blogs to share the most intimate details of their faltering finances, hoping their online confessions will help them develop some self-restraint.

Every time the bloggers reach for a credit card, the realization that they will have to confess any splurges is supposed to give them pause. The 29-year-old woman who writes bloggingawaydebt.com — identified only as Tricia — keeps a running tally of her obligations in the upper-right-hand corner of the Web page (just over $22,000 right now, down from almost $38,000). Right below that is the button that allows readers to sign up to receive updates: 349 regulars are keeping a watchful eye.

They were fairly understanding when she and her husband went roughly $100 over budget on Christmas presents for their son, though one comment suggested they "start the new year with redoubled determination." Hard to be too tough on them since they've already wiped out over $15,000 in debt.

Consumers are asking others to help them develop self-control because so many companies are not showing any restraint. The Federal Reserve estimates that credit card companies sent out more than six billion direct-mail solicitations in 2005. Last year the average American household was $21,000 in debt, about a third of that on credit cards.

In response to the explosion in consumer debt, Congress passed a law in 2005 making it more difficult for individuals to declare bankruptcy. But legislators did nothing to curb the blizzard of pre-approved cards that fall through the mail slots. Often the most profitable customers are the least responsible ones. At a Senate Banking Committee hearing in January, Chairman Christopher Dodd cited a study estimating that credit-card penalty fees had risen to $17.1 billion in 2006 from $1.7 billion in 1996.

Credit can be a good thing, both for simplifying transactions and helping people get over a temporary crunch. But Congress needs to do more to make rates and fees more transparent while putting an end to some of the most abusive policies. In a fairly common practice known as universal default, for instance, a credit card company raises interest rates because a consumer missed or was late with a payment on a different company's account. Citigroup just announced that its credit-card business would voluntarily end the practice. That's something good to blog about for a change.

OTHER NEWS:

Without Health Benefits, A Good Life Turns Fragile (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

SALISBURY, N.C. — Vicki H. Readling vividly remembers the start of 2006.

"Everybody was saying, 'Happy new year,' " Ms. Readling recalled. "But I remember going straight to bed and lying down scared to death because I knew that at that very minute, after midnight, I was without insurance. I was kissing away a bad year of cancer. But I was getting ready to open up to a door of hell."

Ms. Readling, a 50-year-old real estate agent, is one of nearly 47 million people in America with no health insurance.

Increasingly, the problem affects middle-class people like Ms. Readling, who said she made about $60,000 last year. As an independent contractor, like many real estate agents, Ms. Readling does not receive health benefits from an employer. She tried to buy a policy in the individual insurance market, but — having had cancer — could not obtain coverage, except at a price exceeding $27,000 a year, which was more than she could pay.

"I don't know which was worse, being told that I had cancer or finding that I could not get insurance," Ms. Readling (pronounced RED-ling) said in an interview in her office, near the tree-lined streets and stately old homes of this city in the Piedmont region of North Carolina.

It is well known that the ranks of the uninsured have been swelling; federal figures show an increase of 6.8 million since 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0139433

But the surprise is that the uninsured are not necessarily the poor, the unemployed and the undocumented. Solidly middle-class people like Ms. Readling are one of the fastest growing subgroups.

And that is one reason, according to a recent New York Times/CBS News poll, that the problems of the uninsured have jumped to the top of the domestic political agenda in Washington and on the campaign trail.

Today, more than one-third of the uninsured — 17 million of the nearly 47 million — have family incomes of $40,000 or more, according to the Employee Benefit Research Institute, a nonpartisan organization. More than two-thirds of the uninsured are in households with at least one full-time worker.

Ms. Readling's experience is typical; people who have had serious illnesses often have difficulty obtaining insurance. If coverage is available, the premiums are often more than they can afford.

While the government does not have an official definition of "middle class," one commonly used point of reference is the median household income, which was $46,326 in 2005.

Katherine Swartz, a professor of health policy and economics at Harvard, said the soaring cost of health care was a major reason for the increase in the number of uninsured. She said it also reflected long-term changes in the economy, like the decline in manufacturing jobs and the growth in the share of workers in service industries and small businesses, which are less likely to provide health benefits.

Moreover, Ms. Swartz said, "Companies have become more aggressive in hiring people as temporary or contract workers with no fringe benefits."

The National Association of Realtors says 28 percent of its 1.3 million members are without health insurance.

"Because real estate agents are independent contractors, they are forced into the individual insurance market, where there is no negotiating or leverage," said Pat V. Combs, president of the association.

As an independent contractor with a Century 21 real estate brokerage, Ms. Readling had bought insurance on her own, a temporary extension of coverage from a prior job. But she was unable to renew it after she had surgery for breast cancer in 2005. Most insurers would not offer her coverage, she said, and one carrier quoted a price of $2,300 a month for coverage with a deductible of $5,000 a year.

Concerns about health insurance permeate her life.

To save money, Ms. Readling said, she defers visits to the doctor and stretches out her cancer medication, which costs her about $300 a month. She takes the tiny pills three or four times a week, rather than seven days a week as prescribed.

"I really try to stay away from the doctor because I am so scared of what everything will cost," said Ms. Readling, who is divorced and has twin 18-year-old sons. Before every doctor's visit and test, she asks, "How much are you going to charge me?" She says she tries to arrange "the best deals I can." But in many cases, the price is still unaffordable, and "I have to do without."

Even those with insurance have reason to be concerned, economists say, because they end up paying for the uninsured in various ways. Some of the costs are also passed on to taxpayers and employers. To help cover the cost of treating the uninsured, hospitals often increase charges to other patients. Insurers then increase premiums for companies that provide health benefits, and they in turn shift some costs to employees.

Ms. Readling is engaged to be married in June, to another real estate agent. But she said she may postpone the wedding because she would not want her husband to be legally responsible for her medical bills.

"I am scared to get married because I don't have insurance," Ms. Readling said. "If I have to go to the hospital and I can't pay my hospital bills, what happens? Do they go after him? Can they take your home?"

To collect unpaid medical bills, health care providers often obtain judgments against a patient's spouse, as well as the patient, and file liens against their homes. Ms. Readling says she does not own a house, but her fiancé does.

The idea of universal coverage, in the form proposed by President Bill Clinton, proved politically untenable. Since the Clinton plan collapsed in 1994, the politics of health care have changed because of the steady rise in health costs, the increase in the number of uninsured and the erosion of employer-sponsored insurance. Politicians are once again speaking about universal coverage as a goal, though opinion polls show that many voters still oppose the idea of a government-run health care system.

DOJ_NMG_0139434

Ms. Readling said it was stressful enough visiting doctors every few months for her cancer follow-ups. Without coverage, she said, the experience is even more stressful.

"When you go to any medical person and they ask for your insurance card, you are so ashamed because you have to say, 'I don't have insurance,' " Ms. Readling said. "You just feel like you are dirt."

Ms. Readling said she often woke up at night, terrified of the cost of getting sick without insurance.

"Anything that goes wrong with my health could destroy me financially," Ms. Readling said. "I could be ruined."

She said she had never voluntarily allowed her insurance to lapse and could not understand why she was being blackballed.

"What did I do wrong?" Ms. Read-ling asked. "Why am I being punished? I just don't understand how I could have fallen through this horrible, horrible crack."

Knowing her health benefits from her prior job would expire in January 2006, she began shopping for a new policy in May 2005. But in June 2005, she learned she had cancer.

"At that point," Ms. Readling said, "I called everybody I could think of, begging for help. But no insurer would touch me."

Barbara Morales Burke, the chief deputy insurance commissioner of North Carolina, said state law did not guarantee the availability of health insurance for individuals. "Most insurers decline to issue policies to those individuals whom they deem to be too risky because of their medical history," Ms. Morales Burke said.

Blue Cross and Blue Shield of North Carolina will sell to anyone, regardless of the person's medical condition, she added, but the premiums may be very high for people who have had serious illnesses.

Heidi Deja, a spokeswoman for Blue Cross and Blue Shield of North Carolina, said, "Rates are based on the anticipated cost of providing care." For people who have had serious illnesses, she said, monthly premiums "can run into the thousands of dollars."

A 1996 federal law limited the ability of insurers to discriminate against people because of pre-existing conditions. But consumer protections are much more extensive in the group health insurance market.

"In the individual market, the federal protections provide precious little help to people seeking coverage," said Karen L. Pollitz, a research professor at the Georgetown University Health Policy Institute.

When Ms. Readling was shopping for insurance, she found two responses particularly galling. One insurer, she said, suggested she return to her prior job, at a furniture company, so she could participate in its group health plan, though she loved her work as a real estate agent. Another insurer suggested she remarry her former husband to get back on his insurance plan.

Working with her doctors, Ms. Readling raced to get as many tests as possible before her coverage expired. She recalled her anxiety in the final months: "It's like a freight train coming at you, and it's going to get you. And there was nothing I could do."

Ms. Readling said she was mystified by the inability of real estate agents to band together and buy health insurance as a group.

"Why can't Realtors in North Carolina, or a few counties, have coverage under one umbrella?" she asked. "You would think that some insurance company would want our business."

Janet S. Trautwein, executive vice president of the National Association of Health Underwriters, which represents insurance agents and brokers, said employee groups were more attractive to insurers for several reasons.

"In a group health plan," Ms. Trautwein said, "the employer typically pays a large share of the premium, so most employees sign up as soon as they are eligible, regardless of their health status."

"The health plan covers a mix of sick and healthy workers," she said. "By contrast, individuals and independent contractors are more likely to defer coverage until they need it, so the pool of people insured is, over all, less healthy. Sick people consume more health care. As a result, the cost to insure them is higher."

Though satisfied with her care, Ms. Readling continually wonders if doctors and nurses treat her differently because she is uninsured.

"Are they going to turn their nose up at you because you don't have insurance?" Ms. Readling asked. "Will they take care of other people first? They can make more money on patients with insurance. What am I? I am just a financial loss to them."

DOJ_NMG_0139435

Oil Innovations Pump New Life Into Old Wells (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

BAKERSFIELD, Calif. — The Kern River oil field, discovered in 1899, was revived when Chevron engineers here started injecting high-pressured steam to pump out more oil. The field, whose production had slumped to 10,000 barrels a day in the 1960s, now has a daily output of 85,000 barrels.

In Indonesia, Chevron has applied the same technology to the giant Duri oil field, discovered in 1941, boosting production there to more than 200,000 barrels a day, up from 65,000 barrels in the mid-1980s.

And in Texas, Exxon Mobil expects to double the amount of oil it extracts from its Means field, which dates back to the 1930s. Exxon, like Chevron, will use three-dimensional imaging of the underground field and the injection of a gas — in this case, carbon dioxide — to flush out the oil.

Within the last decade, technology advances have made it possible to unlock more oil from old fields, and, at the same time, higher oil prices have made it economical for companies to go after reserves that are harder to reach. With plenty of oil still left in familiar locations, forecasts that the world's reserves are drying out have given way to predictions that more oil can be found than ever before.

In a wide-ranging study published in 2000, the U.S. Geological Survey estimated that ultimately recoverable resources of conventional oil totaled about 3.3 trillion barrels, of which a third has already been produced. More recently, Cambridge Energy Research Associates, an energy consultant, estimated that the total base of recoverable oil was 4.8 trillion barrels. That higher estimate — which Cambridge Energy says is likely to grow — reflects how new technology can tap into more resources.

"It's the fifth time to my count that we've gone through a period when it seemed the end of oil was near and people were talking about the exhaustion of resources," said Daniel Yergin, the chairman of Cambridge Energy and author of a Pulitzer Prize-winning history of oil, who cited similar concerns in the 1880s, after both world wars and in the 1970s. "Back then we were going to fly off the oil mountain. Instead we had a boom and oil went to $10 instead of $100."

There is still a minority view, held largely by a small band of retired petroleum geologists and some members of Congress, that oil production has peaked, but the theory has been fading. Equally contentious for the oil companies is the growing voice of environmentalists, who do not think that pumping and consuming an ever-increasing amount of fossil fuel is in any way desirable.

Increased projections for how much oil is extractable may become a political topic on many different fronts and in unpredictable ways. By reassuring the public that supplies will meet future demands, oil companies may also find legislators more reluctant to consider opening Alaska and other areas to new exploration.

On a global level, the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, which has coalesced around a price of $50 a barrel for oil, will likely see its clout reinforced in coming years. The 12-country cartel, which added Angola as its newest member this year, is poised to control more than 50 percent of the oil market in coming years, up from 35 percent today, as Western oil production declines.

Oil companies say they can provide enough supplies — which might eventually lead to lower oil and gasoline prices — but that they see few alternatives to fossil fuels. Inevitably, this means that global carbon emissions used in the transportation sector will continue to increase, and so will their contribution to global warming.

The oil industry is well known for seeking out new sources of fossil fuel in far-flung places, from the icy plains of Siberia to the deep waters off West Africa. But now the quest for new discoveries is taking place alongside a much less exotic search that is crucial to the world's energy supplies. Oil companies are returning to old or mature fields partly because there are few virgin places left to explore, and, of those, few are open to investors.

At Bakersfield, for example, Chevron is using steam-flooding technology and computerized three-dimensional models to boost the output of the field's heavy oil reserves. Even after a century of production, engineers say there is plenty of oil left to be pumped from Kern River.

"We're still finding new opportunities here," said Steve Garrett, a geophysicist with Chevron. "It's not over until you abandon the last well, and even then it's not over."

DOJ_NMG_0139436

Some forecasters, studying data on how much oil is used each year and how much is still believed to be in the ground, have argued that at some point by 2010, global oil production will peak — if it has not already — and begin to fall. That drop would usher in an uncertain era of shortages, price spikes and economic decline.

"I am very, very seriously worried about the future we are facing," said Kjell Aleklett, the president of the Association for the Study of Peak Oil and Gas. "It is clear that oil is in limited supplies."

Many oil executives say that these so-called peak-oil theorists fail to take into account the way that sophisticated technology, combined with higher prices that make searches for new oil more affordable, are opening up opportunities to develop supplies. As the industry improves its ability to draw new life from old wells and expands its forays into ever-deeper corners of the globe, it is providing a strong rebuttal in the long-running debate over when the world might run out of oil.

Typically, oil companies can only produce one barrel for every three they find. Two usually are left behind, either because they are too hard to pump out or because it would be too expensive to do so. Going after these neglected resources, energy experts say, represents a tremendous opportunity.

"Ironically, most of the oil we will discover is from oil we've already found," said Lawrence Goldstein, an energy analyst at the Energy Policy Research Foundation, an industry-funded group. "What has been missing is the technology and the threshold price that will lead to a revolution in lifting that oil."

Nansen G. Saleri, the head of reservoir management at the state-owned Saudi Aramco, said that new seismic tools giving geologists a better view of oil fields, real-time imaging software and the ability to drill horizontal wells could boost global reserves.

Mr. Saleri said that Saudi Arabia's total reserves were almost three times higher that the kingdom's officially published figure of 260 million barrels, or about a quarter of the world's proven total.

He estimated the kingdom's resources at 716 billion barrels, including oil that has already been produced as well as more uncertain reserves. And thanks to more sophisticated technology, Mr. Saleri said he "wouldn't be surprised" if ultimate reserves in Saudi Arabia eventually reached 1 trillion barrels.

Even if the Saudi estimates are impossible to verify, they underline the fact that oil companies are constantly looking for new ways to unlock more oil from the ground.

At the Kern River field just outside of Bakersfield, millions of gallons of steam are injected into the field to melt the oil, which has the unusually dense consistency of very thick molasses. The steamed liquid is then drained through underground reservoirs and pumped out by about 8,500 production wells scattered around the field, which covers 20 square miles.

Initially, engineers expected to recover only 10 percent of the field's oil. Now, thanks to decades of trial and error, Chevron believes it will be able to recover up to 80 percent of the oil from the field, more than twice the industry's average recovery rate, which is typically around 35 percent. Each well produces about 10 barrels a day at a cost of $16 each. That compares with production costs of only $1 or $2 a barrel in the Persian Gulf, home to the world's lowest-cost producers.

Chevron hopes to use the knowledge it has obtained from this vast open-air, and underground, laboratory and apply it to similar heavy oil fields around the world. It is also planning a large pilot program to test the technology in an area between Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, for example.

Oil companies have been perfecting so-called secondary and tertiary recovery methods — injecting all sorts of exotic gases and liquids into oil fields, including water and soap, natural gas, carbon dioxide and even hydrogen sulfide, a foul-smelling and poisonous gas.

Since the dawn of the Petroleum Age more than a century ago, the world has consumed more than 1 trillion barrels of oil. Most of that was of the light, liquid kind that was easy to find, easy to pump and easy to refine. But as these light sources are depleted, a growing share of the world's oil reserves are made out of heavier oil.

Analysts estimate there are about 1 trillion barrels of heavy oil, tar sands, and shale-oil deposits in places like Canada, Venezuela and the United States that can be turned into liquid fuel by enhanced recovery methods like steam-flooding.

"This is an industry that moves in cycles, and right now, enormous amounts of innovation, technology and investments are being unleashed," said Mr. Yergin, the author and energy consultant.

After years of underinvestment, oil companies are now in a global race to increase supplies to catch the growth of consumption. The world consumed about 31 billion barrels of oil last year. Because of population and economic growth, especially in Asian and developing countries, oil demand is forecast to rise 40 percent by 2030 to 43 billion barrels, according to the Energy Information Administration.

DOJ_NMG_0139437

Back in California, the Kern River field itself seems little changed from what it must have looked like 100 years ago. The same dusty hills are now littered with a forest of wells, with gleaming pipes running along dusty roads. Seismic technology and satellites are now used to monitor operations while sensors inside the wells record slight changes in temperature or pressure. Each year, the company drills some 850 new wells there.

Amazingly, there are very few workers in the field. Engineers in air-conditioned control rooms can get an accurate picture of the field's underground reservoir and pinpoint with accuracy the areas they want to explore. None of that technology was available just a decade ago.

"Yes, there are finite resources in the ground, but you never get to that point," Jeff Hatlen, an engineer with Chevron, said on a recent tour of the field.

In 1978, when he started his career here, operators believed the field would be abandoned within 15 years. "That's why peak oil is a moving target," Mr. Hatlen said. "Oil is always a function of price and technology."

Romney: Blogs More Open Than Mainstream Media (POL)

By Roger Simon And Mike Allen

The Politico, March 5, 2007

Mitt Romney's Republican presidential campaign needed an adrenaline jolt after a couple of weeks of Rudymania in the press and polls. The former Massachusetts governor got it (sort of) Saturday evening when the Conservative Political Action Conference, the annual Woodstock of the activist right, gave him first place in its highly publicized -- if somewhat meaningless -- straw poll.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona, knowing he would fare poorly, didn't show up for the 5,000-plus gathering at a Washington hotel. Former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani gave a well-received speech at lunchtime Friday, and then was hustled out of the Omni Shoreham, with aides saying he had a plane to catch. Neither of those two, who lead in national polls, had a booth in the massive exhibit hall.

Romney was more leisurely, speaking on Friday afternoon and then sticking around for a reception that was open to all attendees. In the voting, where he took 21 percent, to Giuliani's 17 percent and McCain's 12 percent, despite a dude in a dolphin suit who was wandering around the convention with a sign calling himself "Flip Romney, another Flip-Flopper from Massachusetts." The hot CPAC souvenir was the Romney Flip Flop -- cheap foam footwear available in green, orange, yellow and red. These shots aimed at what many Republicans view as Romney's greatest liability—the perception that he is guided by opportunism rather than principle. Romney wanted to win badly enough that he stacked the deck by bringing a group of college kids in to vote for him.

Despite the flak and his recent slide in the polls, Romney seemed unruffled when he sat down for an interview with the Politico, which came after a stroll along CPAC's Radio Row, where conservative stations from around the country had talk shows set up.

Surrounded by cameras and supporters, Romney also wandered past a section the American Conservative Union, the group's sponsor, had set up for bloggers. Romney has given several interviews to bloggers and he has a director of online communications, Stephen Smith, who is respected by New Media types. Smith is responsible for reaching and monitoring the blogosphere.

The Politico interview took place outside the "Mitt" booth at CPAC, behind a blue curtain that separated the "exhibit hall" from a parking garage. His wife of nearly 38 years, Ann Romney, joined the conversation. Here are excerpts of the interview that did not make the cut for an upcoming column on Romney and his new campaign plan:

Politico: Governor, you're pretty popular on blog row.

Romney: Well, it's a great group, I'll tell you that. I appreciate the blogs because the blogs are able to really zero in on issues and find the truth. Sometimes the mainstream media writes one article and it sits out there and it may be accurate, it may not be accurate. But the blogs are open – there's a discourse, there's back and forth and it allows us to get to the truth. And that's why the blogs are playing such an important role, particularly in grassroots organization of American politics.

DOJ_NMG_0139438

Politico: How helpful do you think the blogs have been so far?

Romney: Oh, I don't know at this stage that you can point to great advances for anybody based on blogs alone. But I think what you're seeing is that blogs are able to get to bottom of things and to cut through the spin. The spin has a huge impact on the mainstream media. Candidates are able to go to the mainstream media, spin their story, they write it and sometimes it's accurate, sometimes it's not. The blogs actually are open for comment and debate and they ultimately get the truth out. And that's critical, in my opinion. Because there are going to be a lot of opposition research folks on other campaigns trying to put up things that aren't accurate.

Politico: Governor, what did you mean by "spin"?

Romney: Well, sometimes an opposition research team will go to the mainstream media and try and slant or direct a story in favor of their viewpoint. And the nice thing about blogs is that if that happens to them, why they still are open to get the views of the other side and you see the truth getting ultimately told.

Politico: Governor, how do you unite a polarized country?

Romney: I think that what we have to do is have Republicans and Democrats be willing to reach across the aisle and find common ground on important issues. I remember Ronald Reagan used to sit down with Tip O'Neill -- they were friends even though they were competitors, from a political standpoint. I have, in my service as governor, sat down almost weekly with the Senate president and the speaker of the House of the opposition party. We work on issues together. We sometimes agree, sometimes we don't. But communications, openness and searching for common ground is what America wants to see. They do not like the fact that the polarity in our political process has yielded an absence of action. They want Washington to change and I represent a change in the way business has been done in Washington.

Politico: Do you have any hope for doing that?

Romney: I do, because I've done it in Massachusetts. Here I was in a state that had a legislature 85 percent Democrat, and I balanced the budget all four years without raising taxes. I also put in place, together with the legislature, an insurance plan that took some mandates off insurance companies -- I wanted to take off more -- but got insurance for all of our citizens without the requirement of raising taxes and without a government takeover. That's the kind of conservative thinking that's willing to reach across the aisle and find common ground with Democrats.

Politico: Are you concerned that only people of vague faith will be able to run, if someone who's strong and vocal about their faith gets picked apart, as your Mormon faith has been?

Romney: When people don't know a great deal about a person's faith, they're just not sure what it means. And as they focus in on my faith, I think that they'll see Ann and my marriage, they'll see our family and they'll say Hey, there's nothing wrong with that. Whatever has produced those guys has got to be OK. And I don't mean by that they we're perfect -- we're a long way from that. But our faith has certainly made us better than we certainly would have been otherwise. I'm proud of the fact that my parents were of my faith, and I've learned from them. I think you will find that the people of America, as they get to know us better, will be pretty darn comfortable with us as a couple and me as a politician.

Politico: Mrs. Romney, do you mind joining the conversation? (The former governor smiles and playfully shoves two of the four tape recorders on the table in front of her.) On ABC's "This Week" and at a recent event in Salt Lake City, you were quite candid or blunt about the fact that you saw this was going to be a difficult process, but you seem to have steeled yourself for that. Could you just talk about what you think this is going to be like?

Ann Romney: It's interesting. If you go to Iowa, South Carolina, New Hampshire, Atlanta – wherever it is, in Orlando – you LOVE meeting people. That is not hard. You love, actually, even, the fundraisers. They're great. People are wonderful and supportive. The only part that's distasteful is, unfortunately, the media. (Smiles.) Here you guys sit.

Romney (chuckling): These aren't the media. These guys are open, honest, fair and balanced guys.

Ann Romney: All the rest of it is an extraordinary honor, to be able to be doing what we're doing. I'm awed by it. People in Iowa and South Carolina and New Hampshire take their citizenship very personally and responsibly. It is impressive to me, and I'm buoyed up by it. (Refers to the media.) It keeps people out of that arena. That's very unfortunate.

DOJ_NMG_0139439

Romney: You've got to have a pretty thick skin to be able to do it. And I've grown up in a home where politics was spoken about and then my dad ran for office and my mom did. And I've learned that you can develop thick skin and just don't worry about it.

Politico: Mrs. Romney, how involved do you plan to be in the campaign? (Ann Romney was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis in 1998. She says she's healthy now but worries the stress of the campaign could inflame her MS.)

Ann Romney: As involved as my heath will allow. We're not quite sure where that line is yet. I can't keep up with him. There's no question about that. I also am an equestrian – I love to ride horses. They keep me balanced and healthy and feeling great about life. Besides my family, it's the joy of my life. So I have to get out every once in awhile and see my horses. I've got to tell you: They don't care whether Republic or Democrat. They just want to know if their oats are coming. It's kind of stabilizing and balancing and being able to pull out every once in awhile – see the grandkids, see the horse, get my bearings, and then jump back in.

Politico: Governor, how do you strike a balance between being your own candidate, without renouncing the president?

Romney: I just have to do what Popeye used to say: "I am what I am and that's all I am." I indicate what my positions are, what I think about issues. I try and do so with respect. In doing so, in some respects I'm going to be acknowledging the president's leadership. In other cases, I'm going to be critical, just by virtue of my positions -- not intentionally, but just every person is different. Even if you're in the same party, you have different views on certain issues and I don't line up that I know of with any Republican, exactly -- even Ann. (Gestures toward his wife.) And so people will draw their distinctions. I've lived a different career, I have a different management style than does the president and do other Republicans, and people will draw that distinction as they think as appropriate.

Politico: What is the difference in your management style?

Romney: Oh, I'm going to have to let you make that assessment. I wouldn't try and characterize the president's. My management style is to bring in a lot of people who are bright and have more skill and experience in certain areas than I, to gather a lot of data and insist on an analytically driven decision-making process, to ask for a lot of debate, a lot of discussion of the pros, the cons, the upsides, the downsides. I like a highly deliberative process for making decisions. Now, I can pull up and shoot whenever I need to. But I like having a very extensive debate of people who agree and disagree on issues in order to make a final and best answer

Politico: What have you learned about the country so far in this process?

Romney: I read, some time back, excerpts from Jimmy Carter's malaise speech, which says that the problem in America is the American people and that the wonderful government leaders are doing their job but the American people could just wake up – effectively, that's what is says. What I've learned is, as I have always believed, the greatness of America is the American people – that the heart of the American people is strong and well and the American people are looking for leadership in Washington to finally get their act together and lead. And that's why I am in this. It's because I'm very concerned about the America that I'm going to leave to my kids and grandkids and your kids and grandkids and I think I can make a real difference.

Politico: Governor, what books should we be reading?

Romney: I like reading – I read a lot of books.

Politico: Even during this process?

Romney: Yeah, yeah. "The Looming Tower," I just read, by Lawrence Wright, which I found very interesting. "The Cube and the Cathedral" – a very good book, about Europe. "America Alone," by Mark Steyn – I read that. I just read one called "The River of Doubt," about Teddy Roosevelt. "Mayflower," by Nathaniel Philbrick. So I like reading.

Ann Romney: We pass the books between us.

Politico: Ever fiction?

Romney: I LOVE fiction. Right now, we're reading a lot of Vince Flynn. I've read every Louis L'Amour book there is – I love those old Westerns. Unfortunately, those are gone – although, as my memory gets weaker, I can go back and read some of them again. Vince Flynn is a spy-novel type.

Ann Romney: Vince Flynn? I'm on his third one. It would really be nice if those characters that were in those books were real and were really doing some of this stuff.

DOJ_NMG_0139440

Romney: What's the other one that I like? The great CIA operative? Mitch Rapp!

Politico: What the White House reporters really want to know is whether your Crawford will be in Deer Valley, Utah, or Lake Winnipesaukee, N.H.? (He has homes both places.)

Romney: Well, that's a hard choice. But without a question, it would have to be in Lake Winnipesaukee, N.H. We've actually chuckled about that, thinking about it the last couple of weeks and months. I wouldn't want to impose the Secret Service and the press corps on our nice little community New Hampshire. So maybe I'd get to visit once a year for a quick weekend and then get the heck out. Because I wouldn't want to intrude on the beauty and the calm of that fabulous place.

Romney Gets The Nod From CPAC (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, March 5, 2007

Mitt Romney's efforts to become the preferred candidate for social conservatives were rewarded at the weekend when he won a straw poll asking attendees at the Conservative Political Ac-tion Conference who they thought was most likely to be the Republican presidential nominee in 2008.

Mr Romney, a former governor of Massachusetts, had faced scepticism at the conference amid charges that he had flip-flopped on some of the critical issues for conservatives, changing his stance on gay and abortion rights. The initial reception to his speech at the conference on Friday was far less enthusiastic than the rousing greeting for the celebrity figure of Rudy Giuliani, former mayor of New York.

About a third of the 6,000 attendees at the three-day conference voted in the poll. Mr Romney won with 21 per cent of the vote, followed by Mr Giuliani, with 17 per cent. Senator John McCain, the only Republican presidential front-runner not to attend CPAC, languished in the poll, ranking fifth with 12 per cent.

Mr Romney's campaign was the best organised at the conference. Dozens of students wearing blue Mitt Romney T shirts and carrying red Mitt Styrofoam baseball mitts were bussed in to encourage activists to vote in the poll. Even so, national polls have consistently shown Mr Romney as trailing in third place. His national campaign has appeared to stall as attention shifted to Mr Giuliani as his presidential ambitions have become clearer.

Unlike at the recent parade for the Democratic presidential candidates last month at the Democratic National Committee meeting, where the main preoccupation was to set out assertive stances on the Iraq war and for withdrawing troops, the Republican candidates largely avoided the subject, focusing instead on the need to win the war on terror.

Other than Mr McCain, the other notable missing figure at the conference was President George W. Bush.

CPAC Embraces Steele, Gingrich (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

Michael S. Steele and Newt Gingrich were the biggest stars according to activists who attended the three-day Conservative Political Action Conference.

Former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani pulled off CPAC's biggest coup, former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III was the biggest surprise, and Ann Coulter was the biggest loser.

Mr. Steele, the former Maryland lieutenant governor -- rejected last fall by the Bush White House for chairmanship of the Republican National Committee (RNC) -- was mobbed by hundreds of attendees wanting their picture taken with him on the dais after he served as master of ceremonies at the Thursday banquet featuring Vice President Dick Cheney and former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton.

"He acknowledged the November shellacking that he and the rest of the GOP took, but was upbeat and essentially said, 'Hey, I'm an African-American Roman Catholic Republican from Maryland, so overcoming odds is nothing new to me,' " said Cleta Mitchell, a Washington lawyer and board member of the American Conservative Union (ACU). "He was funny, smart, warm, and representative of all we stand for."

This year's CPAC was also a boon for Mr. Gingrich, as the former House speaker acknowledged after his Saturday speech that closed the conference.

"I got more bang for my buck than the other [2008 presidential hopefuls]," a smiling Mr. Gingrich told The Washington Times after he marched from the back of the Regency Ballroom at the Omni Shoreham Hotel, amid stirring music nearly drowned out by applause and cheers.

Mr. Gingrich was the only top-tier potential contender for the Republican nomination who hadn't formed a presidential exploratory committee or bought any CPAC banquet tables for supporters. Yet in the largest presidential preference straw poll in the conference's history, he placed fourth (14 percent) -- ahead of Arizona Sen. John McCain (12 percent), who rejected an invitation to address the event.

Mr. Giuliani made his decision to accept CPAC's speaking invitation four days before the conference, yet managed to place second (17 percent) in the straw poll behind former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (21 percent), who had invested heavily in pre-event organization.

Perhaps most importantly, the conference poll conducted by the Fabrizio-McLaughlin firm allowed attendees to indicate their second preferences. Mr. Gingrich and Mr. Giuliani each got 16 percent of the second-choice votes, so that when first- and second-place were combined, Mr. Giuliani was on top (at 33 percent), with Mr. Romney and Mr. Gingrich tied for second at 30 percent each.

"I think Giuliani is doing much better among conservative audiences than anybody could have imagined six months ago," said Michael Toner, a Federal Election Commission member appointed by President Bush.

Following Mr. Giuliani's Friday speech, several previously skeptical conservatives stopped a reporter to express their admiration for how thoughtful Mr. Giuliani appeared and to say they liked the way he conveyed a sense of leadership.

However, when questioned Saturday night after both Mr. Gilmore's and Mr. Gingrich's speeches, more CPAC attendees remembered the former Virginia governor's address and said the Virginian -- a former RNC chairman who headed the Gilmore Commission to assess terrorism threats -- got all the nuances right on foreign policy, while also praising Mr. Gingrich's emphasis on basic Republican themes of individual freedom.

"Newt showed he is the strongest spokesperson for today's conservatives," said Tom Edmonds, a veteran campaign strategist and chief executive officer of the Edmonds Hackney media-consulting firm.

Mr. Steele, who lost his 2006 Senate bid in a bad year for Republicans, got high marks from CPAC attendees for his easygoing humor as master of ceremonies at the gala banquet on opening night.

"Michael Steele showed himself clearly to be a significant figure in the future of the conservative movement," said Joe Morris, a Chicago lawyer and ACU board member who noted that Mr. Steele, who now heads GOPAC, has been nominated for the ACU board, "a tribute to his campaign last year."

Several conference attendees said they were shocked by an apparently offhand remark Miss Coulter made during her standing-room-only speech Friday.

Asked to comment on Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards, Miss Coulter said, "It turns out you have to go into rehab if you use the word 'faggot,' so I'm kind of at an impasse -- I can't really talk about Edwards."

Mrs. Mitchell said that Miss Coulter -- a best-selling author, TV commentator and a frequent speaker at campus conservative events who also drew criticism for using an anti-Arab epithet in her 2006 CPAC speech -- has become an "embarrassing ... caricature" who is hurting the movement.

"No question -- we shouldn't give Coulter a serious platform when she is seriously out of line," said Mrs. Mitchell, an Oklahoma native whose clients include many top Republican candidates. "She is the Howard Stern of so-called conservative commentators, and we should take her off the list in my view."

Former Republican congressional staffer Gil Macklin agreed.

"Every time Ann Coulter opens her mouth, taste takes a holiday," Mr. Macklin said. "No blow is too low for Coulter to throw."

Pollster Tony Fabrizio took an unusual turn in the spotlight as the conference concluded Saturday evening, eliciting sometimes deafening boos from the packed ballroom every time he mentioned a poll finding associated with Mr. McCain. The Arizona senator snubbed CPAC, and a McCain spokesman called the annual gathering a bunch of Washington insiders even though the poll showed that 85 percent of its 4,800 registered attendees came from 47 states outside of Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia.

DOJ_NMG_0139442

A Mood Of Gloom At CPAC (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

The Politico, March 3, 2007

At first blush, the state of the Vast Right-Wing Conspiracy appears to be strong. Here at the annual Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC), a few thousand students, activists, hopeful pols and professional hangers-on have descended on one of Washington's larger hotels to affirm and amplify the right-wing gospel.

But even though every conservative group from the Islamic Free Market Institute to The American Protectionist is here in force, there is considerable grumbling about the health of the movement. From conservative pioneers to up-and-coming true believers, many attendees are looking for leaders -- and they're uncertain about the current crop of presidential candidates and not even thrilled with the current occupant of the White House.

"I'm disenchanted, I'm disenfranchised, I'm just dissed," quipped David Bossie, the president of Citizens United and a tireless congressional investigator in the Clinton era.

"It's a struggle," said conservative activist and public relations specialist Mike Thompson. "Conservatives want to win, but they aren't really sure the guys at the top of the field are conservative." Reconciling purity and pragmatism is always a challenge, Thompson added, but it's especially so going into 2008 because "of the fear of the other side."

Some of the ire at the CPAC conclave is directed squarely at Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), whom many conservatives suspect talks the talk when it comes to movement ideals but harbors dangerously moderate instincts.

On Thursday, Bossie gleefully unveiled a 22-page dossier kneecapping McCain ("He's No Ronald Reagan: Why Conservatives Should Not Vote for John McCain"). But Bossie also said his beef wasn't just with the one Republican presidential aspirant – McCain -- who skipped the CPAC festivities

His McCain manifesto "may be the first, but it's not going to be the only," Bossie said by way of warning to the other GOP aspirants.

For More Info Visit Our Candidates Page

It's not just skepticism about McCain, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney that has members of the movement in a funk.

While conservatives here are appreciative of his steadfastness in the war on terror, President Bush has disappointed some on the right who had high hopes.

Bush has "made so many mistakes," said the Eagle Forum's Phyllis Schlafly. "The war is a disaster and he flubbed the [immigration] issue."

And the leading GOP contenders to succeed Bush? "They're all equally unacceptable," Schlafly said.

Comparisons with the ultimate CPAC icon, Ronald Reagan, are, of course, inevitable in this crowd. While Bush has never addressed the gathering, now in its 34th year, CPAC proudly posts on its Web site all the years that Reagan addressed the conference (12 times all told). And as veteran activists recall, the Gipper did far more than give perfunctory after-dinner remarks.

"Reagan wasn't just at the head table," said a wistful Richard Viguerie, "he walked among us." The direct mail guru said conservatives "are leaderless at this point in time."

"They no longer look to Republican leaders, whether it's President Bush or Republicans in Congress."

Conservatives, Bossie said, "are desperately looking for an heir to Reagan's mantle." And among the top three contenders, "I don't think that any of these candidates are up to that."

But it's not just the old-timers, pining for the good old days that always look better in hindsight, who have soured the mood at CPAC.

"There is no agenda," said Soren Dayton, a young consultant and blogger, complaining that GOP candidates are only offering up predictable platitudes. "You say you're pro-life, you say you'll ban gay marriage and you say you'll cut taxes."

Many of the younger bloggers here, at least those not actively working for a campaign, are in no hurry to get on board with the 2008 contenders.

"I'm for letting them fight it out for a while," said Mary Katharine Ham, who writes for the conservative TownHall.

DOJ_NMG_0139443

Some GOP gurus dismiss the overlay of pessimism. Grover Norquist admits that "there's no Ronald Reagan that everybody's in love with," but he takes a more hopeful view of the rightward shifts of Romney, McCain and Giuliani.

"We have candidates going to where Reagan is," pointed out the anti-tax crusader. "That's good, that's called progress."

Conservatism would be in trouble, Norquist added, if the top candidates were saying, 'I'm not where Reagan is, and I don't want to be.' "

"There's no Rockefeller wing of the party left," he observed.

Indeed, the conservative movement has consolidated their control over the GOP and kept successive Democratic hopefuls out of the White House.

As John O'Neill, Sen. John F. Kerry's fellow Swift Boat veteran-turned-nemesis put it when I asked him about the 2004 race: "mission accomplished."

The question now is what the next mission is and who will lead it.

Giuliani's Not-so-wild Card In 2008 (USAT)

By Chuck Raasch

USA Today, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — In a paradoxical way, George W. Bush's struggles as president may be benefiting 2008 candidate Rudy Giuliani, who has a solid lead in head-to-head polls among fellow Republicans.

National horserace polls usually aren't worth the money spent on them until you get closer to primary and caucus season, and even then, they can be cruelly fickle. Otherwise, it would have been President Howard Dean.

But in Giuliani's case, a recent surge in national polls so defies conventional wisdom that it may be indicative of important contours in the 2008 campaign, at least as it is shaping up today. The search for a candidate identified with strong leadership qualities, as Giuliani has carried since 9/11, may be trumping some of the threshold requirements on abortion rights and other cultural issues that have marked GOP presidential primaries for over a quarter century.

Conventional wisdom has been that as Giuliani's support of abortion rights, gay rights and gun control becomes better known, he will be toast among social conservatives who vote in GOP primaries and caucuses. The negative primary and caucus ads that could be run against Giuliani almost write themselves. The only question is which opponent attempts to draw first blood and when.

But Giuliani's poll standing has risen the more he has been on the stump, where a lot of coverage has focused on this twice-divorced candidate's attempts to explain himself to dubious cultural conservatives. Yet, as he has moved around the country, Giuliani leads Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., to 44-21% in the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll, taken Feb. 22-25. A month earlier, Giuliani enjoyed a 7 percentage-point advantage.

As Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., maintains her front-runner status among Democrats (she led Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., 41-17 in the Post-ABC survey), the fear and loathing created on the right over the thought of another Clinton administration might also be fueling Giuliani's surge. The calculations over the best available candidate to defeat Clinton may be trumping ideological fealty among Republicans. There is no guarantee this equation will survive the hurly-burly of debates and mega-campaign ad blitzes. But that no clear cultural conservative champion has yet arisen in the GOP field accrues to Giuliani's favor.

Bush may be a lame duck, but it is almost impossible to create an election scenario in 2008 that is not a referendum on his leadership. With opposition to the war in Iraq building, Democratic presidential candidates are already being measured in the distance they are putting between themselves and Bush on the war. Democratic rhetoric is heavily built around the notion that this has been a failed presidency, and Democrats are banking that a majority of Americans will agree with them in November of 2008 — no matter who their nominee turns out to be.

Conversely, Republican presidential candidates are facing a tougher balancing act between stressing support for an embattled fellow Republican versus separation on issues that have not gone well for the president, most notably Iraq and immigration reform. Three out of four Republicans in a recent USA TODAY poll still gave Bush favorable ratings.

Even if Iraq stabilizes in the coming months, as Bush struggles to make his "surge" work, the president's leadership still would be the subject of referendum, this time accruing favorably to Republicans in a redemptive, stay-the-course way.

DOJ_NMG_0139444

In many ways, Bush is unlike any other president. In an upcoming book, "Second-Term Blues," by the Brookings Institution Press, eminent presidential scholar Charles O. Jones describes Bush as "fascinatingly paradoxical," his presidency featuring "many firsts, mosts and leasts." Jones said it has been a presidency marked — some would say marred — by wide swings in favorability, and branded with counterintuitive acts and leadership style.

Jones describes Bush as "the president with the least political standing of those elected in modern history," yet he is "among the most boldly aggressive policy advocates."

Bush's presidency has been marked by "agenda-bending" events, Jones said, including 9/11, Katrina, Iraq, rising nuclear threats in Iran and North Korea. He is the first president to govern in a post-9/11 reality that two oceans and history's most sophisticated military no longer protects Americans from distant terror and turmoil.

The American people often understand the magnitude of the challenges better than the tacticians and wedge-drivers inside campaigns.

This is why leadership, strength, and clarity of national purpose could transcend narrower ideological tests when Americans choose their next president.

The Real Rudy Giuliani: A Profile (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

Rudy Giuliani had been speaking for six minutes before anyone in the audience thought to clap, which was exactly the way he wanted it. Talking to a political crowd in North Spartanburg, S.C., last month, the former New York City mayor and 2008 presidential candidate was not there to excite but to warn; he was less interested in making political promises than he was in sketching out the perils we face. He spoke in the hushed tones of the day that marked him for history, September 11, 2001, his voice barely filling the somber setting—not a hotel ballroom or a church basement, but a firehouse, festooned with American flags.

America's struggle was far from over, Giuliani warned the crowd. The terrorists who tested the nation that morning were still plotting to destroy its spirit. He wouldn't even use the word "if" to talk about future attacks: "I think probably the way I have to say it is, when we're attacked. That's the only way we're going to be safe." The crowd remained silent. "We're going to be in this war for quite some time," Giuliani concluded. "Not by our choosing, but by theirs."

His remarks were dramatic, which was fitting, since Giuliani has always been a man of drama, always thriving at moments of crisis. Growing up in the Long Island suburbs of New York in the placid 1950s, he would close the door to his bedroom and listen to Italian operas, in which each song contained a challenge, a confession or a choice. As a college student he read the words of Winston Churchill, perhaps dreaming that he, too, might one day feel as though he were "walking with Destiny." For a pudgy, Brooklyn-born undergraduate at Manhattan College, his aspirations seemed somewhat outlandish. Sometimes they still do. In his daily interactions, Giuliani can be arrogant, abrasive and imperious, an average-size man trying too hard to prove himself a giant.

But when the crises come, Giuliani has proved to be big enough. New York City was crime-ridden with a dwindling middle class when he became mayor in 1994. By the millennium, the city was safe, swaggering—and the envy of much of the nation. On 9/11, with the president hidden from view, "America's Mayor" steeled the country by speaking the terrible truth: "The number of casualties will be more than any of us can bear." Now, with the war in Iraq in chaos and Al Qaeda still unvanquished, he is pitching himself to Republican primary voters as the man destined to steady the party and the nation in a time of trial.

The Republicans will require some convincing. Giuliani is a social moderate running in a party dominated by Christian conservatives; he supports gay rights and gun control, and hopes to be his party's first pro-choice presidential nominee since Gerald Ford more than 30 years ago. His tenure at city hall—in which he donned fishnet stockings to dance alongside the Rockettes and sauntered for the press corps as a pink-chiffon-clad Marilyn Monroe—is a case study in why no New York City mayor has gone on to higher office since 1868.

Yet with their party in turmoil after the disastrous 2006 midterm elections, some conservatives seem willing to overlook the mayor's colorful past. After a slow start, Giuliani's candidacy has gained ground in recent weeks, thanks in part to former front runner John McCain's staunch advocacy for escalating the troop presence in Iraq and the emerging impression that none of the top-tier candidates (Giuliani, McCain, former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney) is a true believer on social issues. In the new NEWSWEEK Poll, Giuliani leads McCain by 25 points (59 to 34 percent) as the choice of registered Republicans and voters leaning Republican for the party's nomination, while Romney trails both men by more than 30 points.

DOJ_NMG_0139445

As Giuliani campaigns to protect the country from disaster, he will have to account for calamities from his own past and of his own making. Twice divorced, he has lived a life more to the tastes of New York tabloid editors than evangelical voters in South Carolina. "I can guarantee you that the majority of Southern Baptists will not vote for Giuliani," says Richard Land, president of the Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention. "President Truman said he would never hire someone who cheated on his wife, because if a person breaks his marriage oath he could also break his oath of office."

Mindful of Giuliani's vulnerabilities, his campaign has controlled his exposure to the media tightly. He declined to be interviewed or photographed for this story. But with the Iowa caucuses still 10 months away, Republican primary voters will soon learn all about the Real Rudy that New Yorkers know so well. The former mayor's life story is that of a man with a righteous sense of right and wrong who excels when the world presents him with a crisis, and, when left to his own devices, creates crises for himself.

Born in 1944, Rudolph William Giuliani was raised to be tough in moments of peril. On a school trip to Washington, D.C., at the age of 17, he stayed up late with other boys, horsing around in the hallway of the hotel. The commotion attracted the attention of an angry hotel manager. "He said to us, 'Pack your bags, you're out of there'," recalls Peter Powers, a Giuliani friend since childhood. The other teenagers panicked; Giuliani was unimpressed. "He's bluffing," said the future mayor. "I'm going to bed." Sure enough, the manager was never heard from again.

Giuliani was taught to venerate courage by his father, Harold, a man with a complex moral history. In 2000, Wayne Barrett, author of "Rudy!", uncovered court documents showing that Harold had served time for armed robbery in Manhattan when he was 26. Barrett's account also quoted eyewitnesses who claimed Harold had served as an enforcer for a brother-in-law who ran a loan-sharking business out of a Brooklyn bar. But Giuliani, who said he knew only "parts" of Harold's checkered past, still spoke of his father with awe. Powers recalls Harold as a moral pillar: "He would ... tell us, 'Behave, do the right thing'."

Young Rudy adopted a black-and-white sense of justice. After Manhattan College and New York University Law School, he set off on a career as a prosecutor singularly focused on battling evil. He made a name for himself as a young assistant U.S. attorney in the Southern District of New York, chasing drug rings and corrupt cops. Friends recall an exceptionally driven prosecutor. "Rudy's professional life always took precedence over his personal life," says Jeffrey Harris, a colleague from the Southern District. "If that meant canceling a vacation or not being at home much in order to ensure he ... performed at the highest level, he was willing to make the personal sacrifice." The sacrifice was real: Giuliani's first marriage, to his second cousin Regina Peruggi, ended in divorce. (It was later annulled by the Roman Catholic Church on the ground that the couple hadn't gotten a special dispensation required for blood relatives to marry.) But his star turn earned him an appointment as Ronald Reagan's associate attorney general, the Justice Department's No. 3 position, in 1981.

At Justice, Giuliani had a knack for causing a ruckus. Shortly after arriving in Washington, he held a highly unusual meeting with the general counsel of McDonnell Douglas. The aeronautics corporation was under federal indictment on charges of fraud and conspiracy at the time and allegedly applied pressure to Republican lawmakers to get the Justice Department to back off. Informed of Giuliani's backdoor session, the two career prosecutors handling the case dashed off a letter to him claiming he'd created the "appearance that certain influential defendants have access to senior officials." The letter quickly found its way into the press. Enraged, Giuliani called the two prosecutors into his office. "He was raising his hands, screaming, 'How dare we send a note like this!' " recalls Michael Lublin, one of the prosecutors. "I've never seen a public official who behaved like that." The scandal passed, but Giuliani held a grudge. After the McDonnell flap, he was slated to give awards to Lublin and his fellow prosecutor, George Mendelson, at a Justice Department ceremony. Giuliani refused to present the honor, Lublin says. (Giuliani's campaign did not respond to a request for comment.)

Within two years, Giuliani had earned the trust of Reagan administration officials and was offered the job he really wanted: U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York. He logged long hours and brought a string of high-profile cases against mobsters, corrupt public officials and Wall Street inside traders. And he developed an addiction to media attention. To make a point about the city's rampant drug problem, he and New York Sen. Alfonse D'Amato donned black leather jackets and dark shades and cruised the streets of an uptown neighborhood to make undercover crack buys.

DOJ_NMG_0139446

By then, Giuliani had come to rely on an influential adviser: his wife. On a trip to Miami in 1982, Giuliani was introduced to an attractive local anchorwoman named Donna Hanover. Hooked, he pursued her intently and proposed within six weeks. Together in New York, Hanover helped Giuliani navigate the tricky tabloid culture. This was no idle exercise; Giuliani had long viewed the Southern District as a jumping-off point for elected office in New York. In 1989, he ran as the Republican candidate for mayor against David Dinkins. He lost by three points.

Bitter about his defeat, Giuliani was convinced he would have to intensify his efforts to survive the bedlam of New York politics. Targeting Dinkins in a 1993 rematch, he brought in a steady stream of outside experts to run a series of seminars on city government. "He didn't want Dinkins to know something he didn't," says Henry Stern, a New York City parks commissioner under Giuliani. One snowy morning in 1991, while Stern was out walking his dog, he ran into Giuliani and his young son, Andrew, in a park on Manhattan's Upper East Side. "When are we going to get a dog, Daddy?" Andrew asked his father. "When we live in Gracie Mansion, we'll have a dog," Giuliani replied. The seminars paid off: in 1993, Giuliani defeated Dinkins by 2.9 points.

The crisis facing New York when Giuliani took over city hall was vast. With a $2 billion deficit, the city was struggling to provide basic services, and the persistence of violent crime had forced many urban professionals to move their families to the suburbs. The problems were so vast, some observers wondered if Giuliani, or any mayor, could do much to solve them. Dismissing the doubters, Giuliani seemed to revel in the challenge, casting it as historical drama. "Winston Churchill," he said in a December 1993 speech, "didn't walk out in the middle of the Battle of Britain and say, 'You know, those bombs may really win out in the long run and we may lose to the Nazis'."

Giuliani wouldn't rest until New York was safe. He ordered the NYPD to scale back its feel-good community-liaison projects and simply patrol the streets. As his police commissioner he recruited William Bratton, a media-friendly Boston police commissioner who subscribed to the "broken windows" approach to enforcement. The theory held that areas that tolerated small-time crime would eventually become havens for more-serious offenses. (A single broken window would lead to more broken windows, which would lead to squatters' breaking into a building.) Graffiti artists, loiterers and prostitutes became the targets of the swift hand of the law. Bratton introduced CompStat—a system for mapping real-time crime statistics to allocate policing resources more precisely and keep track of officers' performance. Questions persisted about whether pursuing squeegee men—panhandlers who washed the windows of cars waiting in traffic—was the best use of the mayor's and his police force's time. But the strategies seemed to work: by the end of Giuliani's first year, homicides in the city were down 18 percent.

New York was emerging from adversity and Giuliani wanted the credit. It was widely reported that he was enraged when Bratton appeared on the cover of a January 1996 Time magazine under the headline FINALLY, WE'RE WINNING THE WAR AGAINST CRIME. Bratton stepped down from the NYPD within months. (Giuliani denied publicity was the issue; "Bratton didn't understand that he had a boss," says Giuliani friend Powers. "It's not a question of credit.") By this time, New Yorkers had grown accustomed to a mayor who loved combat—with allies and adversaries alike. "For Rudy, governing New York was conquering New York," says Mitchell Moss, a professor of urban policy and planning at New York University. "He thrived on confrontation." As long as Rudy got results, the public didn't particularly care how he did it, or how many fights he picked. The squeegee men were gone, as were turnstile jumpers and the more notorious pornographic emporiums. In terms of quality of life, he delivered. The rest was just drama—drama that exhausted those involved, yes, but what mattered was New York was livable again. Suburban parents no longer automatically vetoed children's trips into the city. By the end of his first term, Giuliani had cut 20,000 workers from the city's payrolls, was dramatically reducing the welfare rolls and had violent crime approaching a 30-year low. The public rewarded him with 55 percent of the vote when he ran for re-election in 1997.

His city delivered from strife, Giuliani went, in John Quincy Adams's phrase, in search of monsters to destroy. Sometimes the mayor created them when a lot of people didn't think they really existed. Where to begin? First, there was the New York Magazine ad campaign in which the magazine called itself "possibly the only good thing in New York Rudy hasn't taken credit for." Giuliani banned the ad from city buses, prompting the magazine to sue, successfully, on the ground that the mayor had violated its First Amendment rights. Then there was the risqué Brooklyn Museum exhibit that included a portrait of the Virgin Mary that the artist had stained with a clump of elephant dung. Whatever one might think of the exhibit's artistic merits—and reasonable people could disagree—Giuliani went to war in a way even some of his friends found rhetorically extreme. Outraged, he responded as though the museum was poised to destroy Christendom. "You don't have a right to government subsidy for desecrating someone else's religion," the mayor said. Some old supporters wondered if he'd lost his sense of proportion. "It was almost as if he became so enamored of his press," says Floyd Flake, a former Democratic congressman from Queens who supported Giuliani in 1993, "that he had to be solving something, even if there wasn't any problem to solve."

DOJ_NMG_0139447

The mayor's largely cultural or political skirmishes—bus ads, art exhibits—were particularly irksome to minorities, who believed he was ignoring a real problem: the city's racial divide. To some community activists, Giuliani's police force seemed especially eager to practice its tough new enforcement tactics on black New Yorkers, guilty or not. Tensions boiled over on Feb. 4, 1999, when NYPD officers fired 41 shots at Amadou Diallo, an unarmed Guinean immigrant, in the vestibule of his Bronx apartment building. Giuliani expressed regret over the killing but seemed primarily concerned with protecting the police department's image. Ed Koch, the former New York mayor who'd supported Giuliani in the 1993 and '97 campaigns, became an ardent critic. "Blacks and Hispanics ... would say to me, 'He's a racist!'" Koch tells NEWSWEEK. "I said, 'Absolutely not, he's nasty to everybody'."

Giuliani was also embroiled in personal crises. By the late '90s, he and Hanover were leading largely separate lives. In 1999 the mayor met Judi Nathan, an attractive East Side divorcée. He was smitten. Over the next year, Nathan and Giuliani spent time together. When Giuliani was diagnosed with prostate cancer in the spring of 2000, forcing him out of a Senate race against Hillary Clinton, Nathan, a registered nurse, helped him as he underwent treatment. Finally, in May 2000, after the New York Daily News published photos of the couple, Giuliani confirmed that Nathan was his "very good friend."

Then a bizarre sequence unfolded: a week after the photos appeared, Giuliani announced in his daily press briefing that he and Hanover would begin divorce proceedings. But later that day, in a hastily arranged press conference, Hanover had her own announcement: Giuliani's announcement had caught her by surprise.

Giuliani's private life was a shambles—and on full display. Another mayor of another city might have moved swiftly to settle the unseemly matter quietly; Giuliani, however, hired Raoul Felder, a celebrity divorce attorney never known to be shy of publicity. When Hanover's lawyers filed a "paramour access motion" seeking to prevent Nathan from entering Gracie Mansion, where Hanover continued to live, Felder accused Hanover of "howling like a stuck pig." (After a judge banned Nathan from the mansion, Giuliani moved into a suite in the home of his friend Howard Koeppel and his partner Mark Hsiao.) No detail seemed too personal for the papers—even the fact that Giuliani's cancer treatment had rendered him temporarily impotent was used to counter the idea that Nathan was his mistress. ("The mayor can't have a paramour if he can't paraform," the comedian Jackie Mason, a Giuliani friend, explained to the New York Post.) Giuliani and Hanover eventually reached a settlement, but by the summer of 2001, Giuliani, savior of Gotham in his first term, had fallen from his early heroic heights. He was unpopular, even irrelevant, as New Yorkers prepared to elect his successor in the autumn of the first year of the new century.

And then came the cold horror of September 11. In those morning and midday hours Giuliani was transformed into the man of destiny he'd seemed to always believe himself to be. Some New Yorkers will remember that awful day as a sheer struggle for survival, a crazed exodus from lower Manhattan. Others will recall the frantic search for a loved one feared to be in one of the towers or on one of the doomed planes. But when the vast majority of Americans look back on 9/11, they will, for the ages, think of Giuliani walking through ash and soot. He was honest, sad and strong; he was heroic. Alone that night, before going to bed, he read Churchill's May 1940 speech to the House of Commons: I have nothing to offer but blood, toil, tears and sweat.

September 11 made Giuliani untouchable. Queen Elizabeth named him an honorary knight. French President Jacques Chirac called him "Rudy the Rock." He became a fixture at Republican rallies around the country in the elections of 2002, 2004—the year the GOP convention came to Madison Square Garden—and 2006. Once reviled by his party for his moderate views, he leapt to the top of opinion polls of potential 2008 Republican nominees.

There were other, more immediate rewards. After leaving the mayor's office in January 2002, Giuliani eventually commanded $100,000 per engagement on the lecture circuit. He found joy spending his new money with Nathan. "She became a socialite," says a friend who would comment on the couple only anonymously. "She helped his hair, she helped his suits." In May 2003, Michael Bloomberg, Giuliani's successor as mayor, married them in a star-studded ceremony on the lawn of the mayor's residence. Wearing an antique white Vera Wang gown and a pearl-and-diamond tiara, Nathan was finally mistress of Gracie, if only for one night.

DOJ_NMG_0139448

Giuliani had found the good life, but that didn't stop him from playing a role in the arena, with very mixed results. In 2004, when the Bush administration was looking for a new Homeland Security secretary, Giuliani enthusiastically made the case for Bernard Kerik, who'd served as his police chief on 9/11. Gruff and hard-charging, Kerik was a Giuliani favorite; when the former mayor started Giuliani Partners, a security firm, he brought Kerik onboard, along with other associates such as Anthony Carbonetti and Denny Young. His recommendation helped Kerik win White House support. "Rudy got the door open for Bernie," says an administration official familiar with the Kerik nomination who would discuss personnel matters only anonymously.

Kerik's nomination was a disaster from the moment Bush announced it. Reporters inundated the White House with allegations of his seemingly shady behavior, including a sweetheart stock deal, improper use of police resources and connections to Mafia-linked construction moguls. (In 2006, Kerik pleaded guilty to two misdemeanors for accepting $165,000 in renovations to his Bronx apartment from a company attempting to win city contracts and for failing to report a $28,000 loan from a real-estate developer.) The White House was caught completely off guard. Bush withdrew Kerik's name after a week and a half, and the botched nomination threw Giuliani's political future into doubt. By the end of 2006, he had yet to assemble a serious political team for a 2008 run. The New York Daily News published an embarrassingly amateurish memo from his staff laying out potential fund-raising targets (many of whom had already been scooped up by McCain) and forecasting potential weaknesses. More than a few Republicans concluded he wasn't serious about running.

Then, once again, Giuliani surprised. "I'm running," he told Larry King in an interview last month before setting off on a series of carefully staged campaign events around the country to prove the point. Just showing that he meant it gave Giuliani a serious bump in the polls and worried his rivals. "I have thought for the longest time that [Giuliani] had zero chance," says an aide to another Republican candidate who asked for anonymity talking up the chances of his boss's rival. "But he's got real momentum. And if there's a terrorist attack between now and the election, he could be the next president of the United States."

Social conservatives remain skeptical and suspicious. "Giuliani is highly respected by lots of Americans because of his leadership after 9/11," says Gary Bauer, president of the conservative nonprofit organization American Values. "In fact, there is evidence that it might be the only thing people could tell you about him." A particular weakness for Giuliani may be gun control, a cause he advocated again and again as part of his crimefighting plan in New York. Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, asks: "The question is, do you need someone who is 100 percent on these issues, or someone who reaches a threshold? He wouldn't be polling so well if he wasn't coming close to a certain threshold."

Giuliani may well be his own worst enemy. His strength in crisis can blur into stubbornness; his resolute conviction sometimes leads to churlishness and a tendency to divide the world into good and evil, with little apparently in between. Voters will have to decide whether his virtues are worth his vices in the White House.

But make no mistake: he is a man of formidable virtues, and mastering the brutal politics of New York is good training for a fast-paced nomination fight and what will likely be a close-run general election.

Will conventional considerations—that is, the ordinary expectations voters have of presidential candidates—apply to Giuliani, or does 9/11 loom so large in the national consciousness even now that Americans will give the mayor a pass on the temperament question in favor of a man who is both strong and competent? (It is hard to imagine a President Giuliani botching the response to Katrina in the way President Bush did.)

The numbers may be strong now, but as British Prime Minister Harold Wilson used to say, a week is an eternity in politics, much less a year. At the event last month in South Carolina, Giuliani looked unsteady as he fielded questions on jobs, immigration and free trade. He still seems un-comfortable when coaxed off his national-security script. But no one knows better than Giuliani that every day is not 9/11, and while the crises of a campaign may seem inane, they are far from inconsequential. In the coming months, there will be a million small disasters—ways to falter or chances to become a man of destiny once more.

With Susannah Meadows, Mark Hosenball, Michael Isikoff, Eve Conant, Sarah Childress, Andrew Romano and Jonathan Mummolo

What Makes Rudy Run (USNEWS)

DOJ_NMG_0139449

By Gloria Borger

U.S. News and World Report, March 4, 2007

I know, it's early. The public hasn't really focused on the presidential race yet. It's all a bunch of background noise. Except when it's not. And there is something happening in the Republican Party these days that goes beyond the usual rat-a-tat-tat of early campaigns and polls, because it's so mind-boggling: Rudy Giuliani is surging. The pro-abortion rights, pro-gun control, pro-gay rights, thrice-married former New York mayor—who as part of a spoof once dressed in drag and got cozy with Donald Trump—is ahead. And not just in one poll; in most every poll. And not just because he's a well-known name; GOP voters specifically rate him above the rest of the field as a leader, both inspirational and electable. In one recent poll, the putative front-runner, John McCain, beat him on just a single quality-experience. For whatever that's worth these days.

So are GOP voters just remembering the moment on 9/11 when Rudy took charge? Or can it be that they might actually embrace a candidate whose positions on social issues are nothing less than a heresy to the party's right flank? Just months ago, that seemed like a nutty idea, particularly with the once-maverick McCain going Establishment. But the inevitability of McCain took a hit with Iraq—and his support for the president's plan for a troop surge. No matter how much McCain says the war was botched—and he says it all the time now—he's still Bush's guy on adding more troops. And that's a problem.

Enter Rudy. His bid is a huge gamble with a simple premise: that, in the end, the appeal of his personality, leadership cred, and the new primary schedule (which could be full of big states with large urban areas with lots of moderate Republicans), will give a city boy a chance to win the nomination. From the minute Giuliani announced his intention to announce (that's how they do it these days), he's been in the top tier. But guess who isn't? "Not one of the leading candidates is a conservative," says William Bennett, a conservative who hosts a radio talk show. The best horse conservatives have is Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas—smart, but not exactly about to catch fire.

Cultural conservatives are, to put it mildly, miffed about "Rudy McRomney." While McCain has spent years burnishing his conservative credentials—and has a clear antiabortion voting record—the purists still consider him suspect. (After all, he supports embryonic stem cell research.) And Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor positioning himself as the conservative alternative to McCain, has a few credibility problems, starting with this: He was for abortion rights just two years ago, before a sudden (pre-convention?) conversion. For Republicans, who like their primaries orderly, it's all just so unsettling. To calm them down, the Giuliani crowd likes to say its guy is just like Bush, only articulate. "Republicans still believe Bush is right on the principles," says a Giuliani backer. "They just wish he could say it—and do it—better." That's obviously the strong suit for the mayor who captivated the nation on 9/11. "If your complaint is that Bush hasn't gotten results in the war on terror, you should be with Rudy," says an adviser. Rudy gets results! Sound like a slogan?

Guns and gays. But is that enough to push aside the GOP social agenda? Not if you're a cultural conservative like Tony Perkins, who runs the Family Research Council. He says that once GOP voters figure out where Giuliani stands on the issues, they'll dump him. And if they don't, he warns, "an unenthusiastic Republican base will suppress turnout and set up a Democratic victory." But what if Giuliani finds a way to finesse his liberal past by, say, promising to appoint conservative judges, as he did recently on the stump? "I would want judges who are strict constructionists because I am," he said. As for his support for gay civil rights, an adviser says, "since when are voters not open to tolerance?" And when it comes to guns, he adds, Giuliani had a city in crisis, got the guns off the streets, and reduced crime. And, in a pitch to conservatives last week, Giuliani himself called Ronald Reagan his "hero."

Will all of this work? It's unknowable. But here's what we do know: In 1999, George Bush was the only Republican candidate who could raise about $70 million to get elected. Now each man in the top tier can raise that, and more. That means they can last until they kill each other off—and get ready. Stories about Giuliani's marriages, McCain's temper, Romney's Mormonism: It'll be a food fight.

Alter: Wrong Time For An Urban Cowboy? (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139450

Presidential elections are said to be about the future, but they also end up as verdicts on the past. Voters often reject the type of leadership they have recently experienced. In 1960, young JFK was the antidote to dowdy Ike. In 1976, Jimmy ("I'll never lie to you") Carter campaigned to wipe away the stain left by Richard Nixon. In 1980, sunny Ronald Reagan tapped into disgust with the malaise of the Carter years. In 2000, George W. Bush took on not just Al Gore, but Bill Clinton and Monica Lewinsky.

The reason the 2008 campaign favors Democrats—at least for now—is that Bush has failed so badly that the next president may be the one who resembles him least. Job One in 2009 will be reviving the prestige of the United States, which is a prerequisite for confronting nuclear threats, jihadists, climate change—you name it—none of which can tackled by Americans acting alone.

So to be effective, Bush's successor must be a tough-minded but flexible and humble chief executive with a talent for building bridges, not burning them. For instance, preventing terrorism is less a matter of war than a subtle diplomatic challenge involving international coordination and a convincing projection of Western values. It's a group activity, which means that the next commander in chief will need a Tom Sawyer-like skill in getting other kids in the global neighborhood to paint the fence. This requires charm and leadership.

Which brings us to Rudy Giuliani. On one level, his consistent lead in the polls makes perfect sense. The trauma of 9/11 still moves through the national bloodstream like a time-release capsule. For many Americans, it was the most significant public event of their lifetimes. If Gen. William Henry Harrison could be elected in 1840 on the strength of his victory over Indian "terrorists" at the Battle of Tippecanoe three decades earlier, the cataclysmic events of 2001 might yet make "America's Mayor" president, whatever his views on other issues.

But from a different angle, Giuliani's leadership style seems out of sync with history's pendulum. Why would voters want to replace a my-way-or-the-highway Texan with a shut-up-and-listen New Yorker? Exchange a Crawford cowboy for an urban cowboy? A woman, African-American, Hispanic, Mormon or Vietnam POW would represent a sharper break from the immediate past.

Not that Giuliani is a Bush clone. He performed in slashing crime and helping to save New York. But Rudy was often petulant and polarizing. To give just one example (minor in itself, but revealing): he broke diplomatic relations with the Manhattan borough president, Virginia Fields, because she dared to criticize him. (Giuliani was feuding with Harlem politicians at the time.) When, amid a racial crisis in the city, I went to Gracie Mansion to ask him how he could refuse to speak for more than two years to the highest-ranking African-American in town, he scoffed that there was no point.

Of course, such detail about his fitness for the give-and-take of the presidency is too nuanced to be a campaign issue. So is the dictatorial way he dealt with local dissent. Unless his temper explodes on the trail, which is not as likely as his detractors predict, we probably won't squarely face the question of whether America is Ready for Petty. The more that liberal New Yorkers warn Republicans in the rest of the country about Giuliani, the more those Republicans will bond with him. The mayor once described by Jimmy Breslin as "a small man in search of a balcony" has found one, and with lots of people standing in rapt attention below.

Including me. In the days after 9/11, I went with Giuliani five times to Ground Zero and to the funerals of several firefighters. Up close, his compassion and calm command were every bit as impressive as advertised. I fell hard for him and what he was doing for New York and the country. Too hard. When he said it was "cynical" to believe he should leave office at the end of his term—nearly four months after 9/11—I bought his argument for an extension. I was fearful enough to write that he had "practical reasons" for moving in an extraconstitutional direction amid the emergency. When cooler heads than mine prevailed, he eventually backed down on that idea, as well as his insistence on changing the city constitution so he could run for a third term.

Rudy was a good mayor in many ways, but his appeal now is based on fear. When terrorists attack again, we'd want him at the helm for the first few weeks. But after that? Even the most skeptical among us might bend too easily to his will, with frightening consequences. As Giuliani moves toward the big prize, voters will have to look closely at how his history and character could condition his behavior in the White House, where past is always prologue.

Clinton, Obama Praise Civil Rights Achievements (USAT)

By Alvin Benn And Jamie Kizzire

DOJ_NMG_0139451

USA Today, March 5, 2007

Two Democratic presidential candidates — one black, the other a woman — speaking three blocks apart on a street named for Martin Luther King Jr.

Sens. Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Clinton of New York came here Sunday to help commemorate Bloody Sunday, a 1965 march that became a seminal moment in the civil rights movement.

The re-enactment of the march over the Edmond Pettus Bridge into Selma was the first time in their campaigns that the candidates appeared together. Later, they watched former President Bill Clinton inducted into the National Voting Rights Hall of Fame.

At the churches and in early appearances, the senators told how the civil rights movement touched their lives.

"I could not be here if not for the foot soldiers," Obama said at a breakfast.

At the pulpit of First Baptist Church, Clinton described herself as a "grateful friend" and "beneficiary" of the civil rights movement.

Obama focused on continuing the struggle in his remarks at Brown Chapel AME Church.

Everyone, he stressed, makes a difference.

"Don't tell me we can't do better by our children," said the 45-year-old senator. "We can achieve. We can do it. The power is in our hands.

"I know if cousin Pookie would vote, if brother Jethro would get off the couch and stop watching SportsCenter and go register some people and get them to the polls, we'd have a different kind of politics," Obama said. "Kick off your bedroom slippers, put on your marching shoes!"

Clinton also embraced the theme of pushing the movement forward.

Bloody Sunday and other major civil rights events such as the integration of Little Rock's Central High School "do not mark the end of the journey," said Clinton, 59.

"We've got a march to finish. The brave men and women of Bloody Sunday did not lose heart. We can do no less."

Clinton recalled how her life changed in 1963 when she attended a speech by King.

She then turned to the future, touching on national issues including health care, education and care for wounded soldiers. After speaking at length about voting irregularities in the last two presidential elections, she vowed to push for federal election reform.

Outside, Cheryl Griffin and Barbara Mann recalled the 1965 demonstrations that changed the political face of America. Students at Alabama State University, they joined the marchers when they got to Montgomery.

"I did it because my mother couldn't vote because of the poll tax," said Griffin, who was of age but also could not vote. "I marched for both of us."

Clintons, Obama Honor Activists In Selma (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, March 5, 2007

Presidential candidates Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton crossed campaign paths for the first time Sunday as they paid homage to civil rights activists who they said helped give them the chance to break barriers to the White House.

The two candidates and former President Clinton, making his first appearance with his wife since her campaign began, linked arms with activists who 42 years ago were attacked by police with billyclubs during a peaceful voting rights march. "Bloody Sunday" shocked the nation and helped bring attention to the racist voting practices that kept blacks from the polls.

"I'm here because somebody marched for our freedom," Obama, who would become the first black president, said from the Brown Chapel AME Church where the march began on March 7, 1965. "I'm here because you all sacrificed for me. I stand on the shoulders of giants."

Not to be outdone in the hunt for black votes, Hillary Clinton also spoke in Selma at a church three blocks away and brought a secret weapon — her husband. Three days before the march anniversary, her campaign announced that the former president who is so popular among blacks would accompany her for his induction into Selma's Voting Rights Hall of Fame.

DOJ_NMG_0139452

Sen. Clinton said the Voting Rights Act and the Selma march made possible her presidential campaign, as well as those of Obama and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who would be the first Hispanic to occupy the Oval Office.

"After all the hard work getting rid of literacy tests and poll taxes, we've got to stay awake because we've got a march to continue," Clinton said in a speech interrupted numerous times by applause and shouts of approval. "How can we rest while poverty and inequality continue to rise?"

Clinton and Obama both appeared outside Brown Chapel for a pre-march rally, but came from opposite sides of the podium and did not interact. Despite the intense rivalry between their campaigns, the two praised each other.

"It's excellent that we have a candidate like Barack Obama who embodies what all of you fought for here 42 years ago," Clinton said. Obama said Clinton is "doing an excellent job for this country and we're going to be marching arm-in-arm."

But they did not join arms when the commemorative march attended by thousands got under way. Instead, Clinton held hands with her husband and Obama was several people down the line. Obama, who shed his coat and tie for the march, approached Hillary Clinton at one point and the two chatted for a few seconds before moving back to opposite sides of the street.

The two candidates sounded similar themes in their speeches. Both said the civil rights movement is not over because inequality still exists in education, health care and the economy. Both criticized the Bush administration for failing to return Hurricane Katrina victims to their homes.

But Obama, who was three years old on Bloody Sunday, delivered a call to action that would be politically unfeasible for Clinton or any of his other white rivals. He said the current generation of blacks does not always honor the civil rights movement and needs to take responsibility for improving their lives by rejecting violence; cleaning up "40-ounce bottles" and other trash that litters urban neighborhoods; and voting instead of complaining that the government is not helping them.

"How can it be that our voting rates dropped down to 30, 40, 50 percent when people shed their blood to allow us to vote?" Obama asked at a unity breakfast with community leaders.

At the breakfast, Obama got a key to the city and another to surrounding Dallas County from a probate judge, Kim Ballard. "Forty-two years ago he might would have needed it because I understand it would open the jail cells," Ballard said. "But not today."

Obama said the fight for civil rights reverberated across the globe and inspired his father to aspire to something beyond his job herding goats in Kenya. His father moved to Hawaii to get an education under a program for African students and met Obama's mother, a fellow student from Kansas.

Obama said he was not surprised when it was reported this week that his white ancestors on his mother's side owned slaves. "That's no surprise in America," he said and added that the civil rights struggle made it possible for such a diverse couple to fall in love.

"If it hasn't been for Selma, I wouldn't be here," Obama said. "This is the site of my conception. I am the fruits of your labor. I am the offspring of the movement. When people ask me whether I've been to Selma before, I tell them I'm coming home."

But the former president stole the show from the two candidates. The audience cheered loudest for him when the three took the stage at the end of the march and the crowd mobbed him as he tried to make it to his limousine, delaying his departure.

Speaking at his induction, Clinton said the 2008 campaign features "a rainbow coalition running for president."

"If it hadn't been for the Voting Rights Act, the South would have never recovered and two white southerners — Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton — never could have become president," Clinton said.

Other Democratic candidates are not leaving the black vote to Obama and Clinton. John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee, was speaking about Selma and civil rights at the University of California, Berkeley.

"The fight for civil rights and equal rights and economic and social justice is more than just going to celebrations, even as wonderful as the one in Selma," Edwards said in remarks prepared for delivery as he referred to Berkeley janitors' fight for a wage increase. "The fight is going on right here, right now."

Candidates Obama, Clinton Vie For Black Voters In Selma (MCT)

By Matt Stearns

McClatchy Newspapers, March 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139453

SELMA, Ala. - Sens. Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton brought their increasingly intense battle for the Democratic party's base to this heart of the American civil rights movement Sunday.

Obama, the upstart Illinois Democrat, brought the hot vibe of the cool new. Clinton, the veteran New Yorker, brought her long history and a ringer: husband and former President Bill Clinton, whom black author Toni Morrison once called the "first black president."

The trio came to Selma for the 42nd anniversary of a seminal event in American civil rights history - the bloody protest march from Selma to Montgomery in defiance of a ban on protest marches by then-Gov. George Wallace. Hundreds of marchers were savagely beaten by Alabama state troopers on March 7, 1965, as they attempted to cross the Edmund Pettus Bridge on the highway to Montgomery. The national outcry helped lead to a successful five-day march of thousands two weeks later. Within months, the Voting Rights Act was signed into law, forever changing American society.

The annual celebration of the event has become a civil rights demonstrators' reunion and political pilgrimage, thrown into high relief this year by the fight for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination. Obama and Clinton already had a high-profile tiff over deep-pocketed Hollywood support; this weekend, both were vying for black voters, a key element of the Democratic primary vote, especially in the South.

A recent Washington Post-ABC News poll late last month found that Obama, once trailing Clinton by 40 points in support among black voters, had gone 11 points up on Clinton among them.

Obama accepted an invitation to a unity breakfast and to speak at a local church several weeks ago; Clinton days later accepted an own invitation. Then last week, Clinton's campaign announced that her still popular husband would come to Selma to be inducted into Selma's Voting Rights Museum Hall of Fame. Originally, Hillary was to accept on Bill's behalf.).

The rhetoric Sunday was lofty despite the gamesmanship. Obama, a toddler at the time of the Selma demonstrations, said the civil rights measures that Selma begat made his rise possible.

"If it hadn't been for Selma, I wouldn't be here," Obama said. "This is the site of my conception. I am the fruits of your labor. I am the offspring of the movement. When people ask me if I've been to Selma before, I tell them I'm coming home."

Sen. Clinton took the idea further, saying that the civil rights movement had made possible not just Obama's candidacy but New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson's and her own.

Some voters had already made up their minds as they massed on Martin Luther King Jr. Street to see Obama at Bethel Chapel A.M.E. Church or Clinton at First Baptist. The two old "movement" churches are just a few hundred yards apart, separated by a public housing project.

Waiting in line after a four-hour drive to see Obama, Fran Gholston wore an Obama T-shirt and carried a sign saying "I Have the Audacity of Hope," a reference to Obama's best-selling book.

"It's a new beginning, a time for a change," Gholston said of her support for Obama. "I like Hillary, too. And I love Bill. If he were running…It's just time for a change."

"I'm still open," said Dennis Middlebrooks, of Tarrant, Ala. "I was sold on Clinton until he stepped up…I need to investigate both."

The weekend-long celebration was the classic Southern dichotomy of Saturday night fun and Sunday morning solemnity. Both showed how far Selma had come since "Bloody Sunday", the March 7 morning that marchers came under attack on the bridge.

Saturday night saw much of a downtown street closed for a rollicking block party that featured teens in long t-shirts and baggy pants and adults dressed to the nines, munching on plates of barbecue and giant turkey legs. Many danced to a blues band and the crowd was almost entirely black.

Leaning against a telephone pole, Vinney Cooper remembered that in his youth, before the movement, such celebrating never would have been allowed to happen: "There was one place we could do something, twice a year, for one day." (Cooper himself, whose older brothers were injured on Bloody Sunday, later became one of Alabama's first black state troopers.)

Next morning, Selma, a poor town in the old cotton fields of west-central Alabama's Black Belt, was transformed. Now it was the set for something unimaginable 42 years ago: two presidential candidates vying for crucial black votes _ one candidate black, one female.

DOJ_NMG_0139454

"If the men and women who crossed that bridge could see…I could hear Dr. King saying, 'We're about at the mountaintop'," said U.S. Rep. Emanuel Cleaver a Missouri Democrat.

Crowds Jam Selma Churches To See Obama, Clinton (AJC)

By By Scott Shepard

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 5, 2007

Selma, Ala. — The stars fell on Alabama on Sunday in political pageantry that looked to be an early defining moment in the campaign for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

Overflow crowds of mostly African-Americans jammed two historic churches to hear sermon-like speeches from the front-runners for the party's nomination, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

But the crowds swelled even larger when former President Bill Clinton, one of the most popular political figures ever among African-Americans, led a re-enactment of the famous 1965 "Bloody Sunday" march that produced landmark federal legislation guaranteeing minorities the right to vote.

Obama acknowledged his debt to a generation of civil rights "foot soldiers" during his remarks at Brown Chapel AME Church, the sanctuary from which the voting rights marchers set out on their fateful walk on March 7, 1965, across the Edmund Pettus Bridge and into the violence of club-wielding law enforcement officers.

"We're in the presence today of ... giants whose shoulders we stand on," he said. "Because of what they endured, they led a people out of bondage. It's because of them that the next generation has not been so bloody. It's because of them I stand before you today."

Indeed, among those in the audience were the Rev. Joseph Lowery of Atlanta, a lieutenant of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. who took over the Southern Christian Leadership Conference after King's assassination, and Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), who led the original "Bloody Sunday" march, a prelude to King's Selma-to-Montgomery march days later.

Speaking to the crowd, Lewis said, "Forty-two years ago it was almost impossible for people of color to register to vote. We got in the way. We stood up. That's why we come back [to mark the anniversary]." Lewis sat next to Obama inside the church, but in his remarks, he did not indicate a preference for Obama or Clinton in the 2008 Democratic presidential contest.

African-Americans are one of the most important constituencies in the Democratic Party, and the face-to-face confrontation between Clinton and Obama in Selma underscored how actively both plan to court black voters.

Comments from those who heard the speeches Sunday did not provide definitive proof of which candidate carried the day.

"We love the Clintons, but it's a brand new day," said Freddie Gholston, 55, an African-American from Trinity, Ala., who attends the "Bridge Crossing Jubilee" every year. "It's really possible for Obama to become president."

But Althea Roy, 67, a lifelong resident of Selma, said of Clinton: "I think she would be good for our people. Her husband was."

Obama, who is seeking to become the country's first African-American president, was just three years old when state and local police turned back Lewis and the other "Bloody Sunday" marchers, producing television images that galvanized the nation against election tactics >used mostly in Southern states to legally disenfranchise blacks.

In a breakfast speech at a local community college earlier Sunday, he told students that his father, a goat herder in Kenya, also was inspired by the struggles in Selma. He moved to Hawaii to attend school and there met the white woman from Kansas who would become his wife and the senator's mother.

"If it hadn't been for Selma, I wouldn't be here," Obama said. "I am the offspring of the movement."

Sen. Clinton also credited the struggle in Selma and the 1965 Voting Rights Act it produced with proving new opportunities for women and Hispanics.

"It is the gift that keeps on giving," she said of the Voting Rights Act.

"It is giving Senator Obama a chance to run for president, [New Mexico Gov.] Bill Richardson, a Hispanic, a chance to run, and it is giving me a chance," she said. "I know where my chance came from, and I am grateful."

DOJ_NMG_0139455

Clinton, who is seeking to become the first female president, spoke at the First Baptist Church, located just two blocks from Brown Chapel. During the voting rights demonstrations in the early 1960s, the Baptist church often served as a meeting place for King and SCLC organizers.

Drawing upon biblical scriptures and the sermons of King, she said after all the "hard work getting rid of literacy tests and poll taxes, we've got to stay awake because we've got a march to continue." To shouts of approval and applause, she added, "How can we rest while poverty and inequality continue to rise? We all know we have to finish the march. That is the call to our generation."

Following the church services, Clinton and Obama praised each other as they appeared together outside Brown Chapel for a rally that kicked off the march from the church over the Edmund Pettus Bridge.

"It is excellent that we have a candidate like Barack Obama who embodies what all of you fought for here 42 years ago," Sen. Clinton said. Clinton is "doing an excellent job for this country, and we're going to be marching arm-in-arm," Obama said of his Senate colleague.

When the commemorative march began, Obama linked arms with Lowery, who had led the Selma-to-Montgomery march at the request of King, and Clinton joined arms with her husband in their first joint appearance since she announced her presidential campaign in January.

The march ended with a ceremony in a park at the foot of the bridge heralding the induction of the former president into Selma's Voting Rights Hall of Fame.

Obama Praises Selma Achievements (USAT)

By Alvin Benn

USA Today, March 5, 2007

SELMA, Ala. — Sen. Barack Obama praised Selma for its civil rights achievements Sunday morning, and said that his presidential candidacy has a direct relation to the events of 1965.

"I am the product of your legend," Obama, D-Ill., said at the Wallace Community College gymnasium, where he spoke to about 1,000 supporters.

The school is named for Alabama's famous, former segregationist governor, George C. Wallace, who once stood in the doors at the University of Alabama to keep black students from entering.

Obama and Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., are in Alabama to participate in events Sunday marking the 42nd anniversary of the Selma to Montgomery march. Former President Bill Clinton will also participate.

Political historians consider the weekend visit by two candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination significant.

"This city has become the symbolic place to come for the African-American vote in this country," Selma historian Alston Fitts said Friday.

Posted

E-mail | Save | Print |

Enlarge

By Rob Carr, AP

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., spoke Sunday morning at the Martin and Coretta King Beloved Community Unity Breakfast, in Selma, Ala.

Obama, Clinton Seek Votes At Civil Rights Landmark (CHIT)

By Dahleen Glanton And Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, March 5, 2007

SELMA, Ala. -- Two of the Democratic Party's leading presidential candidates came to an emotionally evocative touchstone of the civil rights movement Sunday seeking to strengthen their bonds with African American voters and tie their campaigns to the cause's unfinished work.

Speaking at two of the city's oldest black churches, located yards from each other, Sens. Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Clinton of New York presented their campaigns as legacies of the struggle for political equality.

DOJ_NMG_0139456

With African American votes crucial to winning Democratic primaries in the South, Clinton and Obama have been making a determined effort to win over black voters. The candidates came to Selma for the 42nd commemoration of Bloody Sunday, when civil rights marchers were beaten by state troopers as they tried to cross the Edmund Pettus Bridge.

Sunday marked the first entrance into the presidential campaign by former President Bill Clinton, a popular figure with African-Americans whom writer Toni Morrison once called "our first black president." He avoided upstaging his wife at her speech by staying away from the church. But people cheered and rushed to be near him when he joined his wife and Obama for a re-enactment of the 1965 march.

In a keynote address for the commemoration, Obama declared himself part of a new wave of black political leaders that he called "the Joshua Generation." It was Joshua, the Biblical successor to Moses, who led the Jewish people to the Promised Land after Moses delivered them from slavery in Egypt.

"We are in the presence today of a lot of Moseses, ... of giants whose shoulders we stand on," said Obama, surrounded by civil rights veterans. But, he added, "We've got to remember now that Joshua still has a job to do."

While Obama did not explicitly claim for himself the role of Joshua, that was clearly the implication, coming during a campaign to be elected the nation's highest leader.

Speaking at the First Baptist Church, Clinton said that three Democratic contenders for the presidency-Obama, an African-American, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, a Latino, and herself, a woman-benefited from the civil rights movement.

"I come here as a ... great beneficiary of what happened in Selma," said Clinton.

"In the last two elections, we have seen our right to vote tampered with ... in state after state," Clinton said.

Clinton began the presidential race with a huge lead among African Americans, many of whom have deep affection for the former Clinton White House, but recent polls have shown Obama leading her among black voters. Though Obama is African American, he is a newcomer to national politics and is not as well known as the former first lady.

Black voters could play an important role in the selection of the next Democratic nominee. South Carolina, where blacks make up about half of the Democratic primary electorate, will hold one of the earliest nominating contests. Several other Southern states, including Alabama, are considering moving up their primaries.

Marching at the front of the procession through downtown Selma and across the bridge, the Clintons and Obama were separated in line by two black congressmen and several other civil rights leaders. People along the route snapped pictures and yelled out the names of Obama and the Clintons. Many of them fell in behind as the march passed.

"It is important for us to see what they stand for," Patrick Dick, a 33-year-old heating and ventilation technician from Birmingham, said of the candidates. "It will be a difficult decision because both of them seem like they are there for us and want to make the world better."

Before the procession, Obama spoke at Brown Chapel A.M.E. Church, the meeting place for Selma civil rights organizers during the 1960s and the starting point for the Bloody Sunday march. Obama was joined there by the local congressman, Artur Davis (D-Ala.), who has endorsed Obama, and by Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), who was badly beaten on the bridge and returns for every anniversary.

Obama placed his own life in the broader experience of black Americans and noted recent news accounts of his genealogy showing a white ancestor once owned slaves.

His father, a black man from Kenya, "met this woman whose great great-great-great grandfather had owned slaves," he said.

Some commentators have argued that Obama's biography-he is the son of a white woman from Kansas and a black man from Kenya and was raised by white grandparents in Hawaii-gives him a different experience from most black Americans.

But he asserted his ancestors in colonial Africa suffered many of the same humiliations as blacks in the Jim Crow-era South, noting his African grandfather was a "house boy" whom even in old age his British employers addressed by his first name, rather than his last.

"Sound familiar?" Obama said, rousing a chorus of affirmations.

DOJ_NMG_0139457

He offered his life story as a legacy of the civil rights movement, asserting formative events in his life as touchstones of the movement's achievements: election to high office, the opportunity to study at prestigious Ivy League universities, and even his birth of a mixed-race marriage.

"There was something stirring across the country because of what happened in Selma, Ala., because some folks are willing to march across a bridge. So they got together and Barack Obama Jr. was born," Obama said.

Obama was born in 1961, four years before the march across the Edmund Pettus Bridge. But spokesman Bill Burton said Obama was "speaking metaphorically about the civil rights movement as a whole."

During Sunday's commemoration, Bill Clinton was inducted into the National Voting Rights Museum Hall of Fame.

His wife said much work remains to be done in this country, including providing health care for 46 million uninsured Americans, creating an efficient energy policy and taking care of American soldiers fighting in Iraq.

"How do we refuse to march when our young men and women are in harm's way and when they come back our government does not take care of them," she said.

She added, "The brave men and women [in the 1960s] did not lose heart. We can do no less."

Clinton And Obama Unite In Pleas To Blacks (NYT)

By Patrick Healy And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

SELMA, Ala., March 4 — Evoking the passions and rivalries of the civil rights era, Senators Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton made deeply personal appeals to voters in the sanctuaries of black churches here on Sunday, and then joined former President Bill Clinton for a march across a bridge where white police officers beat protesters, most of them black, nearly 42 years ago.

It was an extraordinary sight: the Clintons and Mr. Obama, two of them competitors for the Democratic presidential nomination, walking — with two black congressman, and sometimes others, in between them — down Martin Luther King Jr. Street to commemorate the footsteps of black demonstrators who were met with violence as they tried to march to Montgomery to demand civil rights in 1965.

The visit to Selma, a historically rich, economically struggling city, became a proxy battle for black support between Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama, whose candidacy represents a threat to Mrs. Clinton's traditional base. That competitive dynamic intensified on Sunday with the debut of Mr. Clinton on the campaign trail, six weeks into his wife's bid, and among a bloc of voters who are at once devoted to the former president and torn between his wife and Mr. Obama.

It was the first side-by-side appearance of Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton in the 2008 presidential campaign, and the political theater of the two campaigns overlapped repeatedly, but with a polite tone that contrasted with their political skirmishing of recent weeks. Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton spoke at services on the same street, three blocks apart, and the lines of worshipers were so long that they nearly intermingled. Both candidates paid homage to the same civil rights leaders, and both concluded the services by locking arms with worshipers and swaying to "We Shall Overcome."

At different points, both Clintons said that the Voting Rights Act of 1965 had paved the way for Mr. Obama to run for president.

"Today it is giving Senator Obama the chance to run for president," Mrs. Clinton told worshipers at the First Baptist Church, to enthusiastic applause. "And by its logic and spirit, it is giving the same chance to Gov. Bill Richardson to run as a Hispanic. And, yes, it is giving me that chance."

Mr. Obama, before the commemoration march, praised both Clintons and said of the political campaign under way, "We don't have time for other folks to divide us."

Mr. Clinton, arguably the most cadence-blessed speaker of the three, half-joked Sunday afternoon that he had been bested by the other two. "All the good speaking has been done by Hillary and Senator Obama already — I'm just sort of bringing up the rear," he said.

If Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton had one overarching theme in their remarks, it was the honoring of the civil rights movement that had contributed to their own rise in politics and quests for the nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0139458

"We're in the presence today of giants whose shoulders we stand on," Mr. Obama said at the Brown Chapel A.M.E. Church. "People who battled on behalf not just of African-Americans but on behalf of all Americans, who battled for America's soul, that shed blood, that endured taunts and torment."

In a 35-minute address, interrupted repeatedly by applause and shouts of praise from worshipers, Mr. Obama said it was time for his generation to pick up the work of those who had toiled before. He said it was time for the "Joshua generation" — a biblical reference to the leader who succeeded Moses — to urge family and friends to shake their apathy to engage in politics and action.

"I know if cousin Pookie would vote, if brother Jethro would get off the couch and stop watching Sports- Center and go register some folks and go to the polls, we'd have a different kind of politics," Mr. Obama said, the crowd rising to its feet. "Kick off your bedroom slippers, put on your marching shoes!"

Down the street, meanwhile, the congregation warmly welcomed Mrs. Clinton, who blended personal anecdotes with a fluidly thematic set of remarks, in which she said the civil rights march "is not over yet."

"We've got to stay awake, we've got to stay awake because we have a march to finish," Mrs. Clinton said, "a march towards one America."

Her voice rising, she said: "Poverty and growing inequality matter. Health care matters. The people of the Gulf Coast matter. Our soldiers matter. Our future matters."

Both candidates, too, turned to stories from their past to show their connection to the civil rights movement.

Mr. Obama relayed a story of how his Kenyan father and his Kansan mother fell in love because of the tumult of Selma, but he was born in 1961, four years before the confrontation at Selma took place. When asked later, Mr. Obama clarified himself, saying: "I meant the whole civil rights movement." He also acknowledged for the first time a recent revelation by a genealogist that his mother's ancestors in Kentucky owned slaves, something reported by The Baltimore Sun last week.

"It turns out that her great-great-great-great-grandfather actually owned slaves," Mr. Obama said before another audience, over breakfast, at George C. Wallace Community College. "That's no surprise. That's part of our tortured, tangled history."

Mrs. Clinton, meanwhile, recalled going with her church youth minister as a teenager in 1963 to hear the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. speak in Chicago. Yet, in her autobiography and elsewhere, Mrs. Clinton has described growing up Republican and being a "Goldwater Girl" in 1964 — in other words, a supporter of the presidential candidacy of Senator Barry M. Goldwater, who opposed the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

After the services, the senators were joined on the steps of the Brown Chapel by Mr. Clinton, who flew to Selma to campaign with his wife and be inducted into the National Voting Rights Hall of Fame.

Indeed, the start of the re-enactment march was delayed as a crowd swarmed around Mr. Clinton, who smiled and hugged his admirers, a few of whom were even wearing Obama buttons.

Mary Broadnax, 52, was walking closely behind, absorbing a moment she would never have imagined growing up in nearby Montgomery. After hearing Mr. Obama speak, she said she would do whatever she could to see him win the presidency.

"I love Bill Clinton, but if he came up to me and asked me to support Hillary, I would have to say I'm sorry," Ms. Broadnax said, pausing before unspooling a long string of attributes about Mr. Obama. "He's the right man for our time."

The two political rivals, followed by large entourages and curious onlookers, had come to Selma three days before the anniversary of Bloody Sunday, a violent afternoon near the Edmund Pettus Bridge that became a turning point in the American civil rights movement. Dozens of congressmen and other elected officials also came for the ceremonies; among them was a House leader, Representative Rahm Emanuel, who represents the same state as Mr. Obama, was a former aide to Mr. Clinton and went to church Sunday with Mrs. Clinton. He has not endorsed anyone in the race.

As they re-enacted the 1965 march, making their way to the Alabama River, the Clintons were at the front of the assembly, while Mr. Obama was often only two people away, separated by John Lewis and Artur Davis, the Democratic congressmen from Georgia and Alabama. They were all linked arm in arm throughout as they slowly moved forward on the two-mile walk.

Clinton, Obama Link Selma March To Present (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Peter Whoriskey

DOJ_NMG_0139459

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

SELMA, Ala., Mar. 4 -- Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), describing himself as "the offspring of the movement," paid homage Sunday to the civil rights protesters whose violent beatings here at the hands of state troopers and sheriff's deputies 42 years ago sparked national outrage and led to legislation ensuring the voting rights of African Americans throughout the South.

Just a few blocks away, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) claimed the same inheritance, describing the civil rights movement as "the gift that keeps on giving" as it propels new types of politicians onto the national stage. Their simultaneous appearance at the annual commemoration of one of the most famous moments in the civil rights struggle embodied the historic nature of a presidential race in which an African American and a woman lead the Democratic field.

The two presidential candidates spoke at separate Sunday morning services and later joined in the ritual march across the Edmund Pettus Bridge, led by Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), who as a young civil rights leader was beaten on the bridge with other protesters on the morning of March 7, 1965, as they began a voting-rights march to Montgomery.

Clinton marched with her husband, former president Bill Clinton, who came to Selma to be inducted into the National Voting Rights Museum's hall of fame. It was the first time the Clintons had appeared together at a major event in the 2008 campaign and an appearance much-debated in Hillary Clinton's campaign before it was announced Thursday night.

In the days leading up to the commemoration of "Bloody Sunday," advisers to Obama and Clinton had insisted it would not be a day for politics. But their mere presence in Alabama signaled the extraordinary importance of black voters in the upcoming Democratic primaries, with recent surveys indicating that Obama is jeopardizing Clinton's lead in the race by gaining among African Americans.

Any pretense that it was not part of the presidential campaign was dropped as they day went on. Supporters carried signs for the two campaigns, former president Clinton joked about the "rainbow coalition" of candidates on the Democratic ballot, and Rep. Artur Davis, the Alabama Democrat who represents Selma, unabashedly introduced Obama in his keynote address at Brown Chapel AME Church as the next president of the United States.

The crowd in and around Obama's appearance was decidedly larger -- his audience included 15 members of Congress, compared with four who went to hear Clinton. Obama, who was 3 years old at the time of the Selma clash, used his keynote address to mark his place in a younger generation of black Americans who do not march in the streets -- but still, in his words, are required "to fulfill that legacy, to fulfill the obligations and the debt that we owe to those who allowed us to be here today."

Referring to his heritage, Obama said that although his own ancestors were not slaves, the civil rights movement inspired his African father to move from Kenya to seek an American education and eventually marry his white mother -- "whose great, great-great-grandfather had owned slaves." "But she had a different idea," Obama said.

"Something stirred across the country because of what happened in Selma, Alabama, because some folks were willing to march across a bridge," Obama said, explaining that, as a result, his parents "got together and Barack Obama Jr. was born." Earlier in the day at a prayer breakfast the Illinois Democrat said: "If it hadn't been for Selma, I wouldn't be here."

"This is the site of my conception. I am the fruits of your labor," Obama told an audience of civil rights movement veterans. "When people ask me if I've been to Selma before, I tell them I'm coming home." An aide later said that the senator did not mean to imply his birth was a literal result of the Selma marches but rather the movement overall.

As Brown Chapel filled to capacity, crowds spilled out onto the lawn and the street, swaying and singing along to gospel music broadcast from speakers set up to accommodate the large number of churchgoers. A lighthearted skirmish broke out among visitors seeking programs featuring Obama. Dueling barbecues served hot dogs and hamburgers -- selling out of both even before thousands gathered mid-afternoon to walk across the bridge.

A smaller group of union members and families lingered outside the First Baptist Church, another civil rights landmark, after Hillary Clinton went inside to speak. Addressing the congregation from the pulpit where the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. once spoke, Clinton, after singing along to a jaunty version of "Battle Hymn of the Republic," described herself, as well as her main Democratic rival, as beneficiaries of the movement.

Democratic Reps. Anthony Weiner (N.Y.) and Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) went to hear Clinton speak. The bulk of the other members of Congress in Selma on Sunday, including Lewis, went to hear Obama.

Clinton described the civil rights era as a gift, saying: "Today it is giving Senator Obama the chance to run for president."

DOJ_NMG_0139460

"And by its logic and spirit, it is giving the same chance to Governor Bill Richardson, a Hispanic, and yes, it is giving it to me," Clinton said.

In her 20-minute speech, Clinton recalled going with a church group as a girl to hear King speak in Chicago in 1963. "I come here as a sister in worship," she told the churchgoers.

Clinton then linked the spirit of the civil rights march and its future to the ideals underlying her agenda: insuring the uninsured, improving schools, reducing the nation's dependency on foreign oil and answering the threat of climate change, which she characterized as "tinkering with God's creation."

The civil rights movement, she said, was not just for "the history books." The march has "carried us a mighty long way," she said. "But we all know we have to finish the march." "How do we say that everything is fine -- Bloody Sunday is for the history books -- when over 96,000 of our citizens, the victims of Hurricane Katrina, are still living in mobile homes and trailers, which is a national disgrace?" The line drew loud applause.

Speaking late in the afternoon at his induction ceremony at the National Voting Rights Museum, Bill Clinton promised to be brief because "all the good speaking today has been done by Hillary and Senator Obama."

Urging the crowd to pursue the ideal of the civil rights movement, he advised them to find support in the idea that in 1965, most of the progress today might have seemed unimaginable.

"A lot of what you hoped for has happened. A lot of what you thought you would never see, you have seen," Clinton said. "We got a rainbow coalition running for president and Reverend [Al] Sharpton is tied to Strom Thurmond. I thought I'd never see it."

Davis Hits HRC On War Vote As Obama Ties Himself To Movement (POL)

The Politico, March 5, 2007

SELMA, Ala., -- Turns out Obama didn't have to wait for all those speakers to get his turn. In a nod to his full schedule, the organizers here allowed their special guest to take the mic ahead of schedule.

Before he did, though, Rep. Artur Davis offered a glowing introduction of his colleague and candidate that included a direct shot at Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Noting how the same knock against Obama, "longevity," had been used against "Dr. King and Jack and Bobby," Davis said seniority wasn't always an asset.

"Longevity," Davis said, "can make you too cautious. It can make you calculate when you cast your vote on a war."

Asked to respond, Clinton spokesman Mo Elleithee said, "Today is not a day for politics."

Obama's address weaved together a tribute to "the foot soldiers" of the movement, many of whom were in attendance here, with an explanation of how he is connected to their struggle.

"My grandfather at age of 60 was still called a houseboy by his employers," Obama said of his paternal kin in Kenya. Even white children in the country, Obama noted to an audience that included many who knew such indignities, "called him by his first name because they didn't want to dignify him."

It was the reverberations of the Civil Rights Movement that got the attention of his father, a goat herder, and inspired him "to set his sights a little bit higher" and eventually pursue his education in America, Obama said.

Turning to his mother, Obama addressed with almost nonchalance the recent discovery that her descendants owned slaves.

"As if that were a surprise," Obama quipped to a crowd of head's nodding knowingly. "That's no surprise."

"That's part of our tortured tangled history."

Obama pivoted to present problems and his vision for the future by invoking the language of scripture and the movement. "Our work is not done," he declared.

"We haven't yet crossed the river...we haven't yet reached the promised land."

Obama talked of racial and economic gaps in health care and education and offered tweaks of President Bush on the war and affirmative action but said nothing direct or indirect about Clinton or his other Democratic opponents.

But he also chided his own community, by saying that just as his generation stands on the shoulders of the giants who preceded them, "our children are going to have to stand on our shoulders."

DOJ_NMG_0139461

"We're going to have to strengthen our shoulders, broaden our shoulders," Obama implored.

Further funding of education is critical, he said, but "money will not make a dimes bit of a difference if you don't turn off the television set and put away the Game Boy and make sure you're talking to the teacher and get over the anti-intellectualism that still exists in some of our community"

Obama got loud applause for that line and many others -- not to mention more than a few "mmm-hmms" and "that's-right's" -- but was subdued in his delivery. He raised his volume and cadence at the end of his remarks, paying tribute again to the sacrifices of those who went before, but mostly offered unembellished rhetoric.

Silicon Valley Looks To Obama (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

Silicon Valley leaders whose endorsements have been key in past presidential races give Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton high marks, but say there is little to learn about her candidacy. Instead, they have bubbling curiosity about her fellow 2008 contender, Sen. Barack Obama.

"He's a once-in-a-generation talent. He's just the real deal," said Jude Barry, longtime Silicon Valley political observer who founded Obama for America. "He's not well known here but he will take off like a hot IPO."

Translation: Local insiders who track stock deals and initial public offerings the way Washingtonians follow politics have growing interest in the Illinois Democrat. Many of them think Mr. Obama could be Silicon Valley's next new thing.

Mrs. Clinton, New York Democrat, who spent time in the valley during her husband's two terms as president, is a known commodity and is still the liberal Bay Area's presumptive favorite. But in California's innovation hotbed, investors, executives and valley politicians are always looking for new blood.

Santa Clara County Assessor Larry Stone has been a force in Democratic politics for decades, and prides himself on his early endorsement of Bill Clinton in 1990.

When former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner opted against running this cycle, Mr. Stone was left in what he describes as a "confusing dilemma."

"In my younger days I was about ideology, now I am just about winning," he said. "I like Hillary a lot and I know her the best of everybody, but I just question whether she can win."

Mr. Obama is courting Mr. Stone, and asked him recently what it would take to "make this deal."

It's a good question for Mr. Stone, who says Mrs. Clinton would be a good president but concedes that probably isn't enough to embrace her for 2008: "She clearly has it together but it just doesn't seem to excite people."

That sentiment echoes throughout the valley.

Mr. Barry, Howard Dean's state director in California in 2004, started the Obama group without ever meeting the senator and raised $30,000 in a matter of hours.

"I was surprised at how easy it was, and it portends great things for him out here," said Mr. Barry, once the spokesman for former San Jose Mayor Ron Gonzales.

Given Mr. Obama's anti-war stance and appeal to youth, Mr. Barry predicts the first-term senator will break all of Mr. Dean's online fundraising records.

"Obama really has a buzz in the valley because he's something new," agreed Victor Arranaga, a longtime San Jose political fixture who works in government affairs for a major tech firm.

Mr. Obama got an early endorsement from former state Controller Steve Westly, a Democrat who made his name as an EBay leader.

In 1992, a group of Silicon Valley business executives from the world's most powerful technology companies gathered at San Jose's Tech Museum three weeks before the general election to endorse Mr. Clinton over an incumbent Republican president.

The CEOs of companies such as Hewlett Packard and Apple Computer -- Republicans, Democrats and independents -- said then they chose Mr. Clinton over George Bush because he would be better for economy and innovation.

DOJ_NMG_0139462

The informal Silicon Valley group has become even more influential this cycle, with a wide-open field sending candidates flocking to the Bay Area for money and to prove their tech mettle.

Russell Hancock, CEO of Joint Venture: Silicon Valley Network, said valley leaders are curious about Mr. Obama. "Folks are really interested to see what he is like. He hasn't spent enough time out here yet," he said.

Fueling the need for candidates to visit the valley is the likelihood California's 2008 primaries will be moved from June to Feb 5. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger says he will sign a bill changing the date.

Former San Jose Mayor Tom McEnery, a Democrat, remembers when Apple's John Sculley and HP's John Young -- lifelong Republicans -- joined 30 fellow valley powerhouses to endorse Mr. Clinton.

"They were people who looked to accomplishment and to the future," he said. "Since then, every presidential candidate makes a stop in Silicon Valley because they understand the future is being invented here every day. It's an absolute necessity."

This time around, the executives are equally interested in Republican presidential candidates.

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, announced recently that Cisco CEO John Chambers will serve as his campaign's national co-chairman and as economic and technology adviser.

Mr. Chambers, a Republican, said Mr. McCain can "move America forward" because "he understands the value that technology contributes to economic prosperity and growth."

Mr. McEnery called Mr. McCain "the type of independent with real appeal to the valley."

Former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani also has broad valley support, with many viewing him as a leader with centrist credentials.

Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina is no Silicon Valley favorite because of his ties to trial lawyers. "He's not a good fit," Mr. McEnery said.

"Trial lawyers are like poison," agreed Mr. Stone.

The Senator's 'Streak' Ends At 57th Vote (WP)

By Paul Kane

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Sure, it wasn't quite DiMaggio-esque in terms of its pop culture mythology, as far as "streaks" go. But Barack Obama's reign as the only perfect attendee of Senate votes among presidential hopefuls came to a crashing end last week.

After 56 straight votes this year on the chamber floor, Obama (D-Ill.) missed his 57th on Friday, bypassing his senatorial duties on a homeland security bill to deliver a speech to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee meeting in Chicago.

"He really hoped to make it back to Washington in time, but it turns out, that was just the audacity of hope," spokesman Ben LaBolt said of the streak ending.

Obama was the last of the six senators already declared for the presidential campaign to have made every vote in the chamber this year. He missed a second vote Friday as well. Both were amendments that sailed to easy passage in the ongoing debate on the homeland security bill.

Obama wasn't alone: Declared candidates Joseph Biden (D-Del.), Christopher Dodd (D-Conn.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) missed both votes.

But if politics were baseball, Biden and McCain were barely on the field last week. Out of six votes on the homeland security bill, they made it to one apiece.

Weekend At Obama's (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

False hope springs eternal, which is one way to look at the recent concordat between Barack Obama and John McCain to "save" the public financing of Presidential election campaigns.

In case you haven't been following this political version of "Weekend at Bernie's" -- and you need a hobby if you have -- nearly every major Presidential candidate has decided not to abide by public-spending limits for the 2008 campaign. That includes Messrs. Obama and McCain. This decision is entirely rational, because the amount of money needed to compete in the primaries exceeds the limits imposed by our campaign-finance scolds.

DOJ_NMG_0139463

But now comes the Illinois Senator to say that if he wins the Democratic nomination, he will ask his GOP opponent to agree with him to accept public money and spending limits for the 2008 general election. Mr. McCain quickly matched the offer. In some media precincts, this is being hailed as an achievement, and other candidates are being challenged to follow suit.

We hope they don't. The public-financing regime is collapsing of its own misguided assumption that only public money in politics is uncorrupting. But campaign limits on individual contributions have instead made candidates even more reliant on organized special interests, and they reduce political competition by favoring the rich and famous. Messrs. Obama and McCain are trying to prop up a policy corpse that deserves to rest in peace.

Clinton Brings Debt Worries To The Fore (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon And John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Hillary Clinton, sounding a theme likely to recur among 2008 presidential hopefuls, is warning about the "economic vulnerabilities" posed by foreign interests owning large amounts of U.S. debt.

In remarks on the Senate floor and a letter to Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke and Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, Mrs. Clinton said President Bush's economic policies have contributed to an "erosion of U.S. economic sovereignty." She also said it is "undeniable that the exponential growth of foreign debt in the last six years has undermined our economic standing."

The comments by Mrs. Clinton, considered the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination, are an early indication of how big an issue the growing unease over globalization and free trade will be in the 2008 campaign. Many Democrats won election last year in part by arguing that global trade leads to job losses and lower wages. They also are warning about the nation's heavy reliance on foreign debt to finance domestic needs, including the federal budget deficit. With polls showing voters are concerned about jobs and wages, Republicans are also expected to address the issue.

Currently, the U.S. imports more goods than it exports from places like China, resulting in a trade deficit, and it borrows heavily from abroad to finance its domestic investment. Foreign interests own about $2.2 trillion of U.S. Treasury securities -- or about 52% of the public debt not held by the U.S. government, compared with about 20% in the early 1990s, during the Clinton administration. The U.S. has come to rely on foreign capital because Americans don't save enough to finance the nation's domestic investment.

But there are differences over how to attack the issue. In her letter, Mrs. Clinton suggested she might support setting a benchmark for foreign-held U.S. debt that would trigger some type of White House action.

An aide to another 2008 presidential candidate, Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd, chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, said such a move could rattle markets and would require extensive consultation with the Federal Reserve. Similar concerns were raised by an aide to Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill). A top economic adviser to the Republican presidential campaign of John McCain also questioned the soundness of setting a specific benchmark for U.S.-held foreign debt.

Still, there is broad concern that the growing reliance on foreign investors puts the U.S. at risk, and some say the way to address it is to begin saving money at home by erasing the current $248 billion budget deficit, moving into a surplus and putting money aside to pay for costly obligations like Social Security and Medicare.

Edwin Truman, a former Treasury assistant secretary in the Clinton administration and a senior fellow at the Peter G. Peterson Institute for International Economics, a pro-globalization think tank here, said that while Mrs. Clinton is right to call attention to the growing reliance on foreign debt, there are no "magic numbers" that should be used as a benchmark for a trigger. Mrs. Clinton said in her letter that she supported legislation last year "that sounds an alarm bell when U.S. foreign-owned debt reaches 25% of GDP or the trade deficit reaches 5%" of gross domestic product.

Mr. Paulson, meanwhile, disagreed with Mrs. Clinton's concerns, saying the willingness of foreigners to buy U.S. Treasurys helps keep interest rates low and is a sign of the U.S.'s strong economy. "We're holding our economic fate in our own hands, and if we keep our economy growing, they're going to invest here," Mr. Paulson said yesterday on the ABC program "This Week."

Write to Deborah Solomon at deborah.solomon@wsj.com1 and John Harwood at john.harwood@wsj.com2

Crafting The New Hillary (USNEWS)

DOJ_NMG_0139464

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, March 4, 2007

The moment she stepped into the room, the crowd of 100 union and environmental activists burst into applause, and Hillary Rodham Clinton began dispensing hugs and air kisses. As photographers followed, Senator Clinton made her way to a front table and blurted out, "Hi, Anna," when she saw labor leader Anna Burger at the podium. At that point, an embarrassed Hillary quickly raised her hand to cover her face as she realized she had interrupted Burger's speech. "Sorry," Clinton said, prompting good-natured laughter from the activists, who had gathered in Washington for a national strategy conference. In her own address, Clinton sounded more like a motivational speaker than a presidential contender, urging the crowd to fight global warming and help reduce U.S. reliance on fossil fuels. "We're makin' progress," she exhorted. "Do not grow weary. You are doing good, as the gospel would say."

Her presentation was devoid of hard edges, contrary to her longtime image among critics as a harridan and a polarizer. Instead, Clinton has begun trying to present a warmer, more genial side—and she's having some success. Forty percent of Americans have an unfavorable view of Hillary Clinton, but 58 percent see her favorably, according to the latest USA Today/Gallup poll. That's an improvement from just a few years ago (chart, Page 26). And she enjoys a substantial lead over her Democratic rivals for the 2008 presidential nomination. In a hypothetical matchup, 36 percent of Democrats support Clinton, while 24 percent back Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, 14 percent support former Vice President Al Gore, and 12 percent endorse former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, according to a recent Washington Post/ABC News survey.

The New York senator's basic strategy is to scare off potential donors and supporters of her competitors by campaigning as the favorite of the Democratic establishment—and the inevitable nominee. After conducting a "vulnerability assessment," Clinton and her advisers have embarked on a two-pronged plan to expand her lead. First, they are emphasizing her strengths—high name identification, a seemingly endless string of endorsements, lots of Washington experience, a reputation for toughness and intelligence, and enormous fundraising potential. Just last week, her campaign announced that it had collected more than $1 million from a seven-day online money drive.

Equally important, Hillaryland, as her team calls itself, is placing more emphasis on her personal qualities—friendliness, a sense of humor, and a willingness to listen—all in a crucial effort to improve her image. "People have dark notions about her. They think the Clintons are all-or-nothing people and that she is vindictive, angry, cold, and calculating," says a prominent Republican strategist. "A man who is cold and calculating is smart and shrewd. A woman who is cold and calculating is considered 'a bitch.'"

Attack. The tough side of Senator Clinton, 59, was evident in her dust-up with Obama a few weeks ago. After Hollywood mogul David Geffen, a former fundraiser for Bill Clinton, endorsed Obama and strongly criticized Bill and Hillary, the empire struck back. Howard Wolfson, Hillary's campaign spokesman, called on Obama to apologize for Geffen's remarks and to return his campaign contributions. Obama refused. "It reminded people that the Clinton instinct always is to attack," says a GOP adviser with close ties to the White House. "They can't help themselves." Many GOP strategists say this image is more than a little harmful to Senator Clinton, especially with men and independent voters. But there was no retreat. "When you're attacked," she declared in Iowa in late January, "you have to deck your opponents. You can count on me to stand my ground and fight back."

With that kind of rhetoric, perhaps it's no wonder that Hillary is just as polarizing as President Bush, maybe more so. Republican strategists, in fact, say she has so many detractors that she could never persuade more than a bare majority of Americans to vote for her. This again raises the nagging question of her electability, long a sore point. Her advisers are doing their best to counteract it.

"Hillary has just come off two landslide elections [for the Senate in New York]," says Mark Penn, Senator Clinton's chief presidential strategist. Penn says Clinton is competitive in all major polls with her likely Republican rivals, and notes that she's leading her Democratic competitors or is near the top of the heap in the early primary and caucus states of Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire, and South Carolina.

Why Hillary? "People see her as an experienced leader who has what it takes to govern in difficult times," Penn told U.S. News. "They see her as smart, strong ... someone who can relate to international leaders and restore respect to America." Penn says men are drawn to her "strength of leadership" while women, a majority of the electorate and the core of her support, see "the idea she can be the first woman president as an emotional and important event in their lives."

DOJ_NMG_0139465

Clinton is also trying to come across as more cautious and centrist, if often ambiguous in her policy stands, to reassure independents and conservatives. In an interview with CNBC's Power Lunch last week, she urged Bush to address fundamental problems in the economy, such as soaring foreign debt and massive budget deficits. She called the stock market plunge a "wake-up call" and encouraged the administration to find some "sensible and reasonable" answers.

So far, the crafting of her new persona appears to be working, at least to a degree. "Hillary," as she prefers to be called, is not only maintaining a lead over Democratic rivals; she has also increased her favorability ratings among voters. In another surprise to critics who have claimed she's unelectable, recent polls find that she is running even with or within striking distance of the leading Republican candidates, Rudy Giuliani and John McCain, and running ahead of Mitt Romney.

"The electability argument has faded," a prominent GOP strategist admits. "It's a credit to her and her campaign that she has moderated her personality step by step." In addition to hewing to the center on some issues, such as abortion and free trade, she has talked openly about her belief in prayer and has worked on legislation with a number of conservative senators, including South Carolina's Lindsey Graham, who helped lead the impeachment drive against her husband. And she has refused to endorse immediate withdrawal from Iraq, despite demands from many antiwar activists.

Her aides are also confronting the "Bill problem." Asked if the former president and his history of adultery and impeachment will cause her problems with voters, a senior Hillary aide says, "They wanted him to continue to be their president even in the middle of the [impeachment]. He is living an exemplary life raising hundreds of millions of dollars for charity. And Bill has always been an asset in New York [in Hillary's two campaigns there]." In fact, the Bill problem might be overrated. A new Gallup Poll finds that Americans, by a margin of 70 percent to 28 percent, believe he would be more helpful than harmful to his wife's presidency; 61 percent want him to advise her unofficially.

Pride. Women form the core of her constituency—and make up 54 percent of the electorate, a powerful base of support. To capitalize on this, Hillary talks openly about her pride in being a woman and a mother. About 59 percent of women have a favorable view of Clinton, compared with 39 percent who have an unfavorable view, according to the Washington Post/ABC News poll. She is especially popular among women 18 to 34, of whom 66 percent have a favorable view. In her re-election to the Senate from New York last November, she won 73 percent of the female vote.

But Clinton is much less popular among men. Forty-eight percent of men have a favorable view of her, and 49 percent are unfavorable. Her share of the male vote in New York last year, 61 percent, was strong but lagged substantially behind the women.

In one way, history is on her side, since the establishment candidate generally wins major-party nominations, as did John Kerry in 2004, Al Gore in 2000, and many Republicans over the years. But the establishment candidate also sometimes stumbles and falls, as did Ed Muskie in losing the nomination to George McGovern in 1972. As the front-runner, Hillary knows she will be everyone's favorite target.

"She's got the old guard, the establishment," says a Democratic strategist with close ties to a rival presidential campaign. "But is this a year when all the accouterments of the old guard and the establishment will be more of a hindrance than a help? You've got an electorate looking for change, and they're not looking to Washington." Adds Frank Donatelli, former political director in the Reagan White House: "The American people look to the future, not the past. Hillary Clinton can only be a candidate of the past."

All this insider chatter seemed far away during her talk to the union and environmental activists in Washington last week. While her friend Anna Burger spoke, a smiling Senator Clinton, like a schoolmarm admiring a star pupil, nodded approvingly. When it was her turn, Clinton wonkishly called for the creation of a strategic energy fund, starting with $50 billion from the government raided partly from the repeal of tax breaks for the oil companies, to help develop renewable energy and create energy security. She criticized a "hint of fatalism" that has crept into Washington during the Bush administration and called for Americans to renew their optimism and unite behind new solutions to the nation's problems. "This is what Americans do best," she said with a big smile. "We are problem solvers."

That's certainly an uplifting theme, but it's far from clear at this point that Hillary Rodham Clinton is the right messenger.

DOJ_NMG_0139466

Bloomberg: The Waiting Game (NSWK)

By Eleanor Clift

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

In the aftermath of 9/11, nobody thought he could fill Rudy Giuliani's shoes. But under billionaire Michael Bloomberg, New York City's Democrat-turned-Republican mayor, the city rebounded. He's overseen a continued decline in the crime rate, forced restaurants to go smoke-free and has made vast strides in improving the public schools, the bane of any urban mayor. Not as ill-tempered as Giuliani, Bloomberg is doing a good job—perhaps, some New Yorkers might say, even a better job than his predecessor did. So why isn't he the one running for president?

Publicly, Bloomberg is focused on his second term and leaving the city in better shape than he got it. Privately, Bloomberg and political adviser Kevin Sheekey are meeting with pollsters and consultants to assess the mayor's chances as a third-party, independent candidate. "There is no Bloomberg campaign," Sheekey tells NEWSWEEK. "But we have certainly reached out." At a dinner last year with Al From, founder of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council, Bloomberg was candid and self-deprecating, wondering what chance a 5-foot-7, divorced Jew has in the celebrity-sweepstakes presidential contest.

The answer is that it depends on who the nominees are for the two major parties, and how much cash Bloomberg is willing to spend. The money part is easy for a self-made media mogul. "He could spend $500 million in a campaign and not even think about it," says From. But he'd probably do it only if buyer's remorse sets in among the voters. Because the primary process is so front-loaded this cycle, the winners will be known in early February, leaving nine months until the election for voters to get antsy. "He won't say anything until March of next year," says a former aide privy to the early discussions who didn't want to be named talking about them. "The guiding philosophy is who the Democratic and Republican nominees are, and the mood of the country once they know who those two people are."

It's hard to project a year in advance if that opening will be there, but there is so much discontent with the two parties that the stage could be set for an independent run. Hamilton Jordan, who masterminded Jimmy Carter's 1976 come-from-nowhere candidacy, and Doug Bailey, a longtime Republican consultant, have teamed up to offer a third-party centrist ticket to be chosen online in a virtual convention in June 2008. So far, 35,000 members have signed on—hardly a groundswell, but Jordan and Bailey are working to get on the ballot in all 50 states. Bloomberg would be a catch for their "Unity '08" ticket, though he might bristle at the rule that the slate has to be bipartisan and just go it alone. Still, Jordan initiated a meeting with Sheekey. Says Jordan: "I let him know there's an opening."

The Kucinich Conundrum (TIME)

By Joel Stein

Time, March 5, 2007

Remember that kid in high school who ran for class president, the one who wasn't popular, who didn't have money or dress well or even make a decent hallway poster? Now imagine if he sticks to it so long he starts to win. And by the time he's 23, he's a city councilman in Cleveland. At 31, he's the country's youngest big city mayor. All this success, you figure, would make his skin glow a little, his suits a bit spiffier, his speeches a little punchier. But what if he was so damn earnest that it didn't? What if at 60 he still looked and sounded like Dennis Kucinich?

You would make fun of him. And you did.

But Kucinich--a six-term Congressman who is running for President despite consistently coming in last in the 2004 primaries and first in talk-show monologues--doesn't care. Because he's so sure that what he's been saying for four years is right--he's for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, ratifying Kyoto, universal health care--he's convinced there's a moment coming, some event or speech or interview, when voters will suddenly realize he's not a joke: "When people see what I have to say, they go, 'Hey, wait. He's right about the war. Ha-ha. He's right about health care. Ha-ha.'" Kucinich believes deeply in the coming of this grand American epiphany even if no one outside his tiny camp does. "How can you take someone seriously that led us to war and not take someone seriously who stood for peace? It's a commentary on where we are as a society," he says. "Do we value celebrity over truth?"

DOJ_NMG_0139467

That, of course, is a decision that society made when Star magazine launched. And Kucinich isn't a celebrity; he's an aging, 5-ft. 7-in. vegan. Last Saturday, as he spoke at a lectern on the corner of Hollywood and Vine in Los Angeles, accepting a Champion for Peace Award from the members of Military Families Speak Out at an Oscars for Peace event, none of the hundreds of people who walked right in front of him stopped, despite the fact that he was standing next to an 8-ft.-tall Oscar clad in camouflage and missing a leg.

Unlike most fringe presidential candidates, Kucinich has years of experience in elective office. But even mainstream liberals won't support a candidate who wants to end the war on drugs and create a Department of Peace. Nancy Pelosi and Henry Waxman passed over him for chairman of the National Security and Foreign Affairs Subcommittee, which he was in line to take over. Even Shirley MacLaine, who has been friends with Kucinich since the '70s, sees how his party won't embrace him. "Maybe it's because he doesn't speak doublespeak and we're so used to seeing that as leadership," she says. "Or maybe it's because he's so short."

And yet the universe has been going his way lately. Even his old kooky ideas are looking pretty good these days. His decision to allow Cleveland to default instead of selling its electric-utility company cost him re-election and landed him in a book about the worst mayors in American history, but he was later honored by the city council for refusing to sell, a move that saved customers nearly $200 million over 10 years. More inconceivable, less than two years ago, his office was visited by a stunning 6-ft.-tall Julianne Moore look-alike 31 years his junior, a Brit who was working for the American Monetary Institute. After some smooth wooing on his part ("I gave her a copy of my Department of Peace legislation and my e-mail address") and one date (at MacLaine's house), she agreed to marry him. If that happened to you, you'd think you could be President too.

Kucinich said he knew after that first meeting that Elizabeth would be his third wife: "I went up to Stephanie Tubbs Jones [Ohio Democratic Congresswoman], and I said, 'I met her.' And Stephanie said, 'Shut up!'" Now with his new bride constantly at his side, Kucinich has picked up his campaigning a little. Speaking to the Rainbow/PUSH Coalition, he broke into Sixteen Tons (standing ovation from Jesse Jackson; four stars on YouTube). At an event in Nevada, Kucinich ended his speech with his new move: after listing his goals, he asks, "Why is it I'm able to do this?" Then he puts his arms out and spins, waiting for someone to yell, "No strings!" Once someone does, he twirls more and then yells, "A President with no strings!" (five stars on YouTube).

Kucinich will run all the way, waiting for that moment when he transforms from punch line to President. And he insists that he isn't frustrated that it hasn't happened yet. "Not at all," he says. "The real test of power is whether you can endure the setbacks and still meet each day with integrity and courage." That, though, is the test of moral fiber, not the test of power. The test of power is whether you can persuade others to do your will. And it may be that an earnest man with progressive ideas who still can't make a decent campaign poster will always fail that test.

Susan Collins May Be Vulnerable, But Don't Underestimate Her (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, March 5, 2007

If you listen to Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) talk for a few minutes, you are likely to think that she doesn't have the toughness and quickness to hold off her likely Democratic challenger, Rep. Tom Allen.

Well, stop thinking that way.

I don't know whether Collins will be able to swim against a potentially strong anti-President Bush, anti-Iraq War current in 2008, but at this point, I'm certainly not going to bet against her.

Collins was the third moderate Republican woman elected to the Senate from Maine in a 30-year period, following in the footsteps of the late Margaret Chase Smith (elected to her final term in 1966) and Olympia Snowe (first elected in 1994), who currently occupies the state's other Senate seat.

A native of Caribou, Collins worked for two GOP moderates, former Maine Gov. John McKernan and former Sen. Bill Cohen, before taking a job as Massachusetts' deputy treasurer. She returned to her home state to run for governor in 1994, finishing a disappointing third behind Joe Brennan (D) and the winner, Independent Angus King.

Two years later, she ran for Cohen's open Senate seat. Her prospects didn't look good, but she won a three-way primary for the Republican nomination and went on to defeat Brennan, 49.2 percent to 43.9 percent in the 1996 general election.

DOJ_NMG_0139468

More notable is that Collins drew 298,422 votes in that race at the same time that her party's presidential candidate, then-Sen. Bob Dole (Kan.), was drawing just 186,378 votes (30.8 percent). Collins ran an incredible 18.3 points ahead of Dole and garnered 112,000 more votes than he did.

Collins' strength that year, in an open seat and a hostile environment for Republicans, suggests that she ran a good race and had considerable personal appeal. It also confirmed the state's reputation for independence.

Six years after she was first elected to the Senate, Collins went on to pummel 2002 Senate opponent Chellie Pingree (D), who was then a state legislator and widely viewed as a credible challenger.

Collins won that second term with 58.4 percent, winning all five of the state's largest counties — Androscoggin (Lewiston-Auburn), Cumberland (Portland), Kennebec (Augusta and Waterville), Penobscot (Bangor and Orono) and York (Kennebunk, Biddeford and Saco). In the presidential election two years earlier, Bush won only one of those counties (Penobscot), and he did so with less than 50 percent of the vote. Collins won York and Penobscot, the most Republican of the five, with more than 60 percent of the vote.

If Allen runs, he almost certainly will be a threat to the Senator all the way until Election Day.

A former Rhodes Scholar with an undergraduate degree from Bowdoin College and a law degree from Harvard, Allen is serving his sixth term in Congress. He served on the non-partisan Portland City Council, including a term as mayor (appointed by his fellow councilmembers).

In his initial Congressional race, Allen won a heavily contested primary against Dale McCormick, an openly gay liberal state Senator who helped found the Maine Lesbian and Gay Political Alliance. The primary was widely portrayed as a test of ideology and activism, with Allen the establishment and the moderate candidate and McCormick the insurgent and the liberal.

McCormick counted on her ideological message and intensely loyal base, and the outcome was extremely close. But Allen won the nomination 51.6 percent to 48.4 percent and went on to handily defeat the sitting Congressman, Jim Longley (R).

Since elected, Allen's liberal and organized labor interest group ratings have been at or near 100 percent. National Journal's ratings place him as the 86th most liberal Member of the House in 2006, sandwiching him between Rep. Lucille Roybal-Allard (D-Calif.) and Rep. Robert Wexler (D-Fla.). In contrast, Collins ranked as the 46th most liberal Member of the Senate in 2006.

Once a reliable GOP bastion, Maine now at least leans Democratic. While Republicans control both of the state's Senate seats, Democrats sit in both House seats, occupy the governor's office and hold majorities in both chambers of the Legislature (though their majority in the state Senate is a paper-thin one seat).

The last Republican to carry the state for president was George H.W. Bush in 1988. Since then, the best GOP presidential showing was in 2004, when incumbent Bush won just 44 percent of Maine's vote.

Collins and Snowe seem to have discovered the formula for winning elections in Maine. Both of the moderate women come from the state's 2nd district — Snowe represented it in Congress, while Collins hails from it — and have been able to rally support in that more conservative part of the state, while at the same time neutralizing some of the Democrats' advantage in the normally more liberal 1st district.

Democrats no doubt will attack Collins for supporting the Bush agenda, as well as for breaking a two-term pledge. Some of those attacks may stick, but she will be able to cite a number of high-profile instances where she broke with the president or her GOP colleagues, including her "not guilty" votes on the articles of impeachment of former President Bill Clinton, her vote against opening the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to drilling and her generally moderate views on abortion.

Though it is early, Collins' electoral fate seems tied to whether Maine voters see her reelection as a referendum on Bush and the Iraq War or as a referendum on Collins herself. Since she has been able to run far ahead of other GOP candidates in the past, and since Bush won't be the party standard-bearer during the 2008 general election, Collins begins with the edge. But Democrats will come after her aggressively, and she must expect a difficult contest.

City Council Race Shows Changed Face Of Beverly Hills (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139469

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. -- When voters here go to the polls tomorrow, Jimmy Delshad is a favorite to be re-elected to the City Council. Under the city's system, he would also become mayor -- the first Iranian-born mayor of this glitzy city, known around the world more for its palm trees and movie stars than its sizable Jewish Iranian-American population.

At a time when tension between the U.S. and Iranian governments is on the rise, Mr. Delshad, a 66-year-old Jewish immigrant, is on the brink of becoming one of the highest-ranking Iranian-American elected officials in the U.S. So what are some of the political issues he feels most passionate about? Traffic-light timing, reducing sprinkler-water use at local parks and even beautifying the city's alleys.

"I want to make Beverly Hills one of the safest cities in the nation, in order to protect our residents and visitors," Mr. Delshad said in a recent interview. "Oh, and free wireless too."

Roughly 8,000 of the approximately 35,000 residents of Beverly Hills are of Iranian descent -- an influx that began in earnest nearly 30 years ago after the fall of the shah of Iran and has fundamentally changed one of America's most iconic cities. The sensitivity of the situation was underscored recently when the city, for the first time, printed its entire ballot in English and Farsi -- a move that prompted an outpouring of complaints, including a number from Iranian-Americans. (See a sample ballot.1)

See Beverly Hills' new English-Farsi ballot2.

Six candidates in tomorrow's election will be vying for two seats on the Beverly Hills City Council. Three are Persian. Mr. Delshad -- who changed his first name to Jimmy from Jamshid when he became a U.S. citizen -- first won election to the City Council in 2003. If re-elected, he would become mayor; council members rotate the job each year, based on seniority.

While Mr. Delshad effectively mobilized the Persian community to vote in larger numbers than ever before during his 2003 campaign, he has said this race should be tougher. As an incumbent, he has received the endorsement of both of the city's local newspapers. However, in a small city like Beverly Hills, which traditionally sees a low voter turnout, results can be unexpected.

A former computer entrepreneur, Mr. Delshad says he's not fazed by seeking a high-profile role at a time when the U.S. and Iran are facing off on the world stage. "It doesn't keep me up at night," he says. "This is the bed I made and I'm going to sleep in it." A registered Democrat, Mr. Delshad declined to comment on the global issues surrounding Iran.

He prefers to focus on challenges facing other small-town mayors, like traffic congestion and development. But because Beverly Hills is so prominent, he's also keenly interested in securing the city against possible terrorist strikes. He wants to increase video surveillance in public spaces and continue to add license-plate scanners to police vehicles.

At times, he has worried for his own safety. In 2003, during his first City Council campaign, Mr. Delshad hired three bodyguards after he received written death threats in his native Farsi language. He also carried a panic button that could summon local police. He says he never knew who was behind the threats or why he received them, but he kept the bodyguards for a few months even after he was elected.

While there have been other Iranian-born candidates for public office, Mr. Delshad's election would be a watershed, says Trita Parsi, president of the National Iranian American Council, in Washington. "This is a man with long ties in the community who has risen through the process," Dr. Parsi says. Mr. Delshad has lived in the U.S. nearly 50 years, the last 18 in Beverly Hills.

The demographics of today's Beverly Hills are a far cry from days past. Early residents included Douglas Fairbanks and Mary Pickford who built their "Pickfair" mansion here in 1919; Charlie Chaplin, Gloria Swanson and Buster Keaton also called the city home. Its first honorary mayor was humorist Will Rogers.

Hollywood stars and executive moguls still live here today. But beginning with the Islamic Revolution in 1979, thousands of Iranians -- most of them Jewish -- immigrated to the city and over the next few years sent for relatives. Once here, the immigrants retained strong family bonds and connections, often keeping them from integrating into the larger community, Mr. Delshad and others say.

Disputes have surfaced in zoning battles over so-called "Persian Palaces," large homes decorated in a sometimes gaudy style that some said clashed with the surroundings. The city found compromises, some brokered by Mr. Delshad. In 2004, the city passed an ordinance that greatly restricted the proliferation of such structures, by offering specific design choices and a review board for new homes.

The split in the community was nowhere more evident than at Sinai Temple, a 101-year-old conservative Jewish congregation a few blocks west of city limits. Today, Persian members account for nearly half of its 1,900 families, says its rabbi,

DOJ_NMG_0139470

David Wolpe. The influx of Persian families caused tensions and some longtime congregants left the temple. Everyone else self-segregated, sitting on opposite sides of the aisle, he says.

In 1999, Mr. Delshad was elected president of the temple, which he says may be the first time an Iranian-American has led a temple founded and previously run by European Jews. "Jimmy's presidency here was a way of saying that you can have a Persian president of an American synagogue and the sky doesn't fall," says Mr. Wolpe.

Today, both he and Mr. Delshad say, assimilation of the cultures has reduced the tensions at the temple and in Beverly Hills. "The fact that Persians have been in the community for many years now and have issues they're concerned with -- things like their kids and zoning issues -- requires them to get more involved in things that affect their lives," Mr. Wolpe adds.

Mr. Delshad, born in the southern Iranian city of Shiraz, came to the U.S. in 1958, following his brother, then a college student, to Mankato, Minn. Their father, a jeweler and goldsmith in Iran, would later join his sons in the U.S.

Mr. Delshad took university-extension courses and worked as a janitor to make ends meet. He and two brothers eventually formed the "Delshad Trio" playing the santur, a Persian string instrument. They moved to Los Angeles's growing Iranian community, playing music as they put themselves through college.

After graduating with a degree in electrical engineering, Mr. Delshad joined a fledgling computer firm. For about two decades, he ran his own computer-hardware company, which he sold in 1999, when he became president of the temple. Married 38 years, he is the father of two grown children.

The recent dustup over the Farsi ballot demonstrated that, despite strides the Iranian community has made, its presence can still be a lightning rod. City Hall has received about 300 complaints since absentee ballots went to voters at the beginning of last month, says Byron Pope, the city's clerk, who decided to translate the ballots into Farsi. (A separate Spanish ballot is available, too.) Mr. Pope says he made the move in consultation with an outside election-services firm and was complying with the federal Voting Rights Act, which says that a jurisdiction that has more than 5% of its voting-age population in "a single language group" should have a ballot available in that language. In the 2005 city election, some information was translated into Farsi, but not the entire ballot, he says.

For Mr. Delshad, the ballot issue was a "blip that most people have gotten over." Traffic, he says, is the true Beverly Hills issue of the day.

Justice Restored (WP)

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

IT ATTRACTED little notice, but Virginia's legislature took a big step last month toward reforming the antediluvian rules that make adequate legal representation a pipe dream for many poor defendants in serious criminal cases.

Alone among states, Virginia until now has set ironclad caps on the fees paid to court-appointed defense attorneys, caps that cannot be waived under any circumstances, even by judges. The capped fees are so low that often the effect is to force defense lawyers to work for peanuts or discourage them from working enough, in all but the most open-and-shut cases.

For instance, a court-appointed lawyer representing an indigent client facing life in prison would be paid a maximum of just $1,235, even if the case went to trial and dragged on for weeks, requiring scores or hundreds of hours of legal work. In less serious felony cases, capped compensation is even more ludicrous: $445 for attorneys representing poor defendants facing prison terms of up to 20 years. (The exception is death penalty cases, which are not subject to a cap.)

This sorry state of affairs is shockingly common because a large majority of criminal defendants cannot afford legal representation and about half live in jurisdictions without public defender offices and must rely on court-appointed lawyers.

After years of shrugging off the problem, the General Assembly finally addressed it last month, thanks to the bipartisan efforts of Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat, and Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell, a Republican. With scarcely a murmur of opposition, lawmakers approved a measure to raise the caps for court-appointed lawyers handling adult felony cases -- and, far more significantly, to allow the caps to be waived with judicial approval.

The legislation is not perfect and would benefit from amendments that Mr. Kaine ought to offer. Under the bill as written, the no-waiver rule would remain for cases involving defendants under the age of 18 if they are tried in juvenile court, as well as for misdemeanor cases in district courts. In both instances it is possible to imagine scenarios under which the fee caps now in place would discourage court-appointed lawyers from mounting vigorous defenses.

DOJ_NMG_0139471

What's more, real reform is still at least a year off as a matter of practice. Since the courts could not determine the probable cost of the higher caps and waivers, lawmakers appropriated an extra $8 million, a token amount; the understanding is that fee data collected under the new rules in the coming year will allow for a more precise estimate of actual costs and a more realistic appropriation.

As Mr. McDonnell pointed out, any justice system will not work unless both sides of a criminal case are represented by competent, fairly compensated attorneys. Until now too many defendants in Virginia were denied that basic right. Now, at least, there is the real prospect of a fix.

Bush Poised To Counter Chávez (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon And Matt Moffett

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

President Bush travels to Latin America this week to take on Hugo Chávez's militant brand of economic populism. But the weakened U.S. president could spend much of the trip defending against charges his own economic policies have helped shortchange the region.

In a speech in Washington today, Mr. Bush is expected to lay out a central theme of his Latin America tour -- that democracy is key to improving life for the millions of working poor in the region. As an example, he is expected to cite the Millennium Challenge Account, a U.S. government-sponsored program set up in 2004 to channel aid to poor countries that meet certain democratic standards. During his trip, which begins Thursday, he also is expected to tout an agreement with Brazil to spread production of ethanol throughout the region, as a way of promoting greater prosperity -- and countering the influence of Venezuelan President Chavez's oil wealth.

Mr. Bush's message seeks to respond to widespread complaints in the region that globalization and international-development policies -- of which he is viewed by many there as a main champion -- have done little to improve the lives of ordinary people there. The president also hopes to use the democracy theme to push back against what he views as Mr. Chávez's authoritarian tendencies.

Mr. Bush won't venture into any countries that have moved into Mr. Chávez's sphere of influence, including Argentina, Bolivia, Ecuador and Nicaragua. Instead, he plans during his weeklong trip to visit five generally friendly countries: Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico.

Mr. Chávez and his allies are preparing a typical street-theater response to Mr. Bush's visit. Argentina's President Nestor Kirchner has invited Mr. Chávez to a public demonstration, most likely in Buenos Aires, that probably will coincide with Mr. Bush's visit to neighboring Uruguay at the end of the week.

Mr. Chávez has also been talking up confrontation with Mr. Bush on his daily radio program. He has alleged that Mr. Bush will use his latest trip to weaken the South American common market, known as Mercosur, that Mr. Chávez wants to use to promote trade and investment ties among members and to counteract U.S. dominance in the region. Besides Venezuela, Mercosur's members include Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay and Paraguay.

In Brazil, labor unions and social groups plan protests against Mr. Bush. Demonstrations are likely in Venezuela and elsewhere in the region.

Mr. Chávez has his own problems. Many in Latin America view the Venezuelan leader as a meddler with militaristic tendencies. A regionwide poll taken in December by the Latinobarometro firm of Santiago, Chile, found that 39% of Latin Americans viewed both Messrs. Bush and Chávez negatively -- a level of disapproval exceeded among the region's leaders only by Cuba's Fidel Castro, Mr. Chávez's ally and mentor.

The prospect of further conflict between Messrs. Bush and Chávez threatens to distract from the U.S. president's efforts to rebuild ties to the region, which have suffered given the U.S. focus on terrorism and the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0139472

The most important stop for Mr. Bush may be Brazil, the largest Latin economy, where he is scheduled to meet with President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva. In São Paulo, South America's biggest city, Mr. Bush is expected to take a firsthand look at the region's poverty, underscoring his concern for economic development.

Mr. Bush aims to accelerate his drive for alternative fuels by announcing a partnership with Brazil to broaden the global market for ethanol. The plan envisions production across Latin America and the Caribbean, as well as greater standardization. Mr. da Silva is expected to seek lower U.S. tariffs on Brazil's sugar-based ethanol, but prospects of that are slim in Congress.

Beyond ethanol, Mr. Bush "wants to maintain [Mr. da Silva] as a mediator in Latin America and a counterweight to Chávez," said Gilberto Dupas, a specialist in international relations at the University of São Paulo. Despite Brazil's strong trade ties and cordial relations with Venezuela, Brazilians blame Mr. Chávez for encouraging Bolivian President Evo Morales to announce the nationalization of the country's oil industry last year.

Mr. Bush's next stop, Uruguay, could give him another wedge against Mr. Chávez and Mercosur. The U.S. has been seeking a free-trade agreement with Uruguay, and Mercosur would have to ease its rules to allow Uruguay to remain a member, if it strikes a deal with the U.S.

Mr. Bush is expected to get a warm reception in Colombia, where he is relatively popular. That is due largely to Plan Colombia, a U.S. military- and social-assistance program started under the Clinton administration.

In Guatemala, Mr. Bush is expected to toast early benefits of the Central American Free Trade Agreement, a regional, tariff-reducing pact ratified by Congress in 2005, as well as the country's progress toward building a democracy.

In Mexico, the country with the closest ties to the U.S., Mr. Bush is set to meet with recently inaugurated Mexican leader Felipe Calderón to discuss such sensitive issues as immigration. Hoping to nudge U.S. immigration reform, Mr. Calderón introduced a plan Tuesday aimed at providing better treatment to the Central Americans who come through Mexico's southern border.

Analysts said Mr. Calderón is likely to use the initiative to show that progress can be made on bilateral issues facing the U.S. and Mexico. That, in turn, could help Mr. Bush persuade Congress to pass a comprehensive immigration-reform bill that includes a guest-worker provision.

Chavez Calls Envoy 'Professional Killer' (AP)

By Elizabeth M. Nunez

AP, March 5, 2007

President Hugo Chavez on Sunday said he believes enemies including the CIA are out to kill him, and called U.S. diplomat John Negroponte a "professional killer."

Chavez said Venezuelan officials have intelligence that associates of jailed Cuban anti-communist militant Luis Posada Carriles also are involved in plotting to assassinate him.

He said the death plot idea has "gained weight" due to various factors, including the recent appointment of Negroponte, the former director of national intelligence, as deputy to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"Who did they swear in ... there at the White House as deputy secretary of state? A professional killer: John Negroponte," Chavez said.

Chavez did not elaborate, but his government has previously accused Negroponte of playing a key role in the Contra war against the leftist Sandinista government of Nicaragua when he served as ambassador to Honduras — a haven for clandestine Contra bases — from 1981 to 1985.

U.S. Embassy officials could not immediately be reached for comment, but they have denied Chavez's repeated accusations that they are plotting to oust him.

Chavez was asked about reports of assassination plots during a televised interview.

"They have assigned special units of the CIA, true assassins, who go around not only here in Venezuela, in Central America, in South America," Chavez said, without elaborating.

He added that while Posada Carriles, a former CIA operative, remains jailed in the U.S. on immigration charges, "Posada Carriles' people are very active in Central America and searching for contacts in Venezuela ... They are going around searching for explosives in large quantities, thinking about a sort of car bombing or searching for ground-to-air missiles, thinking about the presidential plane."

DOJ_NMG_0139473

Chavez did not give details. His government has demanded that the U.S. extradite Posada Carriles, a naturalized Venezuelan, to stand trial for allegedly masterminding the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner that killed 73 people. Posada Carriles denies involvement in that incident.

Chávez's Oil Largesse Winning Fans Abroad (CSM)

By Sara Miller Llana And Mark Rice-Oxley

The Christian Science Monitor, March 5, 2007

The London bus has come to symbolize many things over the years. It's a national icon, a picture postcard paragon of public transport, a byword for frustration and irregularity.

But a harbinger of international socialism? Far-fetched perhaps, but less so after the latest move by Venezuela's President Hugo Chávez to offer cut-rate fuel so that 250,000 Londoners on welfare can travel half-price throughout one of the world's most expensive cities.

The double-decker trademark isn't the only trace of Mr. Chávez's so-called "21st century socialism:" For the past year residents in New York, Boston, and other major US cities have scored cheaper heating bills, thanks to Venezuela. Chávez has also sent cheap oil to Cuba, Nicaragua, and more than a dozen other countries.

His offerings go beyond oil and have been announced with particular frenzy since he won a third term in December, promising $500 million in financing for Ecuador, $135 million for a dairy cooperative in Argentina, and a development plan in Nicaragua that includes generators to ease blackouts as well as a new development bank.

Analysts say his projects both in Latin America and beyond are singular among leaders sitting on vast energy reserves, as Chávez sets out to create a counterbalance to US dominance with a flurry of deals, measures, gifts, and grandiose schemes. To his harshest critics he's an egomaniac using an "energy bribe" to inflate his reputation. To fans he's the consummate humanitarian. Both agree that his moves have amounted to a PR coup, and some analysts even say the fallout could lead to a shift in social, economic, and political balances across the region.

"By situating Venezuela in these various international arenas of cooperation, the Chávez government is also attempting to limit what the US can do to isolate Venezuela," says Miguel Tinker-Salas, a Latin America oil and politics expert at Pomona College in California.

Certainly, providing subsidized oil to help residents pay bills and access public transportation has raised his visibility, cloaking him in the role of benefactor, says Larry Birns, director of the left- leaning Council on Hemispheric Affairs in Washington. "I think that these actions have projected an image for the average Latin American of great good will."

That has put pressure on other Latin American leaders, such as Brazil's Lula da Silva, for example. "I could easily see Lula throwing up his hands over Chávez's antics, but Lula regularly goes to Caracas hugging Chávez because he needs that for domestic consumption," says Mr. Birns.

It is this type of "demonstration effect," as Mr. Tinker-Salas calls it, that could ultimately prove lasting in the region and beyond.

In the US, Venezuela is sending oil subsidized at a 40 percent discount from the delivery price to 16 states – double from the year before – as well as 163 native American tribes. That represents 100 million gallons of fuel this winter. The program brochure describes it this way: "This is a people-to-people program that comes from the heart of Venezuela to the homes of American families who just can't pay their energy bills."

"In New York, residents wonder why a foreign country has to provide this. They want to know, 'Why can't you provide it? Or BP and Shell?' " says Tinker-Salas. "It's highlighting what those countries are not doing for their own populations."

That was the sentiment in November in a neighborhood called Las Torres, one of the poorest in Nicaragua's capital, Managua, which has been plagued by blackouts over the past year. "Light? Of course not," says Flor de Maria Flores, who regularly lights her home by candle, and, like so many of her neighbors, cooks over an open fire. She was vaguely aware of

DOJ_NMG_0139474

Chávez's plan to send discounted oil to her nation to help ease power blackout problems. "I'm glad someone is doing something about it," she says.

Chávez's latest scheme, signed by London's leftist mayor Ken Livingstone on Feb. 20, will save the city $32 million a year. In return, London transport chiefs will visit Caracas next month to advise on traffic management and urban planning. "The agreement with Venezuela is to use the energy cost contribution to alleviate the impact of high energy costs for some of the poorest Londoners," says a spokesperson for Mayor Livingstone.

But critics have questioned the logic of the deal. "I find it strange that the capital of a G-8 country is effectively receiving foreign aid from a poor country," says Richard Barnes, a Livingstone opponent in the Greater London Assembly. "Thirty-eight percent of [Venezuela's] people live below the poverty line and here [Venezuela] is subsidizing London's poor."

London joins a growing list of locales receiving Chávez largesse. Venezuela's oil has gone to at least 18 nations. Cheap oil is sent to needy Caribbean nations as part of Chávez's Petrocaribe initiative. Recently he pledged to send Nicaragua 10,000 barrels of discounted oil and oil products a day.

In its most obvious defiance against the US, Venezuela sends 100,000 barrels of oil a day to Cuba at subsidized rates. The projects go beyond oil. Venezuela gave Argentina $2.5 billion to pay off its debt to the International Monetary Fund (IMF) last year, and promised to help Bolivia to continue nationalizing key industries.

Programs strike a chord with the poor

Chávez's programs, especially in Latin America, have tapped into a widespread disenchantment with the free-market policies championed throughout most of the region in the past couple decades, a sentiment reflected by the recent electoral wins of Chávez allies, including longtime US foe Daniel Ortega in Nicaragua, Rafael Correa in Ecuador, and Evo Morales in Bolivia.

"I think that there has been significant erosion of US-Latin American dependence, psychological as well as actual dependence, on the US," says Birns.

Yet some say that his influence is overestimated. "He needs the US more than the US needs him," says Gal Luft, co-director of the conservative Institute for the Analysis of Global Security in Washington, an energy security think tank. "I don't think we should scare ourselves to death by what Hugo Chávez is doing," he says pointing out that Venezuela is the fourth biggest supplier of US crude imports.

An 'energy bribe'?

Mr. Luft dubs Chávez's moves an "energy bribe" and says that most leaders will leave his side when he runs out of money. "There is a great game going on now in Latin America, in which he is trying to pour a little oil money into every one of the chess squares," says Luft. "If someone offers you a gift, it's hard to turn down. Hugo Chávez does all kinds of things that make a lot of headlines but at the end of the day everyone knows who he is."

In fact, his popularity may have surged in pockets where residents are direct beneficiaries of his aid, but overall his popularity has not changed dramatically. According to a regional survey in late 2006 by Latinobarometro, a polling firm in Chile, respondents grouped Chávez, Cuba's Fidel Castro, and President Bush all as bad leaders.

Chávez's reputation also took a blow last fall when he failed to win a seat on the UN Security Council despite fierce lobbying, after he called President Bush "the devil" at the United Nations.

Michael Shifter, the vice president for policy at the Inter-American Dialogue in Washington who is coming out with a report this week on the challenges the Chávez administration poses to US policy makers, says that Chávez is able to point out what is wrong with Latin America, but his direction is not necessarily a solution. "He offers a seductive project, and his appeal is totally understandable. His gift is to tap into ... this resentment toward the US, which has a real basis," says Shifter. "But I don't think Chávez has an answer to the problems either."

U.S. To Offer North Korea Face-Saving Nuclear Plan (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139475

WASHINGTON, March 4 — In an effort to make the best of newly murky intelligence about North Korea, Bush administration officials say they plan to tell the North's nuclear negotiators on Monday that Washington's doubts about how much progress the country has made in enriching uranium gives North Korea a face-saving way to surrender its nuclear equipment.

The new approach to solve a dispute over the existence and extent of a uranium program, which intelligence agencies say could have been developed using equipment that the North Koreans purchased from Pakistan, will come at a meeting with North Korea at the United Nations. It is the first session intended to hammer out a schedule under which North Korea is supposed to disable its main nuclear plant and then account for all its nuclear programs.

Because the agreement includes providing North Korea with a million tons of fuel oil before it turns over its suspected arsenal of nuclear arms and fuel, some of President Bush's conservative allies have denounced it as a dangerous concession. Mr. Bush has called it a "first step," though it bears similarities to the kind of deal that the administration rejected in its first term.

On Sunday, Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, said that at the meeting he planned to "form an agenda to work on our bilateral relationship — what's involved in the establishment of diplomatic relations, what's involved before North Korea can get off the state-sponsor-of-terrorism list, and how to get them off the Trading with the Enemies Act." He said he would be "pressing for disclosure of all their nuclear programs, including highly enriched uranium."

Persuading North Korea to address that program will be particularly challenging — both because the North Koreans have denied seeking to enrich uranium and because a top American intelligence official told Congress last week that there was only moderate confidence that the equipment North Korea bought had been used. But that ambiguity, officials say, may give North Korea the chance to turn over its equipment with a vague explanation that an effort to produce energy, rather than a bomb, did not work out.

That is a very different tone than intelligence officials struck in November 2002, just after American officials told the North Koreans that they had discovered evidence of the purchase of centrifuges, the high-speed devices that enrich uranium, from Abdul Qadeer Khan, the head of Pakistan's nuclear program.

In an unclassified, single-page report distributed to members of Congress at the time, top agency officials, headed by George J. Tenet, then the director of the Central Intelligence Agency, reported, "We recently learned that the North is constructing a plant that could produce enough weapons-grade uranium for two or more nuclear weapons per year when fully operational — which could be as soon as mid-decade."

On Friday, three days after the testimony of Joseph DeTrani, the North Korea coordinator for the director of national intelligence, suggesting doubts about the current state of the program, Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan and the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, sent a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates seeking more answers.

"Is this still the intelligence community's assessment?" he asked of the 2002 report. "If not, why, and when did the intelligence community revise this assessment? What is the current intelligence community assessment?"

He also asked what underlay the conclusion that an enrichment plant was under construction.

US, North Korea Begin Thaw In Relations (AFP)

AFP, March 5, 2007

Landmark US-North Korea talks on normalizing relations were to get underway Monday amid questions in Washington over whether US intelligence had exaggerated Pyongyang's nuclear threat.

US officials were cautioning that the talks in New York are only a small first step towards establishing diplomatic ties and that North Korea needs to meet a series of denuclearization benchmarks in order to end a half century of enmity between the two states.

Washington's chief negotiator, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, and his North Korean counterpart, Kim Kye-gwan, will kick off the meetings with a dinner Monday night at a New York hotel and then hold a full day of talks on Tuesday, US officials said.

The talks come as the International Atomic Energy Agency said the UN atomic watchdog's chief Mohamed ElBaradei will travel to North Korea on March 13 to discuss how to monitor its promised dismantling of nuclear facilities.

DOJ_NMG_0139476

"The plan is for Dr. ElBaradei to arrive in Beijing on March 12 and leave for North Korea on the 13th for a two-day visit," spokeswoman Melissa Fleming said.

The bilateral talks between Washington and Pyongyang meet a long-standing condition set by the reclusive communist regime for abandoning its nuclear ambitions, and could bring the two sides the closest ever since Korea was divided in the wake of World War II.

But they come amid controversy in Washington over whether US intelligence agencies overstated Pyongyang's alleged secret uranium enrichment program in 2002, and whether the agencies' ability to provide information on the North is adequate and reliable.

"We still don't have the intelligence community overall to give us, as policymakers, the information that we need to make good decisions in North Korea, Iran and other places," Republican Representative Peter Hoekstra said Sunday.

"You always make policy with imprecise information, but you know, there are some things that we've been disappointed with," he told the Fox News Sunday program.

"It's a concern about the leadership in the intelligence community, not the folks who are working this 24/7," Hoekstra added.

The talks Monday come as part of the six-nation deal reached February 13 to end North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

Under the multi-phase agreement, North Korea said it would shut down its main nuclear facility and begin steps towards giving up its nuclear weapons program in exchange for some 300 million dollars in aid and moves towards "full diplomatic relations" with the US.

While the rapid start to those normalization talks took many by surprise -- in 2002 President George W. Bush branded North Korea part of the "axis of evil" -- US officials stressed that the talks would yield no breakthroughs.

"Don't look at it as a meeting that's going to produce immediate results," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack last week.

He said the talks were more likely to focus on "organizational" issues like setting a framework and agenda for what are hoped will be ongoing discussions.

But observers of Bush administration foreign policy said this week's meetings turned an important page for Washington.

"In and of itself the meeting Monday is historic," said Joseph Cirincione, a North Korea and non-proliferation expert at the Center for American Progress.

Cirincione said the talks showed that, "In the end, the relationship with the US matters more to the North Koreans than their nuclear weapons."

But amid US lawmakers there was lingering concern over whether Washington could obtain enough and reliable information about what the Koreans are up to.

Last week Joseph DeTrani, the North Korea mission manager for the Directorate of National Intelligence told a Congress panel that US spy agencies are less confident now than they were in 2002 about accusations that Pyongyang was secretly enriching uranium.

"We still have confidence that the program is in existence -- at the mid-confidence level," told the US Senate Armed Services Committee.

The US accusations in 2002 that the North was running a secret uranium program, in addition to its declared plutonium-based nuclear operation, led to the collapse of a 1994 denuclearization deal with Pyongyang.

Subsequent tit-for-tat actions led to Pyongyang's atomic bomb test in October 2006, a move that some officials say might have been avoided.

On Sunday De Trani complained in a written statement about "considerable misinterpretation" of what he had told the panel.

"We have continued to assess efforts by North Korea since 2002," he said. "All intelligence community agencies have at least moderate confidence that North Korea's past efforts to acquire a uranium enrichment capability continue today."

N. Korea: Intelligence And Uncertainty (NSWK)

DOJ_NMG_0139477

By Michael Hirsh And Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

Intel analysis is an art, not a science—and one that sometimes depends on the politics of the moment. Last week the government's senior North Korea intel analyst, Joseph DeTrani, told Congress that American officials now had only "midlevel confidence" in the same intel that led the Bush administration to assert in 2002 the North was actively "enriching" uranium—and could have a bomb-making plant up and running soon. During a confrontation with Pyongyang officials in October 2002 over the North's secret program, the then Assistant Secretary of State Jim Kelly says he actually had little certainty. He told NEWSWEEK last week that the North Koreans themselves "gave no specifics about what kind of program they had." According to several current and former administration officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter, Kelly knew that Pyongyang was buying equipment for some 20 centrifuges from Pakistan in return for shipping Nodong missiles. He also had some tentative intel that the North Koreans might be building a factory. But "I don't think it was known then and apparently it's not known now what they've done with this stuff they've bought," Kelly said. The rest was creative interpretation, especially a CIA assessment to Congress that said the North was building a plant to make weapons-grade uranium that could be "fully operational" by "mid-decade."

Now, post-Iraq, the intel community is more cautious. And with the administration eager to pursue an aid-for-nukes agreement with Kim Jong Il, there's less interest in putting the worst possible spin on what is known. CIA spokesman Paul Gimigliano says the agency stands by its earlier assessment, saying "the classified assessments ... contain far more detail."

Kim Jong Il's Word (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

North Korean officials arrived in New York over the weekend for discussions on normalizing relations with the U.S. as part of the nuclear disarmament accord struck last month. Chief U.S. negotiator Christopher Hill is scheduled to meet today and tomorrow with his counterpart, Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan.

May we suggest that, before he sits down, Mr. Hill take a look at the brief statement issued quietly Thursday by the United Nations Development Program (UNDP). There is no better guide to Kim Jong Il's negotiating style, nor to the North Korean dictator's habit of breaking his word. Nuclear negotiators, beware.

The agency announced, in an item on its Web site, that it is suspending all operations in North Korea because the "necessary conditions set out by the Executive Board on 25 January 2007 have not been met." The UNDP's 20 or so projects will be shut down, we're told, and its eight international staffers will be pulled out of the country. The U.N. isn't known for its tough love, and no one we've talked to can recall another example of the UNDP suspending operations in a country that refused to comply with the regulations.

The "necessary conditions" were imposed at the last board meeting in response to an outcry over the UNDP's lack of oversight over its programs in North Korea. U.N. documents, produced reluctantly after prodding by the U.S. mission to the U.N., showed numerous irregularities dating back into the late 1990s. Tens of millions of dollars for programs that were supposed to help the poor appear instead to have been handed over to Kim's dictatorship.

As the March 1 deadline for compliance approached, North Korea decided to throw a tantrum to see if it could get excused from its obligations. It deemed the conditions politically motivated -- especially the one that limits aid to programs that directly help the people and bans assistance that could aid the government -- and demanded a renegotiation.

Never mind that North Korea sits on the Executive Board and had agreed to abide by the terms thrashed out in January. To its credit, the UNDP refused to be bullied into extending the deadline and is holding Pyongyang to its commitments. The suspension applies to all existing projects; the board had already suspended new projects until an audit could be completed and better oversight provided.

The U.N. has another deadline fast approaching in North Korea. At the end of January, Secretary General Ban Ki Moon ordered a full investigation of all U.N. programs in North Korea, to be completed within three months. Those include Unicef, the World Food Program and the U.N. Population Fund. As the end-of-April deadline for that audit comes closer, it will be instructive to watch Pyongyang's degree of cooperation.

DOJ_NMG_0139478

Meanwhile, the talks on North Korea's nuclear program are moving ahead, with the U.S., South Korea and Japan all holding bilateral meetings with Pyongyang this month toward the goal of normalizing relations. At the top of Japan's agenda is the whereabouts of its citizens who were kidnapped by North Korean agents in the late 1970s and 1980s and forced to train North Korean spies. Negotiations with Pyongyang have so far yielded the return of only five abductees along with preposterous explanations for how the rest have supposedly died.

The preference in some diplomatic circles, including the U.S. State Department and perhaps now in the White House, is to dismiss the U.N. corruption in North Korea as well as the abductee and other human-rights violations as side-issues to the more vital objective of getting Kim to give up his nuclear program.

We'd argue that international focus on these issues is an essential part of keeping up the pressure on Kim's regime. But even if you buy the argument that these are ancillary issues, there's still an important lesson here: If Kim won't abide by the pledges he made regarding UNDP aid to his country, how can he be expected to keep his promises on nuclear disarmament?

Former U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John Bolton lays out the troubling case of changing American intelligence judgments toward North Korea on the opposite page. His point about the need for an intrusive inspection and verification regime is especially important. Under the six-party agreement announced on February 13, North Korea has 60 days to account for all of its nuclear programs. If it doesn't, or if Kim attempts to renegotiate the terms at the last minute, we'd like to think the U.S. would show at least as much fortitude as the United Nations, and tell Kim to take a hike.

Key Lawmakers Complain Of Weak Intelligence (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

American intelligence agencies are not providing adequate information for Congress to make policy decisions on key foreign-policy areas including Iran and North Korea, according to the top House Republican on the issue.

"We still don't have the intelligence community overall to give us, as policy-makers, the information that we need to make good decisions in North Korea, Iran and other places," said Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, the ranking Republican on the House Select Committee on Intelligence.

When told by "Fox News Sunday" host Chris Wallace that he was making a "pretty striking indictment" of the intelligence community, Mr. Hoekstra said, "Well, it is."

Mr. Hoekstra blamed the bureaucratic leadership in the intelligence community for what he said are delays in implementing necessary reforms after September 11 and intelligence failures in Iraq.

"We've had problems in standing this up and developing more bureaucracy, and it's a concern about the leadership in the intelligence community, not the folks who are working this 24/7," he said.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat and her party's second-ranking member on the intelligence panel, acknowledged the difficulty of obtaining workable intelligence from Iran and North Korea, but praised the administration for diplomatic progress with both regimes.

"I am very pleased to see the shift in the administration," she said during her own appearance on "Fox News Sunday." "When Secretary [of State Condoleezza] Rice came before the Senate Appropriations Committee and talked about this regional summit in which the United States would take part and the G-8 nations, I think that's exactly the way to go, to bring the light of day and the preponderance of nations into this effort."

Meanwhile, several leading Democrats said they are building support for a bill that would overturn the original Iraq war resolution. Still, they remain short of the 60 votes necessary to block a Republican filibuster.

"If we can focus on this purpose -- keeping American troops out of the middle of a civil war with the understanding that there needs to be a limited mission that remains after that -- I believe we can get almost all the Democratic votes, plus we can pick up some Republican votes," said Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat and Senate Armed Services Committee chairman, during an appearance on CBS' "Face the Nation."

DOJ_NMG_0139479

"We want to change it, to have a much more narrow focus," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, during an appearance on ABC's "This Week." "We have a very broad consensus. We're hoping to get close to unanimity, like we did on the surge resolution, that requires the president to change that mission."

However, one leading U.S. commander said the surge was showing progress and could be completed within a year.

"We're starting to see some progress, but it's very slow," Maj. Gen. Raymond Odierno, the No. 2 U.S. military commander in Iraq, said in an interview with CNN's "Late Edition."

"I think that will take some time. I don't want to put an exact time on it but a minimum of six to nine months."

Sen. Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, told ABC that the various resolutions to force a withdrawal of U.S. forces or the troop "surge" are just represent "Congress trying to micromanage the situation."

"When the going gets tough, they're trying to figure out how to get out. And they can't get their act together on how to defund the troops, so they're having all these different approaches. ... I mean, they can't get it together."

North Korea Climbdown (WSJ)

By John R. Bolton

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

Washington's most important person -- the Anonymous Senior Official ("ASO") -- was busy last week, briefing reporters on North Korea's uranium enrichment program.

The North's pursuit of nuclear weapons through uranium enrichment, an alternative to reprocessing plutonium from spent fuel at the Yongbyon reactor, constituted both a material breach of the 1994 Agreed Framework and an enormous challenge to the hope that it could ever be negotiated out of pursuing nuclear weapons. Based, however, on one public comment and much work by Mr./Ms. ASO, the media last week set about deconstructing a critical strategic concern underlying Bush administration Korea policy. According to their breathless reporting, yet another threat to America was disappearing, revealed as simply more intelligence hype from an administration that apparently did little else in its first term.

The reports raise three separate issues. First, what exactly is the intelligence judgment about North Korea's enrichment activities, and how valid was it in 2002? Second, what are the implications for the administration's ongoing negotiations with North Korea? And third, is Mr./Ms. ASO speaking for the Bush administration, or for those elements in the permanent bureaucracy that have consistently opposed key elements of the Bush foreign policy, at least as conducted until recently?

On the first question, concerning North Korea's enrichment activities, there is actually less here than meets the eye. The only attributable public comment is from Joseph DeTrani, mission manager for North Korea for the Director of National Intelligence, who said that he now had a "mid-confidence level" about North Korea's program, down from "high confidence." Mr. DeTrani's testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee recounted how, in October 2002, the U.S. confronted Pyongyang "with information they were acquiring material sufficient for a production-scale capability of enriching uranium," and how North Korea "admitted to having such a program." Mr. DeTrani continued, "we've never walked away from that issue." Indeed, in 2002, intelligence community officials told me that new evidence erased existing, long-standing disagreements within the community about what the North was up to since the mid-1990s, producing a remarkable consensus that has not, to my knowledge, broken down since.

Neither in Mr. DeTrani's testimony, nor in any of Mr./Ms. ASO's backgrounding, is there any reversal on actual facts, only an apparent shift in the "confidence level." My understanding is that the decrease in confidence stems from the absence of significant new or contemporary information about North Korea's activities. This lack of new information may be attributable to a loss of sensitive sources and methods, or it may be attributable to the effectiveness of President Bush's Proliferation Security Initiative, or its creative financial sanctions, in drying up North Korea's procurement activity. But there has been no suggestion that the intelligence from 2002 and earlier has been contradicted or discredited. Mr. DeTrani's testimony is expressly to the contrary. Indeed, on Saturday he reiterated this precise point in a second public statement.

Moreover, as Donald Rumsfeld likes to say, "the absence of evidence is not evidence of absence." If we lack new intelligence, analysts should say so explicitly, and policy makers can draw appropriate conclusions, one of which might well be that the North is simply better at concealing its clandestine nuclear activities, not that those activities don't exist. What analysts should not do is to cast doubt on earlier intelligence, or change confidence levels, if there are no other reasons to do so. In any event, there is nothing here to allow anyone to conclude that the 2002 intelligence conclusions were flawed or hyped.

DOJ_NMG_0139480

This raises the second issue. Mr./Ms. ASO's backgrounding is really about the ongoing six-party talks, and less about what happened in 2002. In any arms-control negotiation, the need for verification is directly correlated to the propensity of the other side to lie, cheat and conceal its undesirable activities. In the present case, the greater the likelihood that North Korea will make commitments it has absolutely no intention of following, the more intrusive and pervasive should be the verification mechanism we insist on. Determining in this or any other case how invasive the verification process must be obviously depends in large part on the historical record.

North Korea's aggressive mendacity puts it near the top of the list, perhaps tied with Iran for the lead, of countries that need the most transparent, most intrusive, most pervasive verification systems. For America to agree to anything less would be to make our national security, and that of close friends and allies like Japan, dependent on North Korea's word -- never a safe bet. And yet, it is precisely this extensive verification system that the North cannot accept, because the transparency we must require would threaten the very rock of domestic oppression on which the North Korean regime rests. North Korea's negotiators understand this contradiction. So do ours.

The only way around this problem is to conclude it doesn't exist, or is so minimal it can be "fixed" in negotiations. That's why Mr./Ms. ASO was busy, laying the foundation to argue that further deals with North Korea do not require much, if any, verification beyond what little the International Atomic Energy Agency can provide. If we continue this approach, what is already a bad deal will become a dangerous deal, whether we make it with North Korea directly or in the six-party talks. (As Nick Eberstadt has put it, a bad agreement with six parties is no better than a bad agreement with two parties.)

And that brings us to the third issue: Where exactly is the administration headed? Mr./Ms. ASO's identity is by definition unknown, but the view is spreading that this backgrounding is more than the bureaucracy's ruminations. I have my own unnamed senior officials who tell me it's not so, but the question remains. President Bush himself must speak, and sooner rather than later, to tell us what he thinks of the intelligence, and the direction of his own policy. Recent polls show his approval rating near 30%, with support among Republicans falling precipitously. If the president's conservative base erodes further, where will his support come from? From liberal editorialists enthusing about his newfound foreign policy "pragmatism"? Based on my personal experience, the president will not have both.

Mr. Bolton is a senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute. and the author of "Surrender Is Not an Option: Defending America at the U.N. and Abroad," forthcoming this fall from Simon & Schuster.

Saudi-Iran Meeting Yields Little Substance (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia, March 4 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran and King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia concluded an extraordinary meeting early Sunday promising a thaw in relations between the two regional powers. But they stopped short of agreeing on any concrete plans to tackle the escalating sectarian and political crises throughout the Middle East.

Mr. Ahmadinejad said that the two countries had agreed to try to curb tensions between Shiite and Sunni Muslims and that they had discussed in detail issues related to the Palestinians and Iraq.

The leaders are believed to have focused on finding ways to end the political standoff in Lebanon between Hezbollah, backed by Iran, and the government of Fouad Siniora, which is supported by the United States.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's first official visit to Saudi Arabia, which began Saturday, was marked by decidedly public shows of warmth and friendship between the leaders, as the men embraced, at times held hands in an Arab sign of close friendship, and smiled to cameras. The event marked the culmination of months of diplomatic efforts between senior Saudi and Iranian officials to ease the political standoff in Lebanon, cool sectarian violence in Iraq and possibly avert a looming Iranian confrontation with the United States.

Analysts were divided on Sunday over the ultimate impact of the summit meeting, held at the behest of the Iranian president.

DOJ_NMG_0139481

To some, it promised to break the spiraling cycle of brinkmanship in the region, focusing both countries on constructive solutions to their differences.

Skeptics, however, said the absence of any tangible resolutions or initiatives, coupled with Mr. Ahmadinejad's continuing aggressive speech, suggested that the meeting was more a public relations offensive meant to help Iran improve its image at home and in the Arab world as its confrontation with the United States appears to be escalating.

On Saturday, diplomats from Germany and the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council discussed trying to impose tougher sanctions on Iran for its continued uranium enrichment efforts in defiance of the Security Council. The diplomats, speaking in a conference call, ended their discussion without an agreement.

But after Mr. Ahmadinejad landed in Tehran on Sunday, he repeated earlier warnings of a "conspiracy" to divide the Muslim world. This time, he included Saudi Arabia as one of his partners in resisting the plan.

"Both Iran and Saudi Arabia are aware of the enemies' conspiracies," Mr. Ahmadinejad told reporters. "We decided to take measures to confront such plots, and hopefully this will strengthen Muslim countries against oppressive pressures by the imperialist front."

Saudi officials had no comment about that. But there was conflict over another issue. The Saudi Press Agency reported that Mr. Ahmadinejad had expressed support for a Saudi-led land-for-peace initiative that would have Arab states recognize Israel in return for the establishment of a Palestinian state in the lands occupied by Israel in 1967. Arab foreign ministers meeting in Cairo on Sunday agreed to revive the plan ahead of the Arab League summit meeting in Riyadh later this month.

An Iranian official, speaking to Iran's state-run media, reportedly denied that the initiative was discussed during the summit meeting.

State Department officials on Sunday had no immediate comment on the meeting. But Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said Friday, before the talks, that "it's going to be up to the Saudi leadership to decide how they interact with the Iranian president."

Mr. McCormack said, "We would hope that they send a message to the Iranian president that across a wide spectrum the Iranian behavior in the region and around the world is just unacceptable, whether it's their support for terrorism or their pursuit for weapons of mass destruction or their efforts to block any sort of progress in building a democracy in Lebanon or in the Palestinian areas. We would hope that the message to the Iranian leadership is that they need to change their behavior."

A Saudi analyst with close ties to the government said, "In the end, they both know this is a geopolitical struggle," adding, "They can offer big words about ending sectarian strife, but what can they really do about it? Ahmadinejad simply undertook this visit to make himself look cooperative with other Persian Gulf states."

Mr. Ahmadinejad has come under increased pressure in recent weeks to tone down his comments. In Tehran on Saturday, Akbar Alami, a member of Parliament, said members intended to ask him to appear before them to answer questions about his policies. Mr. Alami said the lawmakers wanted to question his "provocative speeches, positions that are against diplomatic norms and against the country's national interests," the ISNA student news agency reported.

Sunni-Muslim Saudi Arabia and Shiite Iran have vied for regional dominance, each carrying the banner of Islam and seeing itself as defending its majority sect. At the same time, the region's calculus has changed significantly with the American invasion of Iraq and the fall of Saddam Hussein.

Saudi Arabia in recent months has led an aggressive diplomatic effort to counterbalance Iran's growing influence in the region, most recently serving as a host for the major Palestinian factions at a meeting in which they said they had agreed to form a unity government.

Saudi Arabia is also said to be working to bring Lebanese parties together to arrive at a peaceful settlement of the three-month crisis. An important part of the discussion on Saturday, some analysts said, was how to bring Syria back into the Arab fold after two years of isolation.

For much of the 1980s, Saudi Arabia and Iran had an adversarial relationship. Their relations thawed with the election of a reformist president in Iran, Mohammad Khatami, in 1997. But relations have cooled significantly since the election of Mr. Ahmadinejad in 2005.

The meeting on Saturday, though initiated by Iran, was an example of Saudi Arabia's muscle-flexing in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0139482

"Saudi Arabia did what people have been asking the U.S. to do for so long, which is to extend a hand out to the Iranians," said Abdel Monem Said Aly, director of Al-Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo. "The Saudis seized on the right time to give the Iranians a window of opportunity to get out of their mess."

Mr. Aly said the test of a détente between Saudi Arabia and Iran is yet to come. "Will the Iranians be willing to give the Saudis what they didn't give the Europeans, which is to stop their nuclear activity?" he said. "That will be a litmus test."

Iran, Saudi Hail 'friendly' Meeting (FT)

By Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, March 5, 2007

Returning from Riyadh on Sunday after meeting King Abdullah, Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad said "friendly consultations" between Iran and Saudi Arabia would continue with the two countries sharing identical views on developments in Iraq.

Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's visit appeared designed to ease tensions between the leading powers of the Persian Gulf, mainly Sunni Muslim Saudi Arabia and mainly Shia Iran.

Suspicions have risen in recent months both over Iraq, where the Saudis are wary of a Shia Muslim-led government friendly with Iran, and over Iran's nuclear programme.

SPA, the official Saudi news agency, reported the two leaders had agreed "the greatest threats against the Muslim nation are attempts to spread strife" between Sunnis and Shias.

The two sides have also been at odds over Lebanon, where a Saudi-backed government faces an opposition led by Hizbollah, the Shia Muslim party allied to Tehran.

Nabih Berri, leader of Amal, a second Lebanese Shia group, was quoted on Sunday by Sharq al-Awsat newspaper that a deal on a national unity government could come "within 48 hours".

In Tehran, the state-owned Kayhan newspaper, which has criticised Saudi Arabia over alleged support for Sunni insurgents in Iraq, splashed Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's visit to Riyadh as the "centre of world attention".

The chances of Iran attending a conference in Baghdad later this month, at which the US will join other UN security council permanent members and Iraq's neighbours, also increased as Mohammad-Ali Husseini, Iran's foreign ministry spokesman, claimed the idea had come from Tehran.

Similar optimism was evident in Damascus, where al-Baath, newspaper of the ruling party of president Bashar al-Assad, said the conference could lead to direct talks between Syria, an ally of Iran, and the US.

The United Nations Security Council is due this week to consider imposing further sanctions on Iran after a series of discussions in the past few days among the five permanent members and Germany.

The US said that "a few outstanding issues" still needed to be resolved after the latest telephone conference between top diplomats from the six countries, on Saturday, adding that the issue would now move to New York.

South Africa, currently president of the Security Council, has said it expected a draft resolution to be discussed in the early part of this week.

The US shows little sign of lessening pressure on Iran, especially over its nuclear programme.

Dick Cheney, the US vice-president, said on Saturday that military force against Iran remained possible.

"It would be a serious mistake if a nation like Iran were to become a nuclear power," he warned during a visit to Australia. "All options are still on the table".

A report released on Monday by Oxford Research group, a London-based security think-tank, argues US attacks on Iran's nuclear facilities could encourage Iran to develop speedily a nuclear weapon.

Would Air Strikes Work? argues military strikes could not "both encompass all key facilities and be surgical and brief."

The author Frank Barnaby, a former scientist in Britain's atomic weapons programme, writes that attacks could embolden hardliners, bolster Iranian public support for the programme, and lead Iran to a crash programme for a bomb.

"If Iran devoted maximum effort and resources to building one nuclear bomb," he writes, "it could achieve this is a relatively short amount of time: less than the two years mooted as the time military strikes would set back the current programme."

DOJ_NMG_0139483

Iran President, Saudis Vow Cooperation (AP)

By Donna Abu-Nasr

AP, March 5, 2007

Following their first official talks in Saudi Arabia, the Iranian and Saudi leaders on Saturday pledged to fight the spread of sectarian strife in the Middle East, which they said was the biggest danger facing the region.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and King Abdullah also stressed the importance of maintaining Palestinian unity and bringing security to Iraq, the official Saudi Press Agency said.

The agency quoted Ahmadinejad as saying he supported Saudi efforts to calm the situation in Lebanon and end its political crisis. Iran supports Lebanon's Shiite Hezbollah group, which is trying to topple the U.S.- and Saudi-backed government.

The talks between the two leaders have been touted as a possible means to defuse sectarian tensions in Iraq and Lebanon, and prevent Iran from sliding further into isolation.

"The two leaders asserted that the greatest danger threatening the Muslim nation at the present time is the attempt to spread strife between Sunni and Shiite Muslims and that efforts should be exerted to stop such attempts and close ranks," the Saudi Press Agency said.

Iran and Saudi Arabia have had chilly relations since the 2005 election of Ahmadinejad, whose refusal to suspend uranium enrichment has led to U.N. Security Council sanctions and made Iran's Arab neighbors increasingly wary of the country's nuclear program.

But Abdullah personally met Ahmadinejad at the airport before the two headed into a meeting. The king later threw a banquet in his guest's honor, the Saudi Press Agency said. The Iranian leader left Riyadh late Saturday after the talks.

Saudi and Iranian analysts said cooperation will benefit both countries, as well as the whole region. Shiite-majority Iran and Sunni-dominated Saudi Arabia are on different sides of the two conflicts that are threatening to ignite the Middle East — Iraq and Lebanon — and the Saudis have expressed concerns over Iran's nuclear program.

Dawood al-Shirian, a Saudi analyst, said the kingdom would not have agreed to receive Ahmadinejad "if it didn't know that the visit would add to its political achievements."

Top diplomats from the United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany were negotiating Saturday on possible new sanctions against Iran.

State Department spokesman Kurtis Cooper said in an e-mail late Saturday the diplomats had "a good discussion," although there was still work to be done on a few outstanding issues. He said the negotiations will now move to envoys at U.N. headquarters in New York.

A breakthrough on the Muslim sectarian divide could also pave way for the success of the March 10 conference in Baghdad of Iraq's neighbors — Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia — as well as the United States and other Western powers, and the annual Arab summit, which will be held at the end of the month in Riyadh.

"Iran has proved its capability of destabilization," wrote Ghassan Sharbil, the Lebanese editor of the Saudi-owned Al-Hayat daily. "Now, it's time to prove its ability to participate in creating stability."

"Ahmadinejad can invest in this summit to calm down the Arab world, the Islamic world and the whole globe in order to protect Iran against isolation, the dangers of an American strike and a new resolution by the Security Council," he added.

Riyadh broke off ties with Iran in 1988, accusing it of supporting terrorism and subversion. They were restored shortly after the 1991 Gulf War, but relations between Iran and Saudi Arabia plummeted again following Ahmadinejad's election in 2005.

Since then, Arab Gulf countries have offered quiet support for moves against Iran's nuclear program that the United States and its allies fear is aimed at creating weapons. Iran says its program is solely for peaceful purposes.

The chill in relations is partly due to Ahmadinejad's tough anti-Western talk, which has raised suspicions among Sunnis that Tehran is trying to expand its influence in the region.

"Since Ahmadinejad's harsh rhetoric is partly responsible for the cooling in relations, he is (now) taking this step to redress (the situation)," said independent Iranian writer Saeed Leylaz.

Saudi Arabia, Iran Target Mideast's Sectarian Discord (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0139484

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 5, 2007

TEHRAN, IRAN

The leaders of rival regional powers Iran and Saudi Arabia are vowing to curb the sectarian strife that is increasingly defining conflict across the Middle East.

The pledge to calm tensions, as Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad made his first official visit to meet Saudi King Abdullah in Riyadh on Saturday, illustrates the growing regional alarm over Shiite-Sunni violence. Sectarian bloodshed has soared in Iraq – often at the hands of allies and coreligionists of these rival nations – and is threatening stability in Lebanon.

Yet while both leaders prefer to blame outside actors for the increase in sectarian tension – their promises to support peace notwithstanding – elements in Iran and Saudi Arabia have helped to finance sectarian militias in Iraq and, in the case of the Saudis, engaged in heated sectarian rhetoric. Still the leaders stated that the "greatest danger" to Islam is the "attempt to fuel the fire of strife between Sunni and Shiite Muslims" and called for unity, the official Saudi Press Agency reported.

Mr. Ahmadinejad said the pair discussed "the plots carried out by the enemies in order to divide the world of Islam." The two leaders, he said, "were fully aware of the threats of our enemies and we condemned them."

The archconservative Iranian president was almost certainly referring to the US, which has accused elite Iranian units of supplying weapons to Shiite militias in Iraq to target American soldiers. The militias are behind many sectarian killings.

Though Saudi Arabia is a close US ally, some Saudis and other Sunni benefactors have backed Sunni insurgents and Al Qaeda in Iraq, which has fueled the civil war there. The Iran-Saudi promise to lower sectarian passions comes after months of public warnings against Iran's rising power.

"[Talks] with Saudi Arabia could allay Arab and US uneasiness," says Davoud Hermidas Bavand, a professor of international law at Alameh University in Tehran. "Before this new strategy, the main problem [in Iraq] was Sunni elements ... behind the scenes, Jordan, Egypt, and Saudi are supporting [them]," says Professor Bavand. "But there was a change: All of a sudden, Iran appears the main troublemaker in Iraq."

The White House, which charges that Iran's commitment to nuclear power is a cover to make atomic bombs, is adding pressure with saber rattling, often repeating that "all options are on the table." Sunni leaders have warned ominously of a destabilizing "Shiite crescent" in the region, though in Iraq the worst violence by far has been carried out by Sunni militants. Ahmadinejad's uncompromising rhetoric, in which he most recently compared Iran's drive for nuclear power to a hurtling train without brakes, has raised concern anew among Sunnis.

But to speak of a Sunni-Shiite divide is not so simple.

"Iran has historically, and clearly in recent times, wanted to pose as a Middle Eastern leader that stands up to more powerful world actors," says Joost Hiltermann, the Mideast director for the Brussels-based International Crisis Group. Iran's support of Shiites in Lebanon and Iraq is "awkward," he says, because Iran's ambitions go beyond mere sectarianism.

"[Iran] wants to have the greatest influence possible, and it can only do that if it is not a sectarian actor," says Mr. Hiltermann, contacted in Amman, Jordan. "It can be more effective if it does not play the Shiite card. [Iran] has every interest in talking to Saudi Arabia, to suppress that aspect of its rise."

The visit to Riyadh comes a week before Iraq's neighbors and the US will hold crisis talks in Baghdad. Iran's foreign ministry said Sunday that Iran had not yet decided to attend the meeting though it "would spare no effort" to help bring peace.

"What good is our [Islamic world's] common cause if we waste our energies and resources on self-destruction rather than self-preservation?" asked an editorial in the Saudi Gazette newspaper. "Mr. President, your visit signals your best intentions." But Sunni-Shiite reconciliation will not be easy.

As Iran is seen to back its fellow Shiites – as well as Sunni Palestinian groups like Hamas – aspects of Wahhabism, the extremist salafi ideology embraced in Saudi Arabia, lead to conflict. "Wahhabis regard Shiites as heretics," says Bavand in Tehran. "Political necessity requires containment of this behavior. But the rise of militant Wahhabism is a sore point for Shiites." Indeed, visceral anti-Shiite preaching hasn't vanished from Saudi Arabia, where two clerics in January called Shiites "the most vicious enemy of Muslims."

DOJ_NMG_0139485

By contrast, Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Sayed Ali Khamenei, delivered a warning in mid-January to a group of Sunni and Shiite clerics. He warned that "the colonial front" (meaning the US and Israel) was seeking to play up sectarian differences. "The issue is not that Shiites and Sunnis should accept one another's beliefs, [but] they should not listen to the enemy's enticements," Ayatollah Khamenei said. "They should not be enemies."

Palestinian Leaders Try To Resolve Split Over Key Posts (NYT)

By Isabel Kershner

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

JERUSALEM, March 4 — Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president and the leader of the Fatah faction, arrived in Gaza on Sunday to meet with Ismail Haniya, the caretaker prime minister from Hamas, in another effort to iron out differences over a possible Palestinian unity government.

Spokesmen from Fatah and Hamas expressed hopes over the weekend that the new government would be formed this week. But nearly a month after agreeing at Mecca, Saudi Arabia, to create a new government, Hamas and Fatah still disagree on important posts, including interior minister.

The problem is not just the Interior Ministry portfolio, which controls some of the Palestinian Authority security services, but also the potential inclusion of representatives of other factions that are considered terrorist groups by the United States. Nor is it clear that the factions are agreed on a political document that is supposed to guide the government's work.

Fatah and Hamas signed the Mecca agreement on Feb. 8, paving the way for a unity government. Under the terms of the agreement, Hamas can nominate an independent candidate for the Interior Ministry, but the appointment has to be approved by Fatah. Two candidates proposed by Hamas have been rejected by Mr. Abbas.

Mr. Haniya officially resigned as prime minister on Feb. 15 and declared that he would form the new government within three weeks. Palestinian law gives him another two weeks' grace after that.

The process has already hit delays. Mr. Haniya had asked the factions to submit the names of their ministerial candidates by this past Friday, and he was supposed to have met with Mr. Abbas on Saturday.

Hamas announced Saturday that it had submitted its names to Mr. Haniya. But Fatah officials have suggested that it will take several days until their party presents its nominees.

A Fatah spokesman, Ahmad Abdul Rahman, told Palestinian radio that Mr. Abbas would stay in the Gaza Strip for several days.

The purpose of the unity government is to end internal Palestinian fighting, which has claimed about 100 lives in recent months, and to try to end the international economic boycott that crippled the previous Hamas-led government. Hamas came to power after winning elections in January 2006, but it is defined as a terrorist group by Israel, the United States and Europe.

The countries of the so-called quartet of negotiating partners — the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia — have laid down conditions for a resumption of direct aid. In order to qualify, the new government would have to recognize Israel's right to exist, renounce violence and accept previous signed agreements.

Hamas has so far failed to meet the demands in any explicit way, though Palestinian leaders argue that a unity government would come some way toward doing so.

A Hamas spokesman, Ismail Radwan, said that in their meeting, Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniya would discuss the "broad outlines" of a political program for the proposed government.

Mr. Radwan told Palestinian radio that Hamas's ministerial candidates "were chosen from the first, second and third ranks" of the Hamas leadership and were "far from the frame of political symbolism," suggesting a lower Hamas profile in the new government. Most have not served as ministers before and are not members of the Palestinian parliament, he said.

A Fatah "young guard" leader, Hatem Abdul Qader, said the candidates would also include new faces.

The post of finance minister has already been promised to Salam Fayyad, a political independent and a former finance minister who has gained the confidence of the West.

DOJ_NMG_0139486

In a new development, the militant Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command has apparently asked to join. The Popular Front is a Marxist splinter group based in Syria and is classified by the State Department as a terrorist organization.

Like Hamas, it rejected the Oslo accords that gave rise to the Palestinian Authority in the mid-1990s. Unlike Hamas, it has not run for election in the Palestinian territories and has practically no constituency there.

Mr. Radwan said that if its participation were approved, the Popular Front could be assigned one of the portfolios allocated for independents and smaller parties, or one of Hamas's own. "We are frankly interested in convening all the Palestinian factions in the national unity government," he said.

Small factions like the Popular Front are "in a struggle for survival," said Mahdi Abdul Hadi, director of Passia, a private Palestinian research center in Jerusalem. "They don't want to be forgotten."

Being in government would give them legitimacy, he added, and would empower them for the next round in the post-Mecca reshaping of the Palestinian political system — namely, the reconstitution of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

"This is like a business relationship, in which principles are put aside," Mr. Abdul Hadi said.

The small, radical Islamic Jihad faction is an exception, having announced that it would not participate in elections or in any unity government.

School Linked To Hamas Gets U.S. Cash (WT)

By Joel Mowbray

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

Millions of dollars in U.S. foreign aid have been given in the past several years to two Palestinian universities -- one of them controlled by Hamas -- that have participated in the advocacy, support or glorification of terrorism.

The funding -- principally in scholarships to individual students -- is being eyed by several members of Congress and their aides, who say it may violate U.S. law.

The U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) has provided more than $140,000 in assistance to the Hamas-controlled Islamic University in Gaza -- including scholarships to 49 of its students -- since Congress changed the law in 2004 to restrict aid to entities or individuals "involved in or advocating terrorist activity."

No U.S. assistance was directed to Islamic University last year, but USAID continues to fund multimillion-dollar programs through American Near East Refugee Aid (ANERA), which is building a high-tech facility for the school. U.S. law requires that any recipient of U.S. aid have no association with terrorists.

USAID also gave $2.3 million in aid last year to Al-Quds University, which has student groups affiliated with designated terrorist organizations on campus and last month held a weeklong celebration of the man credited with designing and building the first suicide belts more than a decade ago.

"It is outrageous that U.S. taxpayer dollars are going toward institutions that support terrorists," said Rep. Gary L. Ackerman, New York Democrat and chairman of the House Foreign Affairs subcommittee on the Middle East and South Asia.

"These loopholes must be closed so that taxpayer funds are used for their intended purpose and not to subsidize terrorism and the promotion of hatred toward Israel and the United States."

Rep. Nita M. Lowey, New York Democrat and chairwoman of the committee responsible for USAID funding, said, "It goes without saying that U.S. taxpayer dollars should absolutely never be used for advocating or honoring terrorist activity. Support for terrorists and terrorism in any shape or form is unacceptable."

USAID adamantly denies that it has violated any laws.

"Every grant we give, every bit of assistance we provide, we do in a way that is fully compliant with the law," said a USAID official, who agreed to talk only on the condition of anonymity.

In the case of Islamic University, the official said, USAID vetted the school president, the vice president of academic affairs and the dean of the library. It provided $12,000 worth of computers and materials to the school's library.

DOJ_NMG_0139487

Students are vetted for connections to terrorism before being granted scholarships, the official added, but, "We don't follow every student and track every meeting they go to." Unlike other U.S. aid recipients, the scholarship students have not been required to sign pledges not to participate in terrorism.

The latest congressional interest in USAID's funding in the West Bank and Gaza was triggered by a report from Palestinian Media Watch (PMW), a pro-Israel group that monitors the Palestinian press.

Included in the report were translations of several Palestinian newspaper articles that discuss the activities of student chapters of Hamas and Islamic Jihad at Al-Quds University and other Palestinian schools assisted by USAID since 2005. Hamas and Islamic Jihad are on the U.S. list of terrorist organizations.

The USAID official did not deny that student groups affiliated with terrorist organizations were on campuses of schools assisted by the agency, but stressed that such organizations receive minimal support from the schools and are not part of "the official administrative structure."

Aides to several congressmen said they were most troubled by USAID assistance to Islamic University in Gaza City, which is openly controlled by Hamas leaders.

The organization held a two-day conference in 2005 on the "martyrdom" of former Hamas spiritual leader and founder Sheik Ahmed Yassin, who was killed in an Israeli air strike in 2004. Sheik Yassin founded the school in 1978.

Sheik Yassin and former Hamas leader Abdel Aziz Rantisi used Islamic University as a base, as has Ismail Haniyeh, prime minister in the Hamas-led Palestinian government and a member of the school's board of trustees.

Sixteen Islamic University lecturers and teachers are elected Hamas members of the Palestinian legislature. In 2005, 78 percent of the student council vote went to Hamas, according to a Palestinian newspaper article provided by Palestinian Media Watch.

When challenged by Congress last year on its assistance to the school, USAID noted that the funding was not renewed last year. Nonetheless, the agency is providing millions in grants to ANERA, which is building a high-tech facility in Gaza City for the university. California-based Intel Corp. is underwriting the project.

In a document USAID sent to Congress last year, USAID wrote that ANERA "is required to ensure that no assistance is provided to terrorist organizations or individuals associated with terrorist activities, regardless of whether or not the activity involves [U.S. government] funding."

Also causing congressional concern is a PMW's report that Al-Quds University last month held a weeklong celebration honoring Yahya Ayyash, the Hamas leader known as "the shahid [martyr] engineer." He is credited with creating the first suicide belts in the mid-1990s and training the next generation of suicide bomb makers.

The opening event, as reported by a Palestinian newspaper and found in the PMW report, included a speech by university administrator Yusuf Dhiyab, "who discussed shahids and the mark that the shahids left on the history of the Palestinian nation and how they succeeded in uniting the nation."

In September, USAID announced an "extraordinary one-time" issuance of 2,000 scholarships for Palestinian students attending Al-Quds University at a total cost of $2.2 million, according to USAID. Simultaneously, USAID provided $100,000 in "in-kind assistance" to Al-Quds University.

In a written statement, USAID said Al-Quds University requested emergency assistance last summer, and the $2.3 million was offered because "strong U.S. support existed for assistance to moderate Palestinian leaders."

The statement singled out Al-Quds University President Sari Nusseibeh as "one such prominent and respected figure."

But Mr. Nusseibeh appeared on the Al-Jazeera satellite channel in 2002 with Hamas political bureau chief Khalid Mashaal and the mother of a suicide bomber, according to a transcript provided by the Middle East Media Research Institute (MEMRI).

"When I hear the words of Umm Nidal, I recall the [Koranic] verse stating that 'Paradise lies under the feet of mothers,' " he said, according to MEMRI. "All respect is due to this mother; it is due to every Palestinian mother and every female Palestinian who is a Jihad fighter on this land."

White House Tussles On Doha (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt And Deborah Solomon

DOJ_NMG_0139488

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As angst over the shaky state of the U.S. trade agenda grows, tensions are emerging within President Bush's inner circle over how best to get the stalled Doha round of world trade talks moving.

The chairman of the National Economic Council, presidential friend Allan Hubbard, and national-security adviser Stephen Hadley have privately voiced frustration with the tortured pace of action in the latest stage of comprehensive talks.

Launched in Doha, Qatar, soon after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the talks had as their primary aim better integrating poor nations into the global trading system. Messrs. Hubbard and Hadley have pressed for a bolder U.S. offer in an effort to encourage other countries to compromise.

In one heated meeting among top Bush aides just before Christmas in the Old Executive Office Building, U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab opposed the idea of a grand offer. Ms. Schwab, who had seen a similar move by her predecessor flop, pushed instead for "quiet negotiations" focusing on details to build trust among Doha's participants.

Mr. Bush sided with Ms. Schwab, and has continued to back her. But she is now at risk of being overshadowed -- some fear undercut -- by new Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, who is moving deeper into the public debate on Doha and trade.

In a speech Thursday, Mr. Paulson said increased trade is "essential to our growth" and cited Doha as especially important for the U.S. He noted that Ms. Schwab, who heads to Europe this week to confer with counterparts there, is "working hard to make progress toward a meaningful agreement."

Last week, World Trade Organization chief Pascal Lamy told The Wall Street Journal he was hopeful the U.S. and Europe were ready to make enough concessions on cutting farm aid to reopen the Doha talks soon, but he said a final deal still would face major hurdles.

Mr. Paulson, who recently named a former deputy U.S. trade representative to handle his China portfolio, will be abroad this week. He plans to argue for improved capital flows and lower trade barriers during a swing through Asia, including a stop in Seoul to pitch a free-trade pact with South Korea ahead of formal U.S.-Korean talks.

Mr. Paulson's higher profile reflects the widening sense of urgency within the Bush administration about the need to kick-start Washington's trade agenda, as doubts about the benefits of free trade and globalization have grown on Capitol Hill and among the public. Showing even modest progress on Doha could give the Democrat-controlled Congress impetus to renew the president's trade-negotiating authority, which expires in June. Extending his ability to present trade deals for a straight up-or-down vote by lawmakers would in turn buy Mr. Bush more time to close a Doha deal.

With the president endorsing quiet diplomacy, others in the administration are falling in behind Ms. Schwab. "We have looked to Sue's lead," Mr. Hubbard said. He said he doesn't recall the December meeting, adding, "We have a jillion meetings around here." A Hadley spokesman declined to comment on "internal deliberations."

For her part, Ms. Schwab said differences of opinion are healthy. "You always have to be thinking about different tactics and strategies," she said. But the trade official now faces pressure to show movement. In administration meetings, she has argued that informal meetings among major Doha players show signs of progress. And she will look smart if a deal comes together.

That is far from certain, though. Hence, Mr. Paulson's coming push on Doha, which administration officials say is designed to give some broader political momentum to the initiative.

The danger is that Mr. Paulson, a former Goldman Sachs chairman, could undercut Ms. Schwab's credibility. "You really risk further diminishing Sue in this, which is going to make it harder to get any deal," said Grant Aldonas, the top trade official at the Commerce Department during Mr. Bush's first term.

Ms. Schwab isn't the first trade representative to get a chaperone. In the 1980s, then-Treasury Secretary James Baker helped trade chief Clayton Yeutter close a controversial deal with Canada. Clinton White House aide Gene Sperling accompanied then-trade ambassador Charlene Barshefsky to Beijing to finalize a deal paving the way for China to join the WTO, the group shepherding the Doha talks.

After Republicans lost control of Congress in November, Ms. Schwab made it a priority to work with Democrats, even as she continued negotiations abroad. But White House officials began looking to Mr. Paulson, who enjoys huge name recognition and respect overseas from his Goldman Sachs days, to buttress her efforts. "He's got an enormous amount of credibility," Mr. Hubbard says.

DOJ_NMG_0139489

Mr. Paulson has a mandate from Mr. Bush to roam across issues within the administration. Taking office a few months after Ms. Schwab, he has carved an ever-greater role for himself as a free-trade advocate.

Aides to Ms. Schwab and Mr. Paulson said the two see their roles as complementary, and consult two or three times a week.

Things haven't always gone smoothly. In November, Mr. Paulson wrote an op-ed piece on Doha with his British counterpart, Gordon Brown. Ms. Schwab was caught unawares. The article was published the day before her own appearance at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, where she intended to make a postelection overture to Democrats on trade. Mr. Paulson later apologized to Ms. Schwab, officials said.

Beijing Accelerates Its Military Spending (NYT)

By Jim Yardley And David Lague

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

BEIJING, March 4 — China announced its biggest increase in defense spending in five years on Sunday, a development that quickly prompted the United States to renew its calls for more transparency from the Chinese military about the scope and intent of its continuing, rapid arms buildup.

Jiang Enzhu, a spokesman for the National People's Congress, the Communist Party-controlled national legislature, said China's military budget would rise this year by 17.8 percent to roughly 350 billion yuan, or just under $45 billion.

"We must increase our military budget, as it is important to national security," Mr. Jiang said at a news conference. "China's military must modernize. Our overall defenses are weak."

But China's military modernization efforts, particularly its drive to develop advanced weaponry, have been raising concern from Washington to Tokyo to New Delhi, where officials are worried that the buildup could be as much offensive as defensive. In January, China set off fears of an arms race in space when it successfully tested an antisatellite missile that destroyed one its own aging weather satellites. A month earlier, the People's Liberation Army began deploying the country's first state-of-the-art jet fighter, the J-10.

These advances reflect China's intense focus on scientific and technological development, and are the fruits of more than a decade of increased military spending. China's defense outlays increased an average of about 15 percent a year from 1990 to 2005, according to the Chinese military. This year's jump is the largest one reported since military spending rose by 19.4 percent in 2002.

Military analysts in the United States and Europe say that China's public military budget actually reflects only a fraction of its overall defense spending, and that the real figure is likely to be two to four times higher. Most defense analysts agree that China's military focus is to build a force that would prevail in any conflict with Taiwan, which it regards as a renegade province, and also to be capable of creating a deterrent to American military intervention.

On Sunday, John D. Negroponte, the new deputy secretary of state, chose not to focus on the size of the latest budget increase, but instead emphasized that China needed to be less secretive about its military buildup.

Mr. Negroponte, who is touring Asia, said military officials from both countries were already holding informational exchanges, and called on China to use these discussions to better explain its military ambitions.

"I think the point we would make with respect to military spending and military acquisition of various types would be the point about transparency," Mr. Negroponte said at a news conference in Beijing.

Chinese officials, meanwhile, assailed Mr. Negroponte over a recent weapons deal in which the United States approved the sale of more than $400 million in air and ground missiles to Taiwan. The missiles are considered a defensive measure against the steady buildup of Chinese missiles aimed at Taiwan.

Chinese officials lobbied Mr. Negroponte to reverse the deal and urged the United States not to send "mistaken signals" to Taiwan.

The deputy secretary said any weapons sale to Taiwan "would be for strictly defensive purposes."

Mr. Negroponte, who was appointed last month as the State Department's second-ranking official, held meetings with Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan and two vice foreign ministers, Dai Bingguo and Yang Jiechi. He offered few details about the discussions, but said the topics included North Korea, Iran, trade tensions and regional security issues.

DOJ_NMG_0139490

Mr. Negroponte emphasized the constructive working relationship between the United States and China. But China's military budget increase is a reminder of the growing unease in Washington about Beijing's long-term intentions. Japan and India are also watching China's military drive and increasing defense spending.

In a news conference before Mr. Negroponte's statements on the budget, Mr. Jiang, the National People's Congress spokesman, said that China's intentions were peaceful, and that any fears about its military ambitions were unfounded. He noted that China spent only a fraction of the proposed United States Defense Department's $481.4 billion budget for the next fiscal year — a figure that does not include spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

He said China's new spending would be dedicated to increasing salaries and benefits for soldiers, as well as to overall modernization and technological upgrades.

"China is committed to taking a path of peaceful development and it pursues a defensive military posture," Mr. Jiang said.

The modernization efforts are also positioning China as a weapons supplier for other countries.

Military analysts say China's main motive in developing the J-10 is to diminish the technological advantage of Taiwan's Air Force. But analysts say China also plans to market the fighter plane to countries that cannot afford more expensive fighter planes sold by other countries.

China's technological push comes as the country continues to shrink the world's biggest standing army. Since 2003, the army's personnel has been reduced by 200,000 to 2.3 million soldiers, according to government figures. Spending is now focused on better training and equipment for this leaner force.

China Boosts Military Spending (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

BEIJING, March 5 -- China announced Sunday that it will increase military spending at a sharply higher rate this year, budgeting a rise of nearly 18 percent, and a senior U.S. official immediately called for clarity on the planned expenditures.

Deputy Secretary of State John D. Negroponte said at a news conference at the end of his maiden visit to Beijing in his new post that the Bush administration is dissatisfied with China's unwillingness to share such information. "We think it's important in our dialogue that we understand what China's plans and intentions are," he said.

The government's military budget announcement and Negroponte's swift appeal for more transparency highlighted a particularly uneasy point in what has become a broad, close and increasingly important U.S.-China relationship.

Negroponte has been assigned the lead role in managing that relationship, a mission he emphasized by calling on Chinese officials so soon after his Feb. 13 swearing-in. Apparently by coincidence, the Chinese government chose the same moment to announce that its declared military expenditures for 2007 will amount to $44.94 billion, an increase of 17.8 percent.

According to Pentagon estimates, that declared total represents about a third of actual military spending if equipment purchases are taken into account. But even that would amount to only a fraction of the U.S. military budget, which is proposed to rise to about $623 billion for fiscal 2008.

China has been steadily increasing military expenditures for more than a decade, seeking to recover from a long lag compared with other major powers. But the figure for 2007 drew attention because it represents the biggest jump in several years.

In reaction to the spending climb and resulting improvements in China's forces, the United States has regularly urged China to open its ultra-secretive military to more scrutiny and share its strategic outlook with Washington to avoid misunderstandings in the region. The outgoing U.S. Pacific Command chief, Adm. William J. Fallon, was particularly active in seeking to organize more contacts between the two military hierarchies.

Negroponte said he, too, will push for closer connections. "It's not so much the budget and the increases as it is understanding these things through dialogue and contacts," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0139491

A spokesman for the National People's Congress, which opened its annual session Monday, said military expenditures were rising to cover the cost of better training and higher salaries in the 2.3 million-member People's Liberation Army and benefits for about 200,000 soldiers shed from the ranks over the past several years. Reducing the lower ranks and improving technological training for remaining troops have been major parts of the country's long-range military improvement program.

The spokesman, Jiang Enzhu, said China's military expenditures do not represent a threat to other countries because President Hu Jintao's government has vowed to use the military only in "defensive operations." He added that "China is committed to following the path of peaceful development, and it has adopted a defensive posture."

The official New China News Agency quoted the head of the military's General Logistics Department, Liao Xilong, as saying that the extra money would also go toward improving China's ability to wage high-tech warfare, to defend its information systems against jamming and to coordinate among land, air and sea forces.

"The present-day world is none too peaceful," he said, according to the news agency. "To protect national security and territorial integrity, we must adequately increase spending on military modernization."

Premier Wen Jiabao, delivering his annual government report to the National People's Congress, also underlined the country's determination to modernize its armed forces, saying they must be able to "effectively carry out the historic mission of the army in the new stage of the new century."

"We will intensify defense-related research and efforts to produce advanced weaponry and equipment," he told the legislature.

Laying out his government's aims for 2007, Wen also vowed to increase spending on environmental protection, rural education and health insurance for the poor. He forecast that China's economy will grow by 8 percent this year, which would be a drop from the more than 9 percent recorded in 2006.

Underlying China's determination to build a more modern military -- and a factor in the U.S. call for transparency -- is the risk of conflict over Taiwan, which sits 100 miles off the mainland.

The island has been self-ruled since Nationalist forces fled there in 1949 as Mao Zedong's Communist troops took power. But in Beijing's eyes it remains a Chinese province that must at some point return to the fold. The government here has vowed to use force as a last resort if Taiwan moves decisively toward formal independence.

Negroponte said Chinese officials raised with him the Bush administration's recent decision to sell Taiwan about 400 missiles, contending that the $421 million deal violated U.S. commitments to a one-China policy. In response, Negroponte said, he emphasized Washington's adherence to the one-China principle but reminded them of legislation mandating U.S. help for Taiwan's defense.

Chinese Military Spending To Rise By 18% (FT)

By Andrew Yeh In Beijing

Financial Times, March 5, 2007

China's defence spending will jump nearly 18 per cent year-on-year to Rmb350.9bn ($45.3bn, €34.4bn, £23.3bn) this year, the largest annual rise in spending in recent years, according to a forecast by Beijing's legislature.

Jiang Enzhu, a spokesman for the National People's Congress, which convenes in the capital on Monday, said on Sunday that the main reason for the rise was to "make up for the weak foundation" of the nation's armed forces.

The newly allocated funds for the People's Liberation Army will be about 7.5 per cent of the nation's total budgeted spending for the year, according to Mr Jiang. The real spending figure is believed to be much higher, however, since the official number probably does not include large procurements and other costs.

In the past, the Pentagon has said China's real military spending could be as much as three times the stated sum.

The Bush administration has, in recent weeks, expressed increased suspicion of the general objectives and technological sophistication of the Chinese military, which is extremely secretive.

John Negroponte, the US deputy secretary of state, called on Chinese leaders on Sunday to explain clearly what their "plans and intentions" are for the build-up.

DOJ_NMG_0139492

"It's not so much the budget and the increases...as it is understanding those questions better through dialogue and transparency," he said at the US embassy.

Beijing's foreign ministry said at the weekend that it "resolutely opposes" recent US plans to sell 450 air and ground missiles to Taiwan. China considers Taiwan a renegade province and aims hundreds of missiles at the island.

"I stressed [to Chinese counterparts] that any weapons sales that we might make to Taiwan would be for strictly defensive purposes and consistent with the 'one China' policy," Mr Negroponte said.

His comments were made just days after Dick Cheney, the vice-president, said on a trip to Australia that China's stated peaceful spending rise was "not consistent" with its current military policies.

Mr Jiang said that the boosted funds would mainly go towards wages for armed forces personnel, improving living quarters and upgrading equipment. He did not elaborate further.

"It's a moderate increase in step with China's economic development," the Xinhua news agency quoted Liao Xilong, a member of the central military commission, as saying. Officials and legislators from around the country are gathered in Beijing to discuss laws and finances.

In a rare white paper on defence released last December, China estimated that its military spending in 2005 was only 6.2 per cent of total US spending and just over half that of the UK.

Mr Negroponte said there has been a lot of dialogue with Beijing since January, when China fired a missile to destroy an old satellite in space, becoming only the third country to do so.

China's Military Buildup Spurs Concerns (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough And Andrew Batson And Jason Leow

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

China says it plans to boost military spending by nearly 18% this year -- the largest increase in a decade -- in a move that could raise tensions with the U.S.

A spokesman for the National People's Congress, which is set to approve China's annual government budget this week, said China is trying to strengthen its armed forces in step with its rapid economic growth. He added that the increase would fund improvements in military technology as well as raise soldiers' pay.

The growth in China's publicly disclosed defense spending -- which many analysts believe understates the total actually devoted to military programs -- has drawn criticism from top U.S. officials, who question China's intentions.

During a visit to Australia late last month, Vice President Dick Cheney said China's "fast-paced military buildup" is "not consistent with China's stated goal of a 'peaceful rise.'"

China disclosed the 2007 spending figure just before a meeting between Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte and China's foreign minister, Li Zhaoxing, in Beijing.

Speaking later to reporters, Mr. Negroponte said that while Pentagon officials in the past had discussed the issue of the defense buildup with the Chinese military, he remained unclear about China's motivations for the buildup. "We think it's important in our dialogue that we understand what China's plans and intentions are," he said. "This is in our view a perfectly reasonable suggestion which we would hope that they take into account."

The NPC spokesman, Jiang Enzhu, acknowledged such concerns. Speaking to reporters yesterday, he noted that "in international society, there are some people who are greatly concerned about China's defense spending."

Mr. Jiang said the increases are "still compensating for the weak foundation in national defense" that resulted from insufficient government investment during the 1980s, adding: "China will not become a threat to any country."

Despite double-digit increases in recent years, including last year's 14.7% rise, Chinese defense spending remains far below that of the U.S. and other major powers, in both relative and absolute terms.

China's defense budget for this year amounts to nearly $45 billion. The U.S. defense budget for the 2007 fiscal year, which ends Sept. 30, is expected to top $600 billion. China's spending is equivalent to somewhat more than 1% of the country's gross domestic product. The U.S. spends about 4% of GDP on defense.

DOJ_NMG_0139493

Even so, the U.S. and China's Asian neighbors are increasingly concerned about China's strengthening military -- worries that escalated markedly after China's successful test of an antisatellite missile in January.

Chinese officials appeared taken aback at the international reaction to the unannounced missile test and have lately issued a number of statements meant to reassure foreign capitals that Beijing harbors no aggressive intent.

But China is determined to improve the technological capacity of its 2.3-million-member armed forces, which still lag far behind those of developed countries, in order to protect its increasingly global interests.

For Chinese strategic thinkers, the increased integration of China into the global economy is prompting a revolution in their views of the role of the military, which has been focused for most of its existence on domestic threats, territorial defense and border conflicts.

Much of China's military focus remains on Taiwan, which Beijing views as part of its territory. Chinese leaders' belief that their country's military has been incapable of using force to take Taiwan -- which buys weapons from the U.S. -- has long rankled and helped spur modernization efforts.

While not linking the military-spending increase directly to Taiwan, Mr. Jiang criticized the administration of President Chen Shui-bian, and reiterated China's intent eventually to rule the island. "We will strive with the greatest sincerity and the greatest effort to realize the prospect of peaceful reunification, but we will never tolerate Taiwan independence," Mr. Jiang said.

In Taipei, President Chen delivered strong pro-independence remarks apparently aimed at provoking China and appealing to his base. "Taiwan should be independent, Taiwan should go by its own name," he said at a banquet marking the 25th anniversary of the pro-independence group, the Formosan Association for Public Affairs.

Both countries retain "China" in their formal names, with Taiwan known as the Republic of China and the communist-ruled mainland officially called the People's Republic of China. But in a bid to assert Taiwan's separate identity in the past year, Mr. Chen's independence-leaning administration has substituted "Taiwan" for "China" at the post office and two big government companies.

China Boosts Defense Fund As Talks End (WT)

By Ed Lanfranco, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

BEIJING -- Traditional fireworks ending China's lunar New Year celebrations were overshadowed yesterday by a display of political pyrotechnics that included a big boost in military spending, tough talk on Taiwan and a conclusion to two days of delicate diplomatic talks with the United States.

The biggest bombshell was a 17.8 percent increase in the defense budget, announced at a press conference ahead of the opening today of the annual meeting of the National People's Congress (NPC).

"China must increase the military budget for protecting national security and promoting the reunification of the motherland," said NPC spokesman Jiang Enzhu. "This increase is compensatory in nature in order to make up for the weak national defense foundation of our country."

The remark on reunification clearly was aimed at Taiwan, the island republic of 23 million people that the mainland government considers a breakaway province.

Mr. Jiang said that "deterring Taiwan's independence and maintaining peace in the Taiwan Strait" remained a "pressing task" for the NPC because of a "continuing push for de jure independence" in Taipei.

Arguing that secession efforts "will not enjoy popular support" in Taiwan, Mr. Jiang said, "If you want to push for independence for Taiwan, you will not have success at the end of the day."

John D. Negroponte, the newly confirmed U.S. deputy secretary of state, wound up two days of talks in Beijing made more delicate by reports that the United States plans to sell Taiwan 450 air and ground missiles to counter China's missile buildup.

"Any weapons sales we might make to Taiwan would be for strictly defensive purposes and consistent with the one-China policy," which considers Taiwan and the mainland as one country, Mr. Negroponte said after his talks.

On the jump in the defense budget, after several years of double-digit increases, Mr. Negroponte expressed concern that much of China's military spending is hidden from view.

DOJ_NMG_0139494

"We think it's important in our dialogue that we understand what China's plans and intentions are," Mr. Negroponte said.

"We should continue, and perhaps intensify, dialogue so that we have a bit better understanding of exactly what it is the government of China has in mind with respect with its military modernization, what doctrines underlie this and what their intentions are."

Since Hu Jintao became the country's supreme leader in November 2002, China's defense budget has increased by 9.6 percent in 2003, 11.6 percent in 2004, 12.6 percent in 2005 and 14.7 percent last year.

The Pentagon and defense analysts think China's actual military spending may be three or four times higher than the budget figures, which do not include weapons procurements and key items such as research and development.

That would include the construction of five new nuclear-missile submarines first reported in The Washington Times last week.

The NPC spokesman said most of the increase in the defense budget will be used to boost wages and living allowances for the armed forces and to upgrade armaments that "enhance the military's ability to conduct defensive operations."

He characterized expenditures as "quite modest" compared with the military budgets of Britain, France, Japan and especially the United States.

Paulson Doesn't See China As Enemy (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. says the economy is healthy, inflation seems under control and the U.S. should not perceive China as an economic enemy.

Mr. Paulson, who this week makes his third visit to China as Treasury secretary, said in a television interview broadcast it is essential that both countries have strong economic ties. The former head of the investment company Goldman Sachs has said China is moving too slowly in overhauling its currency system and cracking down on copyright piracy. U.S. businesses blame these factors for the soaring U.S. trade deficit with China.

"I would say that our relationship with China is multifaceted, and it's a very important relationship for the U.S. And I don't believe we need to make China an enemy," Mr. Paulson said.

Democrats in Congress have criticized the Bush administration for doing too little to protect U.S. workers from unfair foreign trade practices. Mr. Paulson thinks protectionist barriers in this country would hurt U.S. consumers and make the United States less competitive.

"[China's] whole economy is developing; their capital markets are not nearly as developed as their manufacturing economy. They're not reflective of the Chinese economy overall. They're largely cut off from the global capital markets," he said.

"But as they reform those capital markets and as they open them up to competition, this will make it possible for them to have a currency that trades in a competitive marketplace. This will help their economy develop in a way [that] it'll be good for them and good for us, because there will be a bigger market for our exports," Mr. Paulson said.

After a week in which the Dow Jones Industrial Average posted its worst weekly performance in more than four years, Mr. Paulson said yesterday that he felt good about the economy and discounted the chance of an economic downtown.

"Markets never move in any one direction forever in a straight line. And so I look at it and put it in perspective and say, over the last year, the Dow's up almost 11 percent, [the Standard & Poor's 500] up 9 percent, and I'll take it," Mr. Paulson said.

The Dow dropped 416 points Tuesday after big declines in China and other countries. The Dow fell 533 points for the week, rattling investor confidence about the state of the U.S. economy.

The sell-off followed comments a day earlier by former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan that the economy might slip into recession by year's end. Weeks ago, the current chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, gave Congress a mostly upbeat assessment of the economy's prospects.

"Clearly, no one's got a crystal ball. So there's always a possibility that there will be a downturn, always a possibility," Mr. Paulson said. "But I don't see it. I think we have a healthy economy in the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0139495

"You know, a year ago, when the growth rates were much higher, I was concerned. I said, 'Is this going to be sustainable?' Now I'm looking at it and I'm seeing a situation where it looks like we're successfully making the transition.

"The consumer's strong. Exports have been greater than imports for quarters running, and they're adding to our growth," the secretary said in an interview taped Friday for "This Week" on ABC.

"We've got a very healthy labor market. ... Inflation seems to be contained. And what really makes a difference to me is the average worker is now beginning to feel the benefits. Real income is up 2.1 percent for the average American worker over the last year. So I'm feeling good about the U.S. economy."

On other topics, Mr. Paulson said:

• He opposes efforts in Congress to rein in executive pay. Last week, the head of the House Financial Services Committee and 21 other Democrats proposed legislation to give shareholders at public companies a formal say in executives' compensation packages.

"What upsets people in this country is pay for failure. And so I think it's very, very important that compensation be tied to performance," Mr. Paulson said.

• His talks with Mr. Bush about China usually bring up global warming.

"Almost every time I talk with the president on China, he asks me how we're doing on the environmental issues with China. Because they're building one coal plant every week, and a lot of it is with some of the more less-developed technology, and there's a lot we can be doing to make advances there," said Mr. Paulson, a former chairman of the Nature Conservancy.

Paulson Renews Yuan-Reform Talk (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said that the U.S. shouldn't make China an enemy, but that Beijing needs to step up reform of its currency to resolve short-term differences.

Mr. Paulson, who this week makes his third visit to China as Treasury secretary, said it is essential that both countries manage disagreements to maintain strong economic ties.

"I would say that our relationship with China is multifaceted and it's a very important relationship for the U.S. And I don't believe we need to make China an enemy," Mr. Paulson said on U.S. TV yesterday.

"If we manage the relationship -- the overall relationship with China properly, it's going to benefit both of our countries for a long time to come."

Mr. Paulson said it is "a top priority to get this long-term economic relationship right between our two countries and to deal with the most pressing short-term issues."

He said that he would continue to press for improving flexibility in the Chinese currency.

Britain's Gordon Brown: A Change In Tone For US (CSM)

By Mark Rice-oxley

The Christian Science Monitor, March 5, 2007

LONDON

Ever since Tony Blair let slip in September 2004 that he had plans to step down, two questions have loomed large in Britain. When will he go, and what will his successor do differently?

Now that the answer to the first question is more or less settled – Mr. Blair is expected to move on by midsummer – the focus is turning to the second.

Barring an improbable political upset, that man will be Gordon Brown, an earnest Scot with a rigorous intellect and a passion for social justice who has served – not always comfortably – for 10 years as Blair's finance minister and right-hand man.

Members of Parliament, political analysts, and people who know Mr. Brown say he will be a much different prime minister from Blair. His interests are Africa and trade justice rather than the Middle East; he was never enthusiastic about Iraq; he appears to have little in common with President Bush.

But although Brown is sometimes seen as the embodiment of core Labour values, the caricature of him as a closet socialist suspicious of America and skeptical about war is off the mark.

DOJ_NMG_0139496

"Gordon is very much an Americaphile, in some ways more than Blair," says Stephen Twigg, a former government minister who is now director of the Foreign Policy Center think tank in London. "When he goes on holiday abroad ,he tends to go to Cape Cod, while Blair normally holidays in Europe. Culturally, Gordon is very much an Atlanticist with strong connections to US politics."

Brown is not yet home free. Some in his Labour Party mutter that his diffident ways and clear association with 10 years of Blairism may make it difficult for him to appeal to voters. But so far, there is no sign of another Labour candidate coming forward to challenge him for the role of party leader that Blair will vacate. If no one does, Brown will accede unchallenged to the Labour helm, and as a result will take over as prime minister as well.

Americans may find him a very different proposition from Blair, more cautious, possibly less compliant. Some say the White House should prepare for a big change in style, if not substance. "There'll be a huge difference because Brown is not an actor like Blair," says Tom Bower, a journalist and author who wrote a 2004 biography of Brown. "But he is an Atlanticist and won't break the relationship with Washington."

What he might do, however, is accentuate the differences between London and Washington. Blair was always apt to minimize whatever disputes arose and stress the unity of the two allies, which often made him look obsequious and earned him the unflattering sobriquet "Bush's poodle."

But diplomats have criticized him for failing to extract enough influence for his unswerving support for Bush's wars. Brown may play a tougher game.

"In those areas where there is disagreement, as there has been on climate change [and] the International Criminal Court, Tony Blair has tended to underplay those, whereas Gordon Brown might be more overt," predicts Mr. Twigg. "He will quite deliberately give emphasis to areas where there are disagreements."

"He'll be much tougher on America than Blair was," predicts Ian Gibson, a Labour parliamentarian, who, like Brown, charted a course from provincial Scotland through Edinburgh University and on to national politics. "But he has a great interest in some of the good things in America," he adds, noting that Brown is more at ease among intellectuals than among defense and institutional types in Washington. "He's more pro-America than pro-Europe in fact."

Indeed, Europeans may be dreading the prospect of a Brown premiership. While Blair aimed to haul Britain into the heart of Europe, the chancellor has given few signs of being a Europhile over the past 10 years and, apart from brief appearances at meetings, rarely visits the continent.

On Iraq, few expect a sudden change. Blair has already started the countdown to exit with the announcement on Feb. 21 of a drawdown in troops. Brown will, experts say, want to draw a line in the sand. And he may change the tune about the war, because he was far less convinced than Blair about it.

"He doesn't suggest, like Blair does, that the war in Iraq was part of the fight against terrorism," says John Curtice, a politics professor at Strathclyde University in Scotland. "He has said as little as possible on Iraq, but has said enough to suggest that he won't give speeches implying that the war in Iraq contributed to reducing terrorism in the UK."

Mr. Curtice says Brown's main aim would be to get out of Iraq as quickly as possible. "The other question is will he be willing to say we made a mistake?" he adds.

Afghanistan is a different matter. Here Brown looks to be locked into current policy. The defense ministry has just announced another rise in troop numbers, to 7,700, and the campaign in the south is viewed very differently from Iraq. "Here, he can't avoid a commitment," warns Professor George Joffe, a Middle East expert at the Center for International Studies at Cambridge University. "But he will do so at the expense of Iraq."

While Blair's foreign policy has centered around active interventionism – the idea that the West has a moral duty to intervene militarily where it sees gross injustice – Brown's big ideas are different, though equally predicated on morality. "He clearly has a passion about Africa; issues around aid, debt relief, and trade justice," notes Twigg. But whether he backs away from moral interventionism remains to be seen. "The situation in Darfur will provide a major test" of that.

Brown has already started behaving like a prime minister. In speeches now, he strays well off the financial beat, positing ideas and policies on everything from Britishness and immigration to Britain's chances of hosting the 2018 soccer World Cup.

DOJ_NMG_0139497

Allies say he will focus more on higher education, science, technology, and engineering. The need to stiffen economic competition against developing countries like India is a favored theme.

But some fret that a Brown premiership does not promise enough domestic change to revive a party suffering in the polls. Brown was, after all, the architect of many of Labour's reforms over the past decade.

As Frank Field, a former minister, wrote last week: "What new directions can be offered when the architect of current policies has merely moved up one place?"

EU-India Trade Pact Stumbles (FT)

By Jo Johnson

Financial Times, March 5, 2007

Indian objections to the inclusion of a standard "human rights and democracy" clause in a proposed free trade agreement with the European Union have emerged as a serious stumbling block, the Financial Times has learnt.

The row is a setback for the ambitious agenda set at the EU-India summit in Helsinki in October last year, when both sides pledged to deepen economic and political ties.

"This clause would, of course, be a deal-breaker," Kamal Nath, India's commerce minister, said in an interview.

"This is meant to be a -specifically targeted trade and investment agreement, which it will not be if other elements come into it."

Since a 1995 EU Council decision by member states, the European Commission has systematically included a so-called "essential elements" clause in bilateral trade and co-operation agreements. It now applies to agreements with more than 120 countries.

However, the Commission has triggered an intense debate among the EU's member states by pushing for an apparent exception for India, on the grounds that a 1994 EU-India co-operation agreement covers human rights questions.

Peter Power, spokesman for Peter Mandelson, EU trade commissioner, said: "Given how much both countries can get out of it, we feel we should forge ahead on the basis of strict economic criteria, leaving more political considerations for other agreements."

Commission officials privately acknowledged that the outcome of the debate in the EU Council was "too difficult to predict".

One said: "The council is going through the detail of the agreement at the moment. We are not out of the woods."

Bilateral trade in goods between India and the EU amounted to $40bn in 2006 and trade in services a further $8bn. Both sides say they want a "deep and comprehensive" agreement that goes beyond multilateral commitments and is not trade-diverting.

New Delhi argues that the "essential elements" clause conflicts with India's longstanding position that economic agreements should not be "contaminated" by political riders.

"India suspects that such clauses provide protectionist cover," said Pradeep S. Mehta, of Consumer Unity & Trust Society, an Indian trade think-tank.

"Because of its economic performance, India is now more self-confident about when it will give ground and when it will not give ground."

Mr Nath said: "This is a win-win deal for both sides and the EU must evaluate how much it has to gain from this agreement. It's up to the EU to work out how it wants to proceed."

India is a member of the United Nations Human Rights Council, but ranks low, according to the Asian Human Rights Commission, among the international community in terms of the ratification of international conventions and covenants.

Although it has signed the UN Convention against Torture, for example, it has resisted ratifying it on the grounds that domestic mechanisms within the country are capable of addressing the issue.

India is keen to launch an FTA with the EU as soon as possible. Manmohan Singh, prime minister, regards it as a low-key way of keeping the reforms process moving forward at a time when there is no consensus for more overt liberalisation.

Ivory Coast Leader Signs Accord With Rebels (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

DOJ_NMG_0139498

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

DAKAR, Senegal, March 4 — The president of Ivory Coast and the leader of a rebel group that controls its northern half signed a new agreement on Sunday to end a political impasse and reunite the country, which has been divided by war.

The plan is the latest in a long string of agreements seeking to end a simmering conflict that has kept Ivory Coast, once one of the most peaceful and prosperous nations in West Africa, divided in two and hobbled economically. Laurent Gbagbo, Ivory Coast's president, and Guillaume Soro, leader of the New Forces rebel group, met in Ouagadougou, capital of Burkina Faso, to sign the agreement.

The two sides plan to form a unity government within five weeks and form a joint military command. The agreement was brokered by Burkina Faso's president, Blaise Compaoré, after a month of negotiations.

Civil war broke out in Ivory Coast in September 2002 after a long period of upheaval and economic decline that followed the death of its first leader, Félix Houphouët-Boigny, in 1993.

The causes of the conflict were complex, rooted largely in the tension between the predominantly Muslim north, where many people are descendants of immigrants from neighboring countries like Burkina Faso and Mali, and the largely Christian and animist ethnic people of the south, some of whom claim to be the true Ivorians.

The war was brief, lasting only a few months before France and the United Nations intervened, dividing the country between the rebel forces in the north and the government-controlled south. A buffer zone was established, and since January 2003, a series of peace agreements built on the principle of power-sharing have been signed.

Each agreement so far has foundered on the difficult but essential questions that caused the war in the first place. The two sides have been unable to agree on voter registration rules and identity cards for long-postponed elections, or on how to disarm rebel groups and the pro-government militias.

Political leaders in the south, fearing that they will lose power to people of foreign descent, have excluded popular northern candidates from running through laws that bar candidates whose grandparents were not born in Ivory Coast.

Elections to choose a new president have been postponed twice, most recently under a United Nations plan that requires that elections be held before Oct. 31.

Under the current agreement, President Gbagbo is supposed to be sharing power with a prime minister, Charles Konan Banny, who was appointed in 2005 as a consensus candidate when elections could not be held in time. But Mr. Banny and Mr. Gbagbo have repeatedly clashed over the question of who has authority to run the country.

Sweden's Pension Antidote Finds A Global Audience (WSJ)

By Joellen Perry

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

As aging populations and shaky public finances make overhauling pension systems a global priority, an initiative implemented nearly a decade ago in Sweden is looking like the pension world's next big thing.

By pegging public pensions to individual earnings and overall life-expectancy rates, Sweden has given its citizens incentives to be more productive and retire later -- and sidestepped the political paralysis that has stymied change elsewhere.

SCANDINAVIAN MODERN

• The Issue: Sweden's decade-old pension system may offer a model for other countries coping with aging populations.

• The Background: Pension payouts are tied to salaries, life-expectancy rates and the health of the economy.

• The Bottom Line: Swedes are retiring later now. The formula averts some political friction.

Some Eastern European nations have already ditched their struggling post-Communist systems and gone Swedish. Steps taken in countries as diverse as Brazil and Russia boast some Swedish elements. A World Bank book based on the Swedish model has been translated into Chinese. And next month, Egypt's government will review plans to chuck the country's failing system for a Swedish version.

"There's no magic solution to the pension problem. But governments world-wide are looking at" Sweden, says Kent Weaver, political-science professor at Georgetown University in Washington. "It's starting to be seen as the best among what are now seen to be imperfect options."

DOJ_NMG_0139499

Sweden's plan -- designed in part by an American expatriate -- is conventional in that current workers' contributions fund current retirees' benefits, much as the Social Security system does in the U.S. But calculating payouts according to salaries and aging projections gives it the flexibility to accommodate revenue and population shifts. If the economy does poorly, the thin king goes, future pension payments will go down. And the longer people in a particular age group are projected to live, the smaller their pension payouts will be.

Or at least that is the theory. The changeover was made in 1999, so not enough time has elapsed to thoroughly test it. In fact, Sweden's economy has done so well since 2003 -- when benefits started being calculated in part under the new rules -- that pensioners have received more than they would have under the old structure. The downside is that if and when growth falters, retirees will get less. "It hasn't happened yet, but it will," says Ole Settergren, director of the pensions department at Sweden's Social Insurance Agency.

That approach is a break from the typical pay-as-you-go system, which defines a guaranteed benefit in advance but often saddles the state with underfunded obligations -- particularly when times are bad.

Sweden's system "is not a good system if you want to subsidize leisure," says Edward Palmer, a professor of social-insurance economics at Stockholm's Uppsala University and a Colorado native who helped design the plan.

It can be a good system, however, for politicians wary of revamping pensions, because it allows them to defer to a formula rather than promoting the unpopular options of later retirement and smaller benefits. "The political discussions behind [things like] increasing the retirement age are much more cumbersome than if it just happens mathematically," says Robert Holzmann, senior director of the World Bank's Social Protection unit in Washington.

Skeptics point out, however, that politicians still could eventually be pressured to change the system if benefits get too skimpy.

Sweden's plan has other critics. It is a tough sell elsewhere in Western Europe, where many see generous pensions as a right. Other critics include the International Labor Organization, which holds that earnings-related pensions should guarantee 40% of a person's prior average earnings. Swedes, unlike the majority of Western Europeans, get no such assurance. The system also preserves existing income inequality: Workers who earn more get more when they retire.

In the U.S., Social Security tracks what people pay through the bulk of their careers, but it reroutes contributions from wealthier citizens to prop up poorer workers' pensions.

The bottom line of the Swedish model: Most people will have to work harder to reap the kinds of pensions their grandparents could take for granted. "It puts the cost of aging onto the individual, rather than onto society," says Sarah Brooks, an Ohio State University political-science professor who has studied the plan.

Last February, the World Bank endorsed the Swedish plan as a possible antidote to pension woes world-wide. Economists at the European Central Bank followed up last fall, highlighting Sweden's approach for the 13-nation euro zone, where one-third of the population will be older than 64 by 2050.

In countries with strapped budgets, the Swedish plan's attraction is its premise that something is better than nothing -- in other words, stingier payouts help ensure the system doesn't collapse. That was crucial to persuading unions in Egypt to endorse that country's new Swedish-inspired pension plan. "They know [the old plan] is generous, but they also know it will not be there," says David Robalino, a World Bank economist who has been working in Egypt.

In Poland, where a public-relations campaign helped ensure an enthusiastic transition to a Swedish-style system in 1999, the fiscal benefits are already clear. A recent European Union report said that, despite having some of the worst demographics on the Continent, "the long-term budgetary impact of aging in Poland is the lowest in the EU."

Like Sweden, Poland mandated that a slice of pension contributions go into private accounts similar to a 401(k), where the money is invested in mutual funds. Swedes contribute 18.5% of their salaries to the pension system; only a small portion of that -- 2.5 percentage points -- is held in individual accounts. Poles contribute a total of 19.52% of their gross salaries to the system, with 7.3 percentage points going into private accounts.

The concept of individual accounts has been key to selling the plan to Swedes. Sweden sends its workers statements -- mailed annually in bright orange envelopes -- showing what they have put into their pension and what they would get at retirement. The money isn't really there for them (it is being paid to current retirees). But advocates say seeing it expressed as an individual account should have the psychological effect of encouraging people to work longer to win bigger benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0139500

It may be working. Sweden's official retirement age is 61 years old. Since the change took effect, the average age at which Swedes retire has risen to 63.

Even partially adopting the Swedish plan can have benefits. Brazil doesn't send its citizens annual statements, and there is no private-account component. But individual-contribution and life-expectancy rates have been used to calculate private-sector pension payouts since 1999. Brazilian officials made the change after studying the Swedish model, and they have seen costs fall since.

Perhaps the Swedish plan's biggest drawback is that it remains relatively untested. The first wave of retirees who get all their benefits based on the new model won't hit for another few years, and the country hasn't suffered a major economic slowdown since adopting the plan.

"It certainly has the virtue of spelling out, in anticipation, what people have agreed should happen," says Olivia Mitchell, director of the Pension Research Council at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School. "But that doesn't necessarily mean that it will."

Castro's Gulag (WSJ)

By Armando Valladares

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

Like thousands of other Cubans, I was arrested in the middle of the night. Fidel Castro's police raided my parents' home, stuck a machine gun in my face and took me away. It was 1960 and I was 22 years old.

The news that the Cuban dictator is gravely ill floods my mind with memories of my years spent in captivity. I believe that those of us who were political prisoners know his legacy better than anyone. For 22 years, I was an inmate in his vast prison system, mostly confined to an island gulag, for crimes I did not commit.

Like the majority of Cubans in 1959, I cheered Castro's victory over Fulgencio Batista, a dictator on friendly terms with the U.S. Castro called himself the enemy of all dictatorships; he had a cross hanging round his neck and he swore that there would be free and fair elections. But as his near five decades of uninterrupted power proved, he tricked everyone and replaced the dictatorship of Batista with his own bloodier version.

In a famous 1959 appearance on "Meet the Press," Castro answered a question put to him by Lawrence Spivak, "Democracy is my ideal, really . . . I am not communist . . . There is no doubt for me between democracy and communism." Once Castro began making his sympathies overt, I began speaking out against his ideological shift amongst the people in my workplace, the postal savings bank.

At the time, the government was distributing placards with the slogan: "If Fidel is a communist, then put me on the list. He's got the right idea." The phrase was ubiquitous, from decals to billboards. When officials in the bank demanded that I put the slogan on my worktable, I refused. When they asked if I had anything against Fidel, I told them that if he was a communist, then, yes, I did. I had no desire to become a symbol of political dissidence. That decision was made for me that day.

Thirteen days after my arrest, I was tried on charges of threatening the powers of state security, even though there was no evidence against me. The justice system under Castro was a mockery of the rule of law; members of my tribunal were Communist Party apparatchiks who sat with their boots up on tables, smoking cigars and reading comic books. Their very presence was but a formality; the verdicts had already been decided. I was not permitted an attorney.

I received a 30-year prison sentence as a potential conspirator. Two men in the same court room falsely accused of shooting at a government spokesman were executed by firing squad. When their defense attorney (whom they had met just minutes before) pleaded with the prosecutor to reduce the sentence, the prosecutor responded that he had received orders to have them shot, no matter what, as a means of social prophylaxis.

Once in prison, if the guards felt like punishing us, they would put us in cages, with mesh roofs, and walk along the edge while pouring buckets of urine and excrement all over our bodies. Sometimes, guards would shoot prisoners for target practice. That is how they killed Alfredo Carrion and Diosdado Aquit. Many of the men whom Castro had imprisoned, tortured and killed had been his comrades in overthrowing Batista. But most of them were innocent people eliminated in Ernesto "Che" Guevara's psychotic quest for what he and Castro called the "new man."

DOJ_NMG_0139501

The impunity of Castro's dictatorship was marked by its cruelty. A prisoner in my block, Julio Tan, once refused an order by a prison guard to dig weeds. The guard struck him with his bayonet, another hit him with a hoe, and a gang of guards beat him until he bled to death in just a matter of minutes. My friend Pedro Luis Boitel, a student leader and courageous opponent of Batista, went on a hunger strike in 1972 to protest his treatment. On the 49th day of the strike, Castro personally ordered that Boitel be denied drinking water. Boitel died of thirst, in horrific agony, five days later.

Terror was Castro's main tool. The tactics used for enemies of the regime included the exploitation of phobias such as reptiles and rats; the use of drugs so as to have prisoners lose all notion of time and place; blindfolding prisoners, hanging them by their feet, and then lowering them into wells they were told are filled with crocodiles; the use of guard dogs that had their teeth removed and which were set upon prisoners with hands tied behind their backs. Usually, these dogs attacked the genitals first. All of this was investigated and extensively documented by a visiting delegation from the United Nations. The evidence can be found in Geneva.

The legacy of Castro for Cuba will be much like that of Stalin in Russia, Pol Pot and Ieng Sari in Cambodia and Hitler in Germany. It will be the memories of the unknown numbers of victims, of concentration camps, torture, murder, exile, families torn apart, death, tears and blood. Castro will go down in history as one of the cruelest of all dictators -- a man who tormented his own people.

But his poisonous legacy will also include the double standard by foreign governments, intellectuals and journalists who fought ferociously against the unspeakable violations of human rights by right-wing dictatorships, yet applauded Castro. To this day many of these intellectuals serve as apologists and accomplices in the subjugation of the Cuban people. Rafael Correa, the recently inaugurated president of Ecuador, has declared that in Cuba there is no dictatorship. Evo Morales, president of Bolivia, considers Castro his mentor and has already shown that he is willing to silence his own critics at the point of a gun. Venezuela, once a democracy, is the new Cuba, replete with a growing population of political prisoners.

Castro hemmed and hawed in the early 1960s, concealing his ideological allegiance to the most murderous system of government humanity has ever experienced. Today's Latin American caudillos openly express their allegiance to communist ideals. "I am very much of Trotsky's line -- the permanent revolution," Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez said in January.

If we have learned anything from Fidel Castro, it is that the totalitarian impulse outlives even its most hardened -- and ruinous -- practitioners.

Mr. Valladares, former U.S. ambassador to the U.N. Commission on Human Rights, is chairman of the New York-based Human Rights Foundation and author of "Against All Hope: A Memoir of Life in Castro's Gulag" (National Book Network, 2001).

The House's Ottoman Agenda (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Can a nonbinding congressional resolution really matter? Most are ignored by everyone except the special interests they are usually directed at. Even the House's recent resolution on Iraq was dismissed by both President Bush and Democratic antiwar leader John Murtha. Yet a vote expected next month on a nonbinding House resolution describing a "genocide" in the Ottoman Empire beginning in 1915 has the potential to explode U.S. relations with Turkey, sway the outcome of upcoming Turkish elections and spill over into several other strategic American interests, including Iraq and Iran.

So, yes: The Armenian Genocide Resolution sponsored by Rep. Adam Schiff does matter, logically or not. Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul spent several days in Washington last month lobbying against it, though the Turkish-American agenda is chockablock with seemingly more important issues. Friends of Turkey in Washington, from American Jewish organizations to foreign policy satraps, are working the Hill; so is the Bush team. On the other side is the well-organized and affluent Armenian American community, 1.4 million strong, and some powerful friends -- including the new House speaker, Nancy Pelosi.

Here is a debate that could occur only in Washington -- a bizarre mix of frivolity and moral seriousness, of constituent pandering, far-flung history and front-line foreign policy. And that's just on the American side; in Turkey there is the painful struggle of a deeply nationalist society to come to terms with its past, and in the process become more of the Western democracy it wants to be.

DOJ_NMG_0139502

Start with the pandering: Schiff, a Democrat from Los Angeles, cheerfully concedes that there are 70,000 to 80,000 ethnic Armenians in his district, for whom the slaughter of Armenians by the Young Turk regime during World War I is "anything but ancient history." Local politics also explains why a resolution that has failed numerous times in the past 20 years is suddenly looking like a juggernaut: Pelosi, of San Francisco, also has many Armenian supporters.

"There's a sense of momentum now about the resolution that we haven't had before," Schiff told me. "The votes are there in the committee. The votes are there on the floor." If Pelosi allows the resolution to be brought up, as she has reportedly pledged to do, it will probably pass. Its language is almost comically heavy-handed: It begins by declaring that the House "finds" a series of 30 paragraphs of facts about the genocide, ranging from the number killed (1.5 million) to the assertion that "the failure . . . to punish those responsible" helps explain subsequent atrocities, including the Holocaust.

Imagine the 435 members of the House, many of whom still don't know the difference between Iraqi Shiites and Sunnis, solemnly weighing whether Schiff's version of events 92 years ago in northeastern Turkey deserves congressional endorsement. But the consequences of passage could be deadly serious: To begin with, Turkey's powerful military has been hinting that U.S. access to the Incirlik air base, which plays a key role in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, could be restricted. Gul warned that a nationalist tidal wave could sweep Turkey and force the government to downgrade its cooperation with the United States, which needs Turkey's help this year to stabilize Iraq and contain Iran. Candidates in upcoming presidential and parliamentary elections could compete in their anti-American reactions.

No wonder the Bush administration as well as even Democratic-leaning foreign policy experts, such as Clinton-era ambassador Mark Parris, are trying to stop the resolution. Yet theirs, too, is a contorted campaign. After all, historians outside of Turkey are pretty much unanimous in agreeing that atrocities against Armenians worthy of the term genocide did occur. Though Congress may look silly with its "findings," the continuing inability of the Turkish political class to come to terms with history, and temper its nationalism, may be the country's single most serious political problem. Prominent Turkish intellectuals, including a Nobel Prize winner, have been prosecuted in recent years under laws criminalizing "insults" to Turkey -- such as accurate accounts of the genocide. In January a prominent ethnic Armenian journalist was murdered by an ultranationalist teenager.

Maybe Congress has no business debating Turkish history, maybe it is doing so for the wrong reasons. Yet if Turkey is to become the stable, Western-oriented democracy that it aspires to be, its politicians will have to learn, at least, to react the way everyone else does to nonbinding House resolutions: that is, with a shrug.

Doctors Without Refuge (WP)

By Leonard S. Rubenstein

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

In war, health workers are often heroes and often victims. Though the Geneva Conventions are supposed to protect them as they fulfill their ethical duty to provide care to wounded combatants without regard to affiliation -- what is known as medical neutrality -- they frequently become targets by attending to the enemies of one side or another.

The United States has always stood up for the protection of health workers in war, condemning violations of medical neutrality. And until now, it has offered asylum to doctors, nurses and other health workers forced to flee their home countries after they complied with their obligations to treat any and all wounded. But in another instance of the corrosion of human rights that has been the hallmark of this administration since Sept. 11, 2001 -- including torture, secret detention and denial of due process -- the Department of Homeland Security is contesting asylum requests by health workers whose lives are at risk for having provided assistance to wounded members of rebel groups.

The government claims that providing such medical care amounts to prohibited "material support" to terrorists and thus is a basis for denying asylum. Its position is as radical a departure from past practice -- where it protested interference with a physician's duty to treat without political distinction -- as it is chilling. For example, the State Department's human rights report for 1999 condemned the Serbian government of Slobodan Milosevic for having "threatened and intimidated doctors working in the province to prevent them from treating [Kosovo Liberation Army] members."

DOJ_NMG_0139503

The reversal is even more dramatically illustrated by the position the U.S. government took regarding a physician caught up in the brutal war in Chechnya. Performing surgery in late 1999 and early 2000 under conditions resembling those of the American Civil War, this doctor adhered to the highest traditions of medicine and medical ethics and saved the lives of civilians, Russian soldiers and Chechen rebels. Because he treated fighters from both sides, though, the physician became a target of Russian forces as well as the rebel groups. The rebels distrusted and threatened him while Russian forces labeled him the "bandit doctor." He was detained overnight and later warned by both Russian and Chechen fighters that he could be arrested and executed.

The doctor escaped and, with the help of the U.S. Embassy, made his way to the United States. When he applied for asylum, his request, as someone persecuted for upholding medical ethics in wartime, was granted in a mere two weeks.

But now the U.S. government is appealing an immigration judge's decision granting asylum to a Nepalese health worker who was twice kidnapped by a Maoist group that wanted him to attend to a wounded rebel. It rejected the asylum claim of a Colombian nurse who was kidnapped by the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, assaulted and forced at gunpoint to provide medical care to its members.

These actions are part of a larger and disturbing pattern of denying asylum even for victims of the most horrific human rights violations. A report by Human Rights First last year showed how the Department of Homeland Security's interpretation of the ban on providing "material support" to terrorists has extended to victims of abuse, such as a journalist who gave money to a rebel group after being beaten and a fisherman who was abducted and forced to pay ransom for his release.

The administration's interpretation goes far beyond what the law requires. Indeed, medical care is not even included among the practices Congress listed as amounting to "material support." In response to an outcry about its policy, the administration said it would offer selected waivers from the "material support" exclusion. While providing justice for some, that stance doesn't begin to restore the commitment to refugee protection that has been central to our values and our policies.

Congress must revise the law to protect medical ethics and restore America's commitment to being a place of refuge for those fleeing persecution. This step is also essential to revive principles of medical neutrality. Just as the government diminished itself and U.S. standing by adopting perverse interpretations of law and medical ethics to justify torture and to enlist doctors' help in breaking down detainees, it is undermining America's long and critical support for medical services for the wounded in war.

The writer is executive director of Physicians for Human Rights.

Capital Marketplace (WSJ)

By Charlie Mccreevy

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

Are the lights being switched off on Wall Street and lighting up in Frankfurt, Paris and London? Is the water being drained out of the East River and diverted straight into the River Thames?

You might think so judging by recent speeches, reports and articles on America's, and in particular New York's, competitiveness from Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson, Mayor Michael Bloomberg, Sen. Chuck Schumer and others.

I don't disagree with them that change is underway. European Union capital market revenues are growing by an impressive 20% a year, compared to only 7% in America. The U.S. share of global IPOs has fallen to 16% last year from 57% in 2001, while Europe's has gone up to 63% from 33% during the same period.

Many seem to see the regulatory burden of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, such as Section 404, as a significant reason for reduced U.S. capital market competitiveness. The detailed requirements for internal control of public companies have turned out to be extremely expensive to implement. Some in London have gone as far as to suggest, tongue-in-cheek, erecting statues for Sarbanes and Oxley. This is silly talk.

For one thing, anything that hurts U.S. capital markets also hurts European companies and our economy. Economic integration runs deep, particularly in financial markets. Companies active on both sides of the Atlantic are also affected by the rules on both sides of the Atlantic. Competitiveness is a two-way street.

We in Europe have improved the competitiveness of our financial markets by integrating, changing our financial regulatory structures, adopting best practice and transparent policy making, and avoiding intervention except when really necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0139504

As European commissioner in this area, my approach is simple: We should not and cannot prescribe rules for every conceivable situation. There is a difference between accountancy and rocket science. The latter is science; the former is not and shouldn't be. Regulation must allow and encourage new ideas and innovation. As an accountant by profession, I might be expected to empathize with the urge some regulators seem to have to control every detail. But I think that box-ticking alone doesn't work. We need responsible judgment and disclosure.

This is why I strongly favor a principles-based over a rules-based approach. Eliminating all risk is an illusion and will lead to unwanted consequences: less innovation and growth, a false sense of security, and reduced pressure to behave responsibly. That is why I reject the siren calls for tougher regulation of hedge funds in Europe and why I strongly agree with the recent report of the President's Working Group on this issue. We must not endanger the benefits hedge funds and private equity have brought. They have increased efficiency and liquidity in our capital markets while keeping company managers on their toes. Are the regulatory hawks perhaps trying to protect weak management from shareholder activism?

What the EU and U.S. both need is top-class regulation based on best practice -- sound investor protection, balanced with a good dose of freedom for market participants. But if we want to have competitive and open capital markets in the U.S. and EU, we need to do something else: cooperate. We need to build on the regulatory pillars of the U.S., EU and other mature economies, based on equivalent but not identical standards that work for our investors and our markets.

Over the past few years, I have worked with Christopher Cox, Ben Bernanke, John Snow, Hank Paulson, Mark Olson and others to build this new cooperation. For example, we are moving towards equivalent and comparable accounting standards so that we can avoid costly reconciliation between Europe's International Financial Reporting Standards and the U.S. GAAP. The U.S. also agreed to reduce the regulatory burden of Sarbanes-Oxley by introducing more flexible timelines for the implementation of Section 404 for foreign firms. And we are getting rid of the Hotel California problem on foreign deregistration. Under current SEC rules companies are welcome to enter the U.S. stock market but can (almost) never leave again. Only companies with fewer than 300 U.S. shareholders can deregister. The new SEC proposal would allow those foreign companies to deregister whose U.S. trading volume is less than 5% of the trading volume in their primary market. This would markedly increase the number of EU firms eligible for deregistration and improve the situation.

But we need to do more. And the need to do so is growing every day as trans-Atlantic markets further integrate. So we have to shift up a gear and chart a route to recognize each other's audit oversight bodies, implement the Basel II banking accord in a way that benefits banks and customers on both sides, and move to a risk-based system of reinsurance regulation that benefits homeowners and policyholders alike. I am in Washington and New York this week to promote this agenda.

Transatlantic regulatory cooperation in capital markets should lead from the front. If we can show that it works then Japan, China, India, Russia and others will join us. This would be a big win-win for the global economy -- and guarantee that the boats will keep bobbing in the East River.

Mr. McCreevy is EU commissioner for the internal market and services.

Taking Genocide To Court (NYT)

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

Genocide moves swiftly, kills promiscuously and keeps finding new perpetrators, despite the world's repeated vows of "never again."

In the face of such rampaging horror, carefully considered court verdicts, like last week's World Court ruling on the 1995 Srebrenica massacre in Bosnia, and patiently assembled dossiers, like the one that International Criminal Court prosecutors have now filed against two accused masterminds of Darfur's ongoing slaughter, seem frustratingly inadequate.

Yet short of the international military interventions that never seem to come in time, the incremental enforcement of international law is one of the most important tools available for establishing accountability and deterring future genocides.

Genocide became an international crime almost 60 years ago. But no country was ever prosecuted for it until Bosnia accused Serbia of direct responsibility for the murder of nearly 8,000 Muslim men and boys in Srebrenica. The World Court, which rules on disputes between nations, concluded that genocide did take place, and that while the Serbian government of that period had not directly ordered the murders, it “could and should” have acted to stop them, as the United Nations Convention on Genocide requires.

DOJ_NMG_0139505

That nuanced distinction, based on evidence collected by the special tribunal that tried Slobodan Milosevic, the former Serbian leader, and other individuals accused of Balkan war crimes, spared Serbia from costly financial reparations. But it also established the official complicity of the former Serbian government.

That is something the current Serbian government now needs to acknowledge. Belgrade should also heed the court’s formal order to turn over Ratko Mladic, the Bosnian Serb general who directed the Srebrenica genocide.

The Darfur cases are being pursued in the International Criminal Court, which prosecutes individuals for grave violations of international law. The first two suspects sought for trial are Ahmad Harun, formerly Sudan’s minister in charge of Darfur security, and Ali Muhammad Ali Abd-al-Rahman, a janjaweed militia commander. Mr. Harun is accused of inciting, financing and arming militia fighters to conduct genocidal attacks. Mr. Rahman is charged with directing one such attack that resulted in hundreds of deaths, systematic rapes and summary executions.

Court rulings can never compensate the survivors of these horrors. But by strengthening the reach and authority of international law, these cases should give pause to those tempted to unleash future genocides — and to those who stand by.

Malaria Pills Without Profit (NYT)

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

The big pharmaceutical companies are rightly criticized for concentrating on the development and marketing of drugs that sell for high prices in the industrialized world while neglecting to produce medications that could save millions of lives in the poorest countries. So it came as especially welcome news last week that Paris-based Sanofi-Aventis, the world’s fourth-largest drug company, working in collaboration with a nonprofit drug-development organization pioneered by Doctors Without Borders, will soon introduce a cheap and easy-to-use pill to combat malaria in sub-Saharan Africa.

The pill combines two drugs that are already in use into a single medication that can be taken once a day for three days by young children and twice a day for three days by adults to cure the infection.

The course of treatment is notably cheap — less than 50 cents for children and less than $1 for adults. Sanofi will make no profit on sales to public health agencies and international institutions that typically serve poor people. But it will also produce a branded version to be sold in the private markets of developing countries at three or four times the public price.

To its additional credit, the company has agreed not to seek a patent on the one-pill formulation so that generic companies, like those in India, can produce the pills cheaply and add to the quantities of medicine needed to treat many millions of malaria victims around the world.

Now that Sanofi has shown, in the words of one executive, that “we are not nasty people working against poor countries and seeking only profits,” let us hope that many other big drug companies feel the same humanitarian impulse.

Brussels Punching Bag (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

Each round of the European Union's battle royal with Microsoft has revealed more about flaws in the bloc's antitrust office than about the stubbornness of the American software giant. Brussels' latest sucker punch is no exception.

Last Thursday, EU antitrust czarina Neelie Kroes threatened to fine Microsoft up to €3 million, or about $4 million, a day because she doesn't like the prices the company wants to charge for licensing its technology. The fines, which would come on top of nearly $1 billion in previous penalties in the three-year-old case, are retroactive to December 2005 and could total as much as $1 billion through last month. Microsoft has four weeks to respond.

The technology in question would allow non-Microsoft servers to work with servers and PCs that run the firm's Windows software. Ms. Kroes claims that "there is no significant innovation" in the programming codes to justify the prices Microsoft has set.

But exactly how "innovativeness" should be measured in this case is disputed. Microsoft notes that agencies in the U.S. and Europe have granted 36 patents for this technology, with 37 applications still pending. "This seems to be a case of one government agency [patent offices] disagreeing with another government agency [the Commission]," Microsoft General Counsel

DOJ_NMG_0139506

Brad Smith tells us. "The first agency actually has the expertise" to make these judgments, he adds. "The second says, 'We're not going to adhere to what they said.'"

So Brussels no longer acts as merely prosecutor, judge, jury and executioner in antitrust cases; it now claims the power to assess the worth of patents, too. While no doubt the patent systems on both sides of the Atlantic could use some work, that doesn't seem to be the issue here.

The heart of the matter is revealed in Ms. Kroes's observation that other software makers provide comparable interoperability technologies at no cost. EU antitrust officials make no secret of their preference for the open-source business model practiced by the companies behind all the complaints against Microsoft, among them such heavyweights as IBM, Sun Microsystems and Oracle. Many of these firms don't want to pay anything to license Microsoft's technology.

The Commission insists that it isn't asking Microsoft to give away technology that has cost it multiple millions to develop. In practice, though, that seems to be just what Brussels wants. Commission officials are either unwilling or unable to describe exactly what Microsoft would have to do for its technology to be deemed "new" enough. It's the old story of the EU punishing Microsoft for not meeting a standard that was never specified.

If Microsoft's response doesn't satisfy Ms. Kroes, she could level an enormous fine for the second time since last April, when an EU court in Luxembourg heard Microsoft's appeal of the original ruling. The Commission argues that it is well within its rights to enforce its ruling unless it is overturned. And that's true.

But the EU antitrust office has a poor track record with the Luxembourg court: Several high-profile decisions by Ms. Kroes's predecessor, Mario Monti, who issued the original Microsoft ruling in 2004, have been overturned on appeal. So one has to wonder if the Commission is hedging its bets by issuing a series of fines, each of which Microsoft would have to appeal even if it wins the primary case. Perhaps the EU's logic is that if the company wins the primary case on appeal -- a ruling is expected shortly -- it may still be willing to settle the noncompliance fines simply to get the Commission out of its hair. Thus the EU wouldn't come away empty-handed after such an epic fight.

Maybe such thinking is too cynical even for eurocrats. But even if that's not their intent, threatening another multimillion-dollar fine when the appeals court is due to rule soon on the original judgment smacks of spite.

DOJ_NMG_0139507

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, MARCH 5, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Arab Bank Accused Of Funding Terrorists (LAT) 3
Terror Case Prosecutor Assails Defense Lawyer (NYT) 4

Homeland Response:
Holt Wants Hearings On FBI Anthrax Investigation (AP) 5
Flirting With Disaster (editorial) (WP) 6
Sensible Security Fixes (WP) 6

War News:
Bush, Cheney Turn Focus To Terrorism (WT) 7
Hundreds Of U.S., Iraqi Troops Sweep Sadr City (USAT) 7
Basra Raid Finds Prisoners With Signs Of Torture (WP) 8
U.S. Gingerly Enters Sensitive Iraq Neighborhood (LAT) 9
Notes From Baghdad (WSJ) 10
U.S. Hopes For Results In Iraq Outreach (AP) 11
Basra Raid Finds Dozens Detained By Iraq Spy Unit (NYT) 12
Iraq Ousts 10,000 In Security Ministry (USAT) 14
No U.S. Backup Strategy For Iraq (WP) 15
How To Stop Genocide In Iraq (LAT) 16
Supplemental Sows Discord (RC) 18
Democrats Benefit From Public Shift On War (WT) 19
Iraq: Silence Of The Sadrists (NSWK) 20
The Things That Get You (USNEWS) 21
10 Questions For Ted Kennedy (TIME) 22
Confronting Iraq's Exodus (TIME) 23
Syria. (TIME) 24
Sweden. (TIME) 24
Japan Weighs Extending Iraq Mission (AP) 26
Bilateral Talks With U.S. Still On The Table (WT) 26
16 Civilians Die As U.S. Troops Fire On Afghan Road (NYT) 27
Insurgents Strike Marine Convoy; 10 Dead In Melee (WT/AP) ... 28
Marines Open Fire After Afghan Ambush (WP) 29
8 Afghans Die After Attack On U.S. Convoy (LAT) 30
New Justice, No Peace (NYT) 31
Cheney In The War Zone (TIME) 31
Cheney Gets To See A Resurgent Taliban (NSWK) 32
Senators: Pakistan Must Address Al-Qaida (AP) 33
Where Does Al Qaeda Stand Now? (CSM) 34

DOJ:
Domenici Says He Called Fired Prosecutor (AP) 35
Domenici Says He Contacted Prosecutor (WP) 36
Senator Sought Dismissal Of New Mexico Prosecutor (NYT) 38
GOP Lawmakers Played A Role In U.S. Attorney Purge (NSWK) 38
Editorial: Stop The Bush Purge (MJS) 39

Criminal Law:
FBI Helps Probe Kremlin Critic's Shooting (WSJ) 39
Doubts Over KGB Link To US Shooting (FT) 40
Analyst Robbed During Shooting (WP) 41
Intelligence Specialist's Shooting Stirs Speculation (WP) 42
Attorney General To Investigate Maywood Police (LAT) 43
Matty 'The Horse' On His Last Ride (AP) 43
Mistrial Sought In Federal Capital Case (WT) 45
Federal Act Preventing County Prosecutors From Trying Olsen (AP) 46
Nevada Governor Retains Top Lawyer (WSJ) 46
Nearly 20% Of Released Sex Felons Are Missing (SAEN) 46
FBI Watching Mortgage Fraud (MBSN) 48
Arrest Sparks Worries Over Implications Of Corporate Law (HC/AP) 48
D'Amato Never Folds (NYT) 49
A Record Of Failure At Center For Sex Offenders (NYT) 51
Early Struggles Helped Forge Lanier's Resilience (WP) 55

Civil Law:
FEDERAL DIARY: Slowing Down The Revolving Door (WP) 57

Civil Rights:
Neighbors Of Ruined Store Call For Healing (OWH) 58
Ruling Awaited On Contested Ga. Tech Policies (WT) 59
Disabled Woman Is Able Ally For Parents (LAT) 59
NAACP Leader Quits Over Group's Focus (WT/AP) 61
President Is Leaving N.A.A.C.P. (NYT) 62
NAACP President Quits, Cites Conflicts (WP) 64
Education, Education, Education (NYT) 65
Governor Gunslinger (NYT) 65

Antitrust:
The Big Deal Goes Green (TIME) 66
Intellectual Property Verdicts Exceed $1.3 Billion In 2006 (LAW) 67
N.Y. Federal Judge Rebuffs Recusal Motion Citing Clients Of Husband's Firm (LAW) 68
Judge Dismisses Lucent Patent Suit Against Microsoft (WSJ) ... 70
Open Call From The Patent Office (WP) 70

Indian Affairs:

Tribe Slave Descendants Face Uncertainty (HC/AP)..... 71

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Sending Investigators To Guatemala Ahead Of Bush Visit (MCT)..... 72
In Guatemala, Officers' Killings Echo Dirty War (NYT)..... 73
Reddit Washington Whispers (USNEWS)..... 75
Brown-on-black Violence Plagues South State (SACBEE)..... 76
Cash And Cocaine, But No Conviction (WP)..... 77
Texas Man Convicted Of Cocaine Distribution, Money Laundering (SHREVET)..... 79
Top Bodybuilders Allegedly Received Steroids From Internet Pharmacy (NYDN)..... 79
Internet Brings Drug Dealing Into The Home (ALBANYTU)..... 80
Schumer Calls For HGH Regulation (NSDY)..... 81
Marigolds Make Way For Marijuana In Suburbia (CSM)..... 82
Bust Yields Bumper Crop Of Pot Farms In Basements (AJC) 83
Police: Couple Ran Pot Farm At Home (PL)..... 85
Lafayette Man Pleads Guilty In Pot-candy Case (SFC)..... 85
Drug Smugglers Reroute Shipments Via Central America (LAT) 86
Drug Smugglers Reroute Shipments Via Central America (LAT) 88

Immigration:

Bush's Last Chance On Immigration (TIME)..... 90

Tax:

Here Comes The AMT (USNEWS)..... 91

Congress-Administration:

Senators Vow Quick Action On Walter Reed (AP)..... 92
Democrats Fume Over Walter Reed Scandal (LAT)..... 93
Walter Reed Hearing To Put Spotlight On Kiley's Leadership (WP)..... 93
US Army Scrambles To Clean Walter Reed (CSM)..... 95
'It Is Just Not Walter Reed' (WP)..... 96
Army Hospitals: Finally, Some Action (NSWK)..... 98
Reddit Washington Whispers (USNEWS)..... 98
Focus Is On Veterans' Chief As Inquiries On Care Begin (NYT) 99
Valor And Squalor (NYT)..... 101
At The Pentagon, Gates Seen As Liberator (WP)..... 102
World Bank Slow To Inform Employees Of Baghdad Shooting (WP)..... 103
Out Of Stocks, And Into ...? (WSJ)..... 104
Mortgage Crisis Spirals, And Casualties Mount (NYT)..... 106
From Serving In Iraq To Living On The Streets (WP)..... 108
For Rep. Sanchez, A Hot-tomato Label Means A Hot Potato (LAT)..... 109
A Senator's Railroad No-Brainer (WP)..... 111
Going Down With The Ships (WP)..... 112
Deep Trouble For Deepwater (USNEWS)..... 113
That Film's Real Message? It Could Be: 'Buy A Ticket' (NYT).. 115
Blog The Debt Away (NYT)..... 116

Other News:

Without Health Benefits, A Good Life Turns Fragile (NYT)..... 116
Oil Innovations Pump New Life Into Old Wells (NYT)..... 118
Romney: Blogs More Open Than Mainstream Media (POL) 120
Romney Gets The Nod From CPAC (FT)..... 123
CPAC Embraces Steele, Gingrich (WT)..... 123
A Mood Of Gloom At CPAC (POL)..... 125
Giuliani's Not-so-wild Card In 2008 (USAT)..... 126
The Real Rudy Giuliani: A Profile (NSWK)..... 127
What Makes Rudy Run (USNEWS)..... 131
Alter: Wrong Time For An Urban Cowboy? (NSWK)..... 132
Clinton, Obama Praise Civil Rights Achievements (USAT)..... 132
Clintons, Obama Honor Activists In Selma (AP)..... 133
Candidates Obama, Clinton Vie For Black Voters In Selma (MCT)..... 134
Crowds Jam Selma Churches To See Obama, Clinton (AJC).. 135
Obama Praises Selma Achievements (USAT)..... 136
Obama, Clinton Seek Votes At Civil Rights Landmark (CHIT).. 137
Clinton And Obama Unite In Pleas To Blacks (NYT)..... 138
Clinton, Obama Link Selma March To Present (WP)..... 139
Davis Hits HRC On War Vote As Obama Ties Himself To Movement (POL)..... 141
Silicon Valley Looks To Obama (WT)..... 141
The Senator's 'Streak' Ends At 57th Vote (WP)..... 142
Weekend At Obama's (WSJ)..... 143
Clinton Brings Debt Worries To The Fore (WSJ)..... 143
Crafting The New Hillary (USNEWS)..... 144
Bloomberg: The Waiting Game (NSWK)..... 146
The Kucinich Conundrum (TIME)..... 146
Susan Collins May Be Vulnerable, But Don't Underestimate Her (RC)..... 147
City Council Race Shows Changed Face Of Beverly Hills (WSJ)148
Justice Restored (WP)..... 150
Bush Poised To Counter Chávez (WSJ)..... 150
Chavez Calls Envoy 'Professional Killer' (AP)..... 151
Chávez's Oil Largesse Winning Fans Abroad (CSM)..... 152
U.S. To Offer North Korea Face-Saving Nuclear Plan (NYT) ... 153
US, North Korea Begin Thaw In Relations (AFP)..... 154
N. Korea: Intelligence And Uncertainty (NSWK)..... 155
Kim Jong Il's Word (WSJ)..... 156
Key Lawmakers Complain Of Weak Intelligence (WT)..... 156
North Korea Climbdown (WSJ)..... 157
Saudi-Iran Meeting Yields Little Substance (NYT)..... 158
Iran, Saudi Hail 'friendly' Meeting (FT)..... 160
Iran President, Saudis Vow Cooperation (AP)..... 160
Saudi Arabia, Iran Target Mideast's Sectarian Discord (CSM) . 161
Palestinian Leaders Try To Resolve Split Over Key Posts (NYT)162
School Linked To Hamas Gets U.S. Cash (WT)..... 163
White House Tussles On Doha (WSJ)..... 165
Beijing Accelerates Its Military Spending (NYT)..... 166
China Boosts Military Spending (WP)..... 167
Chinese Military Spending To Rise By 18% (FT)..... 168
China's Military Buildup Spurs Concerns (WSJ)..... 169
China Boosts Defense Fund As Talks End (WT)..... 170
Paulson Doesn't See China As Enemy (WT/AP)..... 170
Paulson Renews Yuan-Reform Talk (WSJ/AP)..... 171
Britain's Gordon Brown: A Change In Tone For US (CSM)..... 172
EU-India Trade Pact Stumbles (FT)..... 173

DOJ_NMG_0139509

Ivory Coast Leader Signs Accord With Rebels (NYT) 174
Sweden's Pension Antidote Finds A Global Audience (WSJ) ... 174
Castro's Gulag (WSJ) 176
The House's Ottoman Agenda (WP) 177
Doctors Without Refuge (WP)..... 178
Capital Marketplace (WSJ) 178
Taking Genocide To Court (NYT) 179
Malaria Pills Without Profit (NYT) 180
Brussels Punching Bag (WSJ)..... 180

TERRORISM NEWS:

Arab Bank Accused Of Funding Terrorists (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — A three-year investigation into the activities of one of the Middle East's largest and most influential banks is producing extensive evidence of how tens of millions of dollars have flowed from wealthy Saudi Arabians to Palestinian groups that allegedly used some of the money to pay off suicide bombers and their survivors.

The information being turned up by government inquiries and lawyers suing Arab Bank "will give people a better understanding of the way money moves in that part of the world to support Hamas" and other militant groups in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, said Stephen Kroll, a terrorism finance specialist and until recently counsel to the U.S. Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs.

"It's important in focusing the public's attention on the issue of what is and what is not acceptable for banks to be involved in," Kroll said.

The Justice Department is conducting a criminal investigation into the New York branch of Arab Bank, which is based in Jordan, and its financial links to organizations and individuals accused of terrorism, according to three former U.S. counter-terrorism officials.

In 2005, the bank agreed to pay the federal government $24 million in fines for violating U.S. laws aimed at preventing terrorist financing, including failing to report suspicious transactions.

The bank is also being sued in federal court in Brooklyn by Americans and Israelis injured in suicide bombings or other fighting in Israel and the occupied territories, and by the relatives of others who were killed. No trial date has been set, but assuming the cases go to trial, they could establish ground rules for what obligations banks have in handling money bound for militant groups. They could also provide an unusually detailed and public look at the flow of money from Saudi donors to Palestinian groups that the U.S. and Israel list as terrorist.

Lawyers suing Arab Bank accuse the firm of facilitating acts of terrorism by providing accounts and other financial services to Hamas, Islamic Jihad and similar groups. Arab Bank also acted as the administrator of a plan in which suicide bombers and others designated as "martyrs" by the Palestinian Authority and other organizations were compensated for their actions on a sliding scale, based on the extent of their injuries, according to documents filed in the cases. The lawsuits charge that the payments — and thus Arab Bank — provided an incentive for suicide bombings.

Arab Bank officials deny such charges and say they have never knowingly supported acts of terrorism. Bank officials say their agreement to pay the fine in 2005 was not an acknowledgment of any wrongdoing.

Bank officials say they provide an important financial service in the impoverished Palestinian territories and that they were merely acting as intermediaries between banks representing Saudi donors and Palestinian organizations and individuals who were being compensated for suffering at Israeli hands.

They also say that a "martyr" can mean almost any Palestinian killed or injured as part of the struggle with Israel, including innocent victims.

"Arab Bank had reason to believe these were humanitarian payments or social welfare payments, and there was certainly nothing in any of the public information that suggested to the bank at the time that these were in any way [meant] to induce terrorism or reward terrorism," said Robert Chlopak, a Washington-based spokesman for the bank.

Chlopak said the bank had checked out clients and transactions and that it did not process any payments to individuals or organizations that were designated as terrorist.

In one instance in which plaintiffs' lawyers allege that Arab Bank maintained an account for Hamas in Beirut, bank officials said that once they learned of the suspicious account, they froze it and reported it to authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0139510

Arab Bank also said that it was primarily transferring funds sent to it from other banks on behalf of legitimate Saudi donors that have not been linked to terrorist activities. To win their case, the plaintiffs' lawyers would have to prove that Arab Bank knew that it was doing business with terrorist individuals or entities.

In 2005, the Treasury Department and the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency found that Arab Bank's New York branch had transferred funds between 2001 and 2004 for organizations that were later designated by the U.S. as terrorist groups. The Treasury Department said the bank had "largely complied" with the requirement to stop the transfers after the groups were identified.

But the department said that after the government designated these groups as terrorist, the bank failed to go back and review its accounts to see what dealings it had had with them and report any suspicious activities.

Some of the initial allegations in the lawsuits, most of which were filed in 2004, were based on documents seized by the Israeli military during raids on charities, businesses and other locations in the West Bank and Gaza in 2002. Among the documents were records indicating that Arab Bank provided financial services for Hamas and at least 41 organizations and individuals allegedly related to it or to Islamic Jihad.

Plaintiffs' lawyers Gary Osen and Michael Elsner used those records as a jumping-off point for a wider investigation in which they have gained access to tens of thousands of financial records from Arab Bank.

The records detail financial transactions that began in 2000 with the start of the second Palestinian intifada, or uprising. Saudi government officials created two special fundraising committees to help Palestinians battle Israeli forces and otherwise resist the occupation, according to court documents.

One of them, the Saudi Committee for Aid to the Al Quds Intifada, decreed that the life of anyone who died as a "martyr" in the conflict with Israel was worth 20,000 Saudi riyals, about $5,300 at the time. The committee began wiring that sum into accounts that families were instructed to set up at Arab Bank branches, the lawsuits allege. The average Palestinian salary is about $3,000 a year.

In all, the Saudi Committee made about 200,000 wire transfers for the Palestinian cause, totaling more than $90 million, Shukry Bishara, Arab Bank's chief banking officer, said in a court declaration. Much of that money went to pay for hospitals and social welfare programs, or to compensate people injured or imprisoned — or the families of those killed — in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

But the money also included an undetermined amount paid to the families of suicide bombers, and those injured or imprisoned by Israel, according to the lawsuits.

The plaintiffs allege that bank officials knew that those listed as "martyrs" included suicide bombers because it was publicly advertised. They cited a Feb. 10, 2001, edition of the Saudi newspaper Al Jazirah in which the Saudi Committee listed the names of Palestinian martyrs, including those killed in suicide bombings, whose families received payments.

Several lawmakers and Bush administration officials involved in the investigation of Arab Bank have expressed concerns about its activities.

At one House Finance Committee hearing in May 2005, Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey said that during his visit to the West Bank city of Ramallah to discuss the issue, the Arab Bank manager for the Palestinian territories told him that he "had not filed a single suspicious activity report in the past two years across all the Arab Bank branches in the West Bank and in Gaza."

"It appears that such controls were indeed sorely lacking at Arab Bank across all of their global operation," Levey said.

Terror Case Prosecutor Assails Defense Lawyer (NYT)

By Raymond Bonner

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

SYDNEY, Australia, March 4 — The chief prosecutor for the American military commissions that will try suspected terrorists being held at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, has lashed out at the military lawyer for one of the detainees, a newspaper here reported in its weekend edition.

The prosecutor, Col. Morris D. Davis, said that the lawyer, Maj. Michael Mori of the United States Marine Corps, should not be making public appearances in Australia in uniform on behalf of his client, David Hicks, and that he faced possible prosecution for some of his remarks.

“I don’t know what Major Mori’s plans are right now but if he wants to come back home and represent his client, that would be helpful,” Colonel Davis was quoted as saying by The Australian. “Certainly in the U.S. it would not be tolerated having a U.S. marine in uniform actively inserting himself into the political process. It is very disappointing to see that happening in Australia, and if that was any of my prosecutors, they would be held accountable.”

DOJ_NMG_0139511

Colonel Davis, who is an Air Force lawyer, added that it would be up to the Marine Corps whether to charge Major Mori with violation of Article 88 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which makes it a crime for a military officer to use "contemptuous words" about the president, vice president, secretary of defense and other high public officials.

Major Mori, who was in Australia this past week, for the seventh time in three years, reacted with anger. "Are they trying to intimidate me?" he said in a telephone interview on Sunday.

He compared Colonel Davis's statements with remarks made last year by a senior Pentagon official, Charles D. Stimson, who was then the deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, who said that corporations should consider not using law firms that represented Guantánamo detainees pro bono. His remarks brought a torrent of objections, and he was forced to resign.

Col. Dwight Sullivan, the chief defense counsel in the military commissions procedure, said in an interview on Sunday night in Washington that Major Mori's behavior was "absolutely proper." Colonel Sullivan, a Marine lawyer, said that under military ethics rules, "a military defense lawyer is supposed to provide the same level of representation as a civilian lawyer." He said that in pressing Mr. Hicks's case in Australia, "Major Mori is fulfilling his duty as an officer and as an attorney."

Colonel Davis, reached by e-mail Sunday night, said his comments reflected his view that Major Mori's remarks in Australia had crossed the threshold of what was proper for a military defense lawyer. He said his remarks did not mean he was pressing for any action to be taken against Major Mori, only that he believed that the major had gone too far.

"Most of the defense counsel say the commissions are unfair and criticize the process as they are entitled to do," Colonel Davis wrote in response to a request for comment. But he said that Major Mori "goes further than any defense counsel I've ever known."

Colonel Davis said that it was improper for Major Mori to have made statements alleging that the president, the secretary of defense and Congress "intentionally created a rigged system that guarantees convictions in order to cover up wrongdoing" and that "everyone involved is potentially guilty of war crimes greater than the charge against" Mr. Hicks.

Colonel Davis said he would not permit the prosecutors on his team to make equivalent comments or "inject themselves into the political picture in an allied country."

Major Mori has been strikingly blunt in his comments about the military commissions, on at least one occasion calling them kangaroo courts.

Major Mori has been a "very effective" advocate for his client, said a senior member of the government of the Australian prime minister, John Howard, on the condition that he not be identified because he was expressing a view that the government would not state publicly.

Last week, the United States military announced that it was filing only one charge against Mr. Hicks, for "material support for terrorism," a major reduction from the initial charges, which had included conspiracy to commit murder, attempted murder and aiding the enemy.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Holt Wants Hearings On FBI Anthrax Investigation (AP)

AP, March 5, 2007

TRENTON --Rep. Rush Holt (D-Princeton) wants hearings into what he says is a lack of headway in the FBI's investigation into the deadly anthrax attacks of 2001.

"It seems to me this investigation is not making progress. I can't say for sure. They won't brief me," Holt told The Times of Trenton for Saturday newspapers.

"Not briefing Congress on the status of the probe into the biggest biological attack in United States history is inexcusable," he said.

The anthrax attacks through the postal system killed five people across the country and sickened 17 in the weeks after Sept. 11, 2001. Investigators have not determined who was responsible for the attacks.

Over the years, Holt has been a vocal critic of the bureau's handling of the case, especially because anthrax contamination was found in mail facilities in and near Holt's district.

Holt on Friday called on four committee chairmen and one subcommittee chairman in the House to hold oversight hearings into the investigation. His request may carry more weight now that his party is in the majority in Congress.

Several earlier attempts to receive information failed. In September and October 2006, Holt formally requesting that the FBI brief Congress on the investigation. He was denied.

DOJ_NMG_0139512

In December, a bipartisan group of 32 House and Senate members called on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to direct that the FBI brief Congress on the investigation. That request was also denied.

Richard J. Kolko, a bureau spokesman, defended the handling of the anthrax probe, saying it is "one of the largest and most complex" ever conducted. He said the investigation is still a high priority.

Flirting With Disaster (editorial) (WP)

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

AMERICA HAS a bad habit of building in areas that don't make sense environmentally or actuarially. That habit has been aided and abetted by public officials who bend to the will of developers and their customers, despite storms, floods, earthquakes and other natural calamities that destroy lives and break banks. The latest example of this can be found in Florida. By rolling back insurance rates, spreading the risk and fiddling with its catastrophe fund, the Sunshine State has invited more development in dangerous places.

Make no mistake, Floridians needed relief from insurance premiums that had doubled or tripled. But in keeping a campaign promise to cut rates, Gov. Charlie Crist (R) and the legislature not only are gambling with the state's fiscal future but also are giving people an incentive to keep putting themselves in harm's way.

Florida is the country's first pin in hurricane alley. The major storms of the 2004 and 2005 seasons and their respective $20 billion and $10 billion payouts sent the insurance industry fleeing from the state. Those that stayed either stripped high-risk policyholders of coverage or jacked up premiums so high that they threatened to cripple Florida's economy, which is dependent upon development and the people who move there because of it.

So here's what Crist & Co. did: The state-run insurer of last resort, Citizens Property Insurance Corp., which is also the state's largest property insurer, rolled back planned rate increases. It can now spread the risk by offering other policies, such as fire and theft. And it will offer its subsidized rates to commercial property. Private companies buying reinsurance from the state at greatly reduced rates must pass the savings to consumers through lower premiums.

Meanwhile, the threshold for troubled insurers to tap into the Florida Hurricane Catastrophe Fund was dropped from $6 billion to $3 billion and the upper limit on claims to be paid out by the state was raised from $16 billion to $32 billion. There's only $1 billion in the fund. If another major storm hits Florida -- a likelihood on a par with the sun rising in the east -- the state is on the hook. The "no big deal, we'll just bond it out" attitude is as irresponsible as the "let's pray we don't get hit by another Big One" wishful thinking gripping many in Tallahassee.

We live in an era of rapid climate change with the potential for more frequent and more destructive storms. Everyone -- from politicians to the voters they aim to please -- must understand that there is a cost to offering below-market insurance that fuels unrestrained building in high-risk areas. Betting against Mother Nature is never a winning proposition.

Sensible Security Fixes (WP)

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

ALONG-DORMANT battle over the Department of Homeland Security's labor practices resurfaced last week in the Senate. The White House threatened to veto a generally sensible homeland security bill that was based on the Sept. 11 commission's recommendations, because of a provision that would allow Transportation Security Administration employees to engage in collective bargaining. In the Senate, 36 Republicans are promising to sustain that decision by President Bush.

He shouldn't veto, and they shouldn't vote to sustain if he does. Other employees of the Department of Homeland Security enjoy the benefits of collective bargaining without endangering Americans' safety. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), who sponsored the bill, points out that TSA employees have unnecessarily limited access to redress, which contributes to the TSA's high turnover, high absenteeism and low morale. Meanwhile, there's a lot more to the bill than this one provision.

The legislation, for example, proposes to distribute federal anti-terrorism grants to cities and states according to a formula that the bill's backers say will put the most money into regions that face the most risk. It would thus direct more money to high-risk cities such as Washington than would the House version. That's good but not good enough; the bill still requires that every state receive some money, regardless of risk. We hope the Senate reconsiders this wasteful formulation in coming days, especially after the farcical example of last year's Homeland Security grant-giving -- marked by huge declines in funding for New York City and Washington and huge increases for cities such as Louisville.

On the other hand, the bill contains a range of solid proposals -- from grants to ease communication among first responders to measures that would promote intelligence sharing. The bill's sponsors also exercised good sense when they excluded a requirement that all sea cargo containers be scanned for harmful materials before entering the United States. This bad idea made its way into the House version of the bill, its supporters claiming that it reflected the will of the Sept. 11 commission when in fact the panel supported no such measure. Requiring 100 percent scanning would be likely to disrupt trade and inflict massive costs on businesses and consumers with meager benefits. A pilot program testing the mere feasibility of scanning all containers is far from complete. If 100 percent scanning stays out of the legislation and Congress sends the money to areas that really need it, President Bush ought to forgo the politics and sign the bill.

DOJ_NMG_0139513

WAR NEWS:

Bush, Cheney Turn Focus To Terrorism (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

Both President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney will give speeches in the next few days on the war on terrorism, to the applause of Republicans who say the White House needs to be more aggressive in selling the successes in Iraq.

"The administration should step it up when it comes to messaging," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, who is one of the strongest supporters in Congress of the president's Iraq policy. "I think the president has to do more. People like myself have to do more."

Mr. Graham said the president is "doing a better job of connecting the outcome in Iraq to the global war on terror," but added that Mr. Bush should "mix it up" in how he communicates the war's stakes. "Don't always go to a place where there's a bunch of troops behind you," he said, referring to Mr. Bush's many speeches at military bases.

Mr. Bush will speak on Iraq and the war against terrorism tomorrow in a speech to the American Legion. Mr. Cheney will speak today to the Veterans of Foreign Wars legislative convention.

A senior Bush administration official, however, said that "more than anything else, the actions on the ground in Iraq, part in Baghdad, are going to dictate how it's interpreted, so, the president, we view his role in this is to give the broader context."

Politically, the White House is happy that the center of the Iraq war debate has shifted to Capitol Hill, giving the Democrats the chance to fail on their campaign promises to end the war.

"Some of the favorite things for Democrats to unite and kind of coalesce around is to be against the president," the senior official said. "I think as you saw in that House debate. We let them have that debate themselves."

After Democrats predicted last month that 40 to 50 Republicans would vote for a nonbinding resolution against Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, only 17 Republicans defected.

"The president's going to stay at a certain level on this," the Bush official said. "We're not going to get in the weeds of the political debate on Capitol Hill."

Some Republicans on Capitol Hill say this has been the best political strategy, allowing the debate to focus on the merits of each sides' arguments and whether the Democrats have a plan, instead of uniting Democrats in opposing the president. But other House Republicans, however, say Mr. Bush has not convincingly argued that Iraq is a fight against al Qaeda and other Islamist groups, and not just a maelstrom of Islamic sectarian violence.

"I think it's been difficult for the White House to turn up the volume on this fact -- on the true nature and intentions of the enemy -- above the din of the Democrats' defeatism. But we all better find a more effective way to do just that," said a Republican leadership aide. "It's much easier for Americans to support a precipitous withdrawal strategy when they don't know how serious the stakes are."

The senior Bush official said the White House thinks the president has "found about the right level of engagement on it."

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said the president has "stepped up outreach ... with Congress."

"We're aware that the war and the surge are unpopular. No question about it," Mrs. Perino said. "Our challenge is to keep showing progress and making the case in a variety of ways."

Hundreds Of U.S., Iraqi Troops Sweep Sadr City (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, March 5, 2007

BAGHDAD — U.S. and Iraqi troops conducted door-to-door searches in the Shiite stronghold of Sadr City on Sunday, marking a critical step in the new Baghdad security plan.

More than 600 U.S. troops and 550 Iraqi soldiers cleared out safe houses and searched for militants and weapons, according to a U.S. military statement. They met no major resistance.

The troops seek to establish a permanent security outpost in Sadr City, home to the powerful Mahdi Army militia. The operation marks a major shift in strategy by Iraq's Shiite-led government, which blocked several attempts last year by U.S. troops to enter the area.

DOJ_NMG_0139514

"Many people felt we would never go into Sadr City because that was the prime minister's power base," said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a spokesman for the U.S. military in Iraq. "It's just another example of the political will that the prime minister and council of representatives are exerting to make this work."

The Bush administration has demanded all sectarian militias be disarmed as part of a broad security initiative that includes an increase of 21,500 U.S. troops in Iraq.

"The law must prevail," Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said Sunday. "Everyone will be affected, regardless of sect."

The crowded neighborhood on Baghdad's eastern outskirts is home to about 2 million Shiite Muslims, many of whom credit the Mahdi Army for protecting them from Sunni insurgents. However, Sunni politicians have blamed the militia for killing civilians and pleaded with al-Maliki to stop the violence.

"We don't know if (al-Maliki) has a change of heart, but certainly there is a change of tactic," theU.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, told CNN.

Mahdi Army militants have displayed little resistance to the security campaign. Sunday was no exception: U.S. forces swept through the eastern corner of Sadr City with barely a sign of opposition, Garver said.

Some Sadr City residents said the area has been calm, although the militia continues to work in the shadows. "The Mahdi Army is still operating," said Ammar Abbas, a cigarette vendor near the area where the sweep took place Sunday. "We're still afraid of them."

The militia's leader, the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, has not been seen in public since January. The U.S. military said last month that he was in Iran, although al-Sadr's spokesmen denied he left the country.

Hundreds of Mahdi Army leaders have been arrested in recent weeks, the Iraqi government says.

Garver said the militants could be laying low to strike in the near future. "We know the enemy wants to strike on his time," he said.

Also Sunday:

·For a third consecutive day, Baghdad was spared a car bombing or other attack bringing mass casualties.

However, a Shiite newspaper editor and a police officer were gunned down. After nightfall, U.S. artillery was heard across Baghdad. In recent days, U.S. gunners have hit suspected Sunni insurgents' staging grounds south of the city.

·Outside Baghdad, Lt. Col. Valery Keaveny described a raid last week that uncovered a suspected Sunni "torture site" and the rescue of two Iraqi captives, who apparently had been spared immediate execution because the militants' video camera broke, and they wanted to record the killings.

Basra Raid Finds Prisoners With Signs Of Torture (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

BAGHDAD, March 5 -- Iraqi special operation forces and British troops swept into an Iraqi intelligence ministry building Sunday morning in the southern city of Basra and found prisoners with signs of torture, British officials said.

All 30 prisoners escaped during the surprise raid, which was triggered by information gleaned from suspects arrested hours earlier in another sweep, a British military spokesman said Monday morning.

"It is unclear how it occurred, but what is clear is that the Iraqi forces did not let them escape," said Maj. David Gell, who called the escape "regrettable."

In a statement, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki called the raid an "unlawful and irresponsible act." He ordered an investigation of the raid, but did not comment on the allegations of torture at the facility that was the Basra headquarters of the National Iraqi Intelligence Agency. The spokesman for the Shiite-led Interior Ministry, which controls the agency, could not be reached.

A British military statement said its forces acted quickly because it had gained information hours earlier that presented a high threat. "It was therefore not possible for either the Iraqi units or multinational forces to pre-warn the relevant provincial authorities," it said.

The operation began at 12:45 a.m. when Iraqi special forces and British troops entered the Basra neighborhood of al-Puwaysa, where they arrested five suspects allegedly involved in car-bomb attacks against British forces, as well as kidnappings, torture and murder. Information from the suspects prompted the raid on the intelligence agency compound, Gell said.

The raid highlighted the insecure conditions in Iraq's Shiite-controlled south at a time when Britain has announced a significant drawdown of its forces. It was the latest instance of U.S. and British forces finding evidence of torture in Iraq's Shiite-dominated security and intelligence facilities that has raised questions about human rights and the rule of law in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0139515

The operation came as more than 1,100 U.S. and Iraqi troops pushed into the Shiite militia haven of Sadr City on Sunday, the largest operation in nearly three years in the sprawling, turbulent slum. Control of the area is viewed as pivotal to stabilizing the capital and preventing Iraq's slide toward civil war.

Riding in Humvees and armored personnel carriers, the troops put up checkpoints and conducted door-to-door searches for illegal weapons and militia fighters. They met no resistance, according to U.S. military, Iraqi officials and residents. No weapons caches were found and no suspects detained, the military said.

The operation represented the most serious effort yet by the government of Maliki to neutralize the Mahdi Army, which is headed by firebrand cleric Moqtada al-Sadr and is the country's largest and most violent Shiite militia.

Maliki, a Shiite, has for months faced intense U.S. pressure to send troops into Sadr City and assert the government's authority. But he has long avoided doing so because Sadr, who controls six ministries and 30 seats in parliament, is his political benefactor.

Sunday's push occurred only after Sadr had agreed to support Maliki's new Baghdad security plan, Iraqi officials said, and after negotiations with civil leaders and Sadr's representatives on the role of U.S. troops in Sadr City.

The operation lasted several hours and primarily targeted an area near a busy market, according to residents interviewed in Sadr City. By afternoon, there were no signs of U.S. or Iraqi soldiers in the densely crowded streets lined with posters of Sadr and banners lauding the Mahdi Army.

U.S. military officials said they would continue the security sweeps to facilitate a plan to house U.S. and Iraqi troops in a police station on the edge of Sadr City, where as many as 2 million people live. The new military post, similar to those being constructed in other neighborhoods, is a key component of Maliki's security plan to build public trust in Iraq's security forces and ensure that areas are not retaken by insurgents.

"It is a multi-day operation, continuing operation," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman.

In Sadr City, black-clad militiamen have vanished from the streets. Senior Sadr officials and Mahdi Army leaders have fled to Shiite cities in southern Iraq or to neighboring Iran. Some fighters said in interviews that they wanted to engage the U.S. troops but were under strict orders from Sadr to maintain a low profile.

"We feel upset, but what can we do?" said Laith Abu Bakr, 34, a Mahdi Army fighter. "We have orders not to act."

Sadr's motive for allowing the security operation in his stronghold was unclear. Some Shiite politicians have suggested he wants to boost his political credentials and improve his image, but others say he hopes to rid his movement of rogue elements and rivals.

Publicly, however, he has started to criticize the U.S. involvement in what he said should be an Iraqi operation. Sadr has long opposed the U.S. occupation and has issued strong calls for a troop withdrawal. In 2004, the Mahdi Army staged an uprising in Shiite areas, prompting U.S. forces to storm Sadr City.

On Sunday, Rahim al-Daraji, the mayor of Sadr City, said "as long as there is an Iraqi leadership, they are most welcome. The Americans can go into Sadr City."

"The people were very cooperative and were very happy because these forces are coming to protect them," he said.

But some residents said they felt safe under militia protection and questioned the presence of U.S. troops.

The Mahdi Army is "treating us very well," said Riyad Hamid Swadi, 40, the owner of a small junk shop. "What are the Americans doing here?"

A senior Sadr official said he did not believe that Sadr had agreed to allow U.S. troops to be stationed inside Sadr City and warned that their presence could provoke the Mahdi Army.

"This will create a spark," Sheik Ayad al-Khabi said. "They are going to drag the Shiites into a fight."

Separately, Maliki announced plans to reshuffle his cabinet in the next two weeks, a move he has promised for months. Maliki's aides have indicated that he intends to replace several Sadr loyalists in charge of key ministries, including the Health Ministry, which has been plagued by allegations of corruption.

Falah Shanshal, of the Sadr bloc in parliament, said that Sadr's supporters had given Maliki a list of replacements for the ministry posts and that they would block attempts to wrest ministries from their control.

U.S. Gingerly Enters Sensitive Iraq Neighborhood (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Just after 8 a.m. Sunday, U.S. and Iraqi troops tapped on Saif Mirwan's front gate in the Shiite stronghold of Sadr City and politely asked to search his house. They looked in each room, asked how his family was doing, checked out the pigeons he keeps on his roof, and then left with handshakes and a thank you.

DOJ_NMG_0139516

With that, Sadr City, whose fearsome reputation and political clout had rendered it largely off-limits to U.S. and Iraqi government troops for nearly three years, became an official part of the latest U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown.

In the first daylight door-to-door weapons searches here since the crackdown began, there was none of the bloodshed that greeted American troops the last time they tried to police the district in the spring of 2004.

But the limited raid, in the Jamila section of the sprawling slum, also raised the question of how long things will stay quiet, given the opposition to foreign troops of anti-U.S. Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia took control of Sadr City's streets after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

More than 600 U.S. soldiers and 550 Iraqi troops, backed by a column of armored vehicles, took part in Sunday's operation, described as a first step toward establishing a permanent U.S.-Iraqi security station within Sadr City. Military officials say these stations will foster trust between local residents and troops and will form the backbone of the security plan, which is seen as a last-ditch effort to quell sectarian warfare between Sunni Arabs and Shiites, fueled in large part by execution-style killings attributed to Shiite militias including the Mahdi Army.

At least 15 stations have been established in other neighborhoods of Baghdad, according to the U.S. military, and several more are planned. Those in Sunni neighborhoods are aimed at quelling the Sunni-led insurgency, which has used bombings, roadside explosives and sniper attacks to kill American troops and spread terror among the Shiite majority.

Setting up in Sadr City, which is named for al-Sadr's late father, a revered cleric, is a tricky maneuver because al-Sadr is politically influential with fellow Shiites, including Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The troops arriving Sunday participated in what they termed a "soft-knock" operation, clearly aware that one wrong move could stoke anger among al-Sadr supporters. The troops avoided pounding or kicking on doors and, according to people whose homes were searched, were unfailingly polite and observant of Muslim sensibilities.

"They thanked us with respect and a smile," said Shihab Ahmed, a teacher, noting that the Americans greeted him in Arabic and asked permission before entering his house with a bomb-sniffing dog. "I am happy that such a campaign is done in my neighborhood. It doesn't upset me, as it is aiming to clear the area of weapons."

In a few hours, the operation was over for the day. A checkpoint was dismantled, allowing traffic to move normally. The convoy rumbled away, and shopkeepers returned to business as usual.

Still unclear is what will happen when troops return to establish a permanent presence, and how long al-Sadr will keep a lid on his militia.

The cleric pulled his militiamen off the streets when the security plan officially was launched Feb. 13 as a favor to al-Maliki. But al-Sadr's impatience with the plan has grown as attacks on Shiites by Sunni Arab insurgents have soared in recent days. On Saturday, al-Sadr issued a statement through associates rejecting recent statements by U.S. and Iraqi government officials that negotiations had cleared the way for a government security station in Sadr City.

Some analysts believe al-Sadr will keep his troops at bay -- at least for the time being.

"It's very clear al-Sadr's policy is to absorb the initial punch of the surge, not to engage the Americans, not to give them an excuse to focus on the Shiites," said Vali Nasr, an expert on Iraq and on the Sunni-Shiite conflict at the Naval Post-graduate School in Monterey, Calif.

But as U.S. troops continue to hand over security functions to Iraqi forces in coming months, Nasr said, al-Sadr will be well-positioned to revive his Mahdi Army, which most Shiites consider far more capable than Iraqi forces at protecting them. Al-Maliki will have to support him in exchange for his cooperation with the security plan, and his loyalists will embrace the return of his bullying but effective militiamen, Nasr predicted.

Across Baghdad, there were reminders of the ongoing sectarian war. Police said that since Saturday, they had found 20 bodies of men who were believed to be victims of Shiite death squads. And at least three Iraqi civilians died in bombings.

One car bomb exploded near an Iraqi police patrol in Doura, a troubled Sunni area in southern Baghdad and killed one civilian. Another Iraqi died when a bomb exploded in the Shiite district of Karada, and a third was killed when a blast hit near a downtown bank.

South of the city, three women and one child were killed when a bomb targeting a U.S. military convoy exploded. The victims were inside a minibus that took a direct hit from the blast.

Times staff writers Raheem Salman and Saif Rasheed, and special correspondents in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Notes From Baghdad (WSJ)

By Mohammed Fadhil And Omar Fadhil

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

BAGHDAD -- The new strategy to secure Baghdad has been dubbed by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki as "Operation Imposing the Law." After weeks of waiting and anxiety it is finally underway, and early signs are encouraging.

DOJ_NMG_0139517

The government information campaign and the news about thousands of additional troops coming had a positive impact even before the operation started. Commanders and lieutenants of various militant groups abandoned their positions in Baghdad and in some cases fled the country. Diyala province to the east of Baghdad was the destination for many Sunni extremists, while Shiite militiamen went to Babil and Diwaniya in the south. Some higher-ranking members of Shiite and Sunni militant groups fled to Iran and Syria respectively. This migration motivated the government to announce supporting security measures in five provinces around Baghdad, to make sure that fleeing bad guys do not regroup in other cities.

This indicates that both the addition of more troops and the tough words of Prime Minister Maliki are doing the job of intimidating the militants. The extremists understand only the language of power, and any reluctance or softness on the part of the Iraqi or U.S. government would only embolden them. In this way the clearly voiced commitment of President Bush and Prime Minister Maliki was exactly the type of strong message that needed to be sent.

One difference between this and earlier -- failed -- attempts to secure Baghdad is the willingness of the Iraqi and U.S. governments to commit enough resources for enough time to make it work. Another important point is the insistence of the Iraqi government that political factions not interfere with the progress of military action. The commanders and the prime minister have made it clear that no one will be above the law, and that even places of worship and the offices of politicians will be subject to searches and raids if evidence of involvement in violence is found.

The Iraqi commanders are also trying to give the operation a national stamp by including troops from across the country -- even from Kurdistan and far provinces like Basra, where politicians and officers have been long opposed to being involved in Baghdad. Yet another aspect that makes "Imposing Law" unique is its ascending intensity. Unlike other operations that always started from a peak and soon lost momentum, this plan is becoming stricter and gaining momentum by the day as more troops pour into the city, allowing for a better implementation of the "clear and hold" strategy. People here always want the "hold" part to materialize, and feel safe when they go out and find the Army and police maintaining their posts -- the bad guys can't intimidate as long as the troops are staying.

The Iraqi people themselves are playing their role in the plan. Recent figures from U.S. officers in Baghdad show that the joint forces have been receiving an average of 250 security tips from civilians since the beginning of the operation, about twice previous figures. With help from a government-appointed committee, people in some Baghdad neighborhoods are returning occupied mosques to their original keepers and worshippers, and holding joint prayers between the two sects in mixed neighborhoods.

So after only a couple weeks we can feel, despite the continuing violence, that much has been accomplished. Many Baghdadis feel hopeful again about the future, and the fear of civil war is slowly being replaced by optimism that peace might one day return to this city. This change in mood is something huge by itself.

The brightest image of the past two weeks was the scene of displaced families returning home; more than a thousand families are back to their homes under the protection of the Army and police. This figure invites hope that Baghdad will restore its social, ethnic and religious mosaic.

Marketplaces are seeing more activity and stores that were long shuttered are reopening -- including even some liquor stores that came under vicious attacks in the past. This is a sign that extremists no longer can intimidate people and hold the city hostage. All of this gives the sense that law is being imposed.

Checkpoints are not seen as scary threats to the innocent. They look more professional and impartial as they include members of the police, Army, Multinational Forces and even traffic cops with laptops verifying registration papers. We've lost the fear that checkpoints might be traps set by death squads; they search everyone, even official convoys and ambulances.

We feel safer about moving in the city now, and politicians who used to hide behind the walls of the Green Zone are venturing out. Watching Mr. Maliki walking on Palestine Street in central Baghdad gave a positive impression that the state, and not the gangs, owns the streets.

It is true that not all of Baghdad has seen the same amount of progress, but we realize that patience is necessary. People do not complain about delays at checkpoints but instead say they'd like to see stricter inspection.

Military-wise, the results are not humble either; hundreds of militants have been killed, more hundreds arrested, and dozens of weapons caches discovered and destroyed. The frequency of attacks has declined drastically, and the terrifying scene of bullet-riddled bodies has become a rarer incident.

Our people want to see this effort succeed. We know it's not going to be an easy fight. Rescuing all of Baghdad's districts from the grip of militants and terrorists will require sacrifice and hard work. We hope the troops and the governments in Baghdad and America do not lose their resolve.

Mohammed and Omar Fadhil write a blog, IraqTheModel.com, from Baghdad.

U.S. Hopes For Results In Iraq Outreach (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0139518

By Ryan Lenz
AP, March 5, 2007
YOUSSIFIYAH, Iraq - It was the kind of exchange that U.S. troops are counting on.

Medics treated an electrical burn on an Iraqi man injured doing home wiring. In return, he passed along a tip: Powerful local clan leaders have ordered a fresh crop of roadside bombs against U.S.-led forces.

The whispered warning - in the shadow of a mosque believed to support Sunni insurgents - is just what the soldiers want to hear as part of a new strategy to move some units off big, fortress-like bases and into outposts in Iraq's most violent places.

The plan hinges on hopes that increased contact with ordinary Iraqis will help soldiers separate innocent civilians from militants hiding among them, and try to rebuild a battered U.S. image after four years of fighting.

The shift also stands as an indirect indictment of the Pentagon's old counterinsurgency plans after years of losing touch with the Iraqi streets - and access to the crucial rumor mills and informants.

"I live where I work. It puts me so much closer to the people. That's what this is all about. The people are the center of gravity in this fight," said Capt. Richard Ince, a native of Georgetown, Texas.

His company - part of the Army's 2nd Battalion, 5th Cavalry Regiment - has turned a water treatment plant into a military compound near Youssifiyah, a volatile area 12 miles south of Baghdad. It's in the so-called "Triangle of Death" because of relentless attacks on U.S. military units patrolling its dirt and gravel roads.

On Friday, he made the five-minute walk from the base to near the mosque in a grove of palm and pine trees on the outskirts of Youssifiyah. Until recently, such a stroll would have been considered foolhardy - if not a breach of orders - for U.S. forces.

Now, it's encouraged.

Troops quickly turned the stone courtyard of an abandoned home into an open-air clinic. They did not advertise their plans in advance, fearing insurgents could plot an attack. Instead, word was spread by knocking on a few doors and letting the local grapevine do the rest.

Within minutes, dozens of people waited behind razor wire for treatment. In Iraq, even humanitarian outreach is accompanied by full-bore security. Every patient was searched and even babies were patted down.

Medics doled out children's Tylenol and antibiotics to parents with sick children. A smiling sergeant was handing out rainbow-colored pencils and candies to youngsters when a man holding his arm approached.

It was charred by a serious electrical burn, which oozed blood. Then, through an interpreter, he told Ince about how local tribal chiefs had called for more roadside bombs in the area.

Ince nodded and spoke quietly into a radio.

Sgt. James Farris, 31, of Tullahoma, Tenn., who had been listening to the exchange, said soldiers have heard dozens of tips like this since they moved into their new post earlier this year.

Some were credible and others viewed with suspicion. But it's opening the channels that's needed, he said.

Along with the advantages, however, come risks. A coordinated attack last month on the outpost in Tarmiyah, about 30 miles north of Baghdad, killed two soldiers and wounded dozens more.

About two hours after the clinic outside Youssifiyah opened, it was ordered closed. Nurses rushed to pack crates. Soldiers, who had watched quietly through the morning, suddenly took defensive positions.

There was no direct threat. Ince simply didn't want to press his luck.

"The longer you stay out here, the more you open yourself to negative action," Ince said, rushing to leave. "When you're ahead at the craps table, that's when you pick up your chips and go home."

Basra Raid Finds Dozens Detained By Iraq Spy Unit (NYT)

By Kirk Semple
The New York Times, March 5, 2007
BAGHDAD, Monday, March 5 — Iraqi special forces and British troops stormed the offices of an Iraqi government intelligence agency in the southern city of Basra on Sunday, and British officials said they discovered about 30 prisoners, some showing signs of torture.

The raid appeared to catch Iraq's central government by surprise and raised new questions about the rule of law in the Shiite-dominated south, where less than two weeks ago Britain announced plans for a significant reduction in its forces because of improved stability.

News of the Basra raid, with its resonant themes of torture and sectarian-driven conflict, coincided with the next stage of the intensified security plan here in Baghdad, where more than 1,100 American and Iraqi soldiers moved into Sadr City, a stronghold of Iraq's largest Shiite militia. The soldiers met no resistance in what the Americans called the plan's biggest test yet.

DOJ_NMG_0139519

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, a conservative Shiite, condemned the raid in Basra. He publicly said nothing about the evidence of torture.

"The prime minister has ordered an immediate investigation into the incident of breaking into the security compound in Basra and stressed the need to punish those who have carried out this illegal and irresponsible act," said the full text of a statement issued late Sunday by his office.

It remained unclear why he sought to pursue the raiding force aggressively rather than the accusations of prisoner abuse. Efforts to reach officials in his office were unsuccessful.

The discovery of prisoners in the Basra offices, which the British described as the headquarters of Iraq's government intelligence agency, echoed other recent cases in which American or British forces stumbled onto a government-run detention center that held people showing signs of torture.

As recently as December, a combined force of British and Iraqi troops assaulted a police station in Basra and rescued 127 prisoners from fetid conditions. Some of the prisoners had been tortured.

The most significant recent case involved a secret Baghdad prison run by the Shiite-controlled Interior Ministry, known as Site 4 and discovered by American and Iraqi troops last year, where more than 1,400 prisoners were discovered and where some had been subjected to systematic abuse.

Mr. Maliki has been under considerable pressure, particularly from American officials and Sunni Arab leaders, to rid the country's Shiite-run security and intelligence forces of militia influence and human rights abuses. American officials have warned Iraqi leaders that they might curtail aid to the Interior Ministry, which runs the country's police forces, if officials who commit "gross violations of human rights" and are not held accountable.

The Interior Ministry, dominated by Shiites, has long been accused by Sunni Arabs of complicity in torture and killings.

It was unclear whether the Basra detainees were still in custody, and there was no further information on the of the detainees or their captors. A spokesman for the British military command in Basra, Maj. David Gell, said in a telephone interview early Monday that he could not provide any further information about them. [A] news agency said the detainees included a woman and two children.

The raid in Basra comes as the British command is planning a drawdown of as many as 1,600 of its 7,200 troops, a decision driven by the British government's assessment that Iraqi forces are strong enough to manage the security of the region on their own. In announcing the reduction on Feb. 22, Prime Minister Tony Blair said that while the Basra area remained dangerous, British troops faced far less violence than Americans farther north and that "the next chapter in Basra's history can be written by Iraqis."

It was unclear whether the discovery in Basra would have any impact on British planning.

Major Gell said the intelligence agency office was raided after an investigation earlier Sunday led to the capture of five suspected bomb makers and evidence that pointed to possible violations at the agency's offices. In those offices, he said, "Evidence of significant criminal activity such as torture was found."

In Baghdad, Iraqi and American soldiers began to patrol the streets of Sadr City and conducted house-to-house searches for illegal weapons and militia fighters linked to sectarian crimes, according to residents and the American military command. No shots were fired.

"Local residents were receptive and cooperative with coalition and Iraqi forces," said Lt. Col. Scott R. Bleichwehl, a military spokesman in Baghdad. The operation is the most ambitious since the implementation of the latest security plan for Baghdad nearly three weeks ago. The push into Sadr City, a bastion of Shiite militancy and anti-Americanism, will serve as a test of Mr. Maliki's willingness to seriously confront the country's Shiite militias, particularly the Mahdi Army, which is based in Sadr City and is led by Moktada al-Sadr, a powerful cleric.

Sadr City residents said they witnessed American soldiers converting a police station into a small garrison on the neighborhood's western flank. American and Iraqi military officials would not confirm this report, but officials have been planning to open a joint Iraqi-American security station there, one of several in the plan to pacify Baghdad, unveiled by President Bush in January.

The sweep on Sunday amounted to the largest military operation in Sadr City involving American troops since 2004, when the Americans suppressed a violent uprising of the Mahdi Army with ground forces and aerial bombardments.

American officials have been pressing Mr. Maliki to send troops into Sadr City and wrest control from the Mahdi Army, which has been accused of driving the cycle of sectarian bloodshed but is considered by many Shiite followers of Mr. Sadr to be a bulwark defense against Sunni insurgents.

The prime minister has also been under pressure from the Americans and his Iraqi critics to distance himself politically from Mr. Sadr, whose backing was decisive in Mr. Maliki's campaign for prime minister last year.

DOJ_NMG_0139520

On Sunday, Mr. Maliki announced that he planned to reshuffle his cabinet within the next two weeks, possibly eroding Mr. Sadr's influence in the administration. While the prime minister did not identify whom he would replace, two prominent Shiite politicians said in interviews on Sunday that the Health Ministry, the most powerful of the six ministries run by a Sadr loyalist, would be removed from Mr. Sadr's faction's control.

The military incursion into Sadr City, widely anticipated for days, lacked any element of surprise. It followed protracted negotiations — among representatives of Mr. Sadr, neighborhood leaders, Iraqi government officials and American and British military commanders — regarding the American role in Sadr City, home to at least 1.5 million people.

Mr. Sadr has long demanded an American withdrawal from Iraq. But he has promised not to impede the government's latest crackdown in Baghdad, which involves a so-called surge of about 20,000 American troops in the capital. The cleric has privately ordered his militia fighters not to resist the military sweeps regardless of provocation.

Many militia leaders, in turn, have left Sadr City and sought sanctuary in Shiite-dominated southern Iraq and Iran, possibly figuring that they can wait out the offensive and return to the capital later. Their subordinates, foot soldiers who have for years operated openly in Sadr City, manning checkpoints and maintaining neighborhood watches, have also remained out of sight in recent days.

For the past two weeks, American and Iraqi forces have been conducting sweeps of neighborhoods bordering Sadr City. These operations, in eastern Baghdad, have been the centerpiece of the new security plan, which is viewed by many here as a last-ditch effort to save the country from all-out civil war. American and Iraqi commanders say they have conducted thousands of patrols and detained hundreds of suspects.

Abdul Hassan Jubara al-Kahbi, the manager of the Sadr City governing council, warned that a prolonged American presence in the neighborhood might eventually incite militia members to retaliate.

Other residents, however, had more mundane concerns, like the traffic jams the sweep caused.

"You can see a vehicle at the entrance of each street," said a 45-year-old baker, who gave only his nickname, Abu Aqil. "It took me two hours to reach the grocery store and return home."

Elsewhere, the American command said Sunday that one marine and one sailor were killed on Friday while conducting a combat mission in Anbar Province, and another marine was killed on Saturday, also while on a combat mission in Anbar.

In an operation unrelated to the Sadr City incursion, American soldiers in Baghdad raided a mosque on Sunday and captured three suspected insurgents hiding inside, according to the American military.

In the western Baghdad neighborhood of Jamiya, the authorities discovered the bodies of eight Shiite pilgrims who were apparently on their way to a holy city south of the capital to celebrate an Islamic holiday this weekend. The bodies were handcuffed and had bullet holes in their heads, according to an official at Yarmouk Hospital.

In Hilla, a bomb killed four other Shiite pilgrims — three women and a child — on their way to Karbala, one of the southern holy cities. The bomb was apparently intended for an American convoy but missed, according to an official at the Interior Ministry. Two others were wounded.

In Baghdad, three people were killed and seven were wounded in a series of attacks. In one, an editor for the Iraqi newspaper Al Mashriq was shot and killed by gunmen while he waited to catch a bus to go to work, an official at the Interior Ministry and a colleague said.

Iraq Ousts 10,000 In Security Ministry (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, March 5, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraq's Interior Ministry has fired or reassigned more than 10,000 employees, including high-ranking police, who were found to have tortured prisoners, accepted bribes or had ties to militias, a ministry spokesman has disclosed.

A soon-to-be-released internal inquiry also details 41 incidents of human rights abuse at the ministry. In one case, four members of the national police hanged prisoners from a ceiling and beat them with sticks in a ministry-run prison known as Site 4, according to the report by the ministry's inspector general.

The United States has pressured Iraq's Shiite-led government to clean up its security forces as they undertake a broad plan to reduce sectarian violence. Sunni politicians have accused Iraq's police of collaborating with Shiite death squads.

More than half of those fired or reassigned since June were found to have militia ties, Jassim Hanoon, the Interior Ministry's deputy spokesman, said in a weekend interview. The investigation is ongoing.

"We are struggling against this disease," Hanoon said of militia infiltration at the ministry.

The Interior Ministry employs about 270,000 people, including police, emergency response units and administrative staff.

"Maybe we aren't 100% cured," Hanoon said. "But we're getting better day by day." Some ministry employees were fired for arresting innocent people, while others had past criminal records, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0139521

Investigators are using information gathered within the ministry to probe political leaders and members of parliament, something not previously done, Hanoon said. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has vowed to pursue criminal charges against political figures — including members of parliament — linked to extremist groups.

The cases of human rights abuse were detailed in a 250-page annual report that will be released this week, Akeel Saeel, the Interior Ministry's inspector general, said in an interview.

The four policemen allegedly involved in the Site 4 case were arrested and handed over to Iraq's criminal court system, Saeel said.

"Under Saddam, investigators had this ideology. Torturing was routine," Saeel said. "I do feel we're having an impact, but it takes time, step by step."

U.S. military advisers are working to better screen and train police, including requiring 15 to 20 hours of human rights training for recruits, said Lt. Col. Pablo Hernandez, a spokesman with the U.S. military unit responsible for training Iraqi police.

"If you look at what they had in the past and the product they're putting out today, it's a lot better," Hernandez said.

No U.S. Backup Strategy For Iraq (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

During a White House meeting last week, a group of governors asked President Bush and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, about their backup plan for Iraq. What would the administration do if its new strategy didn't work?

The conclusion they took away, the governors later said, was that there is no Plan B. "I'm a Marine," Pace told them, "and Marines don't talk about failure. They talk about victory."

Pace had a simple way of summarizing the administration's position, Gov. Phil Bredesen (D-Tenn.) recalled. "Plan B was to make Plan A work."

In the weeks since Bush announced the new plan for Iraq -- including an increase of 21,500 U.S. combat troops, additional reconstruction assistance and stepped-up pressure on the Iraqi government -- senior officials have rebuffed questions about other options in the event of failure. Eager to appear resolute and reluctant to provide fodder for skeptics, they have responded with a mix of optimism and evasion.

Even if the administration is not talking about Plan B, the subject is on a lot of minds inside and outside the government. "I would be irresponsible if I weren't thinking about what the alternatives might be," Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates acknowledged last month to Congress, where many favor gradual or immediate withdrawal.

Gates did not elaborate. Several administration officials, while insisting that a wide range of options was discussed before Bush's Jan. 10 announcement, firmly closed the door on the subject of fallback plans. "I don't think anyone is going to be inclined to discuss any contingency-type planning," said National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

National security experts outside the government have stepped into the void, offering detailed options through public papers, speeches and policy proposals over the past several weeks.

"The ultimate Plan B is pull everybody out," said Stephen D. Biddle, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations and an adviser to the Defense Department. "Nobody wants to do that. Most are looking at the middle ground between surge and pullout."

Most options involve partial or complete U.S. redeployment from Baghdad and other violent urban centers, followed by containment of the civil war within Iraq's borders -- keeping out meddlesome neighbors such as Iran and preventing a wider, regional conflict. Retired Marine Gen. Anthony Zinni, a former chief of Central Command, the U.S. military headquarters for the Middle East, said Congress is "drifting toward containment" and predicted that option will soon begin gaining popularity.

Daniel L. Byman and Kenneth M. Pollack of the Brookings Institution last month released the most comprehensive public exploration of containment. The two national security experts seemed to wince even as they proposed keeping up to 80,000 troops along Iraq's borders, cautioning that "there would be no end in sight either for the war or for their mission." But it is "the only rational course of action," they wrote.

"I firmly believe that is where we should wind up, and is what we should be doing now," said retired Air Force Gen. Charles F. Wald, formerly the No. 2 U.S. officer in Europe.

One military officer involved in long-term planning for Iraq said he does not think the idea is feasible. "It would be a massive operation," the officer said. "But having said that, it's probably the best option if they go into open civil war."

Other senior military officials are skeptical of containment, fearing that it would be almost impossible to achieve and that a policy of standing back and letting Iraqis kill each other would be morally indefensible and a recruiting boon for al-Qaeda and other extremist groups. Even proponents of containment warn that it would leave U.S. troops as concentrated targets while limiting their ability to control the situation militarily.

DOJ_NMG_0139522

A related option would involve redeploying U.S. forces to the relative safety of the Kurdish region in northern Iraq, to more peaceful areas in the south and to Anbar in the west, where they could focus on fighting al-Qaeda. "You can have your civil war without us," columnist Charles Krauthammer recently suggested that Bush tell Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. "We will be around to pick up the pieces as best we can."

Biddle, who noted that new Iraq strategy proposals "proliferate hourly" in the public domain, said another variant is to set up "heavily defended forward operating bases out in the desert somewhere [and] either sit there and mind our own business and do nothing except be present -- enabling us to say we're still there -- or, in a somewhat more activist flavor, to conduct raids of various kinds" against al-Qaeda bases and rescue missions for Iraqi military units.

Steven N. Simon, senior fellow for Middle Eastern studies at the Council on Foreign Relations and the NSC's director for national security threats during the Clinton administration, last month proposed U.S. disengagement from Iraq itself, calling for containment from the outside with a reinforced U.S. presence elsewhere in the region and the opening of a regional diplomatic dialogue. Those steps should be initiated immediately, Simon wrote, before the costs of the war begin to widen across the Middle East and beyond.

Still other withdrawal possibilities center on the replacement of conventional troops with a significant Special Forces contingent to engage in counterterrorism, along with what Biddle called "facilitating ethnic cleansing" by providing armed escorts for Iraqis who want to leave contested areas.

Any containment option is likely to add substantially to the nearly 4 million Iraqis who have fled to Jordan and Syria or have been displaced from their homes within Iraq, said Carlos Pascual of the Brookings Institution, who served as director of the State Department's Office of Reconstruction and Stabilization until October 2005. Humanitarian agencies are already drawing up plans for huge refugee camps inside and around Iraq's borders, although many are concerned they will only add to the country's problems.

"When refugees and displaced persons start collecting in camps," Pascual said, "you get a vulnerable population -- and a lot of unemployed men -- who are subject to attack, recruitment and internal violence. This is where you often get further radicalization, and the camps themselves become a source of the problem."

Over the years of U.S. involvement in Iraq, new plans have been launched with assurances of success -- the return of sovereignty to a handpicked Iraqi administration in the summer of 2004; a democratically elected government in January 2005; "Plan Baghdad," designed to retake the capital from insurgents and militias, in the summer of 2006. The current Plan A is arguably already Plan D or beyond.

Since last summer, public opinion has turned against Bush's handling of the war and favors withdrawing, rather than increasing, troops. Although the administration has said the new strategy should show progress within months, many officials privately say it could be years, if ever, and the Democratic majority in Congress has shown little inclination to wait patiently.

Any substantive administration planning for other contingencies is occurring at the margins of policy, far from key decision-makers. "Planners plan, but I don't think anyone is saying, 'Let's do the partition,' or 'Let's pull back and let Baghdad burn,' " one Pentagon official said. "That would be a tectonic shift. That would be catastrophic failure."

One military officer and another defense expert said they believe that retired Army Col. James Kurtz, a specialist in strategic planning, has been asked by the Pentagon to begin studying alternative strategies at the Institute for Defense Analyses, a government-run think tank. "It's just not appropriate to ask for that," Kurtz said in response to an inquiry. "We keep what we do with our sponsors, okay?"

Bush has warned that the U.S. commitment to Iraq is not open-ended and will require increased effort from Iraqis. Pressed to specify U.S. limits, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice promised the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that there would be ample opportunity "to see whether or not in fact the Iraqis are living up to the assurances they gave us."

"And what if they don't?" Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) asked.

"I don't think you go to Plan B," Rice replied. "You work with Plan A."

How To Stop Genocide In Iraq (LAT)

By Samantha Power, Samantha Power, A Professor At Harvard University's Kennedy School Of Government, Is The Author Of T

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

Offering the carrot of U.S. withdrawal may be the best way to end ethnic cleansing in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0139523

THOSE WHO SUPPORT remaining in Iraq increasingly can be heard invoking the specter of genocide as grounds for staying. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) warned that, if U.S. troops leave, "You'll see a bloodletting in Baghdad that makes Srebrenica look like a Sunday school picnic."

Some defenders of President Bush's approach, having backed the Iraq war from the start, have now settled on genocide warnings after each of their original justifications for being in Iraq — weapons of mass destruction, terrorism prevention, energy diversification, regional stabilization and democracy promotion — has crumbled one by one.

Other proponents of remaining in Iraq are not, in fact, looking to redeem their own faulty judgment. They are genuinely frightened that, as ferocious as the civil war there has become, a U.S. withdrawal could unleash an all-out slaughter. With increasing numbers of civilian corpses piling up every day, they have reason to worry.

Although critics of withdrawal do a masterful job of painting a grim picture of the apocalypse that awaits, they offer no account of how U.S. forces in Iraq will do more than preserve a status quo that is already deteriorating into wholesale ethnic cleansing. Although more than 115,000 U.S. troops have been in Iraq for the last four years, about 3.8 million Iraqis have fled their homes and at least 50,000 Iraqis are fleeing each month. It would be nice to think the surge of troops to Baghdad would help to staunch the flow. But with only one-third of the new troops on duty at any given time in a city of 6 million people, they will have no more success deterring the militias intent on carving out homogeneous Shiite or Sunni neighborhoods than U.S. forces have had to date. About 74% of Shiites polled and 91% of Sunnis — the people who have the most to fear from genocide — would like to see U.S. forces gone by the end of the year.

Unfortunately, many of those who favor a U.S. exit have recklessly waved off atrocity warnings or taken to blaming Iraqis for their plight. What is needed to stave off even greater carnage than we see today is neither assuming massacres won't happen nor suspending thought until the surge has demonstrably failed in six months — at which point other options may no longer be viable. Rather, we must announce our intention to depart and use the intervening months to prioritize civilian protection by pursuing a bold set of measures combining political pressure, humanitarian relocation and judicial deterrence.

First, although it has a familiar and thus unsatisfying ring to it, the most viable long-term route to preventing mass atrocities is to use remaining U.S. leverage to bring about a political compromise that makes Iraqi Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds feel economically stable, physically secure and adequately represented in political structures. This is consistent with the position of leading U.S. generals and the members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, who have stressed that there is no military solution to Iraq's meltdown and urged the administration, the Iraqis and regional players to reopen broad-ranging political negotiations.

Instead of simply lining up behind Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's government in the hopes that it will one day decide to stop ethnic cleansing, recent withdrawal proposals in Congress use the leverage of the proposed redeployment to press Iraqis to reach a political solution. A plan put forth by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) has come under neoconservative fire for setting a target departure date, but it provides for flexibility to suspend the U.S. drawdown if Iraqis meet the key economic, political and security benchmarks they have committed to achieve this year. The plan would also retain some U.S. forces in Iraq and the region to help deter atrocities by sectarian militias and aggression from Iraq's neighbors.

However, if this political pressure fails and U.S. forces remain unable to stave off an ever-widening civil war, the U.S. should go further and announce its willingness to assist in the voluntary transport and relocation of Iraqi civilians in peril. If Iraqis tell us that they would feel safer in religiously homogenous neighborhoods, and we lack the means to protect them where they are, we should support and protect them in their voluntary, peaceful evacuation — a means, one might say, to preempt genocide in advance of our departure.

The administration must help secure asylum for those Iraqis — and there are millions who fit this bill — who have a "well-founded fear of persecution." At the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees' conference scheduled for April, which will be attended by Jordan, Iran, Iraq, Syria and the United States, the overburdened countries of first asylum (Syria is sheltering 1 million Iraqis; Jordan has taken in 700,000) must be persuaded to reopen their gates to fleeing Iraqis. And Western countries must dramatically expand the number of resettlement slots for Iraqis. Astoundingly, the U.S. took in just 202 Iraqis last year and, although the maximum for this year was recently raised to 7,000, this is still not sufficient.

Finally, if we are serious about preventing further sectarian horrors, the U.S. must send a clear signal to the militias and political leaders who order or carry out atrocities that they will be brought to justice for their crimes. That means offering belated U.S. support to the International Criminal Court, the only credible, independent body with the jurisdiction to prosecute crimes against humanity and genocide.

Many of those who say U.S. troops should stay in Iraq to prevent genocide are the same people who for political reasons refuse to acknowledge the gravity of the calamity unfolding on our watch. The same people who modeled a war on best-case scenarios are now resisting ending a war by invoking worst-case scenarios. But after years of using the alleged needs of the Iraqi people to justify U.S. political postures, it is long past time to use the leverage we still have to actually advance Iraqi welfare.

DOJ_NMG_0139524

Supplemental Sows Discord (RC)

By Susan Davis And Emily Pierce

Roll Call, March 5, 2007

The still-evolving bill to pay for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan has rapidly become a political headache for Democratic and GOP leaders, as the debate over what to include in the measure has exacerbated intraparty tensions in both chambers.

The House Appropriations Committee could mark up the $100-plus billion emergency supplemental spending bill as early as Thursday, but knowledgeable Democratic aides cautioned last week that the schedule has not been confirmed and could spill into the week of March 12.

Procedurally, three legislative days are required after a bill has been dropped in order to have a markup, so if language is not circulated by Tuesday, a markup is unlikely to occur this week, aides said.

Staffers were expected to work through the weekend, and failure to produce language early in the week will be further indication of the challenges facing Democratic leaders to build consensus between the conservative and liberal flanks of the party who have vastly divergent views on the war that will be difficult to reconcile.

While Democratic leaders have emphasized their party's unity on the mid-February resolution condemning the proposed troop increase, the supplemental measure is already straining that accord.

The divisions have presented a serious test for Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) leadership, as well as for Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.), who must shepherd the legislation.

"It's a big tent, and I'm glad I'm not in Nancy Pelosi's shoes." said Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.), co-chairwoman of the Progressive Caucus as well as the co-founder of the Out of Iraq Caucus.

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on Defense, has been a lightning rod for Democrats on the Iraq War since he announced plans — without first vetting it with leadership or the full Democratic Caucus — to include conditions and guidelines in the supplemental that critics have charged would unfairly restrict President Bush's ability to conduct the war.

While Murtha appears to have relented on some of his stronger positions — such as putting in conditions that would make it difficult to fund the additional troops Bush wants to send to Iraq — after strong backlash from both sides of the aisle, there continues to be significant discontent among the rank-and-file Members who supported Murtha's plan.

A potentially large segment of the Out of Iraq Caucus, which numbers 71 and overlaps heavily with the Progressive Caucus, is not expected to support the supplemental spending bill if it contains funds that do support the president's plan to deploy more troops.

"The only conditions I'll vote for are full-funding to bring our troops home from Iraq," Woolsey said Thursday.

But the California lawmaker declined to say whether she and other anti-war lawmakers would vote against the bill if, combined with potential GOP opposition to the bill, it meant it would doom the measure.

"I hope we get to a place where that's not necessary," Woolsey said.

But while emergency funding requests for the Iraq War have previously received strong bipartisan support, Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) announced last week that Republicans were ready to take the rare step of formally whipping against the bill if it contained any measures that they believe would put roadblocks up for the White House on Iraq.

"I think placing arbitrary or punitive political hurdles before the commander in chief in a time of war, especially under the guise of supporting our troops, is wrong and it is reckless," Boehner said late last week.

Boehner said the GOP would adhere to two principles in the supplemental: to oppose any effort to "put handcuffs" on Bush, or to add "unnecessary" additional spending in the bill that does not pertain to the war effort.

Democrats have floated the proposal to give the president waiver authority to make the terms outlined in the supplemental for troop readiness less binding, but Boehner said it was unclear if that would be enough.

"It may. But at the end of the day, these are unnecessary obstacles that will not support our troops ... and will not support the president," he said. "And if they want to cut the funding, they ought to have the courage to stand up and do it forthright."

Rep. Bill Young (R-Fla.), the ranking member on the Defense subcommittee, said late last week that he did not believe waiver authority would be enough to appease most Republicans.

"I think it's accurate to say that our leadership and our defense folks would be opposed to those restrictions with or without a waiver," he said.

Democrats are also expected to include billions of dollars in additional funds in the supplemental for issues ranging from agriculture relief to the State Children's Health Insurance Plan, among others. And knowledgeable Democratic aides have said they are considering including funds to improve conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

DOJ_NMG_0139525

A spokesman for Pelosi said Democrats were hopeful Republicans would ultimately vote for the funding bill.

"Democrats want to make sure that our troops have the equipment and training they deserve and that the Iraqi government meets the benchmarks President Bush endorsed," said spokesman Nadeam Elshami. "Republican leaders should be supporting our efforts and not threatening to vote against the troops and accountability in Iraq."

If GOP leaders seek to make this vote a test of party loyalty, it will take a significant whip effort to get the rank-and-file Members to vote against a war supplemental. As one Democratic aide observed, it is difficult to explain the nuance of such votes to the public who see "a vote to shut down the supplemental as a vote to shut down the DOD." The aide said leaders and appropriators are so far not fearful of being able to pass the bill on the House floor. "If [Boehner] wants to whip against it he does so at his party's peril," the aide said.

"If the Democrats insert language that really does hamstring our ability to fight and win this war, then I think it will be an easy whip," countered a GOP leadership aide, adding that Democrats will face great difficulties uniting their own Caucus. "If it does nothing to hasten troop withdrawal, they lose their Members in the left wing, and if they do put conditions on funding, they lose a whole different segment of the Caucus."

Meanwhile, Senate Republicans said the Democrats' apparent inability to forge a consensus on how to address the Iraq War in the supplemental and in other ways made their opposition to funding restrictions or cuts much easier.

"One of the first rules of politics is when your opponent is in disarray, don't stop them," said Senate GOP Conference Vice Chairman John Cornyn (Texas). "That's where the Democrats are right now. I don't think they have a coherent strategy."

Cornyn indicated that GOP opposition coupled with the possible objections of centrist Democrats likely would produce a supplemental "without any nonbinding resolutions or strings attached."

Indeed, Democrats said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has little appetite for including funding restrictions in the supplemental.

One Democratic Senator said that view was largely shared within the Democratic leadership and Caucus. Additionally, the Senator indicated that Senate Appropriations Chairman Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) and other members of the spending panel would face pressure to keep any language restricting funds out of the committee mark of the bill.

"What is done will be done on the floor, not in committee," said the Senator.

Byrd spokesman Tom Gavin said the topic of restricting funding in the supplemental has not even come up in talks among committee members.

"Has there been any discussion of putting strings on the supplemental? No," Gavin said.

If such language is not included in the committee version of the bill, it likely will be much harder for any Senator to add restrictive provisions on the floor, because it would almost certainly be filibustered by Republicans, several Senators indicated.

Still, Democrats said they would continue to look for ways — either on the supplemental or in other legislation — to force the White House to change its tactics in Iraq.

"We are continuing discussions on how best to affect a change in the administration's policy on Iraq," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley.

Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), who serves as the ranking member on the Appropriations subcommittee on Defense, said his discussions with Democrats gave him "the feeling that they want this bill to pass, but they really want to challenge the president on a number of things."

One of those "things," Stevens said, was the addition of funds for poor children's health insurance, continuing Gulf Coast hurricane disaster assistance, and other "emergency" funding issues that are not part of the Iraq War effort.

Stevens said Republican Senators may be forced to accept those add-ons, even if they oppose them, because Reid plans to vote on the measure in late March, which will leave precious little time to make sure the bill is reconciled with the House version and enacted before the Pentagon runs out of money on April 15.

"It will affect us and our willingness to accept things we might not otherwise accept under the circumstances," said Stevens.

Gavin acknowledged that the Senate bill likely will include money for non-war-related emergency expenses, such as for recovery from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita and for SCHIP.

Manley confirmed that Reid plans to bring up the supplemental during the last week of March, right before the Senate is scheduled to break for a week-long recess. The Senate Appropriations Committee will mark up the bill March 20, Gavin said.

Stevens said he was unsure of what Senate Republicans' reaction would be to any inclusion of funding restrictions in the bill, whether they were adopted in committee or on the floor. But he suggested that the restrictions might be easier to swallow if the president were given "the authorization to waive the restrictions in order to protect the forces."

Democrats Benefit From Public Shift On War (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And S.a. Miller

DOJ_NMG_0139526

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

As the war in Iraq and the broader battle against terror were being fought abroad, the political calculus at home changed, with public opinion shifting to favor the Democrats on an issue that long had been a Republican winner.

Republicans won the 2002 and 2004 elections in part because voters were convinced that Democrats were weak on defense and lacked the political will to protect the U.S. from terrorists. That changed as the war in Iraq grew more unpopular -- a major factor in the sweeping Democratic gains last fall, allowing the party to regain congressional power.

Anti-war sentiment has been bolstered lately, with polls showing the majority of Americans disapproving of President Bush's plan to send a "surge" of 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Most surveyed instead want to see troops withdrawn from Iraq with varying degrees of dispatch.

Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat, said oversight hearings and the House's nonbinding resolution showing disapproval with the surge plan were "long overdue," and helped the public to realize their calls for action on Iraq have been heard.

"The American people are way ahead of the politicians in Washington," he said. "In many cases, we're playing catch-up, but Democrats have been able to give some meaning to public dissatisfaction with the war.

"Now the challenge is how the war comes to an end," he said.

Despite assertions the Democrats are all on the same page when it comes to war strategy, party leaders have spent weeks trying to craft a unified position. They will give details today for a plan that would link funding to troop readiness and put more responsibility on the Iraqi government to meet benchmarks.

Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, who is chairman of the defense subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, yesterday acknowledged the Democrats "don't have the votes" to cut off troop funding.

"The public doesn't want, they don't want that to happen. They want the troops to be entirely funded," he said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

But that hasn't stopped Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio, a Democratic presidential hopeful, from pushing a bill to use existing funding to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq and seek to replace them with an international peacekeeping force.

"I don't look at polls," the outspoken war critic said. "I look at casualty counts. [The American people] are not interested in polls, either. They want the troops home."

Two national polls taken last week each showed 46 percent of respondents want Congress to use the power of the purse.

In a Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll, 46 percent said they would personally "vote against funding the war altogether to try to force a withdrawal." In the survey of 900 registered voters taken Tuesday and Wednesday, 45 percent wanted to keep funding the current level of troops and 9 percent were unsure.

In the other poll, an ABC News/Washington Post survey of 1,082 adults conducted Feb. 22-25, 46 percent said they would support "Congress trying to block Bush's [surge] plan" by "restricting funding for the war," versus 51 percent opposed and 3 percent undecided.

That same survey also showed more support -- 58 percent -- for Mr. Murtha's approach of putting onerous readiness rules that U.S. forces could not meet, thus choking off the war. And 56 percent said U.S. troops should be withdrawn even if Iraq is left unstable.

Both polls had a three percentage point margin of error.

A senior Republican aide said the tables had turned on the Democrats in terms of the war debate, even if the war itself remains unpopular.

"In terms of the PR campaign and in terms of the message to the American people, the Democrats have again come across as fractured and the Republicans have come across as unified," the aide said. "Republicans play politics better than Democrats."

The war has also turned the Republican presidential race on its head, dragging down the popularity of one-time front-runner and war hawk Sen. John McCain of Arizona and bolstering anti-war candidates.

"I would much rather lose a campaign than lose a war," Mr. McCain has said in defending his stance of wanting to send more troops to Iraq.

The senator told The Washington Times he sees his party's rank and file recoiling from Democrats' anti-war rhetoric.

"Where I've been traveling -- which is talking to Republicans -- the Republican base is coming back and supporting the president because the Democrats have overreached," said Mr. McCain, a decorated Vietnam veteran.

Iraq: Silence Of The Sadrists (NSWK)

By Rod Nordland

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139527

So far the Mahdi Army is lying low. But for how long?

Early in the latest U.S. and Iraqi attempt to bring peace to Baghdad, one high-ranking Iraqi official included Moqtada al-Sadr in his prayers. "Allah, lo yehdih, lo yedahdih," he prayed, a pun that roughly translates as "Allah, show him the way, or kick him aside." As far as the official, who would only speak anonymously, is concerned, his prayer has been answered. Sadr has all but disappeared from the Iraqi scene the past three weeks, and Sadr's Mahdi Army has been notably quiet, too. Officially, the Iraqi government is attributing that to the new Baghdad security plan, part of a surge of forces that will eventually include 21,500 new American troops. But this official says what's really happening is the taming of Moqtada.

The U.S. military announced plans to set up a base inside Shia-dominated Sadr City only late last week. Most U.S. reinforcements are still en route. Yet despite an upsurge in suicide bombings by Sunni extremists, mostly aimed at Shia civilians, the number of reprisal killings is down dramatically since the security plan was launched on Feb. 14. Human Rights Minister Wijdan Salim said last week that "sectarian killings have dropped to a fourth what they had been [two weeks earlier], a very big decline." The senior Iraqi official credits pressure on Sadr from his former patrons in Iran, as well as from Ayatollah Sistani and the Marjaiyah, the Shia clerical leadership in Najaf. He says Iran is withholding military advice and aid to Sadrists as well as other rogue elements, and leaning on them to stop the killings. "Sadr is convinced that there's no real outcome of this struggle, and [death-squad reprisals have] backfired," he says.

Washington takes a less sanguine view of Iran's role in Iraq. U.S. military authorities have publicized a series of weapons seizures in recent days, including material for making the deadly "explosively formed projectiles," or EFPs, bombs allegedly of Iranian origin that can penetrate armored vehicles. But Iranian officials have publicly supported the Baghdad security plan, and have agreed to join a regional conference on Iraq's future with the United States and other nations. "Iran's strategy is to strengthen and support the [Shia-dominated] central government in Iraq," says a senior Iranian intelligence official who asked for anonymity because of his line of work, "when and how it sees appropriate."

The threat of American action certainly had something to do with Sadr's silence, too. Even before Feb. 14, U.S. and Iraqi troops had begun targeting top and middle-level officials in Sadr's organization, arresting several key ones and killing at least two who resisted. Even more critical may have been the intervention of Shia elders. Alarmed at the U.S. crackdown, Sadr had an 11 p.m. meeting with Sistani about a month ago, according to an aide to the grand ayatollah, speaking on condition of anonymity in keeping with practice in the cleric's office. "He asked the sayyid what he should do about the attacks against him, and [Sistani] told him, 'You have two options: bear the consequences, on you and Shias in general, or withdraw into a corner'."

The corner Sadr chose was likely somewhere in Iran. U.S. and Iraqi officials say he left for Iran two weeks ago. "As far as I know, he's still there," says Sami al-Askari, an adviser to Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki. "He's a secretive man." Both Tehran and Sadr's spokesmen vehemently deny he's hiding in Iran, but it's notable that he has been absent from his usual Friday sermons at the Kufah mosque for three weeks now, and hasn't appeared elsewhere in public. A former Mahdi Army commander in Baghdad, Abu Hazim, says, "Sadr is following a strategy called 'bending before the wind' because he's lost part of his control over the Mahdi Army. It's not like it was in 2004," when an uprising called by the young radical threatened to engulf much of the country.

Some analysts worry that Sadr and Shia extremists are just biding their time. But as additional U.S. troops arrive during the next two months, that may prove an uncomfortable wait. Already, in Karbala, a group of Sadrists recently split after one of them blamed other Sadr followers for killing civilians, including a prominent sheik close to Sistani. Police in Karbala went on to arrest 50 of Sadr's followers. "Even if they lie low, they will lose contact with their people," says the senior Iraqi official. "Even an organized army would lose its command and control." When the surge is over, says U.S. Embassy political officer Margaret Scobie, the Sadrists "may find their opportunities to resume are limited." In the meantime, authorities can breathe a little easier with only one set of extremists to fight.

The Things That Get You (USNEWS)

By Alex Kingsbury

U.S. News and World Report, March 4, 2007

FORWARD OPERATING BASE KALSU—There are plenty of nasty ways to meet with death or injury in Iraq. Examples of some of the cleverest devices targeting American troops are mounted on large sheets of plywood outside a dining hall at FOB Kalsu, about 25 miles south of Baghdad. It's a sobering display of the ingenuity and resourcefulness of the enemy: antipersonnel mines hidden in household items, pressure-sensitive explosives fashioned from slats of wood and wire, garage door openers that trigger artillery shells to rip open tanks.

The letters IED, for improvised explosive device, have become forever associated with the war in Iraq. These weapons are the greatest day-to-day threat to U.S. forces. The military reported that at least 60 U.S. troops have been killed in IED attacks so far this year (the military doesn't report the cause of death in all instances). IEDs were responsible for more than half of American hostile-fire deaths in the past 12 months.

DOJ_NMG_0139528

The military has struggled to develop practices and gear to counter the IED threat, with an array of devices designed to trigger the bombs prematurely or render them harmless. It's punch and counterpunch, as each new design breeds a new defense, and vice versa.

The display at FOB Kalsu, intended to help troops recognize common IEDs, is a poignant reminder of the dangers that soldiers routinely face in or out of their vehicles. The variety known as explosively formed penetrators—which American officials assert are coming from Iran—are particularly dangerous because of their ability to penetrate even armored vehicles. An EFP consists of a short tube that acts as a barrel for a machine-milled concave copper plate. When the explosive charge detonates, the force of the explosion creates a hot copper projectile that shoots from the barrel at hypervelocity and through nearly anything in its path.

"Getting clever." It's hard to fully appreciate the force of this small weapon, even seeing how it can punch a hole through a vehicle's armor. One EFP attack on an American light armored vehicle a few weeks ago sent a copper slug a distance of more than 70 yards, through a concrete wall, then through the rear of a car, tearing through the trunk and the front and back seats, and finally settling in the engine block. In this case, the slug missed its intended target, and no one was injured.

Increasingly sophisticated EFP attacks involve four or more such explosives timed to explode simultaneously or in sequence against a single target. "They are getting clever about aiming EFPs at the engine and troop compartments," says an American commander who witnessed an EFP attack.

But the EFPs against patrols and convoys are only the latest weapons of choice for targeting U.S. troops. Insurgents still use traditional military weapons like mortars as well. Either hand-held or mounted on the back of a pickup truck, mortars can fire an explosive shell a distance of a mile or so, delivering a powerful, if often inaccurate, punch.

The mortar alarms that sound in Camp Kalsu are sometimes ignored, as soldiers have become accustomed to the attacks. Playing dominoes in a large tent, a group of soldiers barely glance up as a mortar alarm begins to sound. The sharp whump of a nearby mortar hit sends them scrambling outside their tent into reinforced concrete shelters. "The worst is when you get four or five alarms and attacks in one night," says a sergeant, leaning on his rifle and peering out of the bunker. "It's hard to sleep through all of that, and you wind up running into the shelter wearing only your boxers."

Phil Hubbard doesn't show his office to many visitors, but the manager of an Internet cafe and coffee shop at FOB Kalsu has had some close calls. Looking at the 20 jagged shrapnel holes in his office wall, he gestures to the point of impact a few yards behind his trailer. "The guy who was working in here at the time just missed being turned into Swiss cheese," he says. Shrapnel tore through the wall, punching several holes into the faux leather chair at his desk, then through another wall on the opposite side of the room. Several soldiers were injured in the attack, one of the largest mortar attacks against FOB Kalsu.

Incidentally, the camp itself was named for the only recently active professional football player killed in the Vietnam War. Robert Kalsu was a lineman from the University of Oklahoma who was voted the Buffalo Bills team rookie of the year in 1968, his first and only season with the team. He was killed two years later in the A Shau Valley in Vietnam during a mortar attack.

10 Questions For Ted Kennedy (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, March 5, 2007

As Ted Kennedy enters his 45th year in Congress, the arch-liberal senior Senator from Massachusetts has a lot on his plate. Between playing a lead role in the antiwar movement, working to push through a hike in the minimum wage and getting ready to reauthorize No Child Left Behind, Kennedy sat down with TIME's Massimo Calabresi to talk about politics, his ever-present Portuguese water dogs and, naturally, the Kennedy clan.

Are you the only Senator to keep dogs in your offices?

No. Bob Dole had a dog, Leader. Elizabeth Dole has a dog. And Bob Byrd has his dog. Elizabeth Dole and I are going to form a dog caucus, and we're going to be co-presidents. We don't think we're going to be president of anything else.

Admirable bipartisanship. Democrats have the country with them against the war in Iraq but aren't acting to end it. Why?

This war is the major blunder in American foreign policy. We ought to free ourselves from our troop involvement. But if you look back on Vietnam, it wasn't until 1973 that we passed the resolution that actually halted troops and money. There's no question that this is a slow-moving institution, and it's no new statement to say that we are behind what's happening out in the countryside.

But there was fallout for Democrats appearing weak on Vietnam.

It's been the Democrats who have been for armor for the troops. We have been for investing in our servicemen when they come back from Iraq. And it is the Democrats who want to get our American troops out of the civil-war cross fire. Democrats are concerned about the security of the fighting person. Too often Republicans are more interested in protecting the reputation of the President than protecting the troops.

DOJ_NMG_0139529

Do you intend to endorse one of the Democrats running for President?

I have no plans. I just got re-elected. I'm going to spend my time here doing what I was elected to do.

It's easy to pick up a newspaper and see some comparison between your brothers and Barack Obama. Is there any validity to that comparison?

Barack is certainly an extremely gifted and talented individual. But my brothers are on a special plateau for me. They're my heroes.

You know Mitt Romney pretty well.

I've had my differences with Mitt, but I wouldn't underestimate him. That's certainly also true for Senator [John] McCain. I have differences with him--the Iraq war is the most obvious example--but I've worked with him quite a bit on the patients' bill of rights, and I've worked with him on immigration.

Your long-sought minimum-wage bill is stuck in conference, thanks to a debate on the size of small-business tax breaks. What's going on?

It's going to get through. The differences are not significant. We're not talking about hundreds of billions of dollars. We're talking about a few billion dollars. It's been 10 years since we've increased the minimum wage, and I want to get this increase to the beneficiaries. I'm convinced we'll get it done within the next two weeks.

Some on the left wing of the Democratic Party would like to see No Child Left Behind done away with. Are you going to deliver reauthorization this year?

The concept of including every child in education as a national goal is one that I wholeheartedly and completely agree with. But there are children left out. If this were the space program, we would have gone to the moon, landed and gotten halfway back. We have work to do in the reauthorization of No Child Left Behind and plenty of it. But do I believe we can get a reauthorization? Yes, I do.

You just celebrated your 75th birthday. Or rather the celebrations are ongoing.

My sister Eunice wants to know why I have to have several, and I told her, Well, I was the ninth member of the family. I had two sisters who had their birthdays on Feb. 20, and mine's on Feb. 22, so the house was always lively on Feb. 20, and then [the next day] someone would say, Oh, my goodness, Teddy's birthday is coming up tomorrow. So I've been wanting to make up for it.

You had a costume party. Who did you go as?

Most people think I was John Quincy Adams. I'll probably leave it there.

Confronting Iraq's Exodus (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, March 5, 2007

The war in Iraq has driven nearly 4 million people from their homes. As many as 2 million have fled the country, in what Refugees International calls the fastest-growing crisis in the world. As detailed in the stories that follow, the burden of coping with this exodus has fallen most heavily on Iraq's neighbors, such as Syria, Jordan and Iran, who have absorbed the vast majority of exiles. But the war's reverberations are being felt beyond the Middle East, in places as seemingly distant and incongruous as Sweden, which has taken in more than 11,000 Iraqis since 2005.

The U.S., however, has been reluctant to open its doors, admitting just 18 Iraqi refugees in 2005 and 202 in 2006. In February the State Department announced that it would admit up to 7,000 more, giving special consideration to those Iraqis who worked for the U.S. government. But that's still just a fraction of the number of Iraqis in need. And although the Bush Administration has offered to cover about a third of the $60 million that the U.N. says is needed for the refugees, the U.S.'s European and Arab allies think Washington should cover far more of the costs resulting from what they view as America's war.

So why the parsimony? U.S. officials argue that resettling Iraqis will accelerate the country's brain drain. Admitting large numbers of Arabs also raises anxieties among some Americans that terrorists could slip in--even though refugees are among the most exhaustively screened migrants. But Bush Administration critics say the biggest reason Washington has been slow to act is that doing so would be an admission of failure in Iraq. Says Harold Koh, dean of Yale Law School and former Assistant Secretary of State for Democracy, Human Rights and Labor: "If the U.S. government were to do an active resettlement regime for Iraqi refugees, it would be conceding that its own rhetoric about the situation in Iraq becoming safe and stable anytime soon is a fantasy."

The U.S. has been cool to refugees before. In World War II, Secretary of State Cordell Hull infamously declined to accept Jewish Holocaust refugees, adhering instead to prewar immigration quotas. Thirty years later, the U.S. watched as a crisis built ahead of the April 1975 collapse of South Vietnam, in part because 54% of Americans were against admitting Vietnamese who were fleeing the communists.

DOJ_NMG_0139530

In both cases, U.S. leaders calculated that the country's national interests trumped its moral responsibilities. But in Iraq, a more magnanimous stance toward refugees would help the U.S.'s broader interests. It would be good propaganda in the Arab world, where the U.S. image needs burnishing. It would be a tool to counter one of the root causes of terrorism: regional instability caused by mass migration. And it would provide Washington with a basis for talks with Iran and Syria, whose help the U.S. needs to stabilize Iraq. Despite the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, the Bush Administration has refused to negotiate directly with either country. But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has taken a first step toward engagement, announcing that the U.S. will participate next month in talks on Iraq's future that will include representatives from Iran and Syria.

Tackling the refugee crisis may be the Bush Administration's best chance to repair some of the damage to U.S. prestige caused by the Iraq war. After the fall of Saigon, Congress bucked public opinion and embraced its obligation to Indochinese asylum seekers, using refugee aid to countries like Thailand and Laos to build relationships and counter the spread of communism.

Opening the doors to Iraq's departed would be smart as well as moral. And it would allow this generation of Americans to live up to George Washington's pledge that "America is open to receive not only the opulent and respectable stranger, but the oppressed and persecuted of all nations and religions."

Syria. (TIME)

By Andrew Lee Butters

Time, March 5, 2007

What happens to a country when its population grows by more than 10% in three years? In Syria, which has absorbed more than a million Iraqi refugees, you can see cosmetic transformations. Iraqi-accented Arabic is heard constantly in the cafÃ©s and streets of Damascus. Real estate prices have skyrocketed. Food prices are rising. There's even a neighborhood in the capital called Fallujah that's popular with Iraqis.

The Iraqi-refugee issue is also changing Syria in deeper ways, altering the country's image in the Middle East--and bolstering its leverage with the U.S. While the Bush Administration has accused it of supporting terrorism in Iraq, Israel and Lebanon, Syria has established itself as the lifeboat of the Arab world. Having taken in 180,000 temporary Lebanese refugees fleeing the war with Israel last summer, Syria is the only Arab country that has been equally welcoming to all of Iraq's religious sects, according to Syrian human-rights groups. Only Jordan--which has received 750,000 Iraqis but has stopped accepting more--comes close to matching Syria's largesse. "The price of this disaster is being paid mainly by the refugees themselves and by two countries: Syria and Jordan," says AntÃ³nio Guterres, the U.N.'s High Commissioner for Refugees. "The international community can't let [them] bear this burden alone."

Syria wants more than bromides for its openness. The humanitarian crisis in Iraq could be the issue that brings Syria out of international isolation and into semi-respectability. Although the Bush Administration has long resisted diplomatic engagement with Syria, cracks are appearing. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has authorized the U.S. embassy in Damascus to talk with Syrian officials as long as their discussions are limited to the refugee crisis. Syrian officials say their willingness to take in so many refugees has helped stabilize the region. Now they want something in return: a softer U.S. line on Syrian involvement in Lebanon and more pressure on Israel to give back occupied land in the Golan Heights. "One million refugees is a huge number," says Redwan Ziadeh, director of the Damascus Center for Human Rights Studies. "It is a card that Syria can play with the U.S."

Damascus may not have that card for long. Internally, the refugee issue poses long-term dilemmas for the Baathist regime of Syrian President Bashar Assad. The presence of so many needy Iraqis has exposed the government's failure to make economic reforms. The Syrian government--dominated by a secular core of Alawite Muslims who rule a country that is 74% Sunni Muslim--may have to stop the influx as a measure of self-preservation. Assad is particularly concerned about extremists re-entering the country from Iraq, according to Syrian security analysts. "We used to call them the Afghan Arabs," a security analyst says, referring to extremists who served with the Taliban and al-Qaeda in Afghanistan. "Now we are worried about the Iraqi Syrians."

The government has begun to limit the amount of time it allows Iraqis without residency status to stay in Syria, down from three months to two weeks. In mid-February, Syria shut its border with Iraq and wouldn't let any Iraqis enter for three days. The border is back open, but the message to Iraq and the U.S. was clear: Stop taking Syrian help for granted. The U.S. still needs to prove to Syria that playing a constructive role in the Middle East can pay off too.

Sweden. (TIME)

By Vivienne Walt

Time, March 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139531

The view from Alaa's apartment reveals streets and sidewalks carpeted in fresh snow, a tableau of tranquillity half a world away from the chaos of Iraq. But inside, the war is never far from his mind. The television set is turned at high volume to a talk show on Baghdadi TV, an Iraqi satellite channel. Only Arabic books line the bookshelves in the living room; Alaa and his roommate, Ali Hamad, an ophthalmologist from Baghdad, barely speak English, let alone the language of the country in which they have sought refuge. As he welcomes a visitor with the typical Iraqi drink of sugared mint tea, Alaa laughs. "This is Little Iraq," he says.

Alaa, 29, left Baghdad in January, a few days after Saddam Hussein was hanged. A group of gunmen had smashed in his front door and ransacked the house. Alaa, a Shi'ite television producer who was at work at the time, believes that Sunni militants wanted to kill him for covering Saddam's trial. And so, as hundreds of Iraqis do each day, Alaa decided to pack up his things and flee. At the time he wasn't sure where he was going or who would take him in. Now he finds himself sharing a two-room apartment with people who were complete strangers just weeks ago, in a country he knows little about--but that is, for the foreseeable future, his new home: Sweden.

This country of 9 million has long prided itself on being one of the world's most hospitable to foreigners fleeing war and hardship. After the 1991 Gulf War, Sweden took in thousands of Iraqi Shi'ites and Kurds. But nothing could have prepared Swedes for the numbers of Iraqis who are pouring in today. While most of the 2 million Iraqis who have left since the U.S. invasion in 2003 have remained in the Middle East, a growing number are trying to make their way out of the region, in search of refuge and the promise of a new life in the West. Having granted asylum to 2,330 Iraqis in 2005, Sweden received nearly four times that many last year. In December, 1,566 Iraqis arrived, nearly five times the figure in February 2006. And with Iraq's civil war still raging, Swedish officials say they are bracing for a possible 35,000 this year.

For both the new Iraqi arrivals and their Scandinavian hosts, coexistence has not come easily. Swedish officials fret about the potential security risks and the costs posed by a swelling population of displaced Muslims. Although relieved to have escaped the grinding violence of Iraq, Sweden's Iraqis face the prospect of having to rebuild shattered lives and find work in an alien society. For many, the trauma of Iraq is inescapable. Recent arrivals like Alaa say they fear being hunted down by sectarian rivals in Stockholm. "We don't know who is who here," says Alaa. In a Swedish government asylum office, he was shocked to see Iraqis in "long beards and short pants" who looked like extremist Sunnis. "I'm scared that among those people who Sweden helps are crazy Salafis who might kill me," he says.

Yet the fact that Alaa made it to Stockholm at all qualifies him as one of the lucky ones. Among Western countries, Sweden is unique in allowing entry to all Iraqis who can prove they have fled central and southern Iraq, no matter what their political involvement or how they reached Scandinavia, according to officials at the Swedish Migration Board.

Being accepted into Sweden is relatively simple compared with what it takes to actually get there. Iraqis say the odyssey north typically costs $10,000 per person and involves relying on a network of nameless smugglers and middlemen. Most Iraqis flee first to Jordan; from there smugglers arrange flights to Istanbul, where it is easy to find illegal European Union passports--red passports, as the Iraqis call them, which contain the refugees' real photos but use other people's names. "Daniel," 23, a Christian Iraqi student sitting in a Stockholm cafÃ©, said he bought a fake Iraqi passport for $300 in Baghdad and used it to take a smuggler's ride through Syria to Turkey. In Turkey a smuggler traded Daniel's Iraqi passport for a false European passport for $8,000--paid by his parents in Baghdad. Then he hid in the back of a cargo truck with three other Iraqi men for the duration of the 3,000-mile journey into Sweden.

For many Iraqis, the initial relief of fleeing the war is replaced by the shock of being shipped to one of Sweden's overcrowded refugee camps, an hour's drive from Stockholm. Only Iraqis who can prove they will live with relatives in Sweden are permitted to stay outside government housing when they arrive; others slowly try to find accommodations once their refugee status is officially approved, usually within a few weeks of arrival. Most end up in Sweden's heavily immigrant ghettos, like the Stockholm neighborhood of Rinkeby. The area's expanse of characterless high-rise apartment buildings dates back to the 1960s, when the Swedish government poured billions into public housing. Driving into the area from Stockholm's gracious old city is like entering another country. In fact, there are few reasons that Swedes would ever visit. Little Swedish is heard in the Middle Eastern and African supermarkets, barbershops and call-service outlets; these days the street-side talk is increasingly in Arabic.

Government officials say they try to steer Iraqis to smaller towns, where housing is cheaper and their skills are in greater demand. But Iraqis resist. "It's a major problem for us," says Mattias SjÃ¶berg, a migration officer at the Swedish Migration Board in Stockholm. "We send people to the north or down south, but in the end many Iraqis end up in Stockholm, where there is a [Muslim] community."

Even in Stockholm, Iraqis often find their careers stalled while they spend months in Swedish-language classes. The government has made attendance in language classes a precondition for receiving asylum benefits. Then comes the slog of requalifying in their profession. While Iraqis in Stockholm praise the Swedes' welcome, they struggle to persuade locals to hire them for professional jobs. "We have a lot of highly educated people driving taxis," says Faried al-Suheil, who fled Baghdad for

DOJ_NMG_0139532

Stockholm in 1993, moved back in 2003, then returned to Stockholm last summer. He stood at the doorway of the Iraqi prayer hall in the Stockholm suburb of Jakobsberg late one evening. Six taxis were parked along the snowbound sidewalk while the drivers celebrated the Shi'ite holiday of Ashura inside. "The Swedes don't want to hire us" for skilled work, al-Suheil says.

But as is true around the world these days, the Iraqis in Sweden reserve their most bitter words for one another. As Iraq's ethnic fighting has intensified, so have the tensions among refugees living thousands of miles from the war. "Before, in Sweden, we never talked about who was who," says Salam Karam, an ethnic Kurdish journalist from Baghdad who moved to Stockholm with his family in 1990. "Now people talk about who's a Shi'ite, who's a former Baathist. Have they come here to hunt us?" He says he was shocked to find that when he taught Swedish to Iraqi refugees last year, "my Shi'ite students never spoke to those who were Sunnis."

The Swedish government has opted to grant refuge even to Iraqis who enter illegally rather than pursue them for using forged documents. "We don't turn anyone back," says Gunn Sundberg-Hjelm, an asylum officer at the Swedish Migration Board. "Look at the circumstances they have left." But how long can the warm welcome last? Swedish voters last September ousted the leftist government, largely over fears about growing unemployment and the country's costly welfare system. That nervousness may increasingly be directed at the new Iraqi refugees, who benefit hugely from Sweden's social services. The country has spent tens of millions of dollars on the new arrivals, who receive a daily allowance, housing and free health care. Beyond the burden to Sweden's economy, the influx could also pose a security risk, says Magnus Norell, senior analyst for the government-funded Swedish Defense Research Agency and a former Swedish Secret Service special analyst on terrorism. "It's not just that Iraqis are swamping the system," says Norell. "The government realizes that there are several people in this country who should not be here, people who would not get in because they have involvement with Islamist organizations in Iraq and Europe." With the numbers of Iraqi refugees soaring, the government doesn't "have time to do the proper investigation."

But for both the thousands of Iraqis who have found their way to Stockholm and the European hosts who have taken them in, there is no going back. Hunched over a borrowed computer in his small apartment, Alaa, the television producer, spends hours a day looking at digital photographs of his small son playing on his bed back in Iraq. Alaa hopes to get his Swedish residence papers sometime this year, allowing his wife and year-old boy to join him in Stockholm--two more Iraqis seeking escape from a world gone wrong.

Japan Weighs Extending Iraq Mission (AP)

AP, March 5, 2007

Japan's top government spokesman said Monday that Tokyo is undecided about whether to extend the nation's air force mission in Iraq when it expires in July, but that a decision is expected by the end of this month.

Tokyo has been airlifting U.N. and coalition personnel and supplies into Baghdad and other Iraqi cities from nearby Kuwait since last year as part of efforts to support the reconstruction of Iraq.

The mission is set to end July 31, and debate is already gearing up about whether Tokyo will continue its contributions to a war increasingly unpopular at home.

"Discussions are going on, but we have not decided on any specific policy yet," Chief Cabinet spokesman Yasuhisa Shiozaki said. "A decision will be made by the end of this month."

Japan backed the U.S. invasion of Iraq and provided ground troops for a non-combat, humanitarian mission in the southern Iraqi city of Samawah from early 2004.

Japan withdrew the ground troops in July last year, and has since expanded its Kuwait-based air operations.

The Iraq mission is part of Japan's bid to boost its international profile. Tokyo also approved in late October a one-year extension of its naval mission in the Indian Ocean to support the U.S.-led anti-terrorism campaign in Afghanistan.

But some in Japan criticize the operations for violating the pacifist constitution, which prohibits the use of force in solving international disputes.

Bilateral Talks With U.S. Still On The Table (WT)

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

U.S. and Iranian officials, in separate remarks yesterday, both left open the possibility of bilateral talks on the sidelines of a regional meeting this week in Baghdad.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, said Washington had not decided whether it would meet one-on-one with the Iranians when regional countries and world powers meet Saturday to try to get Iraq's neighbors to contribute to stabilizing the country.

"We have not decided at this point with regard to anything bilateral [with Iran], but we will be prepared to play our role as constructively as possible," Mr. Khalilzad said in an interview with CNN yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0139533

"There have been some recent indications that [the Iranians] are interested in a dialogue with regard to Iraq," he said.

Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammed Ali Hosseini, meanwhile, said his country has not decided whether it will attend the Baghdad conference but did not rule out a decision to meet directly with Mr. Khalilzad.

"Recently, the United States has proposed negotiations with Iran through different channels over the Iraq issue," Mr. Hosseini was quoted as saying by the Associated Press. "Meeting with Americans on the sidelines of the Baghdad conference is not on the agenda of Iran, for the time being."

The meeting will bring together working-level officials in Baghdad before a second session, involving ministers, as early as next month, U.S. officials said. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said she would attend the later session.

Mr. Khalilzad said on CNN that the U.S. was "prepared to talk" with the Iranians about U.S. accusations that Iran is sending weapons to Iraqi militants.

He said he was concerned primarily about roadside bombs known as "explosively formed projectiles" (EFPs), which have killed a large number of U.S. soldiers.

"It is my understanding that EFPs do come across the border [from Iran] and there is continuing support and assistance from elements in Iran to elements in Iraq. That continues," he said. The U.S. military thinks the Quds Force, part of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, is behind the weapons shipments, he said.

"Should the opportunity arise to talk to the Iranians, we will focus on the weapons that come across the border," he said. "The purpose of any talks that take place, the bilateral talks, will be very much the security of our forces."

The United States has no diplomatic relations with Iran and is involved in a war of words to stop Tehran's nuclear program, which Iran says is aimed solely at producing electricity.

President Bush has stepped up accusations that Iran is backing Shi'ite militants in Iraq. The U.S. military has strengthened its presence in the Gulf and detained several Iranians in Iraq. Washington also is leading a push for stronger sanctions against Iran over its nuclear defiance.

Syria, which has agreed to attend the Baghdad meeting, indicated that its government is hoping to engage the United States.

The Al-Ba'ath state newspaper said in an editorial yesterday that the Baghdad conference should open the way for talks between the two countries, whose relations have been strained for years.

"How could attendees of a conference who are sitting at the same table ignore each other?" said Al-Ba'ath. "The entire region sees in the conference a glimpse of hope and optimism to start a series of solutions."

Washington accuses Syria of allowing militants to cross into Iraq, a charge Syria denies. Last week, a the Syrian government called Washington's decision to attend the conference a step toward comprehensive dialogue with Syria on the Middle East.

16 Civilians Die As U.S. Troops Fire On Afghan Road (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 4 — American troops opened fire on a highway filled with civilian cars and bystanders on Sunday, American and Afghan officials said, in an incident that the Americans said left 16 civilians dead and 24 wounded after a suicide car bombing in eastern Afghanistan. One American was also wounded.

The shooting sparked demonstrations, with local people blocking the highway, the main road east from the town of Jalalabad to the border with Pakistan. And there were differences in some of the accounts of the incident, with the Americans saying that the civilians were caught in cross-fire between the troops and militants, and Afghan witnesses and some authorities blaming the Americans for indiscriminately shooting at civilian vehicles in anger after the explosion.

The United States military said the unit came under fire after a suicide bomber detonated his explosive-laden car near their convoy “as part of a complex ambush involving enemy small-arms fire from several directions.”

Members of the unit, on patrol near Jalalabad airfield, returned fire, and the civilians were killed and wounded in the cross-fire during the battle, according to a statement from the military press office at Bagram Air Base, 40 miles north of Kabul.

“We regret the death of innocent Afghan citizens as a result of the Taliban extremists’ cowardly act,” Lt. Col. David Accetta, a military spokesman, said in the statement. “Once again the terrorists demonstrated their blatant disregard for human life by attacking coalition forces in a populated area, knowing full well that innocent Afghans would be killed and wounded in the attack.”

Yet some of the wounded interviewed in the hospital by news agencies said the only shooting came from the American troops. A hospital official, who asked not to be identified, said all the wounded were suffering from bullet wounds and not shrapnel from the bomb explosion.

DOJ_NMG_0139534

Hundreds of Afghans blocked the road and threw rocks at police officers in protest afterward, with some demonstrators shouting "Death to America! Death to Karzai!" a reference to President Hamid Karzai, The Associated Press reported.

The shooting will be a setback for American forces in Afghanistan, who have been working to contain the continuing insurgent attacks, in particular roadside bombs and suicide attacks, and win the support of the people with reconstruction and development projects. Deadly riots shook Kabul last May after American troops were involved in a fatal car crash and then opened fire on the crowd.

Among the dead on Sunday morning were a woman and two children in their early teens, said Dr. Ajmal Pardez, the provincial director of health, speaking by telephone from the Jalalabad city hospital. He said the hospital received 10 dead and 25 wounded people from the incident, with four people in critical condition.

After the suicide attack, the Americans treated every car and person along the highway as a potential attacker, though none of the people showed hostile intent, Muhammad Khan Katawazi, the district chief of Shinwar, told The A.P.

"They were firing everywhere, and they even opened fire on 14 to 15 vehicles passing on the highway," said Tur Gul, 38, who was standing on the roadside by a gas station and was shot twice in the right hand. "They opened fire on everybody, the ones inside the vehicles and the ones on foot."

Some of the wounded interviewed by The A.P. said the soldiers opened fire indiscriminately on passing cars and pedestrians on the busy main road.

"When we parked our vehicle, when they passed us, they opened fire on our vehicle," said 15-year-old Mohammad Ishaq, who was hit by two bullets, in the left arm and right ear. "It was a convoy of three American Humvees. All three Humvees were firing around."

In other fighting, two British soldiers were killed Saturday in southern Afghanistan, the British Defense Ministry said Sunday. The men were involved in heavy fighting that has raged for three days in the town of Sangin, said Col. Tom Collins, a NATO spokesman in Kabul. Townspeople have fled the town and abandoned their shops as Taliban insurgents and British forces stationed there have been trading artillery and rocket fire, according to a resident of the area.

Insurgents Strike Marine Convoy; 10 Dead In Melee (WT/AP)

By Rahim Faiez

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

BARIKAW, Afghanistan -- Insurgents struck a convoy of Marines with an explosives-rigged minivan and followed up with a fusillade from the roadside, U.S. officials said yesterday.

As many as 10 people were killed and 34 wounded as the convoy made a frenzied escape, and injured Afghans said many were killed by Americans who fired on civilian cars and pedestrians as they sped away.

U.S. officials said militants' gunfire may have killed or injured civilians, but Afghanistan's Interior Ministry and wounded Afghans said most of the bullets were American. Hundreds of angry Afghans protested near the blast site, denouncing the U.S. presence.

As the Americans fled, they treated every car and person along the busy highway as a potential attacker, said Mohammed Khan Katawazi, the district chief of Shinwar in eastern Afghanistan's Nangarhar province.

"I saw them turning and firing in this direction, then turning and firing in that direction," Ahmed Najib, a 23-year-old hit by a bullet in his right shoulder, said of the U.S. forces. "I even saw a farmer shot by the Americans."

Lt. Col. David Accetta, the top U.S. military spokesman in Afghanistan, said gunmen may have fired on U.S. forces at multiple points during the escape. He said it was not yet clear how the casualties happened, though he left open the possibility that U.S. forces had shot civilians.

"It's not entirely clear right now if the people killed or wounded by gunfire were killed or wounded by coalition forces' gunfire or enemy attackers' gunfire," he said.

The accusation that U.S. forces killed or wounded so many Afghans was likely to cause an uproar in a country that has seen an untold number of civilians killed by international forces since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001. A high-level delegation was appointed to investigate.

President Hamid Karzai has pleaded repeatedly for Western troops not to harm civilians, and in December wept during a speech lamenting civilian deaths at the hands of foreign forces.

The U.S.-based Human Rights Watch estimates that more than 100 Afghan civilians died as a result of NATO and coalition assaults in 2006. An AP tally, based on reports from Afghan, NATO and coalition officials, puts the overall civilian death toll in 2006 at 834, most from militants' attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0139535

Nine witnesses -- including five Afghans recuperating from bullet wounds in the hospital -- said in interviews that U.S. forces fired indiscriminately along at least a six-mile stretch of one of eastern Afghanistan's busiest highways -- a route often filled not only with cars and trucks, but Afghans on foot and bicycles.

"They were firing everywhere, and they even opened fire on 14 to 15 vehicles passing on the highway," said Tur Gul, 38, who was standing on the roadside by a gas station and was shot twice in his right hand. "They opened fire on everybody, the ones inside the vehicles and the ones on foot."

The tolls varied. The Interior Ministry said 10 persons were killed, while the provincial health chief said eight died.

The U.S. military said eight civilians were killed and 34 wounded after earlier saying 16 were killed and 24 wounded. It did not explain the revised, lower death toll, saying only that the new figures were "the most accurate numbers to date." A U.S. Marine was also injured in the suicide blast.

Interior Ministry spokesman Zemeri Bashary said the chief of the Interior Ministry's criminal division would lead a delegation including a U.S.-led coalition official to Nangarhar province today to investigate.

"The coalition says they have proof that gunmen opened fire," said Mr. Bashary. "But I think more of the gunfire was from the [U.S.] side."

Marines Open Fire After Afghan Ambush (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, March 4 -- At least eight Afghan civilians were killed Sunday in eastern Afghanistan when U.S. Marines traveling in a convoy were hit by a car bomb and responded by firing in a way that some witnesses called reckless.

The incident, which the U.S. military said resulted from a "complex ambush," was followed by angry demonstrations in which hundreds of Afghans took to the streets, many chanting anti-government and anti-American slogans.

According to Afghan and U.S. accounts, the Marine convoy was struck by a van packed with explosives as it traveled along a roadway connecting the eastern city of Jalalabad to the Pakistani border, in the district of Mohmand Dara. The portion of the road where the explosion occurred is flanked by shops and was crowded at the time of the blast.

Immediately afterward, the convoy was attacked by "small-arms fire from several directions," said Lt. Col. David Accetta, a U.S. military spokesman. "The coalition forces returned fire in self-defense. It's unclear whether the casualties were from the car bomb blast or from the small-arms fire."

The Associated Press quoted several wounded Afghans as saying that the Marines fired indiscriminately as they fled the scene.

"They were firing everywhere, and they even opened fire on 14 to 15 vehicles passing on the highway," Tur Gul, 38, told the AP. Gul was standing on the roadside near a gas station and was shot twice in his right hand. "They opened fire on everybody, the ones inside the vehicles and the ones on foot."

The AP also quoted an Afghan police official who supported the civilian accounts.

Accetta said that the allegations would be investigated but that "at this point we don't have any information that there was any wrongdoing by the coalition forces."

Noor Agha Zuwak, spokesman for the provincial governor, said the roadway was shut down for two hours by the crowds of protesters that formed after the incident. They were shouting "Down with the U.S.!" he said, and "Down with Karzai!" a reference to Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

The U.S. military at one point said 16 civilians were killed but later changed that estimate to eight. An official at a local hospital said late Sunday that 14 people had died. The military said 35 people were wounded, among them a coalition service member.

Baz Mohammed Shirzad, deputy director of the hospital where the wounded were treated, said doctors saw both bullet and shrapnel injuries. He said four patients were in critical condition Sunday night, but others were lucid enough to talk about what they saw. "An explosion took place, then firing took place. After that, they don't know what happened," he said.

Accetta said the anger aimed at the foreign troops following the incident was misdirected. "It should have been directed against the extremist forces who initiated this attack in a crowded area when they knew there would be civilian casualties," he said.

The incident is the latest to spark public outrage over the perception that foreign troops are not taking enough precautions to avoid civilian casualties. Last May, for instance, a U.S. military cargo truck lost control and struck 12 vehicles, killing one person and injuring six. A riot ensued in Kabul, the capital, and 20 people died, 160 were injured and dozens of buildings were damaged or destroyed.

DOJ_NMG_0139536

The United States has 27,000 troops in Afghanistan, 15,000 of whom are under NATO command. The incident Sunday involved Marine Special Forces who are not part of the NATO mission.

Also Sunday, the NATO-led force said that two of its soldiers were killed Saturday during a firefight in southern Afghanistan. Officials later said the soldiers were British.

8 Afghans Die After Attack On U.S. Convoy (LAT)

By Shafiqullah Azimi And Laura King, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

Protesters riot after a suicide blast targeting troops results in gunfire that claims civilian lives.

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN — A suicide bombing Sunday targeting an American military convoy triggered chaotic gunfire on a busy highway in eastern Afghanistan, leaving at least eight Afghan civilians dead and about three dozen wounded, officials said.

The incident outside the city of Jalalabad set off a riot in which hundreds of protesters, charging that American troops fired indiscriminately, threw stones and shouted slogans denouncing the United States and the Afghan government.

It was the highest civilian death toll this year in an incident involving U.S. or other foreign troops. Such casualties erode public support for Afghan President Hamid Karzai, who has repeatedly called on coalition forces to exercise greater care to avoid harming civilians.

The incident occurred as the five-vehicle U.S. convoy was on patrol near the Jalalabad airfield, a large base that lies just off a heavily traveled highway to the Pakistani border.

U.S. military officials said American forces opened fire after a suicide attacker detonated a minivan packed with explosives as the convoy passed through the small market town of Bari Kot, whose bazaar was filled with morning shoppers.

Calling the ambush "complex," the military said that U.S. troops also came under fire from several directions during the suicide attack.

Witnesses, however, said the gunfire appeared to come mainly from U.S. troops whose convoy sped along the highway shooting other vehicles and pedestrians for up to five miles from the blast scene.

"They were firing everywhere," Tur Gul told the Associated Press. Gul, who was standing at the roadside and suffered gunshot wounds, said he saw more than a dozen cars hit.

"They opened fire on everybody, the ones inside the vehicles and the ones on foot," he said.

Two Afghan journalists working for the Associated Press said a U.S. soldier deleted their photos and video of a four-wheel-drive vehicle in which three people had been shot to death, about 100 yards from the suicide bombing site, the news service reported. The news service said it planned to lodge a protest with the American military.

Coalition officials blamed the Taliban for the civilian casualties, saying the attackers bore responsibility regardless of whether bystanders were hit by U.S. or insurgent fire.

"We regret the death of innocent Afghan citizens as a result of the Taliban extremists' cowardly act," said Lt. Col. David Accetta, a U.S. spokesman. "Once again the terrorists demonstrated their blatant disregard for human life by attacking coalition forces in a populated area, knowing full well that innocent Afghans would be killed and wounded in the attack."

Casualty counts varied, as is often the case in such attacks. Provincial police spokesman Abdul Ghafor said 10 people were killed and about three dozen injured. The U.S. military initially reported 34 civilians killed and 24 wounded, but it later revised its death toll to eight, with 35 hurt.

An American serviceman also was wounded. The dead were said to include at least one woman and two children.

After the incident, demonstrators blocked the roadway near Jalalabad and hurled rocks at police. "Death to America! Death to Karzai!" some shouted.

Afghan and U.S. military officials announced that they would investigate the shootings, which came as the country braced for a new round of fighting that often comes with the warming temperatures that will soon melt the snow in high mountain passes.

Both NATO generals and Taliban commanders have declared they will try to seize the offensive.

Coalition forces have overwhelming military superiority, but Taliban-led insurgents increasingly have turned to nonconventional tactics such as roadside bombings and suicide attacks.

The coalition troops are under orders to be extremely vigilant against suicide bombings, which are a near-daily occurrence. But increasing numbers of Afghan civilians have been shot when troops mistakenly believed they posed a threat.

Last year was the bloodiest in Afghanistan since the Taliban regime was toppled by U.S.-led forces in 2001. More than 4,000 people were killed in 2006, most of them militants.

Coalition forces in Afghanistan are at their highest levels since the fall of the Taliban, with U.S. and North Atlantic Treaty Organization troops now totaling more than 45,000.

DOJ_NMG_0139537

laura.king@latimes.com
*
Special correspondent Azimi reported from Kabul and Times staff writer King from Istanbul, Turkey.

New Justice, No Peace (NYT)

By Richard May
The New York Times, March 5, 2007
Washington

LATE last month some 25,000 people held a rally in the Afghan capital, Kabul. Were they calling for more aid? Were they rallying to demand military action against the Taliban? No, they were urging President Hamid Karzai to sign a law providing legal amnesty for actions committed during the civil war that raged in Afghanistan during and after the Soviet occupation.

While the law has passed both houses of Afghanistan's Parliament, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and several humanitarian groups have argued against it on the grounds that it eliminates any possibility for justice for the people killed, tortured and raped during that awful period. Some have made subtle threatens, saying that should Mr. Karzai sign the law, he might have a harder time getting international aid. I understand such humanitarian feelings and the calls for justice, but President Karzai should sign the law — for four good reasons.

First, while most international groups feel that the law is simply about absolving the most violent warlords, the fact is that almost all Afghans have blood on their hands. In a country that has been enmeshed in war for more than 25 years it is hard to find people who have not taken up arms at some point in their lives. Children drafted into militias and farmers who armed themselves to protect their homes could easily be called "soldiers" of the warlords at some point and face charges.

Second, political participation like the pro-amnesty rally is a good sign for the future. While many saw it as an effort to forgive warlords, I saw something much better: progress through participation. When the people of a country that has experienced only war and tyranny for 25 years feel free to go to the streets to have their voices heard, democracy is working.

It is worth noting that not a single person was hurt during this rally — not one police officer or soldier or marcher. Whatever the views of the crowd, they demonstrated their position through a nonviolent method — a tremendous advance in recent Afghan history. And, while the global humanitarian groups want to resolve the past, the rally showed that many of the survivors of those dark years want nothing more than to put it behind them and rebuild their country democratically.

Third, the rejection of the amnesty law could easily turn the people against the government and the coalition forces that operate in Afghanistan. Should Mr. Karzai refuse to sign, it would convince many Afghans that their government is more interested in the views of the international community than that of its own people.

Fourth, calls for justice tend to ignore the reality of the civil war. When Westerners hear the term "warlord" they think of tyrannical criminals who are self-serving instruments of death. But in Afghanistan things are more complex. Most warlords came to power protecting their families, clans and land from Soviet troops. The members of the militias the warlords commanded were cousins, sons and neighbors. The warlords were, and in many cases still are, closer to the people than the Kabul government has ever been. By negating the amnesty law, Mr. Karzai would effectively shun a large segment of the population and potentially turn it toward the Taliban.

The fragile government in Kabul cannot focus on dividing its country over past acts. It must look to the future with a vision that accepts all elements of its society. President Karzai should err on the side of unity and act not for the future of his government, but for the future of Afghanistan.

Cheney In The War Zone (TIME)

By Aryn Baker / Kabul
Time, March 2, 2007

A suicide bomber outside the main U.S. military base in Afghanistan on Feb. 27 killed about two dozen people--and underscored the mission of Dick Cheney, who had arrived less than 24 hours earlier to meet with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. The Vice President had just come from Pakistan, where he urged President Pervez Musharraf to crack down on the activities of the Taliban--which claimed responsibility for the attack, saying it was timed to Cheney's visit--and al-Qaeda.

U.S. National Intelligence Director Michael McConnell believes al-Qaeda is regaining a foothold in the border area of Waziristan. He told the Senate Armed Services Committee on Feb. 27 that "to the best of our knowledge, the senior leadership, No. 1 and No. 2, are there, and they are attempting to re-establish and rebuild." Tasneem Aslam, Pakistan's Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, says Pakistan is policing the region with 80,000 troops, some 800 of whom have died in skirmishes with militants. "We are doing our utmost to stop the cross-border activity," Aslam says. "What are the Afghans doing to combat this problem? Or the U.S.?"

DOJ_NMG_0139538

Musharraf is in a bind. Even if he doubled the number of troops on the border, says a Western diplomat in Pakistan, it would probably just exacerbate regional violence by fueling antigovernment sentiment. "The only way you are going to solve the problem of militancy in the tribal areas is through a massive influx of development," he says. "And even then, we are talking 10 to 15 years." That's a grim analysis, given the claim of senior Taliban commander Mullah Dadullah that he will soon be able to field some 10,000 soldiers, including 2,000 suicide bombers. While few believe the Taliban has that kind of strength, it's still a worrying indication that the fighting will get worse this spring.

Cheney Gets To See A Resurgent Taliban (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh And Sami Yousafzai

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

Dick Cheney was cool and collected, just as he had been on that September morning five years before when two Secret Service agents burst into his White House office and half-carried him into the bunker. Last week the vice president found himself under attack again—and rushed into a bomb shelter by his Secret Service detail. Only this time Cheney was in Afghanistan, and the perpetrators were the resurgent Taliban. "I was sitting in my quarters when I heard a loud boom," Cheney recalled later to a small group of reporters accompanying him on his weeklong trip to Asia. "Shortly after, the Secret Service came in and said there had apparently been an attack on the main gate."

When the barbarians are at the gate, it may be time to get serious. The Feb. 27 attack on Baghram air base during Cheney's surprise visit was the most vivid reminder to date that, half a decade after they were supposedly vanquished, the Taliban is back in force, along with its onetime Qaeda guests. And the jihadists are now confident enough to launch a frontal suicide assault on the main U.S. stronghold in South Asia. Cheney shrugged off the attack, which killed 23 people including a U.S. soldier, noting that it did not affect his plans to visit the badly weakened Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, later that day in Kabul. "Never an option," he told reporters before he boarded his plane home carrying a thick book ("A History of the English-Speaking Peoples Since 1900," by the Tory historian Andrew Roberts). Even so, Cheney's visit was ordered by a worried President George W. Bush, who announced two weeks ago that he was extending the deployment of 3,200 U.S. troops in Afghanistan amid a doubling of the size of the Afghan Army. The Bush team's main concern now is that the Taliban's "spring offensive" could topple Karzai or turn him into a more isolated figure, hunkered down in Kabul.

An even scarier prospect is that a newly Talibanized Afghanistan, along with sympathetic areas of neighboring Pakistan, could become a launchpad for the next plot against America. A senior administration official, briefing reporters on Cheney's plane after his meeting with Karzai, said Bush was preoccupied with a renewed "threat to the homeland" from the region. He has cause for concern. Taliban officials tell NEWSWEEK that they have carved out a huge border zone of their own. And they say Qaeda "foreigners"—mainly Arabs bent on killing Westerners—are being welcomed back into parts of Afghanistan and Pakistan's North Waziristan region, where Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf signed a controversial peace deal with tribal elders last September.

Under that pact, the Pakistan military agreed to end its military operations and dismantle its checkpoints. In return, the tribesmen promised not to allow militants to conduct cross-border operations and to expel all foreign fighters from the area. That latter pledge has been largely ignored. As NEWSWEEK has previously reported, informal terror training facilities have cropped up in the tribal area. In contrast to the open-air camps seen in pre-9/11 Qaeda videos, these sites are set up inside tribal-style compounds of mud-brick houses surrounded by high walls, so as to stay out of sight of U.S. and Pakistani reconnaissance aircraft. Several of those inside are being trained as suicide bombers. "I hope one day I will get my dream and hit the U.S. Army and that will be the best moment for my soul and spirit," one Pakistani trainee told NEWSWEEK last week.

NATO has expanded its forces in Afghanistan to more than 20,000, and it has had some success in recent campaigns. And in an interview last week, Pakistani Foreign Minister Mian Khurshid Mehmood Kasuri sought to counter the impression in Washington—especially in Congress—that Musharraf wasn't doing all he could to stop the Taliban from using his country as a base. "There is a lot of cooperation between the ISI [the Pakistan intelligence service] and the CIA," he said. But Kasuri also criticized the Bush administration, saying that it was failing at counterinsurgency by mounting a purely military response. "Let's be honest. There are a lot of people all over the Muslim world, from Indonesia to Somalia, who are hostile to what they regard as American foreign policy. You need to tackle the root causes." Further complicating such efforts is a bitter feud between Musharraf and Karzai, with each blaming the other for harboring Taliban leaders.

U.S. officials believe Karzai is only getting weaker and Musharraf generally takes a minimalist approach to reining in extremists, in part because he must balance U.S. demands for action with the rising Islamist sentiment in his country. Until last week, it had been more than a year since Pakistan had publicly offered up a high-level target to Washington (a U.S. airstrike took out one of Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar's top commanders in December, though Islamabad did not publicize its cooperation). But after weeks of denying that Mullah Omar or other senior Taliban officials were in the Pakistani city of Quetta—a known haven of jihadists—Pakistani officials said they arrested a senior Taliban official named Mullah Obaidullah Akhund there on Monday. That also happened to be the day of Cheney's visit. U.S. officials could not immediately confirm the arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0139539

Cheney may not have achieved much else on his trip other than to inspire his handlers at Baghram to rethink their security measures. Indeed, America is so constrained in Iraq, in terms of troops and resources, that it can't afford to lose Musharraf or Karzai as an ally right now. Mainly, said Kasuri, the Pakistani president and the American vice president "talked about the spring offensive. Naturally, we are worried, and the Americans are worried." And if they're worried, so should we be.

Senators: Pakistan Must Address Al-Qaida (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, March 5, 2007

Pakistan must do more to stem al-Qaida in its ungoverned territories amid growing signs operatives plan a spring offensive against allied forces in Afghanistan, lawmakers on the intelligence committees said Sunday.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., and Rep. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich., also said the U.S. must work to ensure that North Korea sticks to its promise to limit its nuclear program. They complained that Congress still lacks meaningful intelligence about the world's hot spots.

"We still don't have the intelligence community overall to give us, as policymakers, the information that we need to make good decisions in North Korea, Iran and other places," said Hoekstra, the top Republican on the House intelligence committee. "We've been disappointed with the stand-up from the leadership in the intelligence community."

In response, National Intelligence Director Mike McConnell's spokesman said that intelligence has been strengthened by changes intended to identify gaps in intelligence and ensure analysts have the information they need. Chad Kolton said one of McConnell's priorities "is to build on those reforms by improving penetration of our hardest intelligence targets."

Feinstein, the No. 2 Democrat on the Senate intelligence committee, criticized what she called half-measures by Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, at a critical moment for the United States and its allies. She said "pinpoint attacks" are needed against al-Qaida before a possible spring offensive.

"The Pakistanis either have to let us go in or go in themselves when they have intelligence," she said. "There's no question that there's going to be a spring offensive in Afghanistan, that they're trying to reach out, that training is going on, recruitment is going on."

Last week, McConnell told Congress that the U.S. is concerned that al-Qaida's top two leaders — Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri — may be hiding in the rugged frontiers of northwestern Pakistan and are attempting to establish an operational base.

McConnell's push for action along the Afghan-Pakistani border came after Vice President Dick Cheney met earlier in the week with Musharraf.

Hoekstra agreed that the Pakistan region was a growing threat but cautioned that a balancing act was required to ensure that Musharraf's government stays in power. Musharraf faces elections in September.

"We need stability in the regime. We need this regime to survive," he said. "The Pakistanis have been doing a number of things to help us go after al-Qaida."

On Iran, Feinstein said similar regional discussions are needed to stem that country's nuclear program. She said she believes the U.S. could exploit a leadership split in Iran's government to work out some agreement.

Hoekstra called Iran a very troubling area overall given its activities in Iraq and their relationships with Hamas and Hezbollah.

"This is not an ally in the war against militant radicalism. They're not an ally in getting us to be successful in Iraq," he said. "We need to focus on them and I think some of the changes and some of the steps that are being taken by the administration are very positive."

As for North Korea, Feinstein praised the country's initial steps to comply with the Feb. 13 agreement on its nuclear program. She stressed the need for cooperation from neighboring Asian countries.

"I don't think you can underestimate the value of China in keeping the North Koreans on track now in seeing that this plutonium-based program is disassembled and that North Korea is brought into the mainstream," Feinstein said.

Like Hoekstra, Feinstein was highly critical of U.S. intelligence efforts aimed at understanding North Korea, specifically the lack of information on how many nuclear devices North Korea has assembled and where that work is happening.

"North Korea is a long way from us, and the intelligence infrastructure is not that good, to be very candid with you," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0139540

In the past week, considerable attention has focused on whether U.S. intelligence analysts have softened their assessments on whether North Korea is pursuing a uranium enrichment program. That effort would be happening alongside the North's plutonium program, which resulted in a successful test of a nuclear device last year.

But McConnell's office pushed back on the notion that spy agencies' views had changed.

In a statement Sunday, the director's mission manager for North Korea, Joseph DeTrani, said there has been "considerable misinterpretation" of the spy agencies assessments on the uranium program.

He said U.S. intelligence had strong information in 2002 that allowed analysts to make a judgment with high confidence that North Korea was acquiring a uranium enrichment capability. That view has not changed.

At the time, the CIA found that North Korea secretly had purchased centrifuges and other equipment needed to construct a large-scale enrichment facility. The U.S. confronted North Korea with that information.

Since then, DeTrani said, "all intelligence community agencies have at least moderate confidence that North Korea's past efforts to acquire a uranium enrichment capability continue today."

Feinstein and Hoekstra appeared on "Fox News Sunday."

Where Does Al Qaeda Stand Now? (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON

Hidden in the harsh terrain of Pakistan's tribal lands near the Afghan border, Al Qaeda's senior leaders have quietly been rebuilding their terrorist network – including lines of command to cells in other nations.

This resurgence does not mean the group has regained its old strength, say US intelligence officials and outside experts. Al Qaeda's top levels are now filled with inexperienced commanders, and its new camps can train only a fraction of the recruits the pre-2001 infrastructure in Afghanistan could handle.

Al Qaeda's goals also remain murky. It is not clear whether the organization has a specific plan to strike within the United States or whether it considers Europe, or Iraq, more important in its war to impose its vision of Islam on the Middle East.

"We have no evidence that they have a coherent strategy" to attack US targets, says Martin Libicki, lead author of a recently published RAND Corp. study on the subject.

The capabilities of a possibly resurgent Al Qaeda became a hot topic in Washington last week following Vice President Dick Cheney's surprise trip to Pakistan. During his visit, Cheney told Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf of US concerns that Al Qaeda is regrouping in Pakistan's tribal regions, and that the group's Taliban allies may mount a spring offensive into Afghanistan.

Regrouping along the Afghan border

In a Senate hearing last week, US intelligence officials reiterated that terrorist groups remain their greatest challenge. Al Qaeda still tops the list of single threats.

"Its core elements are resilient," said the director of national intelligence, retired Vice Adm. Michael McConnell.

Al Qaeda would still like to inflict mass casualties upon the US, and it continues to seek weapons of mass destruction, Admiral McConnell said.

In addition, it is "forging stronger operational connections that radiate outward" from Pakistan to affiliated groups in the Middle East, North Africa, and Europe, according to US intelligence.

Still, Al Qaeda remains a loose network of like-minded individuals, instead of a tightly controlled terrorist hierarchy. Three-quarters of Al Qaeda's pre-9/11 leaders were killed or captured, according to US estimates. Aside from Osama bin Laden and his deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri, many of its leaders are relative rookies.

Nor has Al Qaeda's new Pakistani infrastructure replaced the multiple camps it operated in Afghanistan, capable of training thousands of recruits at once. "The numbers are not the same, but there are volunteers who are attempting to reestablish [training grounds]," McConnell said.

That Al Qaeda is resurgent in its remaining small corner of the world should not come as surprising news, some outside experts say.

"It's been true for a long time," says Jessica Stern, a terrorism expert at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government.

After all, US intelligence has long thought that Osama bin Laden disappeared into Pakistan's wild tribal frontier after the fall of the Taliban in Afghanistan. The area is so remote that for centuries it has largely remained beyond the control of central authorities. Border security is nonexistent.

Al Qaeda's reach

DOJ_NMG_0139541

As to evidence of Al Qaeda regaining its ability to reach out and mount attacks, in a videotape released last year Mr. Zawahiri claimed responsibility for the July 2005 London bombings. Similarly, investigators have long believed that last years' failed plot to blow up airliners from London was Al Qaeda-related, in part because it resembled a mid-1990s plan to explode airliners over the Pacific.

Some critics of the White House are surprised that many of the recent warnings about Al Qaeda come from administration officials. In essence, critics say, the White House confirms something they've long held to be true: the central front in the war on terror is along Pakistan's border with Afghanistan, not in Iraq.

"We went to Iraq and left the serious terrorist problem to fester," Ms. Stern says.

On the subject of Iraq and Al Qaeda, the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) estimates that less than 10 percent of the Iraqi insurgency consists of foreign fighters. Of those, most are suicide bombers.

Violence perpetrated by terrorists accounts for "only a fraction" of insurgent violence in Iraq, according to a written statement submitted to the Senate Armed Services Committee by DIA director Lt. Gen. Michael Maples. The attacks have a disproportionate impact on Iraq's stability because of the high-profile nature of the terrorist operations and tactics, the DIA says.

US remains a potential target

According to General Maples's statement, documents captured in a raid on a safehouse belonging to Al Qaeda in Iraq revealed that the group was planning operations in the US.

"Despite being forced to decentralize its network, Al Qaeda retains the ability to organize complex, mass-casualty attacks and inspire others," Maples wrote.

The DIA and other US intelligence sources maintain that Al Qaeda is still focused on striking the US. But that is not the same as having a specific plan or a discernable strategy for the goals it hopes to achieve by doing so, the RAND study says.

The study examined a number of hypothesis that might explain Al Qaeda's thinking with regard to hitting within the US: that the group's leaders might be interested in rallying supporters around the world or in coercing the US into leaving the Middle East.

The most likely scenario, RAND concluded, was that Al Qaeda would pick targets that would simultaneously create fear and damage the US economy. It might attack US agriculture or food industries, for instance; or employ radiological "dirty" bombs.

But, the study says, the terrorist organization itself has given few real clues about where or when it might strike, or if its leadership is even thinking in such terms, said the RAND study.

DOJ:

Domenici Says He Called Fired Prosecutor (AP)

By Jennifer Talhelm

AP, March 5, 2007

New Mexico Sen. Pete Domenici acknowledged Sunday that he called a federal prosecutor to ask about a criminal investigation several months after calling for his replacement, but insisted he never pressured nor threatened his state's U.S. attorney.

The prosecutor, David Iglesias, was fired by the Justice Department in December. Iglesias says he believes he was dismissed for resisting pressure from two members of Congress before last year's election to rush indictments in a Democratic kickback investigation.

Ethics experts said Domenici's conduct may have violated Senate rules, which generally bar communications between members of Congress and federal prosecutors about ongoing criminal investigations.

Iglesias, a Republican, has said he would not name the lawmakers unless asked under oath.

A House Judiciary subcommittee subpoenaed the prosecutor last week to appear Tuesday and testify under oath. He also was scheduled to appear before a Senate committee the same day. Domenici refused last week to say if he had contacted Iglesias, insisting in a brief interview with the Associated Press, "I have no idea what he's talking about."

But in his statement Sunday, the Republican senator said he called Iglesias last year and asked "if he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what time frame we were looking at.

"It was a very brief conversation, which concluded when I was told that the courthouse investigation would be continuing for a lengthy period," Domenici said in the statement.

"In retrospect, I regret making that call and I apologize," Domenici said. "However, at no time in that conversation or any other conversation with Mr. Iglesias did I ever tell him what course of action I thought he should take on any legal matter. I have never pressured him nor threatened him in any way."

DOJ_NMG_0139542

Domenici noted in his statement that he had recommended Iglesias' appointment in 2001, but subsequently became disillusioned with him and recommended to the Justice Department "several months" before the telephone call that he be replaced.

Kenneth Gross, a Washington lawyer who specializes in congressional ethics rules, said Domenici's phone call to Iglesias could have violated Senate ethics rules if there was an element of pressure or coercion to his inquiry.

"It doesn't sound very good to me," Gross said. "But requests for the status of cases are generally considered permissible."

Punishment for such violations range from a warning and reprimand to expulsion from office.

Abbe D. Lowell, a criminal defense lawyer who served as special assistant to the attorney general during the Carter Administration, said it was hard to determine if there was a violation without knowing what Domenici knew about the investigation when he made the call and what exactly he said.

But Lowell added, "The safest course of a member of Congress is not to make inquiries of prosecutors about pending matters so their motives and actions cannot be misunderstood."

Iglesias said last week that he was shocked to receive two separate phone calls in mid-October from lawmakers who asked about details of the investigation and seemed eager to see an indictment before the 2006 election.

"I frankly felt violated," Iglesias said. "They were very troubling phone calls."

When Iglesias testifies Tuesday before the House panel, he is expected to say that Domenici and Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., contacted him to discuss moving forward on indictments in a high-profile corruption case involving a Democrat before the November congressional elections, according to a Democratic aide who is familiar with Iglesias' planned testimony.

The aide spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the issue publicly before the hearings.

Corruption in the New Mexico Democratic Party was a major issue in Wilson's re-election campaign and further indictments might have helped her. Wilson last week refused to say if she had contacted Iglesias, referring questions about "that personnel matter" to the Justice Department.

Iglesias is one of eight U.S. attorneys who were fired in December, some without cause, according to the department. Federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president and can be fired for any reason, or none at all.

Congressional Democrats say the firings indicate the Bush administration is using a new part of the terrorism-fighting Patriot Act to reward political allies with coveted jobs as U.S. attorneys without having to submit them to Senate confirmation.

This provision, enacted a year ago with the law's reauthorization, removes a time limit by which the Senate must confirm appointees to such jobs. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, however, has said he intends to submit the name of every nominee to vacant U.S. attorney job to the Senate for confirmation.

The House Judiciary subcommittee that subpoenaed Iglesias also issued subpoenas for three other dismissed U.S. attorneys — Carol Lam of California, H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Arkansas and John McKay of Seattle.

The Senate also has asked those four and two others, Daniel Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona to appear voluntarily at a hearing Tuesday.

Domenici Says He Contacted Prosecutor (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) acknowledged yesterday that he contacted the U.S. attorney in Albuquerque last year to ask about an ongoing corruption probe of Democrats, but said he "never pressured him nor threatened him in any way."

Domenici also said in a statement that he told the Justice Department it should replace U.S. Attorney David C. Iglesias, one of eight federal prosecutors fired in December. But Domenici said the recommendation came before his call to Iglesias about the criminal investigation.

"In retrospect, I regret making that call and I apologize," Domenici said of talking to Iglesias. "However, at no time in that conversation or any other conversation with Mr. Iglesias did I ever tell him what course of action I thought he should take on any legal matter. I have never pressured him nor threatened him in any way."

Legal experts say it violates congressional ethics rules for a senator or House member to communicate with a federal prosecutor regarding an ongoing criminal investigation.

Domenici's remarks came four days after Iglesias alleged that two New Mexico lawmakers called him in mid-October and pressured him about the pace of the investigation. Iglesias said he believes the calls were at the root of his dismissal.

When asked last week about Iglesias's allegations, Domenici said: "I have no idea what he's talking about."

Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) has yet to comment; the rest of the New Mexico congressional delegation has denied placing any calls to Iglesias.

Two sources with knowledge of the calls have said Wilson made the first contact, followed by Domenici about a week later. The sources spoke on the condition of anonymity because they did not want to be named discussing the matter before a congressional hearing tomorrow.

The Justice Department said last night that Domenici called Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty during the first week of October to discuss Iglesias.

This followed three calls to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales in September 2005, January 2006 and April 2006 during which, Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said, Domenici "expressed general concerns about the performance of U.S. Attorney Iglesias and questioned whether he was up to the job . . .

"At no time in those calls did the senator mention this corruption case," nor did he specifically ask for Iglesias's ouster, Roehrkasse said.

The spokesman said he is not aware of any similar calls or complaints to the Justice Department from Wilson.

Iglesias and five other fired prosecutors are scheduled to testify tomorrow before Congress. Iglesias declined to comment in detail yesterday on Domenici's statement, saying he was refraining from further public remarks before the hearings.

"As to Senator Domenici's apology, I accept it and look forward to testifying on Tuesday," he said in an e-mail message.

The Senate Ethics Manual advises senators that contact with prosecutors and regulatory agency officials is "generally permitted, where the communication is with the agency and not directed at the court, where the agency is not engaged in an ongoing enforcement, investigative or other quasi-judicial proceeding."

Stanley Brand, an ethics lawyer who served as House counsel in the 1980s, said a senator should contact a federal prosecutor about an ongoing investigation only if he or she has evidence or information related to the probe.

"It's going to precipitate a huge problem," Brand said, warning of a potential review by the Justice Department.

Staff members on the Senate Ethics Committee could not be reached to comment yesterday.

The firings, which had already sparked congressional interest, became more controversial last week with Iglesias's allegations of political interference.

Democrats allege that the Justice Department was sacking qualified prosecutors to reward political cronies, and they have proposed legislation to limit Gonzales's power to appoint interim replacements.

Administration officials acknowledged Friday that the White House approved the unusual firings, in which seven of the prosecutors were called Dec. 7 and asked to resign, even though most had positive job reviews. An eighth prosecutor, in Arkansas, was informed of his firing earlier, opening the job for a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove.

Domenici said in his statement that he called Iglesias to ask about a criminal probe of courthouse construction kickbacks, which the FBI had turned over to Iglesias's office. Officials say the probe centers on a former Democratic state senator; no charges have been filed in the case.

"I asked Mr. Iglesias if he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what time frame we were looking at," Domenici said. "It was a very brief conversation, which concluded when I was told that the courthouse investigation would be continuing for a lengthy period."

Domenici is not specific about when the call took place, saying only that he made it "late last year." Iglesias said the calls occurred in mid-October.

At that time, Wilson, a close Domenici ally, was locked in a tight reelection battle with state Attorney General Patricia Madrid (D). Their race included widespread discussion of alleged corruption among New Mexico Democrats.

Domenici said his unhappiness with Iglesias began before he inquired about the probe of Democrats. He said he was concerned about resource problems in the U.S. attorney's office and "an inability within the office to move more quickly on cases."

"This ongoing dialogue and experience led me, several months before my call with Mr. Iglesias, to conclude and recommend to the Department of Justice that New Mexico needed a new United States attorney," Domenici said.

Justice officials have said they were never notified that lawmakers had called Iglesias and have said the issue did not play a role in his firing. Iglesias has acknowledged he erred by not informing Washington officials about the calls, as Justice rules require.

The House Judiciary subcommittee has issued subpoenas for Iglesias, Bud Cummins of Little Rock, Carol Lam of San Diego and John McKay of Seattle. The Senate Judiciary Committee has also asked Daniel Bogden of Las Vegas and Paul K. Charlton of Phoenix to testify, in addition to the four others.

"No one believes anymore these U.S. attorneys were fired for any good reason," said Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, "and we will start to uncover the real truth at our hearing on Tuesday."

In a related matter, administration officials said they were mistaken in saying that McNulty consulted his predecessor, James B. Comey, about some of the U.S. attorneys before they were fired. Comey was not consulted, the officials said.

Senator Sought Dismissal Of New Mexico Prosecutor (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 4 — Senator Pete V. Domenici, Republican of New Mexico, said Sunday that he had urged the Justice Department to dismiss the state's top federal prosecutor, who in December was one of eight United States attorneys ousted from their jobs.

In addition, Mr. Domenici said in a statement that last year he called the prosecutor, David C. Iglesias, to ask about the status of a federal inquiry in New Mexico. The case centered on accusations of kickbacks in a courthouse construction project in which a former Democratic state official was said to be involved.

"I asked Mr. Iglesias if he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what time frame we were looking at," Mr. Domenici said. "It was a very brief conversation which concluded when I was told that the courthouse investigation would be continuing for a lengthy period."

Mr. Domenici apologized in the statement and said he regretted making the call, but added that he had not urged any course of action in any investigation. "I have never pressured him nor threatened him in any way," he said.

A Justice Department spokesman said on Sunday that records at the agency showed that the senator complained about Mr. Iglesias in calls to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales in September 2005 and again in January and April 2006. The senator made a brief call to Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, in October 2006 when the deliberations over Mr. Iglesias's dismissla began.

In each of these calls, said Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, Mr. Domenici expressed general concerns about Mr. Iglesias and questioned whether he was "up to the job." Mr. Roehrkasse added, "At no time did they discuss the public corruption case."

A Justice Department official said Mr. Domenici's criticism of Mr. Iglesias was a factor in the decision to remove the prosecutor, adding that the decision was also based on an internal evaluation at Justice Department headquarters regarding his handling of the job.

Mr. Iglesias, who is among five of the ousted prosecutors scheduled to testify in Congress on Tuesday, has said he interpreted the call from Mr. Domenici, and another from an unidentified federal lawmaker, as an effort to pressure him into bringing indictments before the November elections in an effort to embarrass Democrats.

He said that his unwillingness to be pressured into moving more quickly led to his removal.

The identity of the other lawmaker who contacted Mr. Iglesias remains unknown. Mr. Domenici is one of three Republican members of the state's Congressional delegation. One of the others, Representative Steve Pearce, has said he did not contact Mr. Iglesias. The third, Representative Heather A. Wilson, has said she will not comment on the matter.

Justice Department officials have said Mr. Iglesias did not report the call to the agency's headquarters and have insisted that none of the eight dismissed United States attorneys were removed because of their action or inaction in any political corruption cases. They have also said that the prosecutors were placed on the dismissal list for a variety of reasons, but have denied that any were removed because of political pressure from outside the Justice Department.

But repeated complaints from a veteran lawmaker like Mr. Domenici, who has been in the Senate since 1972 and is influential on law enforcement and border issues, would be unlikely to be easily dismissed by the Justice Department.

Mr. Domenici said that several months before his call, he recommended to the Justice Department "that New Mexico needed a new United States attorney," even though he had recommended Mr. Iglesias's appointment in 2001.

Mr. Domenici said that by 2004 and 2005, he and his staff had "expressed my frustration with the U.S. Attorney's Office to the Justice Department" because it was moving too slowly on prosecutions.

Justice officials have said that F.B.I. officials complained that Mr. Iglesias was not bringing corruption cases fast enough, but have not mentioned Mr. Domenici's efforts to remove him.

GOP Lawmakers Played A Role In U.S. Attorney Purge (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

The firings of eight U.S. attorneys has put the heat on top Justice Department officials—and some GOP members of Congress. The unusual mass dismissals took place late last year, but the controversy escalated last week when David Iglesias, the former U.S. attorney in New Mexico, went public with a dramatic charge: that he had gotten phone calls from two unidentified GOP lawmakers in D.C. last October, pressing him to bring indictments in a high-profile corruption case involving a prominent local Democrat before the November election. Iglesias—a former Navy prosecutor who was the model for Tom Cruise's character in "A Few Good Men"—said he refused to answer. Six weeks later, a Justice official ordered him to resign. This week, Iglesias has been subpoenaed along with three other fired prosecutors to testify before Congress. He plans to name the lawmakers who called him as Rep. Heather Wilson (who was in a tight re-election battle at the time) and Sen. Pete Domenici (who originally sponsored him for the job), according to two sources familiar with his account who asked not to be identified talking about the upcoming testimony. An aide to Wilson said "no comment." Domenici's office didn't return repeated phone calls. A senior Justice official, anonymous because of the confidential subject, confirmed to NEWSWEEK that Domenici "did express general concerns" about Iglesias to senior DOJ officials—but insisted he did not specifically complain about the corruption case. "It's absolutely 100 percent inaccurate" to suggest that Iglesias's failure to bring the corruption case against the Democrat led to his dismissal, department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

DOJ_NMG_0139545

The decision to fire the U.S. attorneys en masse was made late last year by two top aides to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales—chief of staff Kyle Sampson and deputy A.G. Paul McNulty—according to a senior department official who asked not to be identified talking about personnel. McNulty may have fueled the controversy when he told the Senate last month that most of the fired prosecutors were let go because of "performance-related issues." That infuriated some of the dismissed prosecutors (all of them Bush appointees), prompting them to defend themselves. "When I heard him say that, I lit up like a tree," said one of the prosecutors, who asked not to be identified because of pending congressional testimony. In fact, internal Justice performance evaluations seen by NEWSWEEK show that those who were fired had gotten mostly glowing reviews. Congressional Dems now smell blood. After this week's hearings featuring the fired prosecutors, "I expect we will have 100 more questions for the Justice Department," said one Democratic staffer who requested anonymity.

Editorial: Stop The Bush Purge (MJS)

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, March 5, 2007

The administration is using its new anti-terrorism power to push out some federal prosecutors. Congress must rein this in and investigate the dismissal of the eight U.S. attorneys.From the Journal SentinelPosted: March 4, 2007

The Bush administration slipped a provision into the USA Patriot Act that Congress renewed last year allowing the attorney general to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods without congressional approval. Previously, such appointments could last for only 120 days. Lawmakers may have figured that the extra leeway might help in rare emergencies.

Well, surprise, surprise. The Justice Department has so far used this provision eight times - and not for emergencies. In a move unprecedented for its scope, the agency has fired eight U.S. attorneys. And indications are that the dismissed prosecutors were too independent, even though President Bush had appointed them. The administration appears to be replacing them with those more pliable.

Congress must stop the purge and reimpose the time limit. Commendably, a House judiciary subcommittee is issuing subpoenas to four of the dismissed prosecutors to appear before it on Tuesday, and the Senate Judiciary Committee is poised to follow suit. Sworn testimony should shed some light on what may be an administration effort to get prosecutors to toe the party line.

Among those called on to testify are prosecutors with stellar records.

Carol Lam, dismissed as U.S. attorney in San Diego, nailed Rep. Randy Cunningham, a California Republican, for accepting bribes from defense contractors. H.E. "Bud" Cummins III was removed as U.S. attorney in Little Rock, Ark., only to make room for an aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove, a Justice Department official has admitted. And New Mexico's David Iglesias charged that he was let go because he refused a request from two Republican congressmen to speed up a probe of possible Democratic wrongdoing to improve GOP election chances - an allegation the Justice Department vigorously denies.

The dispute is all the more reason to set the record straight in hearings.

Also, Congress must retract the permission it gave the Justice Department to appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely - permission the administration has abused.

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Helps Probe Kremlin Critic's Shooting (WSJ)

By Evan Perez And Alan Cullison

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

Federal agents joined local police in investigating the shooting in a Maryland suburb of an intelligence expert who suggested the Kremlin was involved in the poisoning death of a former Russian agent in London.

DOJ_NMG_0139546

Investigators haven't publicly suggested a motive for the shooting of Paul M. Joyal in Adelphi, Md., Thursday, and the case is being handled as a local criminal matter. A federal law-enforcement official said local police asked for help from the Federal Bureau of Investigation in part because of Mr. Joyal's activities in the Russian emigré community in the U.S. and his views on the poisoning in London last year of Alexander Litvinenko, who worked for the KGB and its successor agency, the Federal Security Service of Russia.

On "Dateline NBC," broadcast Feb. 25, Mr. Joyal said the Litvinenko murder was a message "to anyone who wants to speak out against the Kremlin: 'If you do, no matter who you are, where you are, we will find you and we will silence you -- in the most horrible way possible.' "

Mr. Joyal was shot in the groin as he stood on his driveway after emerging from his car. Witnesses told investigators he argued with two black males before the shooting and the two men fled. He was hospitalized in serious condition and breathing with a respirator, according to associates. No arrests have been made in the incident, which occurred in an area just inside the Washington Beltway where violent crime is a problem.

The Prince George's County (Md.) police department hasn't publicly released details of the case.

A Russian diplomat in Washington referred calls on the matter to a spokesman who didn't return calls seeking comment.

While the shooting doesn't bear all the hallmarks of a political attack, it comes at a time of tensions with Russia and doubts about the Kremlin's direction under President Vladimir Putin. Experts say Mr. Litvinenko's poisoning with a rare radioactive isotope, polonium 210, in November would have been difficult without some kind of government sponsorship.

Formal charges haven't been filed in Mr. Litvinenko's murder, but the British investigation has focused on a Russian security service veteran, Andrei Lugovoi, who met Mr. Litvinenko in a London cafe shortly before he fell ill.

Alexander Goldfarb, a friend of Mr. Litvinenko, said that Mr. Joyal telephoned him about an hour before the shooting, and that Mr. Joyal was "deeply involved" in the public debate over Mr. Litvinenko's death. Mr. Joyal had been pushing for Congressional hearings into the matter, he said.

Mr. Joyal was director of security for the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence from 1980 to 1989, according to a biography on the Web site of National Strategies Inc., a Washington consulting firm where he is a vice president. In recent years, he also ran business ventures in Russia and the central Asian nation of Georgia, while editing an intelligence newsletter on Russia.

With the U.S. presidential campaign heating up, American policy toward Russia could be fodder for critics of President Bush, who started his presidency by claiming a warm personal relationship with Mr. Putin.

Some in Congress have called for a tougher line against Mr. Putin, who has taken reprisals against his political opponents at home and a more strident stand against the U.S. internationally. Russia is also scheduled to hold elections of its own. Mr. Putin has pledged to step down after his term expires next year, but he is expected to name a successor whose victory will be assured in a carefully orchestrated electoral contest.

Within Russia, Mr. Putin's presidency has been troubled by a number of unexplained deaths, often people critical of the Kremlin. Until recently, assassinations abroad were thought to be a feature of Soviet times.

Last summer, Russia's parliament passed a law that essentially legalized targeted assassinations of people abroad who are deemed a threat to national security. The last confirmed "wet work" by Russia against an enemy abroad was in Qatar in 2004: Two Russian agents were convicted in Qatar of attaching a 4.4 pound bomb to the underside of a Toyota Land Cruiser owned by the former president of the breakaway region of Chechnya. The former president, Zelimkhan Yandarbiyev, was killed and his son seriously injured in the incident.

Write to Evan Perez at evan.perez@wsj.com1 and Alan Cullison at alan.cullison@wsj.com2

Doubts Over KGB Link To US Shooting (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Catherine Belton

Financial Times, March 5, 2007

A former senior KGB officer who met a Russia intelligence expert just hours before his shooting in the US, on Sunday expressed doubt that the incident was related to the case of Alexander Litvinenko, a former KGB officer poisoned last year in London.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation is assisting a police inquiry into the shooting on Thursday of Paul Joyal, a former Senate intelligence committee security director and editor of a newsletter on Russia. Mr Joyal recently accused the Kremlin on US national television of involvement in the Litvinenko death.

Oleg Kalugin, the former head of KGB counter-intelligence who on Thursday evening met Mr Joyal at Zola, a bar in the International Spy Museum building in Washington, said he would not rule out a connection with the Litvinenko case. But he said the shooting was more likely to be a local crime.

"I have doubts because of the way it went down," said Mr Kalugin. "It does not fit well with the pattern of security services [in Russia] as I know them."

Mr Joyal, an employee of National Strategies, told NBC's Dateline in a programme broadcast last month, that the Litvinenko killing was intended to send a message. "A message has been communicated to anyone who wants to speak out against the Kremlin. 'If you do, no matter who you are, where you are, we will find you and we will silence you in the most horrible way possible'," Mr Joyal said.

Police have not commented on the shooting. But a law-enforcement official said Mr Joyal, who remains in critical condition, appeared to have been the victim of a robbery. The official said he was shot after resisting two men who had robbed him.

The case has raised interest partly because Daniel McGrory, a reporter with The Times who appeared on the same NBC programme as Mr Joyal, died five days before the broadcast. There has been no official an-nouncement about the cause of death but he is believed to have died from a stroke.

Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Mr Litvinenko and acquaintance of Mr Joyal, was also sceptical about Russian government involvement but he too would not rule it out.

"It looks like a regular street mugging," he said. "But in Soviet times, when they wanted to organise a hit on someone they would hire someone local."

Mr Goldfarb, who met Mr Joyal several weeks ago, said Mr Joyal was pushing for Senate hearings on the Litvinenko affair and was hoping Mr Goldfarb would testify. He said he had received a text message from Mr Joyal before the shooting saying he was discussing the possibility of congressional hearings with Mr Kalugin.

The Kremlin has strongly denied any suggestions that it was involved in the poisoning of Litvinenko, a fierce critic of the Russian regime. British police are investigating his death.

NBC has provided bodyguards for reporters who worked on the programme about the Litvinenko case.

Analyst Robbed During Shooting (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

The noted expert in Russian intelligence who was shot outside his house in Prince George's County last week -- a crime that raised the possibility of international intrigue in the Washington suburbs -- also was robbed of his wallet and briefcase, law enforcement sources said yesterday.

That property was taken from Paul Joyal supports the theory that he was shot during a robbery rather than in retaliation for public criticism of the Kremlin, according to two sources who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

Joyal, 53, was critically wounded in the driveway of his home in the Adelphi area Thursday evening, four days after he alleged in a television broadcast that the government of Russian President Vladimir Putin was involved in the fatal poisoning last fall of Alexander Litvinenko, a former KGB agent who was living in London.

Speaking on TV's "Dateline NBC" on Feb. 25 about the poisoning, Joyal said, "A message has been communicated to anyone who wants to speak out against the Kremlin: 'If you do, no matter who you are, where you are, we will find you and we will silence you -- in the most horrible way possible.' "

The timing of Joyal's shooting raised the possibility that he was targeted in an attack similar to the one he had publicly deplored. The disclosure the next day that the FBI was helping with the case seemed for many to reinforce that notion.

In addition, robberies are rare in the suburban area where Joyal lives, and police spokesmen have declined to talk about possible motives or say whether property was taken from Joyal.

But another law enforcement source, who also spoke on condition of anonymity, said yesterday that Joyal was driving a Chrysler 300, a vehicle sought by carjackers, suggesting that the assailants might have followed Joyal home rather than waited there to attack him. Police have described the suspects as two black males.

Joyal, a longtime critic of the Putin regime, said on "Dateline" that Litvinenko's poisoning -- with polonium-210, a rare radioactive isotope -- was an act of "political retribution." Speculation that Putin and the Russian government were involved in Litvinenko's death in November has been widespread, in part because Litvinenko was looking into the killing of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya. Putin and Kremlin officials have denied involvement.

For some, the possibility of a conspiracy in the shooting of Joyal was compounded by the recent death of another person featured in the TV segment.

Daniel McGrory, 54, a reporter for the Times of London, died at his home Feb. 20. MSNBC reported that McGrory's cause of death was a heart attack.

DOJ_NMG_0139548

Joyal was shot hours after meeting with a former KGB general, Oleg Kalugin, near the Spy Museum in Washington. Kalugin, a family friend and a member of the museum's board, has said he was shocked when Joyal's wife called later that evening to tell him that Joyal had been shot.

Joyal, who was struck in the groin, remained hospitalized Saturday. His condition could not be determined yesterday.

Intelligence Specialist's Shooting Stirs Speculation (WP)

By Candace Rondeaux, Lori Aratani

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

No Motive Known As Comments on Putin Are Debated

In some ways, the shooting of Paul Joyal last week in a quiet, middle-class enclave of Prince George's County would seem like nothing more than a random act of violence.

But for those who know the 53-year-old expert on Russian intelligence and former staff member of the U.S. Senate's intelligence committee, the shooting has raised suspicions that his background might be behind the incident.

Law enforcement sources have said it is unclear whether the gunmen were trying to rob Joyal. He was shot in the driveway of his home shortly after returning from a trip to the International Spy Museum in the District with a friend.

Two men shot Joyal about 7:35 p.m. Thursday, sources said. The shooting occurred four days after Joyal alleged in a television broadcast that the government of Russian President Vladimir Putin was involved in the fatal poisoning of a former KGB agent in London.

Prince George's police officers have released few details about the incident, and several calls requesting comment were not returned yesterday. Joyal remained hospitalized yesterday.

But an FBI official confirmed yesterday that the agency is looking into the shooting. Joseph Persichini Jr., the FBI's assistant director in charge of the Washington field office, said his office is assisting Prince George's and the Baltimore office of the FBI in the investigation.

"We're pursuing this as hard as possible. We're not at all sure of the motive," Persichini said.

Joyal, who has long been an outspoken critic of the Putin regime, appeared in a segment on "Dateline NBC" Feb. 25 about the Alexander Litvinenko case. Litvinenko's death in November from radiation poisoning has caused widespread speculation that Putin and the Russian government were involved, because Litvinenko, a former KGB agent, was looking into the killing of a Russian journalist. Putin and Kremlin officials have repeatedly denied involvement.

In the "Dateline" interview, Joyal pointedly accused the Putin regime of silencing its critics and poisoning Litvinenko with polonium-210, a rare radioactive substance.

"It's clear-cut. It has to be a state-run or a state-managed operation," Joyal said in the interview.

The circumstances of Joyal's shooting seem worthy of a spy novel.

"I would not rule out anything, but it's hard to believe that a few days [after the broadcast] that some guys would shoot him. It could be just a regular criminal assault," said longtime family friend and former business associate Oleg Kalugin.

Kalugin, a former KGB general and Putin's former boss in the agency, met with Joyal for drinks at a restaurant at the Spy Museum a few hours before the shooting. Kalugin, a member of the museum's board, said in a phone interview yesterday that Joyal seemed in good spirits before leaving for home.

Kalugin said he was shocked when he received a panicked phone call from Joyal's wife about an hour after the men had parted, saying that Joyal had been shot in front of his Adelphi area home.

"I could not believe my ears when she said he was shot. She said Paul drove up to the house, and as he opened the door and left [the car], there were two guys, and they shot him," Kalugin said.

A source close to Joyal, who requested anonymity because the investigation is ongoing, said the unidentified assailants shot Joyal in the groin and escaped.

Joyal's wife, who is a nurse, was at home at the time and ran to assist her husband as he lay bleeding in the driveway, the sources said.

Joyal was taken to a hospital, where he was initially in critical condition. A source said yesterday that Joyal had improved and that doctors were "cautiously optimistic" that he will recover.

Yesterday, four cars were parked in the driveway at Joyal's brick ranch on Lackawanna Road. A boy who answered the door declined to speak to a reporter.

Neighbors and friends said Joyal, who is a member of the Prince George's law enforcement task force, is the father of three and coaches youth basketball.

Prince George's State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey, who befriended Joyal through his work in local law enforcement, said he did not know details about the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0139549

"He's a wonderful man with a strong commitment to the community," Ivey said.

Attorney General To Investigate Maywood Police (LAT)

By Jessica Garrison, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

California Atty. Gen. Jerry Brown has announced plans to conduct a "top to bottom" review of the Maywood Police Department, following allegations of sexual misconduct, racism and brutality among officers in the small suburb southeast of Los Angeles.

The probe, made public Friday, comes amid residents' growing anger toward the 37-member department.

Officers have been accused of beating residents and stalking and sexually abusing women. One woman said an officer groped her 14-year-old daughter.

Critics have charged that the department's afternoon sobriety checks were designed to snare unlicensed illegal immigrants and generate money. About 96% of the city's population is Latino and more than half are foreign born.

The City Council recently stopped those checks, and said it would become a "sanctuary city" for illegal immigrants.

That sparked tension in town, with some opposed to having the Police Department cease its afternoon checkpoints.

Earlier this year, Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles), who represents the area, told the Maywood City Council he was troubled by the allegations against the Police Department.

Nuñez and the council then requested that Brown's office investigate.

In a March 1 letter to Nuñez, Brown said his office would review the department's training, supervision, use of force and citizen complaints.

The Los Angeles County district attorney's office and the FBI also are investigating the department, Maywood City Councilman Sam Peña said.

Peña said he thought the Police Department had "done all the right things" in investigating internally and cooperating with outside investigations.

*

jessica.garrison@latimes.com

Matty 'The Horse' On His Last Ride (AP)

By Larry Mcshane, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 5, 2007

At an age when most of his contemporaries were long out to pasture or in prison, Matty "The Horse" Ianniello was still riding high.

Retirement held no appeal for the old man — and why would it? The notorious Genovese crime family captain, an eyewitness to gangland history from the slaying of "Crazy Joey" Gallo through the conviction of Vincent "The Chin" Gigante, ascended to family boss just three years before his 80th birthday.

It was 1997, and big money was rolling in from rackets in Little Italy, the garbage industry, a mobbed-up union local. The silver-haired Ianniello kept $130,000 in cash around his suburban home, adding a touch of green to his golden years.

It took almost a decade, but "The Horse" now faces the last roundup: He pleaded guilty in a pair of racketeering cases last year. Death behind bars is a possibility for the mobster, who eschewed a graceful exit and ignored organized crime history — the boss always becomes the No. 1 target of law enforcement.

Even if he's 86 years old. Even if he knows better.

"You know these mob guys — it's a way of life," said mob expert Howard Abadinsky, a St. John's University professor and author of several books on organized crime. "To leave is like walking away from family, except with quote marks around `family.'

"He's part of that life."

But Ianniello's life went beyond just "The Life." He was a decorated World War II veteran. In the 1970s, he joined authorities searching for a 6-year-old named Etan Patz after the boy disappeared on a Manhattan street. He was a businessman in a world where brutality often spoke loudest, operating like a CEO rather than a street thug.

And now, instead of cashing Social Security checks, he's facing 2 1/2 years in prison at a March sentencing.

When Ianniello pleaded guilty last year to corrupting a Queens bus drivers union, he arrived in court propped up by a cane. His voice was difficult to understand during his plea; Ianniello's lawyer blamed his client's garbled diction on a stroke.

Others were more skeptical, suggesting Ianniello was as healthy as — well, a horse.

"Don't let his age fool you," said assistant FBI special agent Matt Heron after one of Matty's arrests. "He's still an influential player."

DOJ_NMG_0139550

___

During a crime career dating to the era of godfathers like Joe Bonanno and Carlo Gambino, Matthew Ianniello was known in their world as two things: A good earner, and a stand-up guy.

"Matty was basically a nice guy," recalled "Joe Dogs" Iannuzzi, a mob informant who knew Ianniello in the mid-1970s. "A powerful man, but helpful to people he liked."

His former attorney, Gerry Lefcourt, remembered Ianniello as a gentleman who enjoyed discussions about civil liberties and the ramifications of war.

"He was a businessman," said Lefcourt. "There's never been any suggestion of violence with him. ... He was one of those people who got what he wanted because he was smart about things."

Ianniello's nickname came from his build: 6 feet tall and 220 pounds at his fighting weight.

Before his move into organized crime, Ianniello was a World War II hero, winning a Purple Heart and a Bronze Star as an Army artillery gunner in the Philippines.

Like many veterans, Ianniello lived on Long Island and commuted to work in Manhattan. He and his wife raised a family of five in Old Westbury.

While many in the mob made money through violence, Ianniello handled his affairs like a large corporation — albeit one where millions of dollars were skimmed. Authorities said he kept dual sets of books to hide his vast illegal income, and worked with a "board of directors" composed of Genovese associates.

"Joe Dogs" Iannuzzi recalled "The Horse" stopping a violent dispute in the mid-1970s by simply reaching out to another Mafiosi — diplomacy over death. "All politics, you know?" said Iannuzzi, whose preferred method of problem resolution was more physical.

By the mid-1970s, Ianniello's empire covered every bar, restaurant and sex shop from Fifth Avenue to the Hudson River between 34th and 59th Streets — they all paid "The Horse," part of the cost of doing business, authorities said. Two of his more infamous holdings were Hungry Hilda's, a topless bar on Eighth Avenue, and a nearby transvestite bar, the Gilded Grape.

Although law enforcement was aware of his business, the cigar-chomping Ianniello beat charges of narcotics and extortion. Even a 1971 conviction for criminal contempt — he declined to answer questions from a Manhattan grand jury probing police corruption — only produced a suspended one-year sentence and a $1,500 fine.

It was a year later when Ianniello lived through one of the most infamous mob hits ever.

Ianniello was in the kitchen at his Little Italy restaurant, Umberto's Clam House, when mobster "Crazy Joey" Gallo rolled in at 5 a.m. It was April 7, Gallo's last stop after a night on the town for his 43rd birthday.

Gallo took a seat with his back to the front door of the restaurant. It was a mistake he wouldn't live to repeat.

A hitman with a .38-caliber handgun fired on Gallo, who staggered to the street and died alongside his parked Cadillac. No one was ever arrested.

Gallo's bodyguard, "Pete the Greek" Diapioulas, charged into Umberto's kitchen and found Ianniello.

When the bodyguard accused "The Horse" of setting Gallo up, Ianniello quickly denied it. "You think I'm crazy?" Ianniello asked. "To let this happen in this place?"

The shooting in some ways "made" the restaurant. It operated on Mulberry Street for the next 24 years, drawing tourists who scanned the woodwork and kitchen door for bullet holes.

Seven years after Gallo's last meal, a 6-year-old boy on his way to school disappeared in Greenwich Village — the same neighborhood where Ianniello and Gigante shared their headquarters.

Etan Patz's name would soon become synonymous with missing children, but on the morning of May 25, 1979, police were simply looking for a lost little boy.

Authorities eventually reached out to Ianniello for help, and the mobster agreed to investigate things through his contacts. Despite the efforts, Patz was never found.

In 1985, when he became eligible for Social Security, Ianniello was convicted of skimming $2 million from an assortment of Manhattan restaurants and food suppliers — including one that provided the hot dogs for Yankee Stadium. Three years later, he was convicted of racketeering and sentenced to 13 years.

By 1986, when Fortune magazine rated the nation's 50 biggest Mafia leaders, Ianniello was listed at No. 35 — behind Gigante (No. 19) but ahead of Philadelphia's powerful "Little Nicky" Scarfo (No. 43).

And in 1987, Ianniello finally went to jail on his racketeering conviction.

Ianniello did his time and was released on Sept. 29, 1995, at the age of 75. But that wasn't the end of his career.

___

DOJ_NMG_0139551

On April 7, 1997, 25 years to the day after the death of Joey Gallo, Gigante entered a Brooklyn courtroom in a typically grungy get-up. It was the end of a long run as the family's head when the bathrobe-and-slipper-wearing Gigante admitted feigning dementia to avoid prosecution.

Ianniello knew the top guy drew unwanted attention from law enforcement. But authorities say that didn't stop him from stepping up when the family asked him to take over following the guilty plea by Gigante, who died in prison in 2005.

"He's got to take `The Seat' because this is what the family needs," said mob expert Abadinsky. "He's a stand-up guy, who played by the family rules. ... Nobody around has the status like Matty has. Who's around?

"Who are you going to turn to?"

Within three years, "The Horse" was deep into a Queens union representing city bus drivers. A medical center that rented space from Local 1181 was forced to pony up $100,000 to renew its lease. With Ianniello's backing, the center was forced to make regular cash payments.

In Connecticut, "The Horse" imposed a mob tax on various garbage businesses and collected more than $800,000 between 2001 and 2005. The money was paid by the companies to ensure no one infringed on their trash-hauling routes — a scenario right out of "The Sopranos."

His legal woes mounted, but Ianniello kept his mouth shut. He pleaded guilty to racketeering charges and tax evasion, but his plea agreement allowed him to avoid testifying against any of his two dozen co-defendants.

He's ready now to do his time, even at his age.

"What can I say, right?" Ianniello said after leaving court in Connecticut last year. "Nothing."

Mistrial Sought In Federal Capital Case (WT)

By Jim McElhatton, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 4, 2007

The defendant in a rare death-penalty case in the District is asking for a mistrial.

Larry Gooch, accused of being the enforcer for the violent M Street Crew drug gang in Northeast, last week asked the federal court judge in the case to declare a mistrial. He claims he is not receiving adequate legal representation.

Mr. Gooch said he wants a mistrial because one of his attorneys recently elicited "damaging" testimony from Metropolitan Police Department Detective Carlton Herndon, according to defense filings.

Under cross-examination by defense attorney Thomas Heslep, the detective told jurors he thought Mr. Gooch wasn't seen around 18th and M streets Northeast after April 30, 2003, "because he shot people" in an alley, defense attorneys say.

Mr. Gooch, 27, is accused of carrying out the fatal shootings of Yolanda Miller and her boyfriend, Calvin Cooper, on Feb. 21, 2003. Prosecutors said he shot them because he suspected they were stealing drugs or cooperating with police. Mr. Cooper was found shot three times in the back in an alley.

Mr. Gooch faces murder, kidnapping, racketeering and other felony charges.

He requested the mistrial after more than a month of testimony and the same week that Mr. Gooch's attorneys filed court papers stating they provided their client with "ineffective assistance of counsel."

Prosecutors say the request for a mistrial is "totally devoid of merit" and that the attorneys' filing only shows "disharmony" among them.

The death penalty is banned under D.C. law, but it can be sought for some federal crimes.

Mr. Gooch also is charged in the Aug. 1, 2000, shooting deaths of Christopher Lane, 19, and William Cunningham, 27, and the Sept. 13, 2002, shooting death of Miguel Miles, 34. Prosecutors say Mr. Gooch killed Mr. Cunningham during a home invasion robbery, while a co-defendant killed Mr. Lane.

More than two dozen people connected to the case were arrested by 2004. Several of the gang's leaders have been tried and convicted, including three men serving sentences of life in prison, but Mr. Gooch is the only M Street Crew defendant facing a death penalty.

Testimony began last month and is expected to resume today. U.S. District Judge Rosemary M. Collyer has not ruled on Mr. Gooch's request for a mistrial, according to court filings.

Even if the judge denies the request, Mr. Gooch has asked that Mr. Heslep be removed from the defense team, according to filings.

Prosecutor also object to that request.

"Defense [attorneys] should not lose focus on their ultimate obligation, which is to represent the interests of their client," Assistant U.S. Attorney John P. Dominguez stated in court pleadings. "They should subordinate all other concerns to fulfill this objective and should put aside any petty bickering and simply find a way to work together to achieve this objective."

DOJ_NMG_0139552

Federal Act Preventing County Prosecutors From Trying Olsen (AP)

AP, March 5, 2007

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) - A federal act is preventing prosecutors from moving forward in the murder case against Timmy Brent Olsen.

He was charged with murder last January in the 1995 disappearance and death of 15-year-old Kiplyn Davis.

Olsen is in a federal prison in Phoenix, Arizona, serving a 12-year sentence for perjury for lying to a federal grand jury investigating the girl's disappearance. He is appealing that conviction.

Prosecutors can't force him to return to face the state murder charges without potentially having to dismiss the charges on a technicality. And Olsen won't sign a waiver of the federal act that is keeping him from facing the Utah charges.

Prosecutors say they are willing to wait for him to exhaust his federal appeals, at which time he would have no choice but to face the murder charge. They say that could take a year.

Nevada Governor Retains Top Lawyer (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons, facing a federal investigation of whether he accepted improper gifts or payments from a federal contractor, retained Abbe Lowell, one of the nation's best-known criminal defense lawyers.

Mr. Gibbons, a Republican, represented Nevada in Congress for five terms before his election as governor last year. He served on the House intelligence and armed services committees, and used his position to help a Reno software maker, eTreppid Technologies LLC, seek federal contracts.

Mr. Gibbons and eTreppid's owner, Warren Trepp, said they did nothing improper. Mr. Gibbons has said his advocacy for eTreppid was part of his efforts to help Nevada companies win government work.

Mr. Trepp, who was Michael Milken's chief bond trader at collapsed junk-bond dealer Drexel Burnham Lambert, has been a major contributor to Mr. Gibbons. The Wall Street Journal reported Nov. 1 that Mr. Trepp paid for private jet flights and a Caribbean cruise for Mr. Gibbons and his family two years ago; the matter is the subject of a preliminary investigation by federal prosecutors.

Mr. Lowell, a partner at Chadbourne & Parke LLP, is representing Jack Abramoff, the former Republican lobbyist who is cooperating with federal officials in a public-corruption probe. Mr. Abramoff is also serving a prison sentence for fraud.

Mr. Trepp has assembled a formidable legal team as well, including Reid Weingarten, a top white-collar defense attorney at Steptoe & Johnson LLP in Washington who previously served in the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section. Mr. Weingarten didn't return a call seeking comment. In a statement, Mr. Gibbons's attorneys said the governor will cooperate with any inquiry.

Nearly 20% Of Released Sex Felons Are Missing (SAEN)

By Polly Ross Hughes, Austin Bureau

San Antonio Express-News, March 5, 2007

AUSTIN — When Anselmo Pruneda Jr. left prison last May, the forwarding address he left to a Houston boarding house almost sounded like an invitation to the cops for tea.

"O Do Drop In," he wrote.

No such place exists.

Pruneda, who had spent a dozen years in prison related to the sexual assault of a 9-year-old boy and failing to register as a sex offender, didn't register as required with the Houston police, either.

Lawmakers created sex offender registries so people could check how close potential predators lived to their neighborhoods, playgrounds or schools. But these registries are not fool-proof.

The Houston Chronicle and San Antonio Express-News examined the whereabouts of more than 800 sex offenders released from prison to Harris or Bexar counties during the 18 months ending last December.

All had been rejected for early release and had served their entire sentences. Almost 20 percent of them either failed to register as sex offenders or their addresses in the state registry were incomplete, "unknown," "absconded" "out of state" or "homeless."

And that's not counting how many false or out-of-date addresses are only detected when too few local police officers try to knock on too many sex-offender doors.

"You're going to send the citizens into a panic" when they learn police lack the manpower to keep track of sex offenders who frequently change addresses, predicted Houston Police Sgt. Glen Shepherd.

DOJ_NMG_0139553

More than 46,000 adults in Texas are registered as sex offenders for crimes ranging from indecent exposure to aggravated sexual assault of a child.

As state leaders in Austin clamor to get tough on violent sex offenders who target children, calling for longer sentences with no possibility of parole or possibly the death penalty, police who work with sex offenders say politicians are overlooking a disturbing trend.

Increasingly, sex offenders deemed too dangerous for early parole return home unsupervised once they have completed their entire sentences. And under the current system, they are less scrutinized, not more.

When paroled, sex offenders aren't released until officials verify and approve where they will live. When registering with local authorities, they must prove their address with a state ID card or drivers license.

But sex offenders who complete their sentences can refuse to tell prison authorities where they will live. Or they can claim they will leave Texas or name a location in the vaguest of terms. They still are required to register with local law enforcement upon release, but police say they often go undetected if they don't.

Nearly 2,200 sex offenders are registered as living in San Antonio and Bexar County, according to the Texas Department of Public Safety.

Prison authorities aren't required to verify their whereabouts. Yet, the Texas Department of Criminal Justice will forward any information sex offenders volunteer to the Texas Department of Public Safety. It then appears on the state registry, accurate or not.

"It's like a giant chalk board. Whatever local agencies send to us, that's what goes on," said DPS spokesman Tom Vinger. "The sex offender registry is based on what sex offenders tell us, and sex offenders are known to be dishonest."

Also, since no parole officer will monitor their movements, police say unsupervised sex offenders seem the most adept at slipping from view.

"It's a total honor system, and you're relying on the most cunning, diabolical, secretive type of felon," said Andy Kahan, Houston Mayor Bill White's crime victim's director.

The U.S. Justice Department, in the most comprehensive study to date, found that 5.3 percent of sex offenders were re-arrested for another sex crime within three years of their release. When compared to non-sex offenders, they were four times more likely to be arrested for a sex crime.

John Walsh from the television show "America's Most Wanted" stressed during a January news conference with Lt. Gov. David Dewhurst that, as Texas leaders take aim at child sex offenders, they must close gaps in the state's sex offender registry.

"They have to know where these creeps are," Walsh said. "How do you find out if they're in compliance or noncompliance when they (flout) the law? When you give a bogus address or say you live in a homeless shelter or on the street, you're in noncompliance right off the bat. How can you track that sex offender?"

The Legislature's proposed "Jessica's laws," named after child murder victim Jessica Lunsford of Florida, don't answer those questions.

Some of the proposals would further restrict where sex offenders can live, barring residences too close to schools, school bus stops or public parks. But more restrictions could prove to be an even greater incentive for sex offenders to try thwarting the registry, authorities worry.

Plus, police and deputies complain that politicians talk tough, but they aren't offering local law enforcement more state money to beef up enforcement.

"This is what's known as an unfunded mandate by the state upon local governments," said Capt. Jim Rickhoff at the Bexar County Sheriff's Department. "Lord knows I'm going to be banging the drum at the next budget session for some personnel."

Attorney General Greg Abbott, who operates a sex offender unit, has asked the House Appropriations Committee for $7.7 million over the next two years so he can send deputies out regionally to help local police.

"Not all these people play by the rules. Many of them abscond, many of them fail to register later, many of them are back out on the streets looking for their next victim to harm," Abbott told budget writers.

As for Pruneda, Houston police began looking for him last week, after the Houston Chronicle asked how he managed to elude authorities. Shepherd said he was surprised to hear his compliance team was checking up on Pruneda, also known as John Perez.

"He's not registered with us," Shepherd said. "Basically, he's just out there in the cracks until a police officer stops him or he has some altercation with the police."

It turns out Houston police did pick up Pruneda last December for a minor infraction but turned him back to the streets, not knowing he was a sex offender eluding the registry.

"Apparently, he knows the system," Shepherd said. "He's gambling and taking a chance."

His luck finally ran out, though.

DOJ_NMG_0139554

Last Friday, Pruneda was arrested in Houston for failure to register, Abbott's office reported. He had been living in a tent behind a convenience store.

FBI Watching Mortgage Fraud (MBSN)

By Mark Morris

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News, March 5, 2007

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Mortgage fraud is being called the country's fastest-growing white-collar crime.

It costs lenders more than $1 billion a year and has turned increasing numbers of federal agents into experts on real estate paperwork. These days, they quickly crack cases that once took years to work, experts say.

Two Kansas City politicians recently learned just how quickly.

The very day last fall when Katheryn Shields, who was then county executive in Jackson County, Mo., and her husband signed paperwork selling their home, an FBI agent notified them they were the targets of a criminal investigation involving the sale.

The documents purportedly showed that the $475,000 house they purchased in 1999 somehow was worth a $1.2 million mortgage in 2006.

Agents also wrapped up an investigation of Kansas City City Councilwoman Saundra McFadden-Weaver just months after she unsuccessfully tried to refinance a $400,000 Lee's Summit, Mo., home. According to prosecutors, McFadden-Weaver had purchased it even though she had no plans to live there or make payments.

By contrast, the largest previous high-profile case in the area, involving a Belton, Mo., real estate investor, took years to develop.

Shields, who is campaigning to be Kansas City's mayor, and McFadden-Weaver have pleaded not guilty to conspiracy and wire fraud charges and have denied all wrongdoing. Shields, a Democrat, said she was the target of "political terrorism" by appointees in the Republican Bush administration. McFadden-Weaver said she innocently was trying to help a needy acquaintance in a real-estate transaction.

Though these relatively high-profile defendants cast new light on mortgage fraud, it already was a regular docket item in Kansas City and in federal courthouses throughout the country.

Mortgage fraud occurs when somebody lies or misrepresents a fact on a statement that a lender uses to make a loan. Banks and mortgage lenders generally are the prime victims when loans are not repaid, but the fallout from a large-scale scam also can devastate individual investors, who sometimes must file for bankruptcy.

Communities also suffer when swaths of properties sucked into a scheme go vacant and deteriorate.

Estimates of mortgage fraud losses vary widely, but experts said trend lines pointed up. Although schemes can prosper during good times - such as the recent mid-decade boom when as much as $2.5 trillion in mortgage loans were made each year - they also can flower as the market cools.

The surge in cases in recent years has led investigators, regulators, lawmakers and industry groups to consider a number of solutions.

Many think that existing fraud statutes are adequate, but four states - New Jersey, Utah, Oklahoma and Colorado - are considering laws that would make mortgage fraud a specific crime, in part to spur more local enforcement.

Ultimately, tthe real estate industry must work harder to weed out fraud, and consumers must become better educated.

John Fougere, a spokesman for the Missouri attorney general's office, said if you don't understand what you're being asked to sign, ask questions until you're comfortable.

"Take that extra step," Fougere said. "You would be amazed at the amount of grief you can save yourself."

How to avoid fraud

The Kansas Association of Mortgage Brokers offers these tips:

Verify that the mortgage company is properly licensed in the state.

Thoroughly read all documents provided by your mortgage company. Question anything that might appear out of order.

Do not sign the loan application if you aren't comfortable with the information typed on it. Remember, any misrepresentation on the application could result in civil or criminal penalties.

While the loan is being processed, question anything that appears out of the ordinary.

At closing, read everything thoroughly. Don't sign if you're uncomfortable with any of the information represented. Review the final loan application to see if there is any incorrect information that might affect your approval, such as an investment property marked as your primary residence or a significant error in your income.

Arrest Sparks Worries Over Implications Of Corporate Law (HC/AP)

By John Christoffersen, Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, March 5, 2007

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — The arrest of a prominent attorney on charges of destroying evidence in a child pornography investigation is raising alarm bells that a law targeting corporate accounting schemes could be used to prosecute lawyers over work done on their clients' behalf.

"Every criminal defense lawyer in the country has to be alarmed at the indictment," said New York University law professor Stephen Gillers. "It's going to upset a lot of assumptions about how lawyers can represent clients. I think this is a boundary-pushing case."

Philip Russell was charged Feb. 16 with destroying a computer that contained child pornography at Christ Church in Greenwich. Former President George H.W. Bush attended the church while growing up and funeral services for his parents were held there.

Russell, the former attorney for the church, is accused of obstructing an FBI investigation that led to the January conviction of the church's music director, Robert Tate, for possessing child pornography.

Russell was charged under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which Congress passed in 2002 after a wave of corporate accounting scandals to make it easier to prosecute such cases. He faces up to 40 years in prison if convicted.

"The case will test the meaning of those new provisions," Gillers said.

The law, which was aimed at cases involving corporate document shredding, made it easier to prosecute obstruction of justice by requiring only that an investigation was foreseeable rather than already pending. Prosecutors also no longer have to show the defendant acted with corrupt intent to keep evidence from investigators, experts say.

While legal experts agree that lawyers can't destroy evidence, they are concerned that prosecutors' use of Sarbanes-Oxley will pressure defense attorneys to betray their clients' confidences and report potential evidence to authorities or risk prosecution themselves.

"The most troubling aspect is it tries to make lawyers shills or hand maidens for police and government investigators," said Jon Schoenhorn, president of the Connecticut Criminal Defense Lawyers Association.

Future cases could be murkier than child pornography, involving bank records or other documents and items that might incriminate a client in a future investigation, experts say.

"Lawyers will have to be soothsayers," said Martin Pinales, president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers. "They will have to figure out what some prosecutor in the future may or may not be charging."

Russell, whose wife is a member of the church, does not dispute that he destroyed the computer, said his attorney, Robert Casale. But denies he broke the law.

"He didn't do it to interfere or compromise any government investigation," Casale said.

The case dates back to Oct. 7, when an employee at Christ Church discovered images of naked boys while using Tate's computer, according to the indictment. A day later, church officials sealed and wrapped Tate's laptop, treating it as evidence, authorities said.

Russell destroyed Tate's computer after learning it contained images of naked boys, according to the indictment.

"Those who possess child pornography or hinder the prosecution of those who do by destroying evidence and impeding investigations will be prosecuted, particularly when the obstructionists are attorneys and officers of the court," U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said.

Federal authorities declined further comment because the case is pending.

Schoenhorn said defense attorneys should advise their clients that it's illegal to possess child pornography, but should leave it up to their client on how to treat the evidence.

"Obviously a lawyer should not destroy evidence, but that begs the question what is evidence?" Schoenhorn said.

Russell plans to challenge the use of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act in his case. Others besides attorneys could be liable if authorities are allowed to apply the law broadly, Casale said.

Federal law has a provision designed to protect attorneys. That shield could be a defense for Russell, but it's rarely been tested, experts say.

The trial in April could spell the end of a career for Russell, whose recent clients included Andrew Kissel, a wealthy Greenwich developer charged in a multi-million dollar real estate fraud case. Kissell was found slain in his home last year days before he was to plead guilty.

"Any criminal conviction will devastate him," Casale said. "It's like capital punishment."

D'Amato Never Folds (NYT)

By Gary Rivlin And Matt Richtel

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

For years, Alfonse M. D'Amato, the former Republican senator from New York, was the host at a Thursday evening poker game at his Capitol Hill office, playing with other lawmakers, staff members and lobbyists late into the night over pots that ranged from a few dollars to a few hundred.

Once New Yorkers collectively informed Mr. D'Amato that it was time to find a new line of work, he graduated to a higher-stakes game, playing with Howard Stern, among others. He is now a stalwart of a weekly game on Long Island where a bad night might mean that a player drops $5,000 or more.

As Mr. D'Amato tells it, and as his card-playing cronies confirm, he rarely leaves a game a loser. Yet it is a safe bet that his love of poker never proved so lucrative as it did last week, when he signed a lobbying deal with the Poker Players Alliance, a nascent group that hopes that Mr. D'Amato will help them become players in Washington politics, too.

Most immediately, the group is hoping that Mr. D'Amato, long known for his connections to Washington insiders and his ability to deliver perks to his constituents and interest groups, can help them overturn a new federal ban on Internet gambling — or at least exempt poker from its provisions.

"John Smith, maybe he doesn't have the financial means or the ability" to travel to a casino, Mr. D'Amato said, gesturing with his hands and speaking volubly in his trademark accent. "The poor guy at home can't bet $50 because we pass this law."

The first big assault on poker players came in October when President Bush signed a bill aimed at online gambling by making it a crime to use credit cards or online payment systems for poker and other online casino games and sports betting conducted over the Internet. The law did not make it impossible or illegal for Americans to bet online, but it did make it trickier for players to get their cash to the offshore casinos that run the Internet sites.

"I think it's fair to say that most poker players see themselves as nonpolitical," said Walt Thiessen, 49, an entrepreneur from Warrenton, Va., who recently joined the alliance. "But the more that the government does to impede poker players, the more angry and frustrated they're going to become."

The booming popularity of poker has spawned any number of cable television shows and made media figures of professionals like Chris Moneymaker and Daniel Negreanu. Tens of millions of Americans play, primarily in home games but also at casinos, legal and illegal card rooms, and at scores of Web sites.

So perhaps it was inevitable that poker enthusiasts would assert themselves as another special interest demanding to be heard in Washington. The Poker Players Alliance, which says it has more than 160,000 members, most paying at least $20 to join the group, will open an office in Washington in the next two months "to oversee our political efforts there," the group's president, Michael Bolcerek, said. It hopes to build a grassroots organization whose political presence is felt in all 50 states, he said.

But even though Mr. D'Amato's involvement in the lobbying effort is bound to generate plenty of talk, it is not expected to lead to overturning the new law anytime soon.

Moreover, Mr. D'Amato, for all his ability to attract attention and parlay his reputation into big money, may not have much sway in a Democratic-controlled Congress preoccupied with war, budget deficits and presidential politics. There is little interest there at the moment in turning back to a subject decided a year ago, when Republicans ruled.

Mr. D'Amato and his backers, said I. Nelson Rose, law professor at Whittier Law School in Costa Mesa, Calif., and an expert on gambling law, "think they have a pair of queens. But what have they really got? They don't even have a pair."

Still, former Representative Jim Leach, an Iowa Republican and one of the authors of the Internet gambling ban, said that Mr. D'Amato certainly added heft to the effort.

"Don't ever underestimate Al," he said on hearing of Mr. D'Amato's role.

Certainly, Mr. D'Amato's poker buddies have learned that lesson. "He's tenacious, he's fearless and he's aggressive," said Gary Melius, the host of the Monday game where Mr. D'Amato is now a regular. "He's also really good at reading people."

Subtlety has never been Mr. D'Amato's long suit, and he has already embraced his new role with characteristic fervor. During an interview in his offices in a high-rise on Park Avenue in Manhattan, Mr. D'Amato did not answer questions about online poker as much as filibuster on the issue.

To him the implications of prohibiting online poker are profound, touching on matters as wide ranging as the war on terrorism, national security, the rights of the elderly and the handicapped and equal protection under the law. At times, he pounded his desk to make his point.

The money being spent to outlaw poker and enforce the ban, Mr. D'Amato said, could be better spent "in the battle against money laundering, trafficking in drugs, or trafficking in terrorism."

He takes issue with Congress's decision to lump in poker, a game of skill as well as luck, with games of pure chance like roulette and craps. "It's really a great sport," Mr. D'Amato said, perhaps the country's favorite sport. "You don't have 70 million people participating in baseball."

It is not clear that poker has 70 million players, either. (Mr. D'Amato's source is a study commissioned by the poker association.)

But one of his trademark tactics is throwing around numbers that might or might not be considered, well, a bluff. He talks of the million players who have already joined the poker association — a misstatement that prompted his handler, presidential style, to clarify that what the former senator meant is that the group hoped one day soon to have that many names on its rolls.

After New York voters replaced Mr. D'Amato with Charles E. Schumer, a Democrat, in 1998, the former senator opened Park Strategies, a lobbying and corporate strategy firm whose client list includes banks, telecommunications companies and a few racetrack owners.

He acknowledged that he did not understand the impulse that prompted a person to place a wager on a horse. But he spoke rhapsodically about the sense of community that poker has fostered in his life, and the banter, camaraderie and friendly competition that can make the game so engaging.

The intimacy of the game, in fact, produced some political headaches for Mr. D'Amato while he was chairman of the Senate Banking Committee after an article in The New York Times disclosed that he had invited lobbyists to play in his office. That gave extraordinary access, some charged, to those representing banks, securities firms and other financial institutions.

Mr. D'Amato has a different view, defending his activity as an innocent pastime that followed in the footsteps of President Harry S. Truman's poker games with cronies. "It was a great way to while the time away — to have fun and talk politics," he said.

Plenty of Americans are still playing poker online, if no longer at sites run by publicly traded companies, which fear reprisals from Washington despite being based overseas.

Instead, online players have shifted to smaller, privately owned sites. They are forced to find other means for transferring money in and out of their accounts, given that the new law more closely monitors financial institutions processing wagers.

"I play as much now as I did before the ban," said Ethan Ruby, a member of the poker alliance who lives and works in Manhattan. Mr. Ruby said he simply took the money he had on account at PartyPoker, his old site, and transferred it to Full Tilt. He then linked his poker account to his checking account instead of a credit card.

"It's a much more tedious process now," Mr. Ruby said.

Still, it only took a few days. "You can't cork this," Mr. D'Amato said. "You can't stop this through some silly bill."

Online poker will only go further underground, he continued, providing an opening for unscrupulous foreign operators seeking to take advantage of the hunger of Americans to play poker.

"When you have regulation, where you have openness, you can ensure you have a game that won't be unfairly cut or disadvantaged or manipulated," Mr. D'Amato said. You can also tax the winnings of players whose ups and downs are tracked online, a figure the poker alliance puts potentially in the billions.

Mr. Rose, the law professor, while doubtful of the chances for the lobbying effort in the short run, said Mr. D'Amato and his backers would be well served in keeping the issue alive until there is more interest in the matter. "If they stay active the next two years," he said, "then there could be a serious bill" to carve out an exception for poker.

Certainly, Mr. D'Amato has staying power.

"The later the game goes, the more Al is going to win," said Larry Elovich, a Long Island lawyer who said he has been playing poker on and off with Mr. D'Amato for 50 years. "He has the ability to stay awake when the rest of the players are all tired."

A Record Of Failure At Center For Sex Offenders (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough And Monica Davey

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

ARCADIA, Fla. — Inside a privately run treatment center here for pedophiles and rapists who have completed their prison sentences, where they are supposed to reflect on their crimes and learn to control their sexual urges, bikini posters were pinned to walls.

Two men took their shirts off, rubbed each other's backs and held hands, while others disappeared together into dormitory rooms. Some of the sex offenders appeared to be drunk from homemade "buck" liquor secretly brewed and sold here.

And some of the center's employees, who openly ignored the breaking of rules ("As long as they are happy, we let them go," one explained), reported that a high turnover rate among staff members was mostly because of female employees leaving their jobs after having had sex with the offenders.

These and other observations were included in a memorandum composed in 2004 by six employees on loan here from Pennsylvania. They had been dispatched by the Liberty Behavioral Health Corporation, which ran the facility, the Florida Civil Commitment Center, and a facility in Pennsylvania.

Nineteen states have laws that allow them to confine or restrict sex criminals beyond prison in a trend that is expanding around the country, with legislators in New York last week announcing agreement on a new civil commitment law there.

The courts have upheld the constitutionality of such laws in part because they are meant to furnish treatment where possible. Most of the states run their own centers to hold and treat such predators, generally with meager results, but at a time when private solutions are popular for prisons, toll roads and other state functions, a few have teamed with private industry.

Yet as the story of the center here in Arcadia reveals, even a $19 million partnership between the state and a company that describes itself as "a national leader in the field of specialized sex offender treatment and management" failed to meet a central purpose: treating sex offenders so they would be well enough to return to society.

"It was like walking into a war zone," Jared Lamantia, one of the visiting workers who signed the memorandum, recalled in an interview. "The residents in that place ran the whole facility."

The memorandum is among thousands of pages of public and private documents about the Florida center reviewed by The New York Times, providing a rare window into the lives of civilly committed sexual predators and the people who guard and treat them. While programs like Florida's are popular because they keep sex offenders locked away past their prison terms, they cost far more than prison — in the case of Florida, on average twice as much — with no measurable benefit beyond confinement.

For more than seven years, Liberty was in charge of almost every facet of the Florida center, where more than 500 men are held beyond their criminal sentences in a crowded former prison surrounded by cow pastures.

That ended last June in a cloud of claims and counterclaims, investigations and legislative hearings. By the end, after the state did not renew Liberty's contract, the Florida Department of Children and Families was virtually at war with the company, with each side pinning blame on the other — the state accused of failing to properly finance the center, the company accused of failing to manage it.

"The place is a cesspool of despair and depression and drug abuse — of people being lost," said Don Sweeney, a mental health counselor in St. Petersburg who treats some former residents of the center, reflecting on Liberty's tenure there.

Many outside experts, even some of the center's critics, said the state's insufficient financing of the center made Florida as much to blame as Liberty for the many failings, many of which are common in other states. Florida spends less than $42,000 a year per resident, one of the lowest rates in the country.

"There was no money to support that facility and to do what had to be done," Dr. Robert Bellino, a psychiatrist who worked at the center here, said of the company. "It's a political football. They were always turning the screws on Liberty — 'Cut this, cut that, don't spend this, don't spend that.' "

Ambitious Private Contractors

As legislators across the nation have answered public outrage about heinous sex crimes with civil commitment laws, a bevy of companies and well-paid specialists have cropped up like constellations around the expanding demand.

Liberty Behavioral Health and Liberty Healthcare Corporation, affiliates with common ownership, have emerged as the most ambitious private contractors in the commitment center arena. As recently as last year, the affiliates had accumulated contracts worth up to $26 million a year in California, Illinois, Pennsylvania and Florida, which was the biggest both in terms of compensation and responsibility.

Growing out of a company that provided emergency room employees to hospitals starting in the mid 1970s, Liberty Healthcare Corporation was founded in 1986 as a provider of mental health, developmental disability and primary care services. In its earliest days, it had no experience treating sex offenders and, its officials said, there was never a particular moment when company officials said to one another, "Let's go into the sex offender business."

Yet as Shan Jumper, Liberty's clinical director in Illinois, tells it, after "analyzing market trends and seeing what areas they could jump into," Liberty executives apparently recognized the potential.

By 1998, the company, which is privately held and based in Bala Cynwyd, Pa., won its first contract to provide services inside a civil commitment center, in Illinois. Rick Robinson, executive vice president and chief operating officer of Liberty Healthcare, described the move as a natural outgrowth of its work, which included creating an adolescent sex offender unit in an Arkansas hospital in 1995.

The states that have hired private companies reason that outside experts have more background in the complex realm of detaining and treating sex offenders than most public workers, and in several states where Liberty holds contracts, officials say they have been impressed with the company's expertise.

But at the Florida center, even beyond a string of embarrassing failures — an escape, the death of an offender after a fight with another over a bag of chips, a sit-in that the state ultimately quashed with hundreds of law enforcement officers — the treatment record was poor.

DOJ_NMG_0139559

In Liberty's tenure, only one of the hundreds of men here progressed far enough in therapy to earn a recommendation from company clinicians that he be released. At various points, many residents were not attending the group therapy specifically addressing sex offending; in May 2005, 35 percent of the center's 484 residents fell into that category.

In written responses to questions from The New York Times, as well as court depositions, legislative testimony, e-mail messages, letters and memorandums, Liberty defended its treatment record, blamed Florida as insufficiently financing its commitment program and, for years, failing to define exactly what it expected of Liberty.

Early Praise and Promise

Liberty's early tenure in Florida won praise from independent evaluators who said the treatment program showed promise. Over the first four years the state asked for few changes, and on matters such as the treatment of mentally ill residents, had a "just do the best you can" attitude, as Susan Keenan Nayda, vice president of operations for behavioral health programs at Liberty, said in a court deposition.

But problems began to surface publicly in June 2000 in dramatic fashion when a resident escaped in a helicopter that an accomplice had landed inside the center's perimeter. The helicopter crashed after departing with the escapee, who was caught 26 hours later in a canal with the pilot, 2 handguns and 28 rounds of ammunition. The pilot, a longtime friend, had visited the escapee 10 times in the five months before the escape.

The bizarre incident raised worrisome questions and the first hints of a conflict over the center's combined goals of security and treatment. Too few Liberty staff members were in the yard when the escape occurred, a report by state officials found, and the center's director had ordered razor wire removed from a security fence because, he said, the wire was damaging volleyballs from a nearby court the residents used.

The report also complained about the state's role, questioning why corrections officers, who were in charge of security on the perimeter, were unarmed. Commitment centers across the country have wavered between following the legal mandate to run a therapeutic program, as laid out by the courts, and the politically acceptable alternative of a more prisonlike one.

In Florida, the conflict emerged again and again. The state's emphasis swung, at various points, toward and away from a "correctional" approach, company officials suggested. At one point, Ms. Nayda told a Florida State Senate committee that even she was not entirely sure what the center was trying to be.

"There's a little bit of confusion," Ms. Nayda said. "What is this place? Is it a prison? Is it a mental health center? A residential treatment facility where people are clients? What is it? We ask that question sometimes too. We really don't have a lot of guidance around what it is the state wants the facility to be, and we would encourage the state to look at that."

By the end of 2000, the state moved its civil commitment center from Martin County on the state's East Coast to its current home here in Arcadia, a 14-acre compound with eight dormitories and other buildings.

From there, the population rose swiftly, even as staff levels mostly stayed put. Liberty repeatedly sought more money from the state for the center's operations, for special treatment of its large severely mentally ill population and for creation of a supervised release program.

Asked to respond to Liberty's complaints about financing, Rod Hall, director of the mental health program office for the state Department of Children and Families, said, "The funding provided to operate the facility was the amount negotiated and agreed upon by Liberty prior to its signing of the contracts."

Liberty's monthly reports began suggesting that the company was feeling the crunch. The reports noted frequent troubling incidents: residents having sex, assaulting staff members and each another, hiding knives in their rooms.

Liberty also said it faced an unusual challenge in Florida, where hundreds of the center's residents are not formally committed, but awaiting trials for commitment. These "detainees," the company said, often reject treatment to focus on their legal battles.

Some critics, meanwhile, began questioning the treatment. Ted Shaw, a forensic psychologist who evaluates civilly committed sex offenders, complained that Liberty held men back in treatment as punishment for minor infractions.

Liberty officials deny the allegations, but Michael Canty, a child molester who was detained at the center but was never formally committed, concurred with Dr. Shaw, saying Liberty staff members would "harass, taunt — try to get you in trouble so you would get kicked out of treatment."

Rising Tensions, and Violence

By the time the six workers from Liberty's facility in Pennsylvania arrived here in 2004, tensions inside the center and with the state authorities were reaching a peak.

In April of that year, a mentally ill man jumped off the center's roof and was injured after staff members rushed at him to get him down. In June, a resident stabbed another 12 times and the staff had residents mop up the blood, destroying evidence before outside law enforcement officials arrived, an internal report showed.

"It was basically a free-for-all prison, out of control," said Josh Stiles, another of the visiting workers from Pennsylvania.

DOJ_NMG_0139560

Liberty officials said they investigated and immediately took "appropriate actions" regarding all that their Pennsylvania employees reported. But they also said the atmosphere in the center at the time was "probably very conducive for allegations that were either unfounded or exaggerated," and noted that a second group from the Pennsylvania facility, including its director, returned to Florida several weeks later and reported no similar problems.

Nonetheless, Lynda Sommers, a consultant hired by the state to monitor the facility over a number of years, also found it in disarray in the period after the second Pennsylvania group.

Ms. Sommers reported suspected sexual relationships between staff members and offenders, staff members who slept on the job, crumbling facilities, and vague policies on punishing troublemakers and treating the mentally ill.

Liberty's own internal investigator, Kenneth Dudding, was also deeply critical of hiring decisions for low-level staff members, whose salaries started at a base rate of $12.89 an hour.

"You could have worked at Wal-Mart last week, they put you in front of a computer to read policy for a few hours, then they send you to a dorm and let you go," said Mr. Dudding, who left after clashing with Liberty's management.

As for female security workers, Mr. Dudding said they were easily manipulated by the sex offenders. "It's like putting candy in front of a baby," he said.

Mr. Dudding said he ultimately called a state whistle-blower's hot line.

The inspector general of the Department of Children and Families investigated and issued stinging reports, saying that the facility's safety director had tried to cover up wrongdoing by tampering with evidence, that an employee was suspected of selling marijuana, and that alcohol was being made and sold there.

Liberty officials said the safety director was fired for "failure to properly function in her role" before they received the inspector general's critique, and they said they fired the worker suspected of drug sales — on whom no contraband was found — for an unrelated reason.

Then a group of residents, angry when the fire marshal demanded that they not have so many personal items, moved into a yard. For months, the staff could not persuade them to go back to their rooms, creating a scene one law enforcement officer called "Woodstock gone amok."

Liberty said it first asked for help from the Department of Corrections and was turned down, only to ultimately get a response the company called "excessive." In February 2005, several hundred corrections and law enforcement officers in riot gear arrived and restored order.

That spring, Liberty's requests to the state grew more insistent. The company asked for $31.1 million for the next fiscal year; it received $18.7 million, the same as the year before.

By April, having described an "alarming" set of "chronic and serious" issues at the facility, the state was preparing to end its relationship with Liberty.

New Company Takes Over

In the end, the struggle between security and treatment may help explain Liberty's doomed tenure at the Florida center.

"I had imagined that we would be trying to do research or publish or be innovative or at least use state-of-the-art equipment," said Dean Cauley, a former therapist at the center. "When I arrived, the equipment wasn't being used, tests were outdated and treatment was very much secondary to maintaining security."

Liberty officials said that treating patients had always been their company's reason for being. Most of the company leaders, including Dr. Herbert T. Caskey, the founder, were originally clinicians, not business people.

If states wanted simply to lock up, not treat, the worst sexual predators, Kenneth Carabello, Liberty's director of regional operations for California and the western United States, said, "We'd let somebody else do this."

Despite the center's history, Don Ryce, the father of Jimmy Ryce, the 9-year-old boy whose 1995 rape and murder spurred the Florida Legislature to adopt a civil commitment law in his name three years later, said the law's "overall intention" had been accomplished.

"There are a lot of people who are confined who otherwise I guarantee you would be out there reoffending," Mr. Ryce said, though he added, "I'm not going to pretend there aren't serious problems that need to be addressed."

As Liberty departed, Florida picked another private company, the GEO Group Inc., to run the center here.

The GEO Group, once known as Wackenhut Corrections Corporation, has more than 23 years of experience running prisons. Of 63 centers GEO operates worldwide, 58 are correctional and detention facilities.

Last fall, under GEO's watch, a new glimpse of turmoil began emerging. Early one morning, a resident said he was attacked by another in his bunk. His screaming, kicking and banging on his door went unanswered for almost 15 minutes before staff members responded, other residents said.

GEO officials said workers from the company and the Department of Corrections "responded promptly" to what GEO described as a "resident upon resident" fight, an assessment echoed in a DeSoto County sheriff's report.

DOJ_NMG_0139561

But some 100 residents signed a letter calling for an end to the practice of housing two residents in a single room. The center “is supposed to be a mental health facility, not a prison,” the residents wrote. “We are to be treated as patients, not state convicts.”

Early Struggles Helped Forge Lanier's Resilience (WP)

By Allison Klein

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Cathy L. Lanier's career could have dead-ended in her fourth year with the D.C. police department.

A new sergeant, she was sent east of the Anacostia River to the 6th Police District, one of the city's most crime-ridden areas. From the start, things were bad.

Lanier's supervisor, a lieutenant, propositioned her sexually and humiliated her in public by making lewd remarks about her, she said. Once, during a meeting with Lanier and a group of male officers, the lieutenant grabbed her ponytail and made a comment about pulling a woman's hair during sex.

It was 1995, and, Lanier said, she had no clue about the law on sexual harassment. Some officers urged her to file a complaint. But another supervisor warned that the department's good-old-boy culture would ensure that if she took action, she would never be promoted.

She retained a lawyer and, along with another woman making similar allegations, went to court. The city settled their lawsuit, and each woman got $75,000. The lieutenant was shifted to a different police district.

Lanier thought her career was over. But there were no repercussions, she said, because she had a solid track record. "Your reputation in the department is either as a hard, loyal worker or someone who will do anything to get out of work. I was a worker," she said.

Now, at 39, she is awaiting D.C. Council confirmation as the city's first permanent female police chief and one of the youngest leaders to head the department.

She has achieved success after struggles in her personal and professional life, including a teenage pregnancy that led her to drop out of high school and an early marriage that failed. Her resiliency will be tested as she inherits a police department in a high-crime city that residents say is out of touch with the community. She is already facing extra scrutiny as a white, female chief of a force that is mostly black and male.

Running the 3,800-member department requires a commanding presence, stamina and the ability to plan while dealing with the inevitable crises. As her predecessor, Charles H. Ramsey, put it: "There are things coming at you all the time and nobody to pass it off to. The buck stops there."

D.C. Council member Phil Mendelson (D-At Large), who heads the Public Safety and Judiciary Committee, said that Lanier gets high marks since taking over as acting chief in December but that "the proof will be over time."

"To the average citizen, the chief of police is the personification of crime fighting. In reality, the chief of police is the manager of a large bureaucracy," Mendelson said. "That's the role she's got to play."Challenges From the Start

Lanier was raised by her mother after her father left when she was 4. She and two older brothers lived with their mother in a modest home in the D.C. suburb of Tuxedo, in Prince George's County.

She dropped out of high school at 14 to have a baby. She wed the boy's father, a marriage that lasted two years, then went on welfare. At 16, she received her GED and became a secretary. She later sold awnings and canopies, worked in real estate and waited tables. Her mother helped her care for the baby.

At 23, she followed her father and two brothers into public service. Her late father, Walter Lanier Sr., was deputy fire chief in Prince George's. One brother is a captain in the county fire department, the other a detective with Greenbelt police.

As a police officer, she came into her own, said her mother, Helen Lanier, a retired legal secretary. "She seemed to blossom."

Cathy Lanier's first assignment was as a foot patrol officer in the 4th District in Northeast and Northwest Washington. A 6-foot-tall blond woman in uniform, she stood out. She remembers stopping by neighborhood playgrounds, shooting hoops with the kids for a few minutes and letting them wear her police cap. She'd give them bubble gum, and they knew she'd be back.

She got to know every street and alley, said her former commander, Robert C. White, now chief in Louisville. "She knew the good people and the thugs. She wasn't afraid or intimidated."

Lanier grew frustrated, however. Some officers were slacking off, she said. "I felt like everybody wasn't pulling their weight."

So she decided to become a training officer, teaching rookies how to work a beat.

"My rule was we didn't take lunch," Lanier said. "We ate, but we didn't take lunch."

Sgt. Brett Parson vividly remembers Lanier's training when he joined the force in 1994. The first day they were out together, they patrolled the lower Georgia Avenue area, and she was teaching him to watch for drug dealing.

DOJ_NMG_0139562

"All of a sudden, she slammed on the brakes, jumped out of the car and handcuffed a guy," Parson said. "I had no idea what happened. I hadn't even gotten out of the car."

Diane Groomes, now commander of the 1st District, recalls competing with Lanier to see who could make more arrests. "We'd usually tie," Groomes said.Changes Won Attention

By 1998, the harassment case was settled, and Lanier began a steady ascent. She became a captain after ranking third on a promotion exam; she has always excelled at such tests. "I wasn't as smart as everybody else, but I would out-study them," she said.

Ramsey took over the department the same year, and he identified a handful of go-getters. Ramsey said he was looking for bright, enthusiastic leaders with at least 10 years ahead of them in the department. Lanier had all of that.

"If there was anything lacking in Cathy at all, it was self-confidence," Ramsey recently recalled.

The meteoric rise was set in motion: five new commands over the next eight years -- leading to chief.

Lanier burnished her police credentials with outside studies, receiving bachelor's and master's degrees from Johns Hopkins University. She also had management training at Harvard University.

Ramsey promoted her to inspector and put her in charge of narcotics. Then, when the department was accused of not doing enough to investigate fatal traffic accidents, Ramsey put Lanier in charge of that unit, too.

She went to every fatal crash and made changes to improve the unit's performance. The unit was staffed round-the-clock, and investigators were ordered to regularly update victims' families.

Lanier took a similar approach when Ramsey put her in charge of the 4th District -- the place she began her career. She blanketed high-crime areas with officers in marked police cars, lights flashing. Crime dipped within 90 days. And she met with residents so that they bought into the strategy.

Her gung-ho personality and self-assured manner earned her praise from neighborhood leaders and caught the attention of Adrian M. Fenty, then a Democratic council member representing Ward 4. They realized they had the same style: Both were responsive to community needs, loved talking to people and had a habit of working through the night.

Lanier moved on, but Fenty would remember the impact she made on the police district.A Surprising Choice

Ronald Reagan's funeral. George W. Bush's inauguration. Countless demonstrations. Lanier oversaw security for big events as head of the Special Operations Division, a 250-member unit she took over in 2002. Among other duties, the division investigates bomb threats, deals with armed standoffs and escorts dignitaries in the city.

As she expanded her reach, Lanier also headed the police board that reviews the use of force and helped negotiate two union contracts. Her final assignment under Ramsey came last year, when he put her in charge of the force's first homeland security division.

Her rise has not been without controversy. Still pending are two lawsuits, one accusing Lanier of unfairly breaking up a canine squad and the other of illegally demoting officers from the mounted unit after they complained about mismanagement. She would not comment on the cases.

After Fenty won the mayoral election in the fall, he made it clear that he would not keep Ramsey. But Lanier said it was one of the biggest shocks of her life when Fenty offered her the job in November -- she hadn't applied.

The choice was also a surprise for another reason: After years of criticizing Ramsey, Fenty chose one of the chief's proteges for the top job.

There were complaints from some in the black community that Fenty passed over African American candidates who they felt would better represent the mostly black city. The force is 76 percent male and 63 percent black.

Some doubts remain. Ronald E. Hampton, executive director of the National Black Police Association and a former D.C. police officer, said picking Lanier was "risky" for Fenty.

"The chief of police ought to be a person of color," Hampton said. "We've got a lot of white people in these positions, and that becomes problematic for recruitment. You wonder why young kids in the black community don't want to be police officers."

Lanier said she should be judged on her performance. "People who know me realize it's not an issue," she said of the racial question.

She is adding foot patrols in neighborhoods that have been craving them for years and tailoring new crime-fighting programs with input from the community.

As a show of support for beat officers, Lanier began a policy that ones who live in the District are the first to have take-home police cars. She is also trying to streamline arduous paperwork.

That goes a long way, said Officer Kristopher Baumann, chairman of the Fraternal Order of Police's Labor Committee. "Officers like that she is the real police, she's out there on the street and she's out in the districts," Baumann said.

DOJ_NMG_0139563

As she learns to manage her position, Lanier has been in near-constant motion, typically starting work early in the morning and winding up late at night. She shows up at crime scenes, has endless meet-and-greets with community groups and still finds time to spend with her boyfriend, D.C. police Sgt. Jim Schaefer, who inspects city trucks, as well as her mother and son, now 24.

At a recent event at an elementary school in Southeast Washington, she agreed to mentor a child for four hours a week. A worried look crossed the face of her aides, familiar with her overpacked schedule.

"Who doesn't have four hours a week to spare?" she asked.

Besides, she still eats her meals in the car on the way to meetings. She eats lunch -- but she doesn't take lunch.

CIVIL LAW:

FEDERAL DIARY: Slowing Down The Revolving Door (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Adjusting the spin of the revolving door is never easy.

A House committee has approved legislation that would lengthen employment restrictions for federal procurement officials who take certain jobs when they leave government, from one year to two years. It also would prohibit newly hired procurement officials from awarding contracts to their former employers for two years.

Tightening employment restrictions will bring more accountability to government, contends Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee. Recent lobbying and procurement scandals are proof that something needs to be done, he points out.

But Paul A. Denett, the procurement policy chief at the Office of Management and Budget, argues that the proposed restrictions "would do great damage" to the government's ability to hire and keep qualified contracting personnel.

"They will have the unintended effect of harming the career prospects of the overwhelming number of honest, experienced government employees and encourage them to leave government service early," Denett said in a recent letter to Waxman. An estimated 20 percent of the government's 28,000 contracting professionals are eligible to retire, Denett noted.

Congress has been trying to regulate the revolving door -- the rotation of federal officials and business executives into and out of government -- since at least 1872, according to the Congressional Research Service.

Over the decades, Congress has sought to protect the government from former employees who took sensitive information with them and used it to promote the interests of a private party. Congress also has devised rules to discourage federal employees from cashing in on their inside knowledge or becoming snarled in conflicts of interest with companies doing business with the government.

"The question here is priorities," said Dave Nadler, a partner at Dickstein Shapiro. "It requires Congress to balance two important policy considerations."

One set of considerations is based on the very real concerns about the federal workforce and whether workforce shortages will increase over time; the other considerations involve the need to respond to the perception that industry and government are becoming too cozy, Nadler said.

"Given the recent high-profile scandals in the procurement community, Congress is clearly focused on addressing ethics and standards of conduct in government contracting," he said.

The scandals include last year's influence-peddling case involving convicted former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the 2004 scandal involving former Air Force acquisition official Darleen A. Druyun, who had negotiated a job with an airplane manufacturer and admitted in federal court to favoring the company in several procurement decisions.

Currently, federal procurement officials dealing with contracts worth more than $10 million may not receive compensation from a company involved in that contract for one year after leaving the government. The House bill would extend that compensation ban to two years.

This "procurement integrity" ban augments other cooling-off periods that limit contacts and lobbying by former federal officials.

The bill also would stop a "reverse revolving door," prohibiting federal executives who worked for private contractors from awarding contracts to their former employers after entering the government.

Denett said that provision would make it hard for the government "to obtain experienced procurement officials from the private sector" and use their knowledge to evaluate contractor proposals and their work.

DOJ_NMG_0139564

Stan Z. Soloway, president of the Professional Services Council, which represents companies that hold federal contracts, agreed, saying the provision would hamper recruitment of mid-career professionals who might come into government to work on a project but have little interest in a long-term federal career.

"There has to be some balance," Soloway said. "You run a risk of over-regulating in a way that is a disservice to the federal workforce of today and tomorrow."

He added, "Before we start adding restrictions, I really think it ought to be underpinned by some clear, cogent evidence that the current system doesn't work."

But James A. Thurber, an American University professor who testified in support of the House bill, said changes are needed, noting that loopholes in some laws permit a federal procurement official to be hired by a company to which he awarded contracts.

Though most federal employees moving to the private sector "do so with good intentions," he said in prepared testimony, "the temptations of future employment in the private sector are there and when acted upon, the public loses."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Neighbors Of Ruined Store Call For Healing (OWH)

By Jennifer Greff, WORLD-HERALD STAFF WRITER

Omaha World-Herald, March 5, 2007

The arson fire that blew a wall off Bob's Food Mart last month exposed not only the store's contents but also racial tension in the surrounding community of east Omaha.

And as with Hurricane Katrina, underlying problems surfaced, north Omaha leader LaVon Stennis Williams said at a community meeting Sunday at St. Therese of the Child Jesus Catholic Church.

The Feb. 18 robbery and arson at Bob's Food Mart, which police said may have been a racially motivated hate crime, sparked community outcry - and now, an avenue for change.

Two white men robbed the store and ordered Kassahun Goshime, an Ethiopian immigrant, into the basement. His hands and mouth were bound with duct tape and the store was set on fire. Goshime escaped.

His family owns the store. Racist graffiti has been found spray-painted on his home as well as on the store, at 16th and Fort Streets.

Bill Whitcomb, a race relations mediator with the Kansas City office of the U.S. Department of Justice, will be in Omaha next week to lead three discussions on race relations and develop a plan to address the issue, Stennis Williams said.

One of those meetings, a forum scheduled for March 15 at 6:30 p.m., is open to the public. Whitcomb also will lead a meeting with community leaders and another with elected officials.

Stennis Williams said others have told her of racial tensions in the area.

"It was an embarrassment to me to realize we're dealing with this in the 21st century," Stennis Williams said.

More than two dozen people attended Sunday's community meeting. Contributing to Sunday's discussion were Tommie Wilson, president of the Omaha chapter of the NAACP; Tristan Bonn, Omaha's former public safety auditor; and representatives of the Anti-Defamation League.

Some of the neighbors attending were interested in talking about the racism that they say plagues their community. But at least one, an older woman, was fearful enough of reprisal in the neighborhood that she asked not to be identified.

Others expressed exasperation at continuing vandalism, retaliation and slow police response in east Omaha neighborhoods.

Most people came to support Goshime, who allowed neighbors to remove goods from the damaged store.

"Here is a community that is pissed off at what is going on and what happened," said the Rev. Ken Vavrina, pastor of St. Therese. "(Goshime) is a great example for us all."

One woman, moved to tears, invited Goshime to her home for dinner. A man in the audience likened Goshime to Mother Teresa and the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

Vavrina suggested that Goshime be elected businessman of the year, then went a step further and hailed him the next president of the United States as the audience applauded.

"If you have the courage and wherewithal to reopen, 99 percent of the community will support you and patronize you," Vavrina said.

Goshime said he had not yet decided whether to rebuild in the same location. And concerning the racist people in the world, he said: "We have to teach them peace and love."

DOJ_NMG_0139565

Police have not yet made an arrest.

Ruling Awaited On Contested Ga. Tech Policies (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

Two women whose 2006 lawsuit against the Georgia Institute of Technology led to the repeal of the school's speech code await a federal judge's opinion on two other unresolved issues in their civil rights case.

Plaintiffs Ruth Malhotra and Orit T. Sklar -- both conservative student leaders at Georgia Tech -- say a ruling is pending by U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester of the Northern District of Georgia on their requests to overturn a school policy that bans funding of religious and political groups with student activity fees and to shut down an administration-run program that challenges biblical doctrine concerning homosexuality.

"The clock is ticking away" on the rest of Judge Forrester's decision, which "could come at any time," said David French, director of the Alliance Defense Fund Center for Academic Freedom, which is representing Miss Malhotra, a graduate student in international affairs from Georgia, and Miss Sklar, a senior in Tech's undergraduate civil-engineering program.

Mr. French describes ADF as a "Christian public-interest legal organization" that promotes religious liberty on college campuses.

The plaintiffs and ADF brought the lawsuit a year ago, claiming that Tech's policies designed to protect students from intolerance actually discriminated against conservative religious students who speak out against issues such as homosexuality, abortion and feminism.

Miss Malhotra accused Georgia Tech of "unlawfully promoting its own [left-wing] agenda while stifling the free expression" of students who hold positions the institution does not share. Both women have been active in College Republicans.

A spokesman for Georgia Tech declined last week to discuss the students' suit, saying the case is in the hands of the Georgia state Attorney General's Office.

"We got a great victory in August, when Judge Forrester repealed Georgia Tech's speech code," Miss Malhotra said.

She said her Christian faith compels her to denounce homosexuality. But Tech had a policy that banned speech about sexual orientation that people may find offensive.

Charging "viewpoint discrimination," Miss Malhotra cited prior incidents in which Tech blocked protests she staged against an affirmation-action rally and a play.

In his ruling last summer, Judge Forrester ordered Tech to delete wording from its speech code that prohibits students from any attempt to "injure, harm" or "malign" a person because of "race, religious belief, color, sexual/affectational orientation, national origin, disability, age or gender."

Miss Malhotra said she is eager to have the court address the school's involvement in a program called "Safe Space" that she says "endorses some religions and denigrates others," depending on their view of homosexuality.

Miss Malhotra points out that she is a Southern Baptist and knows that members of her faith have been condemned in the program because of their objections to homosexuality.

As for the plaintiffs' bid to force Tech to allow private religious and political groups to receive funding from student activities fees, Mr. French and Miss Malhotra said they find it inconsistent that the school recently funded "Islamic Awareness Week."

Disabled Woman Is Able Ally For Parents (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

A Denver mom is legally blind, in a wheelchair and determined to keep her children. As a lawyer, she battles for others in similar spots.

Denver — CARRIE Ann Lucas is confined to a wheelchair. She breathes with the aid of a ventilator. She cannot hear and can see only at close range.

She begins most days about 4 a.m. with newspapers and e-mails. About 5:30, she wakes her three disabled daughters. She and an aide dress the two who use wheelchairs. The girls cannot feed themselves, so Lucas and the aide plug feeding tubes into their bellies. She pours cereal for the one daughter who can eat on her own. She puts the girls on their school buses, the last leaving by 7:10.

Lucas cherishes these mornings, tough as they are, because she knows how hard it is to keep a family together.

She is one of a handful of attorneys in the country whose specialty is representing disabled parents like herself. Her mission: making sure they get the same chance as everyone else to be moms and dads.

DOJ_NMG_0139566

According to the U.S. Census Bureau, 15% of all parents with children in the household have some disability. These parents are far more likely to have the government try to take their children away. Even Lucas lives in fear that social services may seize her children. She knows the sorrow of losing a child — a 7-year-old girl whom she wanted to adopt was taken from her after a difficult court fight.

"I love my kids so much and I love being a parent so much, and I know my [clients] do too," said Lucas, 35, a wisecracking woman who once wrote an essay titled "one of the many joys of crip parenting."

"My clients have fought and fought and fought" to raise their children, she said. Her brassy voice wobbled as her eyes watered behind her tinted glasses. "It's just discrimination."

Lucas works her cases out of a seventh-floor office at the Colorado Cross-Disability Coalition in central Denver. The walls are papered with magazine articles about disabled parents. A bumper sticker in the shape of a shark that reads "Lawyer" is prominently displayed. More disabled people seek help from the coalition than Lucas, who carries about a dozen cases at a time, can handle.

Among those she has worked with was a deaf woman in suburban Denver, whose two toddlers were taken away and put up for adoption after social workers deemed her an unfit mother because she could not hear her children's cries for attention. Lucas could identify with her — she sleeps with a sound-activated pager that vibrates when one of her daughters calls for her.

She advised attorneys for a wheelchair-bound mother in Montana who fended off requirements from social services that someone who could walk be in the house 24 hours a day if her kids were to live there.

Another client, a blind woman in Denver, was refused treatment at a fertility clinic because the staff there did not think she could be a proper mother. She was asked: "How are you going to drive your kid to soccer practice?" The woman lost: A jury ruled that the clinic had no obligation to treat her.

"It's really indicative of how people view parents with disabilities," Lucas said.

STILL, Lucas readily acknowledges that some disabled people should not be parents. She herself admits that she's not a perfect parent. "I'm sure there are people who can do a better job than I can," Lucas said. A wealthier mother could afford to stay home with the children, but that wouldn't be a legitimate reason to take them, she said.

"We shouldn't be social-engineering families," Lucas said, "on the basis of things like poverty and disabilities."

The Lucas family lives in a middle-class neighborhood in south Denver, with a huge honey locust tree in the frontyard and a short ramp to the front door. With ample space to turn wheelchairs, all Lucas had to do to make the house accessible was widen doorways to accommodate wheelchairs and lower kitchen and bathroom sinks and counters.

On a recent Sunday afternoon, Lucas wheeled into the living room, where bookshelves overflowed with law books. Propped on a shelf was a stuffed figure of Timmy, a character in a wheelchair from the cartoon "South Park." Heather, the oldest child, lay on the floor. She suffers from a rare condition that has left her deaf, unable to walk or fully sign, and looking far younger than her 16 years. Lucas pivoted Heather to face a box of toys and games, but the teen seemed uninterested. "She's mad about something," Lucas guessed.

In the middle of the room, transfixed by images on the flat-screen television, were Lucas' two other children, Adrianne, 8, who has cerebral palsy and uses a wheelchair, and Asiza, 11, who has a mild developmental disability. Asiza was bouncing as she watched a singsong segment showing children how to communicate in sign language.

Lucas turned to Adrianne and asked, "Can you sign 'imagination'?" Lucas tickled her daughter, who smiled and turned back to the show.

At the kitchen table, Lucas' younger sister, Courtney Lucas, 32, was making cookies. Courtney was working as Lucas' aide that Sunday. (Lucas gets assistance at home every day from helpers paid by Medicaid, and an assistant drives her to court appearances.) Courtney proudly talked about her sister: "She has, as long as I can remember, been the most stubborn person I've ever met. She's never been one to let anyone tell her she can't do something."

CARRIE Ann Lucas grew up in a small town 57 miles northeast of Denver. She was healthy in her youth, playing basketball and running track. She went to college in Washington state and studied sports medicine. There she began developing unexplained bone tumors and excruciating muscle pain.

After graduation in 1993, Lucas moved to Saipan, where she taught at a beachfront school and scuba-dived regularly. Her illness advanced, and she had to go to Guam and Hawaii for medical treatment. She returned to Colorado after two years, and was eventually diagnosed with a rare degenerative disease called central core disorder that she knew would impose limits on her. She began using a wheelchair and lost her hearing.

She enrolled in seminary, but found that a pastor's life was not for her. "I'm just not that much of a touchy-feely person," she said.

Then, in 2000, Heather entered her world.

DOJ_NMG_0139567

Social workers had taken Heather from Lucas' half-brother in Tennessee and placed her in foster care. When Lucas heard this, she made a snap decision. "I wasn't about to let my niece stay in foster care," she said.

Tennessee was skeptical Lucas would be a good parent. The caseworker made Lucas demonstrate repeatedly that she could care for the girl and required that she prove she could lift Heather's wheelchair into her rented van. She visited her niece several times and filled out form after form for almost a year — while the child was in a Tennessee foster home — before Tennessee let her adopt Heather.

Back in Colorado, Lucas ran into trouble. The straps on Heather's wheelchair clearly made her uncomfortable, so Lucas got rid of the restraints. One of Heather's teachers reported Lucas to social services for modifying the chair. Another reported Lucas for failing to cut her daughter's hair, saying she had unrealistically high expectations for the child's social life by letting her hair grow out.

The complaints, though resolved in her favor, were an indication of the scrutiny that disabled parents face.

But that did not stop her from wanting to adopt Ariana, a 7-year-old in a wheelchair whose biological parents were giving her up. In Lucas' home with its lowered sink, Ariana was able to get herself a glass of water for the first time. "It was a level of mobility and access she'd never experienced," Lucas said.

Then Ariana's aunt and uncle decided they wanted to adopt the child. As biological relatives, they had priority. After 10 months, Lucas lost custody.

"Losing my kid was one of the worst things I've been through," Lucas said. It took three years before she was emotionally ready to adopt her other two children.

At the time, Lucas was working as a legal assistant at the Cross-Disability Coalition, where disabled parents sought help to hold on to their children. Even some of the group's disabled executives and board members found themselves fighting for their rights as parents.

"We realized if that's happening to us, who're really connected, who know our stuff, are professionals with advanced degrees, what's happening to other people?" Lucas said.

SHE enrolled in law school at the University of Denver. Her vision began to fail, and she added Braille to civil procedure and evidence as study subjects. She graduated in 2005, by then legally blind but able to scan documents and lip-read at close range.

The Cross-Disability Coalition has another lawyer who mainly handles accessibility and employment discrimination cases, but was eager to have Lucas help parents full time. The group struggled to find a way to fund her position, finally securing a grant from the law firm Greenberg Traurig.

Lee Dancer, 39, feels lucky that he found Lucas. The airport concession worker has an IQ of 73, and social services took his newborn daughter more than two years ago. After years of court battles, Dancer went online and searched for attorneys who could help. "Even though she's got all these disabilities," Dancer said of Lucas, "she doesn't let anyone walk over her."

It was just in time — the state had moved to terminate his parental rights, which could prevent him from seeing his daughter again.

"This is a very heartbreaking case," Donna Schmalberger, an assistant Arapahoe County attorney, told a judge last month as the trial opened in a suburban courthouse. Dancer and the girl's mother, who has a mild developmental disability, "desperately want to be able to parent [the child] but simply are not able to."

The case is ongoing, and Lucas sees it as another example of the government being too critical of disabled parents. She noted that Dancer had no problems helping to raise a 13-year-old son from another relationship. "Every parent can improve," she said, "but his skills are adequate."

Dancer's daughter is developmentally disabled, and one of Lucas' arguments for disabled parents is that they can serve as strong role models. It's why Lucas has gone out of her way to adopt disabled children.

Back in the Lucas home on that Sunday afternoon, Lucas and her sister split feeding duties. Courtney inserted a syringe of high-protein fluid into the tube that plugs into a shunt in Adrianne's belly while Lucas did the same with Heather. Asiza and Courtney's son Gavin frolicked around the living room.

Talk turned to past family camping trips in wheelchair-accessible cabins and an upcoming vacation to Florida. Then Asiza dashed up to Lucas and said, out of the blue: "Can I be a cowboy?"

Lucas turned in her wheelchair, fixed her glasses at Asiza, and reassured her child with words mothers have used for ages. "You," Lucas said firmly, "can be whatever you want to be."

nicholas.riccardi@latimes.com

NAACP Leader Quits Over Group's Focus (WT/AP)

By Erin Texeira

DOJ_NMG_0139568

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

NEW YORK -- NAACP President Bruce S. Gordon is quitting the civil rights organization, leaving after just 19 months at the helm, citing growing strain with board members over the group's style and operations.

"I believe that any organization that's going to be effective will only be effective if the board and the CEO are aligned, and I don't think we are aligned," Mr. Gordon said yesterday. "This compromises the ability of the board to be as effective as it can be."

Mr. Gordon said he will give up his duties before month's end. He spoke to AP by phone from Los Angeles, where he had attended the NAACP Image Awards.

Dennis C. Hayes, general counsel of the Baltimore-based National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), is expected to serve as interim president, Mr. Gordon said. Mr. Hayes filled the same role after Kweisi Mfume resigned the presidency in 2004 after nine years.

Mr. Gordon said that while the NAACP is an advocacy organization, it needs to be more focused on service and finding solutions.

"I'm used to a CEO running an organization, with the board approving strategy and policy," Mr. Gordon said. "But the NAACP board is very much involved."

He said he made the decision in recent weeks and told the board at its annual meeting in New York in mid-February. NAACP leaders were surprised by his decision and engaged in hours of discussion, he said.

"They expressed disappointment," Mr. Gordon said. "We attempted to see whether there was a way to continue, but that didn't happen."

Asked about his plans after leaving the NAACP, Mr. Gordon said: "I'm going to catch my breath."

"What I've clearly learned in my tenure here is that all is not well in black America, that's for sure," he said. "I believe I have a lot to offer. I've got to find a way to be engaged that optimizes what it is I bring to the table. My intention is not to disengage, but to find a different way."

NAACP spokesman Richard McIntire declined to comment.

Mr. Gordon, 61, was a surprise pick for the NAACP's top post. When he took over on Aug. 1, 2005, he had no track record in traditional civil rights circles. He had spent 35 years in the telecommunications industry and retired in 2003 from his post as president of the Retail Markets Group for Verizon Corp.

Critics said he wouldn't be a good fit for the nearly 98-year-old organization.

However, he smoothed strained relations between the NAACP and the White House, meeting with President Bush three times in less than a year. He used his corporate ties to lend quick assistance to black New Orleans residents after Hurricane Katrina in 2005. And he hired a number of key national employees whose reputations inspired staff members.

Mr. Gordon "brought a level of competence that we hadn't had," Julian Bond, chairman of the board, said last year.

Mr. Bond has acknowledged that, with 64 members, the NAACP's board of directors is large and sometimes unwieldy. But he has defended it, saying it allows a wide range of members' voices to be heard.

Ronald Walters, a University of Maryland political science professor, was surprised at the news but added that he had suspected that Mr. Gordon may not fit in at the NAACP.

"I thought very early on that there might be a cultural conflict," Mr. Walters said. "Somebody who came out of a corporate culture and was used to a set of agenda items and management style in one field might not have been able to make the adjustment totally to another field."

Willis Edwards, a board member from Los Angeles, said: "We tried a certain type of guy, a business guy. We didn't have a civil rights guy. Maybe he had a different philosophy of what a civil rights organization is about."

Rupert Richardson, a board member from Louisiana, said it was clear Mr. Gordon wanted the NAACP to do more social service work, but that was not the decades-old mission of the group.

"I think he saw his job as remaking us to make us more effective, but his job was to do what the board and management wanted," she said. "He was not a good fit for us."

President Is Leaving N.A.A.C.P. (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 4 — The president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People said on Sunday that he was stepping down after only 19 months on the job, signaling divisions within the organization, the nation's oldest and largest civil rights group.

DOJ_NMG_0139569

The president, Bruce S. Gordon, 61, a former Verizon executive who was relatively unknown in the civil rights community when he was tapped to run the N.A.A.C.P., said he resigned because of differences with the board over his role and the direction of the organization.

"In order for any organization to be effective, there has to be a tight alignment between the C.E.O. and the board," Mr. Gordon said. "That alignment in this case does not exist."

In interviews, black leaders close to the organization said the reasons behind his departure stemmed from a dispute over its future role in a nation where the battlefront for civil rights has shifted.

"We want it to be a social justice organization; he wanted it to be more of a social service organization," said Julian Bond, the chairman of the N.A.A.C.P. board. "Our mission is to fight racial discrimination and provide social justice. Social service organizations deal with the effects of racial discrimination. We deal with the beast itself.

"There are many organizations that provide social services," Mr. Bond continued. "We say, 'Good for them.' But we are one of the very few that provide social justice. It is popular to say that we are in a post-civil rights period, but we don't believe that."

Mr. Gordon said he did not believe that the organization should abandon its civil rights mission but rather that it should expand its role to include providing social services. "This is not an either/or," he said. "There needs to be the right balance between advocacy and service."

"It would be insane to give up on advocacy," he continued. "I just think we can do more than that, and should."

The news of Mr. Gordon's resignation came on a pivotal day for civil rights advocates, as hundreds of people, including longtime civil rights activists and politicians, traveled to Selma, Ala., to commemorate the 42nd anniversary of Bloody Sunday, a police attack on civil rights protesters that became a turning point in the struggle for black voting rights.

The news shook civil rights advocates and diverted attention from the celebrations in Selma, where Senators Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton, who are running for president, were among those on hand to pay homage to the leaders of the Bloody Sunday march.

"On a day when you had so many positive signs that there was new life in the civil rights movement, to hear of Bruce's departure is surprising and shocking," said Donna Brazile, a Democratic strategist who is black. "We all pray that the N.A.A.C.P. is able to recover and regroup."

Ms. Brazile added, "To have the nation's oldest and largest civil rights organization without a leader is troublesome."

Mr. Gordon made the decision to resign in recent weeks and told the executive committee at its annual meeting in New York City in mid-February, Mr. Bond said.

Mr. Gordon said he would leave the post before the end of the month. Mr. Bond said Dennis C. Hayes, the organization's general counsel, would serve as interim president until a permanent replacement was selected.

When he was named in June 2005 to succeed Kweisi Mfume, a former member of the House of Representatives, as president of the N.A.A.C.P., Mr. Gordon took over a 500,000-member organization that was beset by a series of problems that raised serious concerns about its long-term viability, including revenue shortfalls and stagnant membership.

The organization also faced ethical questions about Mr. Mfume, who had been accused of giving raises and promotions to women at the N.A.A.C.P. with whom he had had relationships. Mr. Mfume denied the accusations and cited the need to spend more time with his youngest son when he resigned.

In taking the helm at the organization in July 2005, Mr. Gordon said he would apply his 35 years' experience in corporate America to push the N.A.A.C.P. toward a more economic-based approach to civil rights, including prodding pension funds and corporations to hire more black managers.

"We've got to get the right emphasis placed on economic equality," Mr. Gordon said in an interview shortly after being named president. "I happen to think that when you have economic stability and equality that often becomes an enabler for social equality."

From the start, there were questions about whether he was a good fit for the organization. Since its founding in 1909, it had been led by lawyers, ministers and, in Mr. Mfume's case, a politician, with backgrounds in the civil rights struggle.

But Mr. Gordon was a creature of the corporate boardroom. After earning a bachelor's degree from Gettysburg College and a master's from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Mr. Gordon went to work at Bell of Pennsylvania and spent the rest of his corporate career in the telecommunications industry. Before retiring from Verizon in 2003, he was president of the retail markets group.

His supporters said his lack of overt political activism and his corporate ties would make it easier for him to work with Republicans, particularly President Bush, who had a strained relationship with the organization. But others in the civil rights movement questioned whether he would lead the group away from its tradition of political confrontation.

Mr. Gordon's difficulties with the board went beyond philosophical differences. Several people close to the organization said he thought the board was too meddlesome and did not give him the authority he felt he should have to run the organization.

DOJ_NMG_0139570

Members of the board, in turn, resented what they regarded as his belief that they were merely there to rubber-stamp his policies, these people said.

Mr. Gordon made reference to these tensions on Sunday. “I did not take this role to follow orders,” he said, while acknowledging that he needed the board to approve his agenda.

The news of Mr. Gordon’s resignation caught many people in and out of the organization off guard.

Alice Huffman, a national board member from California, said that she was “stunned” by news of Mr. Gordon’s resignation on Sunday and noted that board members had told him before he was hired that the organization’s focus was civil rights, not social services.

“He knew that coming in,” Ms. Huffman said. “I’m really sad he opted to bail out so soon.”

NAACP President Quits, Cites Conflicts (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Bruce S. Gordon, the former telecom executive who was named NAACP president in a surprise choice less than two years ago, has resigned after a long-running disagreement with the group's 64-member board over how to steward the nation's oldest and largest civil rights organization.

Gordon's confirmation yesterday in Los Angeles that he quit the NAACP's leadership caught numerous members by surprise, including Lorraine Miller, president of the District's chapter, and the Rev. Morris L. Shearin, the chapter's vice president, who also is a member of the national board of directors.

Friction between the president and a micromanaging board is a fact of life at the NAACP, members said, but Shearin said "I never knew" things were this bad.

The Rev. Benjamin Hooks of Memphis, who served as NAACP president for more than 15 years, said in a telephone interview that he was "very surprised" by the resignation because "I thought things were moving along smoothly."

Hooks said his relationship with the NAACP board was also strained when he took over the organization in 1977, but within a short time that changed. "After I had been there a year or two, when they trusted me, I ran it lock, stock and barrel," he said. "But they have to believe in you. I had no trouble for a number of years, but I had trouble at first."

When Gordon, 61, was selected president in June 2005, succeeding former congressman Kweisi Mfume (D-Md.), Hooks said he offered some advice: "I cautioned Brother Gordon that he would have some problems. The board wants to do a number of things."

Dennis C. Hayes, who ran the Baltimore-based organization as interim president after Mfume resigned in December 2004, after nine years at the helm, will again assume that role as a search committee looks for a replacement. Gordon is expected to leave the job by month's end.

Gordon was en route to New York yesterday and could not be reached for comment. NAACP Chairman Julian Bond did not respond to messages.

The Associated Press first reported Gordon's resignation. "I believe that any organization that's going to be effective will only be effective if the board and the CEO are aligned, and I don't think we are aligned," Gordon told the news agency.

In choosing Gordon, the NAACP veered from its tradition of selecting ministers, politicians and civil rights figures. Gordon's strong management skills and fundraising ability as a former Verizon Communications Inc. executive factored into why he was selected to run the 500,000-member NAACP. The organization struggled financially in the mid-1990s before Myrlie Evers-Williams, widow of slain Mississippi civil rights leader Medgar Evers, took over as chairman and began to eliminate massive debt.

The group's $27 million operating budget has been criticized as paltry, and the size of its membership has been the same since the 1940s.

During his tenure, Gordon closed the rift between the 98-year-old NAACP and the White House. In July, President Bush addressed the organization's annual convention in Washington. With the speech, Bush avoided becoming the first president since Warren G. Harding not to address the most recognized black American rights group throughout his term.

The NAACP was among the organizations that strongly challenged the results of the Florida balloting in the 2000 presidential election, which was ultimately decided in Bush's favor. In the run-up to his reelection, Bond referred to far-right members of the Republican Party as "the Taliban wing." Mfume routinely criticized the administration's policies.

In 2004, the Internal Revenue Service threatened to revoke the NAACP's nonpartisan, tax-exempt status because Bond "condemned the administration policies of George W. Bush" in a speech, according to documents provided by NAACP lawyers.

Gordon's push to move the NAACP's headquarters to Washington was embraced by numerous board members, including Bond, but was unpopular with executive committee members because it would increase costs, according to a member who is familiar with the talks.

DOJ_NMG_0139571

Education, Education, Education (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

It's an article of faith that the key to success in real estate is location, location, location.

For young black boys looking ahead to a difficult walk in life, the mantra should be education, education, education.

We've watched for decades — watched in horror, actually — as the lives of so many young blacks, men and boys especially, have been consumed by drugs, crime, poverty, ignorance, racial prejudice, misguided social pressures, and so on.

At the same time, millions of blacks have thrived, building strong families and successful careers at rates previously unseen. By far, the most important difference between these two very large groups has been educational attainment.

If anything, the role that education plays in the life prospects of black Americans is even more dramatic than in the population as a whole. It's the closest thing to a magic potion for black people that I can think of. For boys and men, it is very often the antidote to prison or an early grave.

A new report from the Center for Labor Market Studies at Northeastern University in Boston tells us that young adults in general have been struggling in the labor market. Many have been left behind by the modest economic recovery of the past few years, especially those with limited education credentials.

The report, which focuses on black males, emphasizes the importance of education in overcoming this tough employment environment:

"For males in each of the three race-ethnic groups (blacks, Hispanics and whites), employment rates in 2005 increased steadily and strongly with their educational attainment. This was especially true for black males, for whom employment rates rose from a low of 33 percent among high school dropouts to 57 percent among high school graduates, and to a high of 86 percent among four-year college graduates.

"The fact that only one of every three young black male high school dropouts was able to obtain any type of job during an average month in 2005 should be viewed as particularly distressing, since many of these young men will end up being involved in criminal activities during their late teens and early 20s and then bear the severe economic consequences for convictions and incarcerations over the remainder of their working lives."

There is no way, in my opinion, for blacks to focus too much or too obsessively on education. It's the fuel that powers not just the race for success but the quest for a happy life. It represents the flip side of failure.

The differences in rates of employment between white men and black men narrow considerably as black men gain additional schooling. After comparing the percentage of the male population that is employed in each race or ethnic group, the Northeastern study found:

"The gap in [employment to population] ratios between young white and black males narrows from 20 percentage points among high school dropouts, to 16 percentage points among high school graduates, to eight percentage points among those men completing 1-3 years of college, and to only two percentage points for four-year college graduates."

For anyone deluded enough to question whether education is the ticket to a better life for black boys and men, consider that a black male who drops out of high school is 60 times more likely to find himself in prison than one with a bachelor's degree.

Black males who graduate from a four-year college will make, over the course of a lifetime, more than twice the mean earnings of a black high school graduate, which is a difference of more than a million dollars.

According to the study, "Black males with college degrees and strong literacy/math skills also are far more likely to marry and live with their children and pay substantially more in taxes to state and national government than they receive in cash and in-kind benefits."

This is not a close-call issue. It is becoming very hard for anyone to succeed in this society without a college education. To leave school without even a high school education, as so many males — and especially black males — are doing, is extremely self-destructive.

The effort to bolster the educational background of black men has to begin very early. It's extremely difficult to turn a high school dropout into a college graduate. This effort can succeed on a large scale only if there is a cultural change in the black community — a powerful change that acknowledges as the 21st century unfolds that there is no more important life tool for black children than education, education, education.

Governor Gunslinger (NYT)

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

A sleepy breakfast with New York City business and civic leaders last week turned into another lively battleground for Gov. Eliot Spitzer. As he defended his efforts to rein in Medicaid spending, representatives of the hospitals and health workers fumed in the front row, especially when he contradicted their mawkish television ads. When a reporter later mentioned how Mr. Spitzer had come out “guns blazing” at the health establishment, he smiled and warned, “that wasn’t guns going.”

DOJ_NMG_0139572

Using such tactics, the governor has an impressive list of victories so far. In his first two months, he has chalked up reforms of the budget process, state ethics, and a workers’ compensation system widely viewed as the worst in the country. A campaign finance reform agreement is also said to be close. These are problems that have been mired for years in Albany’s political quicksand.

As with all such successes, there are some problems. In the case of workers’ comp, for example, there are still questions about how insurance companies can be persuaded to lower costs of compensation insurance. Mr. Spitzer has also had one notable loss so far, his effort to get an experienced hand to take over as the new state comptroller. The Assembly Democrats chose one of their own.

Mr. Spitzer’s one reform to date that is troubling is last week’s agreement on civil confinement legislation for dealing with sexual predators. It would be a profound shift in how the state treats those who have already served their time, and would mean locking people up for crimes they might commit in the future. The Legislature should hold new hearings to assess the wisdom of this specific proposal. The Spitzer confinement laws should not become this administration’s version of the unfair Rockefeller drug laws.

For all of his early successes, Mr. Spitzer has not yet managed to change the way things get done in Albany. These reforms were largely worked out the old-fashioned way — in the back rooms of the State Capitol. It makes sense that Mr. Spitzer wanted to push through some early victories, but if he plans to succeed over time, he should be doing more to bring the public into the discussion.

Polls show that Mr. Spitzer is enormously popular, and that the public backs his efforts to shake up state government. When the going gets rough, as it surely will, having the strong support of the public may be the most powerful weapon in his arsenal.

ANTITRUST:

The Big Deal Goes Green (TIME)

By Cathy Booth Thomas

Time, March 5, 2007

Al Gore, take another bow. Hollywood is not the only place concerned about global warming. Now Wall Street is worried too. On Feb. 25, the Texas utility TXU Corp. agreed to a proposed $45 billion buyout--the biggest deal ever to take a public company private--with major environmental initiatives attached.

Turns out the barbarians at the gate--Henry Kravis of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and David Bonderman of Texas Pacific Group (TPG)--have a little tree hugger in them. Even before the deal with TXU was sealed, the buyout shops called up environmentalists and, in a 17-hr. meeting at San Francisco's Mandarin Oriental Hotel, agreed to roll back carbon emissions from all TXU power plants to 1990 levels by 2020. Four days later, the company's board accepted the buyout offer, agreeing to drop controversial plans for eight of 11 new coal-fired power plants and to support a federal cap on carbon emissions.

TPG's man in the negotiations, William Reilly, who was Environmental Protection Agency chief under the first President Bush, tells TIME the pre-deal deal with Environmental Defense and the Natural Resources Defense Council was not just a nicety. "Although this might have been doable without an environmental commitment, it would not have been done with us," says Reilly. "If you're going to do an energy investment today, you have to take into account the concerns people have about climate change." The motive is one part caring about the planet and one part turning around the p.r. nightmare that was threatening TXU's future projects.

The deal has implications far beyond Texas. The Lone Star State is No. 7 in the world for greenhouse gases (emitting more CO2 than Britain), and TXU is the state's biggest corporate contributor. Those 11 coal-fired plants would have thrown off 78 tons of carbon dioxide a year--double the savings expected from California's Clean Cars legislation, passed last year. The buyout firms promised not only to halt eight of the Texas plants but also to terminate plans for coal-fired operations in New Jersey, Virginia and Maryland--a recognition that momentum is growing in Washington for legislation to mandate caps on carbon emissions. On Feb. 26, California and four other states agreed to establish within 18 months a market to trade emission credits. TXU, as part of its agreement, plans to join DuPont, Alcoa, General Electric and seven other firms in pushing Congress for a national cap-and-trade program, that would give companies "credits" for carbon emissions to use--or sell at a profit. It's a win for the environment, notes Reilly, and not bad for the bottom line either.

DOJ_NMG_0139573

Intellectual Property Verdicts Exceed $1.3 Billion In 2006 (LAW)

By Sheri Qualters, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, March 5, 2007

Companies -- especially in the tech sector -- are prepared to go to the mat to protect intangible assets

Finisar Corp. employs dozens of Ph.D.-level scientists to create technology for its high-speed data communication components and testing business, but one of the company's most lucrative inventions may be a patent outside of its core business that generated a court victory worth $117.3 million last year.

In June 2006, the Sunnyvale, Calif.-based Finisar won a $78.9 million jury verdict in a patent infringement case against broadcast satellite company The DirecTV Group Inc. of El Segundo, Calif. Although appeals are in the works, fines are racking up, including a judge's $25 million enhancement for willful infringement and $13.4 million for prejudgment interest, post-judgment interest and a compulsory license. Finisar Corp. v. DirecTV Group Inc., No. 05-00264 (E.D. Texas).

Amid a worldwide market expansion for technology products, the Finisar case is one of a burgeoning number of blockbuster verdicts in intellectual property cases. These verdicts exceeded $1.3 billion in 2006, according to VerdictSearch, an affiliate of the National Law Journal, and our own research.

There's a direct correlation between intellectual property jury verdicts and the importance of the technology protected by the patent, said Eric Maschoff, a shareholder at Workman Nydegger of Salt Lake City, who served as Finisar's lead patent prosecution counsel on the case. "Companies are looking more and more towards their intellectual property portfolio as an asset, and they're exploiting that asset," Maschoff said.

Lawyers report that the sheer market size of high-technology products based on the patents in those portfolios can lead to massive infringement verdicts. Companies' rising inclination to bring such cases to trial, and the emergence of high-tech courtrooms that enable the use of animation and other visual aids, also boost the possibility of gargantuan verdicts.

The verdict in Finisar was much lower than Finisar's requested $1.7 billion, an amount representing 3 percent of its gross revenue during the alleged infringement period of about six years, said DirecTV's lead trial lawyer, Victor Savikas, a partner in Jones Day's Los Angeles office.

Savikas also noted the link between a company's sales and a jury verdict in a patent infringement case.

"Successful businesses generate lots of money and become big targets," he said. "DirecTV has millions of subscribers and the damage period is a six-year time span. Creative plaintiffs get a chance to put lots of numbers in front of the jury."

Similarly, annual sales of tens of millions of dollars in the dynamic random access memory (DRAM) computer memory chip market was a factor in Rambus Inc.'s $306.9 million jury verdict against Hynix Semiconductor Inc., said Rambus lawyer Gregory Stone of Los Angeles-based Munger, Tolles & Olson. The Los Altos, Calif.-based Rambus develops and licenses DRAM while Hynix, of Icheon, Korea, makes DRAM chips. Hynix Semiconductor Inc. v. Rambus Inc., No. 00-20905 (N.D. Calif.).

Even after the judgment was reduced on remittitur, Hynix still owes $133.6 million. Another phase of the trial is under way, so it's too soon for an appeal.

"My case reflects a very large industry being involved in a series of problems, from price-fixing to patent infringement," Stone said.

As of December, the U.S. Department of Justice had fined companies in the DRAM industry more than $732 million for price-fixing.

Hynix lawyer Daniel Furniss of the Palo Alto, Calif., office of San Francisco-based Townsend and Townsend and Crew agreed that DRAM's "huge royalty base" played a role in the numbers.

"There's DRAM in every computer in the world," Furniss said. "Every computer has at least five and more likely 15 or 20. You have a large base."

A global market and colossal sales of technology products are part of the story. A willingness to take disputes all the way through a trial is another factor, said Larry Laycock, a Workman Nydegger partner who led Finisar's trial team.

Earlier in his career, Laycock saw many cases like Finisar settle before trial. "The rise in the number of large verdicts is due to the number of cases wending their way to trial," he said.

Finisar, for example, decided several years ago to develop its patent portfolio to protect its technology development, and a court case is the next step in that process, said Maschoff. "The [case against] DirecTV is an example of seeing some advantage come out of Finisar's effort," he said. "They're able to use the court system as a means to do that."

Litigation goes through cycles, said Ernie Brooks, president of Southfield, Mich.-based intellectual property boutique Brooks Kushman. Antitrust verdicts were common in the 1960s and 1970s, but today they're rarely seen. These days, the culture is receptive to intellectual property litigation. "It's a question of cultural or societal set of conditions and what legal barriers are in sync and supported by the culture," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0139574

Brooks' team won a $115 million verdict against Microsoft Corp. of Redmond, Wash., and $18 million against San Rafael, Calif.-based software company Autodesk Inc. for z4 Technologies Inc., an anti-piracy technology company. Microsoft's verdict has since been enhanced by $25 million for willful infringement, and the Commerce Township, Mich.-based z4 reached a confidential settlement with Autodesk. z4 Technologies Inc. v. Microsoft Corp., No. 06-00142 (E.D. Texas).

Although verdicts of more than $10 million are increasingly common, Professor Paul Janicke at the University of Houston Law Center, who has tracked jury verdicts in the Eastern District of Texas, concluded that tales of runaway patent juries are "strictly anecdotal." Janicke has seen plenty of verdicts below $3 million, including some below $1 million.

Janicke is studying intellectual property verdicts at such top jurisdictions as the Central and Northern districts of California and the Eastern District of Texas, along with Delaware, a lower-ranked but popular East Coast venue.

"My feeling is that [verdict averages are] a lot lower than the financial press has been suggesting," Janicke said.

Because ending the infringement is often the chief objective, many companies file patent infringement cases soon after a violation begins. Quick filings produce small accumulated damages, he said. "For ongoing business entities, the injunction is what is mainly moving them," Janicke said.

In Finisar's case, the patent covering data transmission via satellite was invented during the company's startup days, but the company never commercialized the technology. Finisar offered licenses to DirecTV's predecessor company and then DirecTV when it learned of the infringement, Laycock said. Finisar has grown into a public company with $364.3 million in annual sales, and enforcing the patent through the courts was "the right thing to do for its shareholders," Laycock said.

Using plain, everyday language is key, said one of Texas Instruments Inc.'s trial lawyers, Liza Walsh of Roseland, N.J.-based Connell Foley. In a case against GlobespanVirata Inc., the team for Dallas-based Texas Instruments used visuals that depicted digital subscriber line (DSL) signals, which are used for high-speed Internet service, as trucks and cars passing each other in lanes.

The visuals helped Texas Instruments seal a $112 million infringement verdict against GlobespanVirata, which was acquired by Newport Beach, Calif.-based Conexant Systems Inc. before the trial, said Walsh, who served as co-counsel on the case with Heller Ehrman attorneys. GlobespanVirata Inc. v. Texas Instruments, No. 03-02854 (D.N.J.).

"If I had any advice it would be make it simple, through plain speaking, plain language, and reduce the technology to something everyday men and women understand," Walsh said.

N.Y. Federal Judge Rebuffs Recusal Motion Citing Clients Of Husband's Firm (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, March 5, 2007

A federal judge has rejected a request that she recuse herself from a high-profile litigation involving the music industry on the ground that her attorney husband and his firm have represented some of the defendants in other matters.

Lead attorneys for plaintiffs in the case expressed concern that because Southern District of New York Judge Loretta A. Preska's husband, Thomas J. Kavaler, and his firm, Cahill Gordon & Reindel, represented several of the music company defendants in other litigation, she might be inclined to tilt toward the defendants.

But Preska rejected the argument in In re Digital Music Antitrust Litigation, 06 MDL 1780, finding that the plaintiffs' motion for recusal was not only time-barred, but was wrong on its merits.

"Courts have uniformly rejected the argument that an appearance of impropriety exists in the following situation: (i) a judge's spouse is a partner in a law firm that represents a litigant in other matters before the judge; and (ii) the spouse did not perform any work at the law firm for the litigant or worked for the litigant on unrelated matters," she said.

Numerous lawsuits have been filed by online music downloaders who claim that the music divisions of Sony, Bertelsmann, Universal, Time Warner and EMI Music North America "conspired artificially to fix or maintain prices" of digital music recordings offered for sale over the Internet in violation of federal and state antitrust laws.

Two of those cases were originally assigned to Preska. She presided over Seley v. Universal Music Group, 06 Civ. 1887, after the case was filed on March 9, 2006, and in Devine v. Universal Music Group, 06 Civ. 4211.

On June 12, 2006, Preska issued a memo in the Devine case informing the parties that her husband and his firm "from time to time" represent Sony, Warner and Universal.

On July 3, 2006, Christopher Lovell, a partner at Lovell Stewart Halebian who represents a plaintiff in the case, sent a letter to the judge asserting a possible conflict. But Lovell did not formally request that the judge recuse herself.

Preska held a conference to discuss the issue on July 26, 2006, and concluded that, because neither her husband nor Cahill Gordon was representing any of the defendants pending before her, "no further action on this issue was warranted." Lovell said his clients agreed, and he did not pursue the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0139575

Meanwhile, in March 2006, the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation (JPML) consolidated the more than 30 related lawsuits and transferred them to Preska for pretrial motions. She said it "does not appear" that the recusal issue was raised with, or considered by, the JPML.

The parties participated in a pretrial conference in November 2006, but her purported potential conflict was not raised. Rather, attorneys for the plaintiffs were seeking discovery of information already provided by the music companies to law enforcement agencies in connection with those agencies' investigations relating to the distribution of digital music. Preska ultimately denied the request.

She said the recusal issue was raised for the first time in the consolidated action one month after the initial conference. On Dec. 20, 2006, plaintiffs attorneys John J. Stoia Jr., a partner at Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, and Lovell, in their capacity as co-lead counsel for the plaintiffs, sent Preska a letter requesting additional information concerning "the scope and substance of Mr. Kaveler's and Cahill Gordon's former and/or current representation of [Sony, Warner and Universal]."

Because the judge's husband and his firm had represented some of the music companies in what Stoia and Lovell said was prior similar litigation, they suggested that Preska was more likely to rule in the music companies' favor.

'LIKELIHOOD OF OVERLAP'

Stoia and Lovell stated that "there is a significant likelihood of overlap and interplay between th[e] [Consolidated Action] and the [action] where Kavaler and Cahill Gordon represented Sony Music Entertainment, and ... a companion state action where Cahill Gordon represented Sony Music Entertainment."

They also stated that "[b]ased upon press reports ... [t]he New York Attorney General and the Department of Justice Antitrust Division are investigating whether [D]efendants have restrained trade in the market for digital downloads," and said that they "do not know whether Mr. Kavaler and/or Cahill Gordon have been consulted or are representing one or more of the [d]efendants in these ... investigations."

The music companies responded, arguing that the issue of recusal was untimely, and in any event, meritless. On Jan. 18, 2007, they offered an affidavit by Kavaler, Preska's husband, stating that, during 2006 Cahill Gordon logged fewer than 30 hours out of a total of 200 hours chargeable to Sony BMG on the supposedly overlapping cases.

"Moreover, my husband averred that he 'was not the partner with day to day involvement in the matters,'" Preska said. "My husband further averred that billable hours chargeable to Sony BMG Music Entertainment represented fewer than approximately .05 percent of Cahill Gordon's total hours billed in 2006."

Stoia and Lovell wanted to know if Cahill Gordon was involved in representing any of the major music companies in any "governmental investigations relating to digital music." In his affidavit, Kavaler said it did not.

The co-lead plaintiffs attorneys then sent a Jan. 31, 2007, letter asking for additional information from Kavaler.

He submitted a supplemental affidavit on Feb. 8, 2007, in which he said the partner at Cahill Gordon with "day to day" involvement with certain possible overlapping cases and issues was Dean Ringel. Kavaler therefore said he would not be the "appropriate person" from the firm to testify as to these issues.

Stoia and Lovell did not formally make a motion for recusal, but Preska construed the two letters sent by them as one.

FOUR FACTORS

In reviewing the timeliness of the recusal motion, the judge cited to Apple v. Jewish Hosp. & Med. Ctr., 829 F.2d 326, 333 (2d Cir. 1987), in which the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals set out four factors to consider when deciding whether a recusal motion is timely: (i) "the movant has participated in a substantial manner in trial or pretrial proceedings"; (ii) "granting the motion would represent a waste of judicial resources"; (iii) "the motion was made after the entry of judgment"; and (iv) "the movant can demonstrate good cause for delay."

Preska said the third factor was not relevant in this case, but the remaining factors all weigh in favor of finding the motion for recusal untimely. She said both Lovell and Stoia participated in a substantial manner, and held that it would be "inefficient and contrary to the purpose of the rules of multidistrict litigation" for her to recuse herself.

"Granting the motion for recusal would clearly represent a waste of judicial resources of this Court and the JPML," she said.

Noting that the recusal issue was not raised until after she ruled against the plaintiffs on the discovery requested at the initial conference, the judge said she could not exclude the possibility that the plaintiffs were "dissatisfied with this decision and now seek a second bite at the apple before a different judge."

In reviewing the merits of the request, Preska said her husband has worked for some of these defendants in prior, assertedly related litigation.

"Nevertheless, courts which have addressed this situation have concluded that a spouse's or child's work on ongoing, related litigation does not rise to the level of an appearance of impropriety," she said, citing to Microsoft Corp. v. United States, 530 U.S. 1301, 121 S.Ct. 25, 26 (2000).

DOJ_NMG_0139576

Preska finally said she had no financial interest in outcome of the case because her husband's firm was not appearing in the matter.

Kavaler declined to comment on his wife's decision, as did Kenneth R. Logan, a partner at Simpson Thacher & Bartlett who represents defendant Warner Music Group.

Stoia did not return calls for comment, but Lovell called the situation unpleasant and "awkward."

He said he signed the letters to Preska in the consolidated case not on behalf of his clients, but as co-lead counsel for the class.

Judge Dismisses Lucent Patent Suit Against Microsoft (WSJ)

By Roger Cheng And Carmen Fleetwood

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

A federal judge ruled that Microsoft Corp. did not violate an Alcatel-Lucent patent for speech recognition.

This is the second of several patent disputes between the two companies. Last week, a jury awarded1 Alcatel-Lucent $1.5 billion from Microsoft in regards to violating two patents involving MP3 technology.

U.S. District Court Judge Rudi Brewster in San Diego dismissed all claims late Thursday regarding the speech-recognition dispute so that the jury trial set to start later this month will not happen. But Alcatel-Lucent intends to continue pursuing its options in the case.

"We plan to appeal this decision and are comfortable with our chances of success as the case makes its way through the legal system," said Alcatel-Lucent spokeswoman Joan Campion.

"This ruling reaffirms our confidence that once there's judicial review of these complex patent cases, these Alcatel-Lucent claims ultimately won't stand up," said Tom Burt, Microsoft corporate vice president and deputy general counsel.

Open Call From The Patent Office (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

The government is about to start opening up the process of reviewing patents to the modern font of wisdom: the Internet.

The Patent and Trademark Office is starting a pilot project that will not only post patent applications on the Web and invite comments but also use a community rating system designed to push the most respected comments to the top of the file, for serious consideration by the agency's examiners. A first for the federal government, the system resembles the one used by Wikipedia, the popular user-created online encyclopedia.

"For the first time in history, it allows the patent-office examiners to open up their cubicles and get access to a whole world of technical experts," said David J. Kappos, vice president and assistant general counsel at IBM.

It's quite a switch. For generations, the agency responsible for awarding patents, one of the cornerstones of innovation, has kept its distance from the very technological advances it has made possible. The project, scheduled to begin in the spring, evolved out of a meeting between IBM, the top recipient of U.S. patents for 14 years in a row, and New York Law School Professor Beth Noveck. Noveck called the initiative "revolutionary" and said it will bring about "the first major change to our patent examination system since the 19th century."

Most federal agencies invite interested parties to weigh in on proceedings, and even the patent office allows some public comment, but never to the degree now suggested .

Until now, patent examiners rarely sought outside opinions, instead relying on scientific writings and archived records of previous patents. For security reasons -- in particular, out of concern that examiners could inadvertently reveal proprietary information if their online searches were tracked -- patent officials have at times even been barred from using the Internet for research.

But their mission has grown increasingly unwieldy. Last year, the agency's 4,000 examiners, headquartered in Alexandria, completed a record 332,000 applications. The tremendous workload has often left examiners with little time to conduct thorough reviews, according to sympathetic critics.

Under the pilot project, some companies submitting patent applications will agree to have them reviewed via the Internet. The list of volunteers already contains some of the most prominent names in computing, including Microsoft, Intel, Hewlett-Packard and Oracle, as well as IBM, though other applicants are welcome.

Brigid Quinn, a spokeswoman for the patent office, said the program will begin with about 250 applications from the realm of software design, where it is especially difficult for examiners to find related documentation. Unlike specialists in many other fields, software designers often forgo publishing their innovations in technical journals and elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0139577

Anyone who believes he knows of information relating to these proposed patents will be able to post this online and solicit comments from others. But this will suddenly make available reams of information, which could be from suspect sources, and so the program includes a "reputation system" for ranking the material and evaluating the expertise of those submitting it.

With so much money riding on patent decisions -- for instance, a federal jury ordered Microsoft last month to pay $1.52 billion for infringing two digital-music patents -- the program's designers acknowledge that the incentive to manipulate the system is immense.

"I'm sure there will be a degree of gaming. There always is," Kappos said.

Maintaining a reliable Web-based reputation has become an increasingly pressing concern for Web companies as they seek to reassure users that they can trust the strangers they do business with online. So the designers of the new patent-review system consulted some of the Internet's leading experts on reputation, Noveck recounted. These included specialists from eBay and Rob Malda, aka CmdrTaco, the founder of the popular technology Web site Slashdot.org.

EBay, for example, established its position as the Web's premier auctioneer after pioneering a public feedback system that has buyers and sellers rate one another based on customer service, the quality of the goods, and timeliness of delivery and payments. Amazon.com, the Web's leading bookseller, provides reviews of its offerings, then allows readers to rank its reviewers based on the usefulness of their evaluation.

The new patent system will try to help separate experts from posers by offering extensive details about the people sending information to the site. To help others evaluate the quality of this information, called prior art, each posting will include several measures gauging the quality of his other contributions to the site. Patent examiners, for instance, will award "gold stars" to people who previously submitted the most useful information for judging earlier applications, Noveck said.

Ultimately, those registered to participate in this online forum will vote on all the nominated information, and the top 10 items will be passed on to the examiner, who will serve as the final arbiter on whether to award a patent.

Noveck said the online program would not only produce better information for examiners to consider but also make the patent process more democratic. "The idea is to make something as important as decision-making about innovation more transparent to the public and more accountable to the public," she said.

During discussions about the patent review project, its developers initially considered limiting or weighting the votes to reflect the expertise of the participants. For the time being, they have instead decided to go with one person, one vote.

But Noveck and others involved in creating the online review system said it was likely to evolve. To assure that the outcome can be trusted, some of those involved in designing the program say some kind of weighted voting system may eventually be required.

"If voting is necessary, you'll have to have some rules about who gets to vote," said Paul Resnick, a professor of information at the University of Michigan.

INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Tribe Slave Descendants Face Uncertainty (HC/AP)

By Sean Murphy Associated Press Writer, The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, March 5, 2007

OKLAHOMA CITY — The Cherokee Nation vote this weekend to revoke the citizenship of the descendants of people the Cherokee once owned as slaves was a blow to people who have relied on tribal benefits.

Charlene White, a descendant of freed Cherokee slaves who were adopted into the tribe in 1866 under a treaty with the U.S. government, wondered Sunday where she would now go for the glaucoma treatment she has received at a tribal hospital in Stilwell.

"I've got to go back to the doctor, but I don't know if I can go back to the clinic or if they're going to oust me right now," said White, 56, a disabled Tahlequah resident who lives on a fixed income.

In Saturday's special election, more than 76 percent of voters decided to amend the Cherokee Nation's constitution to remove the estimated 2,800 freedmen descendants from the tribal rolls, according to results posted Sunday on the tribe's Web site.

Marilyn Vann, president of the Descendants of Freedmen of the Five Civilized Tribes, said the election results undoubtedly will be challenged.

"We will pursue the legal remedies that are available to us to stop people from not only losing their voting rights, but to receiving medical care and other services to which they are entitled under law," Vann said Sunday.

"This is a fight for justice to stop these crimes against humanity."

DOJ_NMG_0139578

Cherokee Nation spokesman Mike Miller said Sunday that election results will not be finalized until after a protest period that extends through March 12. Services currently being received by freedmen descendants will not immediately be suspended, he said.

"There isn't going to be some sort of sudden stop of a service that's ongoing," Miller said. "There will be some sort of transition period so that people understand what's going on."

In a statement late Saturday, Cherokee Nation Principal Chief Chad Smith said he was pleased with the turnout and election result.

"Their voice is clear as to who should be citizens of the Cherokee Nation," Smith said. "No one else has the right to make that determination. It was a right of self-government, affirmed in 23 treaties with Great Britain and the United States and paid dearly with 4,000 lives on the Trail of Tears."

The petition drive for the ballot measure followed a March 2006 ruling by the Cherokee Nation Supreme Court that said an 1866 treaty assured freedmen descendants of tribal citizenship.

A similar situation occurred in 2000 when the Seminole Nation voted to cast freedmen descendants out of its tribe, said attorney Jon Velie of Norman, an expert on Indian law who has represented freedmen descendants in previous cases.

"The United States, when posed the same situation with the Seminoles, would not recognize the election and they ultimately cut off most federal programs to the Seminoles," Velie said. "They also determined the Seminoles, without this relationship with the government, were not authorized to conduct gaming."

Ultimately, the Seminole freedmen were allowed back into the tribe, Velie said.

Velie said Saturday's vote already has hurt the tribe's public perception.

"It's throwback, old-school racist rhetoric," Velie said.

"And it's really heartbreaking, because the Cherokees are good people and have a very diverse citizenship," he said.

Miller, the tribal spokesman, defended the Cherokees against charges of racism, saying that Saturday's vote showed the tribe was open to allowing its citizens vote on whether non-Indians be allowed membership.

"I think it's actually the opposite. To say that the Cherokee Nation is intolerant or racist ignores the fact that we have an open dialogue and have the discussion, he said.

___

On the Net:

Cherokee Nation: http://www.cherokee.org/

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Sending Investigators To Guatemala Ahead Of Bush Visit (MCT)

By Nancy San Martin, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, March 5, 2007

GUATEMALA CITY - Three murdered Salvadoran legislators. Four cops, suspected in the killings, themselves shot to death in a maximum security prison. Broken government agencies. And more questions than answers.

That's what FBI investigators will face when they arrive this week to help sort out the stunning murders, which have highlighted the wave of drug-fueled corruption and crime lashing a country President Bush will visit in seven days.

"The number of murders in this country is offensive and, unfortunately, authorities have done little to stop the blood bath," said the government's own Human Rights Ombudsman Sergio Morales.

Authorities and activists say the problems date back to a decade-old peace treaty that ended a bloody civil war but did little to cleanse the ranks of a historically violent police and other security forces.

"We had 30 years of war, with more than 100,000 dead, and no tribunals were ever carried out," said Interior Minister Carlos Vielmann. "Then we had 10 years of the formation of a new police force, but again, there was no serious action to resolve internal problems."

Luis Ramirez, an analyst with the watchdog Guatemalan Institute of Comparative Studies on Penal Science, said that while the 1996 peace accord called for dismantling the old police force, a new one was never really created.

"They changed uniforms but everything stayed the same," Ramirez said. "Historical problems have now come to surface. These murders are like an x-ray: They show the profound problems that exist."

Add the corruption and crime generated by drug smuggling - U.S. estimates show that 75 percent of the Colombian cocaine hitting American streets passes through here - and security agencies can be easily overwhelmed.

DOJ_NMG_0139579

"It's not that organized crime has penetrated the police force or the Interior Ministry," said Ramirez. "Organized crime is directing the police, the ministry and the military."

The murder rate in this country of 12.7 million rose each year since 1999 and now stands at 45 per 100,000 residents, compared to Florida's five per 100,000 in 2005. Many say that if the recent victims had not been well-known Salvadorans, they would have received little attention.

The gruesome drama began Feb. 19, when the Salvadorans and their driver were found shot and burned to death 20 miles southeast of the capital. They served on the Central American Parliament, which meets in Guatemala City, and were members of El Salvador's ruling ARENA party.

Initially, speculation that a settling of political scores from Central America's old civil wars was sparked by the fact that one of the victims, Eduardo D'Aubuisson, was the son of the late Roberto D'Aubuisson, a founder of ARENA and accused death squad leader in the 1980s.

Three days later, four police officers - including the head of the Guatemalan National Police organized crime unit - were arrested in the killings and jailed in the El Boqueron maximum security facility 40 miles east of the capital.

Three more days later, the cops were shot dead in their cells - killed by either fellow inmates or what witnesses described as a heavily armed group of men wearing prison guard uniforms who drove to the prison in a dark vehicle.

Authorities have arrested 24 prison officials, including its director, lending credence to the allegation that the cops' murders were carried out with inside help. Guatemala's head of criminal investigations was removed from his post and the country's second-highest ranking police official resigned.

Last week, another cop suspected in the Salvadorans' killings turned himself in. Authorities say they are still looking for another policeman and a seventh unidentified person in the first killings.

And on Friday, authorities said they believe other inmates may have killed the four cops. Four guns were found hidden inside a DVD player, a television and speakers.

Evidence clearly points to the four dead cops' involvement in the Salvadorans' murders - their car was reportedly equipped with a Global Positioning System that puts them at the place and time of the killings.

But the rest remains unknown. Why were the Salvadorans killed? Was one or more of them involved in a drug deal gone bad? Was it a simple case of highway robbery? And who killed the jailed policemen?

The FBI team arriving this week will provide technical and scientific support to try to find some answers.

Interior Minister Vielmann said all lines of investigation remain open - from a possible case of mistaken identity "to something much more profound," including ties to organized crime.

"All we've resolved is the part of the operation that ends with the assassinations," Vielmann told The Miami Herald.

Alvaro Matus, the public prosecutor in charge of the Salvadorans' case, told the Herald that while nailing corrupt officers will be difficult "because they know how to operate and try not to leave any evidence behind, we are not going to conceal anything or anyone - not civilians, not police, not military."

But even if that case is solved, the underlying problem persists. Among other incidents in the past six months:

Eight men were shot to death in a restaurant by gunmen who arrived in three cars and opened fire with automatic rifles and pistols.

More than 3,000 police and soldiers stormed the Pavon penitentiary east of the capital, sparking a fierce battle with grenades and automatic rifles that killed seven inmates.

Two former senior anti-narcotics agency officers pleaded guilty in federal court in Washington. They were busted in 2005 after accepting $25,000 from undercover U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents to protect cocaine shipments.

Guatemalan President Oscar Berger is pressing Congress to create an independent commission to investigate corruption and present its findings for prosecution. And there's a push to reverse laws that require police fired for suspicion of corruption be reinstated unless there's substantial evidence. More than 1,000 police officers have been dismissed on corruption charges in the past 2 1/2 years and about 250 are currently in jail.

But both measures are sure to face resistance from opposition political parties, and activists fear that politics will get in the way of much-needed reforms.

"These cases have presented two doors: one of danger and one of opportunity," said Iduvina Hernandez, director of the independent Association for the Study and Promotion of Security in a Democracy.

"We want to open the door of opportunity to renovate the security system and strengthen the democratic framework," she said. "We want a Guatemala in peace, with social justice."

In Guatemala, Officers' Killings Echo Dirty War (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0139580

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

GUATEMALA CITY, March 3 — After three Salvadoran congressmen were waylaid and killed on a road in Guatemala last month, it did not take the authorities long to find the culprits: they were Guatemalan police officers, and their unmarked police car had a tracking device that proved they were at the scene.

They quickly confessed, saying they thought their victims were drug dealers, and were sent to a maximum-security prison.

It is a measure of the weakness of the crime-plagued Guatemalan state that what happened just four days later remains something of a mystery — aside from the indisputable fact that the four who confessed ended up dead.

The police and the interior minister say that rioting gang members inside the prison shot and stabbed them. But other inmates and their visitors that day say a group of heavily armed men in military garb and ski masks made their way through seven locked doors and executed them, with no interference from guards, removing any possibility that they could identify co-conspirators.

The two sets of brazen killings set off a vicious diplomatic conflict between Guatemala and El Salvador — heightened by news reports suggesting that the congressmen were indeed drug dealers — and ignited a political scandal here. It shed light on how corrupt the National Police has become, and raised questions about links between drug dealers and high-level police officials, as well as whether the government can contain drug trafficking without international help.

One assistant police chief has been forced to resign and another has been suspended. On Thursday, the interior minister and top police officials appeared before Congress, where they were grilled not only on whether death squads exist inside the police force, but on how the state failed to protect the four officers.

Perhaps more important, the whole episode has exposed to the world the rampant police corruption, lawlessness and drug trafficking that plagues much of Central America, and Guatemala in particular.

This small country of 12.3 million people has more than 5,000 homicides a year, many of them vigilante killings or gangland murders, human rights advocates say. Arrests are made in only 2 percent of the cases.

Drug trafficking fuels the violence, and United States officials say Guatemala's record on taking down drug lords leaves much to be desired. At least two-thirds of the cocaine used in American cities — much of it made from coca cultivated in Colombia and Bolivia — passes through Guatemala, American officials report, and several former military officers have been accused of trafficking.

President Óscar Berger and his minister of interior say they are attacking the problem and point out it was Guatemalan police officers who caught the rogue officers in the first place. Mr. Berger has also backed a proposal to create an international commission to investigate human rights abuses by the police.

Since 1993, the United States has twice helped set up special antinarcotics forces here, only to watch their commanders become embroiled in the drug trade themselves. President Bush is scheduled to visit next week, and American diplomats say the lack of public security here is near the top of his agenda.

Human rights advocates and opposition politicians have taken the two sets of killings as proof that criminal gangs have corrupted Guatemala's national police force and that groups of officers are operating like drug syndicates, robbing and killing competing dealers.

The squads of rogue officers, human rights experts and others say, are in a sense an outgrowth of Guatemala's long internal conflict. Some former military officers who came of age during the bloody counterinsurgency operations of the 1980's are members of the new rogue squads, according to human rights experts and opposition politicians. They say other members are younger, but have adopted the old practices of assassination and terrorism to combat crime and, sometimes, to line their own pockets.

"The truth, I think, is the problem comes from the end of the armed conflict, when the state tried to protect itself against rebels," said the editor of La Hora newspaper, Óscar Clemente Marroquín. "When the war stopped, the apparatus kept operating the same way but now it doesn't protect the military. Now it protects organized crime."

A high-ranking United Nations official here, who requested anonymity to protect his diplomatic neutrality, said he believed the Interior Ministry and the National Police created death squads over the last three years, trying to combat the wave of violent crime by gangs like the notorious Mara Salvatrucha, a group started in Los Angeles by the children of Central American civil-war refugees of the 1980s.

The officers in those squads belong to evangelical churches, the official said, and see the extrajudicial killings of gang members, known here as "social cleansing," as holy work. But they have also begun to commit crimes for their own profit. "It gets out of their hands," the official said. "They create a Frankenstein."

Otto Pérez Molina, the leader of the Patriotic Party and a candidate for president, has also charged there are at least two separate groups of rogue officers operating within the National Police, each controlled by a deputy commissioner.

DOJ_NMG_0139581

Erwin Sperisen, the national police chief, denies that the force harbors death squads, though he acknowledges that his department is riddled with corrupt officers who sometimes commit crimes. Because of strong labor laws and poor vetting procedures, he said, he has not been able to purge the 19,000-member force of officers who came from the two main police forces that controlled the country during the civil war and were schooled in torture and assassination.

"One has to break with this kind of schooling," he said.

At first, the killings of the Salvadoran congressmen appeared to be politically motivated. One of the three was Eduardo José D'Aubuisson, son of Roberto D'Aubuisson, the late Salvadoran right-wing leader and founder of the current governing party. But now many here say Eduardo and the others, along with their driver, were the latest victims of rogue police officers run amok. The three were there to attend a meeting of the Central American Parliament, a regional body.

About 10:30 a.m. on Feb. 19, Luis Arturo Herrera, a decorated officer who was head of the Guatemalan National Police organized crime unit, and three other officers used their unmarked sedan to cut off the congressmen's luxury four-wheel-drive car in front of a shopping center on the outskirts of Guatemala City, prosecutors say.

They forced the driver and Mr. D'Aubuisson into their sedan, leaving the other two congressmen in their car, and then drove both vehicles back down the highway toward El Salvador, where a traffic camera filmed them, according to the prosecutor in charge of the inquiry, Álvaro Matus.

A short time later, witnesses told prosecutors, they also stopped at a gasoline station, where they were joined by at least two other police officers and two people in civilian clothes.

The two cars then continued to an empty stretch of road near the town of Santa Elena Barilla, where according to statements by the four officers, they searched the car and beat the victims, Chief Sperisen said. Later in the afternoon, around 4:30, they went down a dirt road to a farm, where called Las Conchas. There they executed the four men with gunshots, then burned the car and the bodies. Some people living nearby found the remains about two hours later, prosecutors said.

The officers who confessed said they had been told that the congressmen were Colombian drug dealers carrying cash, according to Chief Sperisen. The whole episode appeared to be a botched robbery based on misinformation, he said.

El Salvador's chief of national police, Rodrigo Ávila, agreed that the officers probably intended to rob the group and panicked when they learned who their victims were. "When they realized they were really congressmen is when they made the decision to kill them," he said.

Mr. Ávila said his government had not ruled out the possibility the police officers were tricked. "They could have been manipulated by someone to hit the congressmen, but we don't know," he said.

The Salvadoran president, Elías Antonio Saca, and top security officials have accused Guatemalan authorities of allowing the four officers who confessed to be killed as part of a cover-up. The Salvadorans have also bristled at theories put forward by Guatemalan investigators that the congressmen might have been carrying drugs or illicit cash.

Mr. Matus, the prosecutor, says he still has not determined why the three congressmen were killed.

Nor have prosecutors made much progress getting to the bottom of what happened at El Boquerón prison on Feb. 25.

The warden at El Boquerón and more than 20 guards have been arrested but have shed no light on the matter. The police have discovered pistols hidden in the inmates' quarters that may have been used in the killings, though some of the shells recovered inside the prison came from assault rifles.

For their part, the inmates maintain they rioted only after the killings, fearing they would become scapegoats. They took hostages and forced the government to send in a television news crew and the country's human rights ombudsman to hear their version of events.

Family members of the inmates, meanwhile, told local reporters they were ordered out of the prison before visiting hours were over, which they took as a sign the guards knew something was about to happen.

The country's top prosecutor, Juan Luis Florido, has promised to get to the bottom of both crimes, even if they reach to the upper echelons of the police or government.

But human rights advocates are skeptical. The attorney general's office does not have the resources, the independence or the strength to investigate the National Police, they say.

"I wouldn't go so far as to call it a failed state, but it's very dysfunctional," said Dan Wilkinson of Human Rights Watch. "The main thing is the drugs and corruption. There is a huge amount of money there. And you have extremely weak institutions that are no match for these organized crime groups."

Reddit Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, March 5, 2007

A Nelson Mandela for an Earlier Time

DOJ_NMG_0139582

Most White House reporters stick to what they know when it comes time to pen a book. But Cox Newspapers correspondent Bob Deans thought bigger. "I found it fascinating to write about the first great leader we know of in English America—Chief Powhatan. "Yes, the father of Pocahontas and the first native big shot the British encountered. In The River Where America Began, Deans charts civilization along Virginia's James and finds the chief to be more than the despot others have called him. If Powhatan had been born today, Deans thinks he knows whom the chief would be compared to: "It's not hard to imagine Powhatan as a kind of 17th-century Nelson Mandela, standing boldly for the cause of his people."

Juicing the GOP Message

Florida's Rep.Adam Putnam, the No. 3 House Republican, isn't shy about his Sunshine State pride. After his alma mater University of Florida Gators won the national football championship, he met with reporters in the Capitol sitting next to an alligator head. Since then, he's talked politics with reporters over jugs of Florida's Natural orange juice, produced from a farming co-op begun in 1933 that his family is a part of. "We try to sweeten the reporters' dispositions," he jokes, and he thinks it's working. "We've been having a couple of good-message weeks."

What's With Watts and Richardson?

It could have been the environment, the Clinton School of Public Service in Little Rock, or the brash frankness of an ex-politician. But former Rep. J. C. Watts, once the House GOP's main communicator and a sometimes entry on Republican vice presidential lists, fessed up at the University of Arkansas last month that he likes Democratic New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson in the 2008 presidential race. "Personally, I'm a Bill Richardson fan," he admits. "I think he has the Bill Clinton touch with people."

A G-Man's Version of Oprah's List

He's no Oprah. But FBI Director and avid reader Robert Mueller has started a new bureau reading list to help his G-men broaden their horizons. The list has more than 60 books about the FBI's history, terrorism, intelligence, and professional development. "He just thought," says an insider, "that we must have more formalized intellectual stimulation." Some gems: Public Enemies, by Bryan Burrough, about the birth of the FBI; The Looming Tower, Lawrence Wright's book about al Qaeda's road to 9/11; China, Inc. by Ted Fishman; and Louis Gerstner's Who Says Elephants Can't Dance? about IBM's historic turnaround. We also hear that Mueller's a big fan of former GE bigwig Jack Welch. So naturally, Welch's Winning also gets top billing.

Brown-on-black Violence Plagues South State (SACBEE)

By Aurelio Rojas, Bee Capitol Bureau

The Sacramento Bee, March 5, 2007

Slaying of girl, 14, put a face on city's growing problem.

LOS ANGELES -- It took political officials nearly a month to respond to the slaying of Cheryl Green. Since then, the 14-year-old African American girl has become the face of brown-on-black violence in this city.

The FBI has joined the Los Angeles Police Department in cracking down on gangs. The Police Department, breaking with tradition, has publicly named the city's worst 11 gangs.

And a city-sponsored report has called for an anti-gang Marshall Plan, a reference to the post-World War II strategy of making massive investments to win the peace in former enemy territory.

The racially motivated shooting of the eighth-grader, which occurred Dec. 15 in broad daylight as she chatted with friends, was one of 269 gang-related murders citywide in 2006.

Outside the African American community, widespread outrage that a schoolgirl could be killed because of her color was muffled by the cacophony of the holiday season.

"She was my baby," Charlene Lovett said recently of the youngest of her four children. "She wasn't raised to see colors. I couldn't understand how everyone wouldn't be horrified by this."

African American activists came to her aid, holding rallies to call attention to similar attacks in South Los Angeles neighborhoods where Latinos have supplanted African Americans as the dominant group.

Hate crimes rose 34 percent in 2005 in Los Angeles, the latest year for which statistics are available, and African Americans were the main target. Overall crime is down in the city for the fifth straight year, but gang crime rose 14 percent in 2006.

On Jan. 18, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa held a news conference near where the teenager was killed to announce a plan to "dismantle" the Latino gang blamed for the girl's slaying. He was joined by Police Chief William Bratton and FBI Director Robert Mueller.

By then, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger had delivered his second inaugural address, which he began by boasting that "people from all over the world live in harmony" in California.

In an interview with The Bee two weeks later, the governor conceded "we have a big gang problem." But he said the girl's death did not represent a larger problem in California.

DOJ_NMG_0139583

"No matter which country you go to, you always have some instances like that," he said. "You know, the Russian mafia or some kind of gang violence in some country.

"Or if it is soccer fans going crazy and trying to kill each other on the soccer field. ... You know, there's crazy things all over the world."

Members of the California Legislative Black Caucus responded to Schwarzenegger's comments with dismay.

The governor, said state Sen. Mark Ridley-Thomas, needs "to raise his IQ about the problem."

"This is an urgent matter and it needs to be addressed," the Los Angeles Democrat said, adding that the Senate Public Safety Committee on which he sits would take up the issue.

Assemblywoman Karen Bass, D-Los Angeles, said that during town hall meetings she held in black communities around the state she collected "anecdotal" evidence that brown-on-black crime is on the rise elsewhere.

"We know that every time there is a study about hate crime, that African Americans are the No. 1 figure," she said when the caucus recently released its "State of California" report. "I think it's absolutely important that we address that."

Assembly Speaker Fabian Núñez, D-Los Angeles, told the caucus that racial violence is escalating in other cities as well and will require a unified response.

"We've got to put our heads together and work hard to eliminate what we're seeing in places like Oakland, San Diego, Fresno, Santa Ana and Los Angeles, where we see far too much brown-on-black crime," Núñez said. "We have to put an end to that."

Cheryl Green was gunned down in a hail of bullets while standing near her scooter in the Harbor Gateway area of Los Angeles, east of Torrance.

She was with a group of friends when they were approached by two men. Witnesses and police said that without a word, one man pulled a gun and opened fire, killing Green and wounding three others.

Cash And Cocaine, But No Conviction (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Jurors, Lawyers Reflect on Where Case Prosecuting District's Largest Drug Seizure Faltered

The haul was unprecedented. A wiretap on the cellphone of a reputed drug kingpin led police to a stash house where they found almost 100 kilos of cocaine and nearly $1 million. A force of more than 100 federal and local agents swept up nearly a dozen suspects in raids across the region.

The evidence to put everyone away seemed strong. There were the drugs, the cash and the wiretaps, filled with curious talk of "tickets" -- "little tickets," "VIP tickets" -- code, prosecutors said, for wholesale quantities of cocaine.

And there was the Global Positioning System device, secretly planted in the suspected kingpin's car, tracking his comings and goings between the stash house in Fort Washington and his supposed customers in and around Washington.

Then the case went before a jury in U.S. District Court. The outcome was hardly what authorities would have expected on that October morning a year and a half ago when they found themselves staring at the biggest seizure ever made in a D.C. drug investigation.

The jurors, after deliberating for weeks, deadlocked earlier this year on many charges against alleged kingpin Antoine Jones, including the most serious: conspiracy. And on more than a dozen other counts, the jury came back with verdicts of not guilty. The three men on trial with him, charged with conspiracy as well, fared even better.

Kevin L. Holland and Adrian Jackson were acquitted of all charges; Michael A. Huggins was acquitted of all but one lesser charge, and that eventually was dismissed by the government. All three men, jailed for more than a year pending trial, are now free. Jones remains in jail, awaiting retrial.

It was a stunning loss for prosecutors and police, who claimed they had busted a major drug-trafficking ring with direct links to suppliers in Mexico. But the case had weaknesses that became apparent once it went to trial.

First was the profile of the alleged conspiracy. Unlike cases against other such enterprises, this one did not allege that anyone was killed or even assaulted by Jones or his alleged co-conspirators. Although the absence of violence was a relief for investigators, it also could have had consequences with the jury, lawyers said.

"If there's blood in the case, it kind of spreads out to everybody," said Jon W. Norris, who won an acquittal for Jackson. "But when there's not, the jury can really evaluate the evidence against each person -- as they're supposed to."

Nothing in the law requires prosecutors to present evidence of violence to prove a conspiracy to distribute narcotics. And whether the lack of bodies was pivotal in this case is a question that veteran prosecutors debate.

But experience tells many prosecutors that a body, or two or three, can make juries more apt to tie defendants together in a conspiracy and return verdicts in which everyone shares blame.

DOJ_NMG_0139584

Without the sort of violence people have come to expect from major drug gangs, a case such as the one against Jones can seem more like an elaborate financial crime, lawyers say. A jury may see a lot of money and perhaps a bit of greed, but it doesn't see any pain and perhaps doesn't feel much emotion. And that could sway a case.

Before they were convicted in 2003 of murder, racketeering and other offenses, Kevin Gray and Rodney Moore, two of the biggest players in the District's drug trade, left a long trail of blood that ultimately landed them in prison for the rest of their lives.

"Everything that I had was somehow connected to drug violence," said Timothy J. Heaphy, the lead prosecutor in the trial of Gray, who was convicted of 19 murders, and Moore, who was convicted of 10.

Prosecutors faced other obstacles in Jones's case. Although all four defendants had previous drug convictions, in this case none of them was caught with or near especially large quantities of cocaine, and Jones was not caught with any drugs. Only the testimony of cooperating co-defendants tied the defendants directly to the supply of drugs passing through the stash house. It wasn't enough for jurors.

"We all just thought the government didn't present the case like they should have," Esther Roberson, 68, said in an interview. It's not that she wasn't troubled by some of what she heard, she said; she just wasn't persuaded. "Sometimes it was a little suspicious, but it wasn't really proved to me."

She and another juror noted that Jones was never photographed entering or leaving the stash house, which was secluded and difficult for investigators to stake out. So what jurors got was video footage of Jones's Jeep outside the house, which he did not own or rent, and the data from the GPS device, which placed the vehicle in the immediate area of the house.

When police arrested Jones at his home in Waldorf, they found more than $60,000 in the Jeep, money prosecutors argued was surely the profits of a drug enterprise but the defense suggested could have been from a club he owned. The jurors interviewed said the source of the cash was unclear.

And if Jones were running so much cocaine, one of the jurors asked, why couldn't police catch him with drugs in hand? "If they're saying he was selling drugs to all those people, I'm sure they could have intercepted him one of those times," said the juror, asking to be identified only as a senior citizen.

In 2005, the activities looked more than compelling to the FBI agents and D.C. police investigators, who concluded that Jones was a key broker for cocaine coming into the Washington area from a Mexican cartel operating around the Texas border town of McAllen. For weeks, investigators monitored Jones's cellphone calls.

Jones, who has drug convictions in the District and Virginia, lives in Waldorf and owned a nightclub in Northeast Washington called Levels. The now-closed club, prosecutors argued, was the hub of the conspiracy, providing a place to launder drug proceeds and a pretense for all the coded telephone talk of "tickets" and "music" -- allegedly terms for drugs.

But "tickets" and "music" can also mean just that. A. Eduardo Balarezo, Jones's defense attorney, said that Jones was a businessman and that his contacts with Holland, Jackson, Huggins and others were business-related and hardly part of any criminal conspiracy.

"My client ran a legitimate nightclub, a successful nightclub," Balarezo said in an interview. "He was a businessman, and the government quite frankly tried to make hay where there wasn't any."

A music promoter, Holland recently said that his ties to Jones were legitimate business dealings and that his past is in the past. Prosecutors are trying to lock him up again, this time as a probation violator -- using the same set of facts already considered by the jury.

At least six people have pleaded guilty in the case, including two who testified for the prosecution. But Jones was the biggest target. He is to be retried on the remaining charges in November. Three other defendants, including one from Mexico, will be tried with him.

When he is back in court, he will face a lot of familiar evidence -- evidence that the prosecutors, Assistant U.S. Attorneys Rachel Carlson Lieber and John V. Geise, argued reflect the unmistakable actions of a drug trafficker, checking on incoming shipments, arranging drop-offs and collecting payments.

In one call to Jones from a cellphone registered to a man in McAllen, the subject is music, ostensibly related to the nightlife business.

Jones is told that the caller is trying to find "some new music" but that it is getting a little rough, according to court papers in the case. But the caller tries to reassure Jones, telling him that he has "good people" who make "good music" and that he is just waiting for them. Jones goes on to tell the caller that he is satisfied with the music he's received so far, that "they love the sound, they love the entertainers, they love it," the papers stated.

Norris suggested that by putting everyone into the same pot with Jones and charging them all with conspiracy, the government overreached and undermined its case.

DOJ_NMG_0139585

"I think they really thought that evidence was going to carry the day," Norris said. But in the end there was very little evidence against the three co-defendants, and the jury acquitted them, he said. "And I think the lack of evidence against those defendants undermined the evidence against Mr. Jones."

Texas Man Convicted Of Cocaine Distribution, Money Laundering (SHREVET)

Shreveport Times, March 5, 2007

A Rowlett, Texas man has been convicted by a Shreveport jury on cocaine distribution and money laundering charges.

Ronald King, 40, was convicted Friday, charged with one count of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine, one count of money laundering and one count of forfeiture, according to a press release from Donald Washington, United States attorney for the western district of Louisiana.

His sentencing is set for June 21 at 1:15 p.m. where he faces a sentence of life in prison, a $4 million fine or both.

“Testimony at trial revealed that King had been distributing cocaine in Shreveport for approximately 20 years,” the release said. “King used a small fleet of vehicles with hidden compartments to transport drug proceeds from Shreveport back to the Dallas area where he and other co-conspirators used financial institutions to launder the proceeds.”

Evidence obtained also showed that King invested some of the money in real estate in Shreveport.

As a result of the investigation, the task force seized more than $40,000 in cash, a house in Shreveport and several firearms, the release said.

King was caught after an investigation conducted by the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force which includes Shreveport and Bossier City police departments, the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Shreveport and the Caddo Parish Sheriff’s Office.

Top Bodybuilders Allegedly Received Steroids From Internet Pharmacy (NYDN)

New York Daily News, March 2, 2007

It may shock no one to learn that two world champion bodybuilders may have been using steroids or growth hormone, but two giants of that well-muscled world were among the athletes who received drugs in a shady Internet pharmacy operation, sources have told the New York Daily News.

Eight-time Mr. Universe Ronnie Coleman, a former BALCO client, and top Mr. Universe contestant Victor Martinez were among the many clients in an ongoing, multistate investigation that led to the raids on several pharmacies in Florida this week, a source said. But like the other athletes whose names have been leaked, Coleman and Martinez are not targets.

"We know that thousands of people in New York alone have been getting steroids this way over the Internet," said a law enforcement official involved in the investigation. "But you have got to go after the source, and that is what we are doing."

Also Thursday, baseball officials said they want to talk to Albany County District Attorney David Soares about Angels outfielder Gary Matthews Jr.'s alleged links to a pharmacy in Mobile, Ala., that is part of the investigation.

However, whether the subject is sources or users, the current investigation keeps overlapping with the more famous BALCO case from the San Francisco area. Coleman, listed among clients on the Web site for BALCO founder Victor Conte's nutritional business, shares the record for Mr. Olympia titles with fellow former BALCO client Lee Haney, who worked out with Evander Holyfield, one of the athletes reportedly connected to the newest raids. While both Coleman and Haney have ties to BALCO, neither was ever accused of receiving drugs from the lab.

Returning from Florida Thursday, Soares said as many as 24 people will be rounded up in the days ahead. Rather than finding a hero's welcome, however, Soares was immediately hit with criticism from local law enforcement officials over his tactics, and with complaints from local reporters that he had favored the Albany Times-Union with a scoop when the raids were carried out Tuesday.

In the days since the highly publicized raids and arrests of pharmacists, Albany cops have challenged Soares' claims that steroid abuse is a growing problem in upstate communities, and thus justified his decision to lead raids in Florida. Soares fired back Thursday, saying his police critics have "never focused on anything other than the guy they can pick up and make $500 of overtime on," a strategy he said has doomed the war on drugs.

"If every member of law enforcement in Albany County was focused on actually putting away criminals instead of arguing with each other and engaging in turf battles, we would have a reduction in the crime rate of about 50 percent," Soares said.

A source with knowledge of the probe said another one of the steroid customers is a supervisor with the Albany Police Department's narcotics squad. Albany cops have been among Soares' most vocal critics.

With Soares and about 2,000 pounds of confiscated documents arriving in Albany Thursday, sources said other pharmacies are soon to be raided, and several employees of Florida pharmacies are expected to surrender to authorities in

DOJ_NMG_0139586

Albany on Monday. But while Soares defended his decision to go after suppliers and not users, as is the case with most drug prosecutions, attention will remain on the documents and the names they may contain.

"You won't find another Barry Bonds, but there are some names people will know," a source close to the investigation said. But only if the documents are unsealed or if the names are leaked.

The four people arrested Tuesday at Signature Compounding Pharmacy in Orlando - Stan and Naomi Loomis, Michael Loomis and Kirk Calvert - waived extradition Thursday and must surrender themselves in Albany by Thursday.

So far, the names of Holyfield - the former heavyweight boxing champion - Matthews, ex-major league pitcher Jason Grimsley and retired slugger Jose Canseco reportedly have been connected to Applied Pharmacy Services in Mobile.

Mobile-based DEA agents searched Applied in August with a federal warrant, and the Albany Times-Union reported Thursday that two Applied owners had been indicted by an Albany County grand jury. But Arthur Madden, an attorney for the pharmacy's owners, said he had not been told his clients are targets in the investigation or have been indicted.

"I know nothing about a New York State proceeding," he said. "I read this stuff with horrid fascination."

Madden said he doesn't know why his clients, Jason and Sam Kelley, would be targets.

"Applied is not an Internet pharmacy where you go online and fill out a form and some doctor writes a prescription," he said. "It's a real pharmacy, it's a brick and mortar place, it's regulated by the FDA and DEA. It's a licensed pharmacy that dispenses prescriptions written by real doctors."

Internet Brings Drug Dealing Into The Home (ALBANYTU)

By Brendan J. Lyons, Senior Writer

Albany Times Union, March 4, 2007

Placing orders online becomes an easy way to get controlled substances

ALBANY -- Ryan Haight was just 17 when he began suffering from back and joint pain.

He was an honors student, a gifted athlete and, like many teenagers, he knew how to navigate the Internet. When his pain worsened, Haight used his computer to find an Oklahoma pharmacy from which he ordered painkillers and anti-depressants.

A medical doctor he never met provided a prescription for the drugs, and the pharmacy mailed them out.

On Feb. 21, 2001, Haight, a resident of La Mesa, Calif., died at the age of 18 after mixing morphine and two prescription anti-depressants with Hydrocodone, a highly addictive painkiller.

Haight's tragic story has been told to various congressional committees, and it underscores what many federal agencies have acknowledged for years: Internet pharmacies are fast becoming one of the nation's primary delivery systems for controlled substances. The issue took on heightened awareness last week with the raid of several Orlando, Fla., pharmacies that were selling drugs to customers in New York.

The problem is bad, federal authorities say, and becoming worse each year. While police continue to wage their war on street drugs, many law enforcement experts say more needs to be done about Internet pharmacies.

Indeed, a 2005 study by the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse (CASA) showed that abuse of pharmaceutical controlled substances has grown at a rate twice that of marijuana, five times that of cocaine, and 60 times that of heroin, between 1992 and 2003.

"Perhaps most disturbing is that many of these Internet pharmaceutical sites ... are hiding behind a facade of legitimacy by pretending to ask customers health questions," said Joseph T. Rannazzisi, a Drug Enforcement Administration deputy assistant administrator, in testimony in 2005 before before a House subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations.

"After customers fill out a superficial questionnaire, which is given an even more cursory review, if any, by a doctor employed by the Internet pharmacy, these sites provide pharmaceutical products with no face-to-face medical examination, no tests, no drug interaction screening, and no follow-up care," Rannazzisi added.

Last week, when Albany County District Attorney David Soares helped steer the arrest of several doctors, pharmacists and business owners in a multi-state investigation of illicit pharmacies, he was subsequently criticized, in a politically charged attack, for his decision to prosecute the case.

Yet a review of dozens of reports to Congress in the past eight years shows that federal sentencing guidelines for a conviction of distributing pharmaceutical drugs are weak when compared to the penalties many states impose. In addition, the Food and Drug Administration and other federal agencies have encouraged states to prosecute Internet pharmacy cases, citing a lack of resources at the FDA and other oversight agencies.

The U.S. Government Accountability Office issued a report two years ago showing "that although extensive time and resources are required to locate, charge and convict criminal anabolic steroid dealers, the penalties under the federal sentencing guidelines faced by persons convicted of such offenses do not reflect the seriousness of their crimes or provide adequate deterrence."

The Albany County case has drawn national attention because of its revelation that many professional athletes allegedly obtained performance-enhancing drugs, including steroids, from some of the pharmacies involved. But an agent in the case, and court records, show that many of the pharmacies and doctors targeted in the investigation also routinely prescribed controlled substances that include Hydrocodone, Vicodin and other addictive substances.

In some ways, the investigation is similar to a law enforcement initiative to detect and arrest pedophiles who troll the Internet for victims. To combat the problem, the Albany and Guilderland police departments and several other area law enforcement agencies have assigned officers to a cyber-crime task force at the Albany FBI facility.

There, the officers comb Web sites for pedophiles, routinely arresting suspects from other areas and states who are then prosecuted locally. The Internet, law enforcement experts say, has blurred jurisdictional boundaries and is forcing many local prosecutors to take on multi-state prosecutions of crimes such as identity theft, fraud, sexual misconduct and drug dealing.

James A. Dahl, the retired assistant director of the FDA's Office of Criminal Investigation, warned Congress two years ago that Internet pharmacies had become the next front in the war on drug abuse.

"The problem of foreign and domestic Internet sales of controlled substances and other dangerous pharmaceutical products is a large and complex issue that appears to be growing exponentially," Dahl said. "The only real concern of the owners of these Internet operations is not the health and well being of the consumer, but their ability to collect payment through the credit card used for the purchase."

In February 2005, an article in U.S. News and World Report magazine disclosed that prescription-drug abuse was rising in all age groups, especially among teenagers. The magazine reported that one in 10 high school seniors has tried the painkiller Vicodin without a prescription, and 1 in 20 has taken the potent pill OxyContin.

Another study by the federal government has shown that nearly 3 percent of high school seniors use steroids, a figure that is climbing. In addition, children as young as 13 now experiment with steroids, according to an FDA report.

"For young people in particular, online pharmacies seem especially seductive. For this generation, the Internet is a familiar medium and it feels safe," said U.S. Rep. Ed Whitfield, R-Ky., during a hearing on Internet pharmacies in December 2005 before the House Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations. "The seduction and convenience of the Internet coupled with the wide availability of controlled substances raises a disturbing prospect of many young people hooked on drugs with the ease of logging on to a computer."

The prosecution undertaken by Soares' office, which began in 2005, has resulted in several arrests of New York residents, including a Colonie man, Daniel Mori, who was arrested in January on charges of insurance fraud, drug possession and hindering prosecution for allegedly trying to warn others about the Albany County grand jury investigation.

Signature Pharmacy of Orlando, which was raided Tuesday, is a registered out-of-state pharmacy in New York and did nearly $10 million in sales here over the past two years, authorities said.

Orlando's Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation, staffed by federal and state law enforcement agencies, is one of the lead agencies in the case. The bureau convinced Albany County authorities to get involved in the investigation after Orlando investigators found "many of Signature's doctors, as well as a large part of their business, were located in New York," according to an internal memorandum provided to state officials recently by Albany prosecutors.

Several people arrested in the case are scheduled to appear in Albany County Court this week on sealed indictments charging them with felonies that include criminal diversion of prescription medicines and insurance fraud.

Schumer Calls For HGH Regulation (NSDY)

By Daniel Wagner

Newsday, March 4, 2007

Following last week's steroid bust that implicated professional and college athletes, and high school coaches, Sen. Charles Schumer yesterday proposed additional federal regulation of a substance he said has become the "drug of choice" for those seeking a quick boost in athletic performance.

"All of a sudden, there are these illegal online pharmacies that have been set up ... and they have engaged in a crooked scheme with doctors," Schumer (D-N.Y.) said. "The doctors have become no more than drug dealers -- they've given up their oath."

He said human growth hormone, or HGH, is popular because it is harder to detect in drug tests and more difficult to prosecute than anabolic steroids, which are illegal to possess without a prescription. Distributing HGH for non-approved medical uses is already illegal under federal law.

Under Schumer's proposal, HGH regulation would be put on a par with current steroid laws, and federal law enforcement would be able to prosecute doctors who write prescriptions "in bad faith" -- an act already illegal in New York State.

DOJ_NMG_0139588

Schumer made the announcement with Albany County District Attorney David Soares, whose year-long, multistate investigation led to last week's sting in Florida. Soares' office took the lead because those implicated could be prosecuted under tougher New York laws, spokeswoman Heather Orth said. She said federal prosecutors need a law like New York's to "get these drugs out of the hands of anyone from professional athletes to kids in high school."

Schumer also said in an interview that there would be "many more" arrests today in addition to four in Florida last week. Those defendants will be arraigned in Albany today. Neither Schumer nor Orth would elaborate; she said there will be more information today.

Governmental concern about HGH is nothing new.

In 2001, the Drug Enforcement Administration acted against a California doctor who had given an agent HGH during a 1994 investigation. And last year, the federal sentencing commission requested public comment on how HGH violations should be punished under amendments to a 2004 anti-steroid law.

Marigolds Make Way For Marijuana In Suburbia (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 5, 2007

SNELLVILLE, GA.

The only permanent residents in the manicured, multigabled ranch east of Atlanta were illegal.

No, not that kind. They were little green creatures of the cannabis family – in short, marijuana plants.

Raids on 40 houses in 12 suburban Georgia counties over the past two weeks are one recent sign of what police say is a national trend in marijuana marketing: growing the illicit crop year-round indoors, using suburban homes as "grow-houses."

Grow-houses – a spacious incarnation of the old grow-room – have proliferated like suburban-garden gnomes, as antidrug squads have chased growers off remote mountainsides and out of cornfields. In these basements, lights hum with thousands of watts across a sea of plants lodged in a hydroponic soup of nutrients. Upstairs, there's usually no furniture, police say, except a cot, a chair, and a rabbit-ear TV.

"It's the most impressive thing I've seen in 20 years of law enforcement," says Lt. Jody Thomas of the Fayette County Drug Taskforce.

Police say the 'burbs give growers a degree of solace and safety, protected by suburbia's premium on privacy and even a 2001 US Supreme Court ruling that prevents law officers from aiming heat-sensing equipment at homes unless they first obtain search warrants.

The trend also signals that "production is moving closer to consumption" – a path that leads straight to the suburbs, says Jon Gettman, editor of the Bulletin of Cannabis Reform in Lovettsville, Va., which promotes legalizing marijuana for medicinal use.

Alarm about suburban pot-growing is rising, and some worry that efforts to eradicate crops grown outdoors are driving the illicit industry to become more entrenched in middle-class America, a la Showtime's hit TV show "Weeds," about a suburban mom who sells pot.

"This is horrifying," says Sue Rusche, president of National Families in Action, which works to help children and teens resist drug use.

In the early 1980s, 80 percent of marijuana on US streets was imported, mostly from Mexico, according to the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML), which works to stop arrests of marijuana smokers. Today, 40 percent of the supply is grown domestically – about half of it indoors under high-wattage lights that turn dank basements into sweltering hothouses.

While outdoor growing is risky and the results inconsistent, indoor growing, which began 30 years ago, has become a science, as amateur botanists produce potent varieties in controlled environments. Experts say it was only a matter of time before syndicates began applying basic black-market principles: higher potency and consistent yields equal more profit.

"It's Adam Smith 101," says Allen St. Pierre, executive director of NORML in Washington. "In a world of prohibition, if you can grow it in your little suburban home and cure it properly, it goes right to the top of the market and you see an incredible level of profit that all the other dealers don't enjoy."

Here's how it worked, according to Fayette County's Lieutenant Thomas: A wealthy buyer tied to a group of Cuban nationals in Miami bought homes in the endless suburbs of metro Atlanta. So as not to raise suspicion, growers illegally cut into public utilities such as water and electricity. Fences would go up in the backyards, and basement windows would be blacked over. "Baby sitters" would arrive late at night in pickup trucks, often talking on cellphones. Sometimes they would live in the homes on cots.

DOJ_NMG_0139589

Harvested at 90-day intervals, the cured "buds" fetched as much as $6,000 a pound in New York City, where most of the suburban Atlanta crop was shipped. Police say a single house could yield more than $1 million in profit a year. Others say the figure is probably lower because authorities often overestimate per-plant yields.

Georgia has lagged behind in indoor busts, with just one last year. The US government eradicates some 3.5 million marijuana plants each year, mostly outdoors, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration. Of some 800,000 marijuana-related arrests in 2005, 90,000 were for trafficking or growing, according to the FBI. The bureau does not further break out its numbers, but experts say growers by far make up the fewest number of arrests.

"We would never have found it without this tip from Florida," says Thomas, referring to a similar series of busts of the same organization in the Miami area earlier this year. "It's so extravagant, yet it has some amount of legitimacy. There's often a car parked in the yard, but no traffic in and out, no buyers."

Growers may have had several reasons for setting up shop in subdivisions like Summit Chase here in Snellville. A key one, though, is the privacy ethos. Darrell Lamb, a local high schooler, says the smell of pot would "slap me across the face" as he and some friends shot arrows in the nearby woods. But he never called the police.

Pat Edwards, who lives across the street, says privacy and anonymity trumped suspicion of the "unfriendly" men who tended the house at 2851 Creekwood Drive, but who evidently did not live there.

"Nobody really speaks to each other on this street, and that's how we all like it," she says. "Maybe these guys sensed that."

Still, people talk. Pre-bust, the biggest gossip in the neighborhood was how the house at 2851 Creekwood fetched one of the highest sales prices in the subdivision, $219,000. Post-bust, speculation centered on whether it would affect property values. Closing up a yard sale across the street, Ms. Edwards struck a pragmatic note as she looks to leave the city for her childhood home in south Georgia.

"Maybe they want to buy my house," she jokes. "I've got a big basement."

Bust Yields Bumper Crop Of Pot Farms In Basements (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 5, 2007

Until the cops showed up, people living in the Cloister subdivision in Lawrenceville thought lawns were the most pampered grass in their neighborhood.

But, as it turned out, in the basement of the quiet home at 2350 Friars Gate Drive, somebody was growing marijuana. This wasn't your garden variety home-stash plant under a grow light.

This was big.

About 500 plants worth of big, said police.

Each four feet tall, the potted plants were arrayed like row crops in the huge basement. They were hydroponic — grown without soil — and irrigated and fed by a elaborate network of pipes. Grow lights were set up to burn at different intensities and hours to imitate the seasons.

The growers had invested tens of thousands of dollars in heating and air conditioning upgrades to create a semitropical climate where the air was a slightly humid 81 degrees.

To save money — the operation can burn about $2,500 worth of electricity a month — and avoid detection by electric meter, the growers had hotwired the power system, digging a hole and tapping into an underground electrical line.

The discovery of the basement pot farm shocked residents. But for authorities, last week's bust was part of an improbably predictable pattern.

The Friar's Gate raid — which resulted in the arrest of Eduardo Rodriguez-Ibarra, 43, Jose Felipe-Bruno, 35, and Jorge Gonzalez-Sanchez, 36 — was the 34th home basement marijuana farm found in 13 metro Atlanta counties in the last three weeks.

"This is amazing, and it's not over yet," Capt. Mike Pruitt, commander of the Fayette County Sheriff's Office Drug Task Force. "It's like a snowball rolling down a hill. It just keeps getting bigger and bigger."

Pruitt, a 27-year veteran of drug enforcement, has become the defacto drug enforcement czar of the case by channeling information his investigators obtained after the Feb. 13 arrests of Merquiades Martinez, 35, and Blanca Botello, 34, in Fayetteville, to other police agencies. The husband and wife team masterminded the network of underground pot farms, police say.

The couple, and 24 others nabbed in the first bust, are charged with manufacturing and trafficking marijuana.

Steve Harris, an attorney for Botello, said she knew nothing about the pot growing operation. She and Martinez are scheduled to appear in Fayette Magistrate Court on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0139590

When Fayette County District Attorney Scott Ballard held a press conference on Feb. 14, he said it was a $12 million drug enterprise, involving 12 homes. The number of homes has since almost tripled, and the number of people arrested is more than 40.

Friday morning, Pruitt's office was a hubub of activity. The phone rang constantly. One minute, it was an investigator. Another minute, it was the Fayette DA calling about the case. After another call, Pruitt hung up wearily.

"Looks like there could be two more, maybe, in Barrow County," he said. "And now it sounds like somebody from Lawrenceville drove a truck down there and dumped a load of pot in Tampa [Fla.] — they're running scared."

Authorities still won't say how long Martinez and Botello allegedly have been in the basement-grown pot business. She was a licensed ReMax Realtor who sold at least six of the houses that have been seized by police. Those purchases were made in 2005, Pruitt said.

Police say Botello was in on the scam and found and sold houses to operatives knowing they would convert basements to pot farms.

But cops didn't pick up the scent until they got a call about three months ago from an investigator with the Drug Enforcement Agency in Miami. "All he gave us was a name, Merquiades Martinez, and information that he was a master grower," Pruitt said.

Martinez ran a garden supply store just north of Fayetteville in a rundown strip shopping center on Georgia 85, next door to an alternator repair shop and an abandoned pool hall.

According to county business records, he obtained the business license for Panoramic Garden Hydroponics in Botello's name, in June 2006.

From the outside, the store appears anything but prosperous. A sign on the door reads "Walk-ins welcome." But few did, said investigators who staked out the place.

The store — which had shelves of plant food and books on hydroponic gardening — was usually closed during the day. Martinez would drop by at night, often pick up a few things, then head off to destinations around metro Atlanta.

"To be honest with you, we thought we'd find three or four houses at most," Pruitt said.

But after two months of tracking Martinez's movements, the investigators had connected him to 11 homes in Fayette, Henry, Coweta, Butts, Newton and Rockdale counties. The houses all had a similar setup.

They were new homes, pricey ($300,000 to $450,000), had big finished basements (1,500 to 2,500 square feet) and were in upper middle class neighborhoods, often widely spaced from neighbors.

Every home had a "baby sitter" who slept upstairs with spare accommodations — often just an inflatable mattress, a TV, a few pots and pans in the kitchen — and monitored the plants. The sitter followed instructions, written in Spanish, on the care of the crop. Many of the homes had red ribbons on front doors or on mailboxes, and good luck symbols of Santeria, an African-based religious practice, similar to voodoo, that originated in Cuba and Brazil. Investigators also found garlic cloves placed behind TV sets and in other locations in some of the houses.

The crops were harvested in 90-day cycles, said Pruitt. The marijuana is a potent hybrid, water-grown under controlled conditions and known as "hydro." It sells for six times as much as Mexican outdoor grown pot, said Pruitt.

"This hydro stuff goes for $3,600 a pound in Atlanta," he said. "But a lot of this is being shipped to New York City, where it sells for $6,000. It's really potent. The THC (the active ingredient that makes a user high) just drips off the leaves."

When investigators arrested Martinez at a pot house he allegedly set up in Coweta, they also served a search warrant on his garden supply store and seized his computer and paper records.

Those records became the blueprint for investigations and arrests across the rest of the metro area, including four drug house busts last week in Gwinnett. The revelation that the pot houses were stealing electricity alerted power companies who are also now a part of the investigation.

"They were having power surges, and they couldn't figure out why all the fuse panels were getting blown," said Pruitt. "Now they know. So, anywhere they're having transformer problems, they're letting us know. We've hit a few houses based on their information and haven't missed yet."

Ruth Porter-Whipple, a DEA spokesperson, said the indoor scheme was unusual for Georgia, where agents routinely find outdoor crops.

"The indoor grown is more desirable because it's more potent. But it's more expensive because of the electricity," she said.

As the number of busts grows, law enforcement agents are finding some of the basement pot farms abandoned, and the equipment left behind.

Some marijuana is being dumped, too. A worker discovered trash bags of discarded pot in a trash bin behind a Lawrenceville deli last week and alerted police.

Harris, Botello's lawyer, said his client was not involved in the pot-growing scheme.

"She was just a front so Martinez could get a license," he said. "The first time she even heard about this was the night agents showed up in the middle of the night and arrested her. She is just a real estate agent and had no idea these houses were for growing pot."

"They don't have a shred of evidence that she has ever used the word 'marijuana,'" he said, "let alone grows it."

Police: Couple Ran Pot Farm At Home (PL)

Patriot Ledger, March 2, 2007

BRAINTREE - A local couple has been busted for running a marijuana farm worth hundreds of thousands of dollars in their suburban home.

Peter Sakalis, 35, and his wife, Cynthia, 37, were arrested after police found 367 marijuana plants growing in the basement of their rented 250 Elm St. home.

Police also found dozens of boxes of harvested plants, cocaine and pills, drug packaging materials, a handgun and rifle ammunition.

The grow house operation is believed to be the largest ever uncovered in Braintree, according to Deputy Chief Russell Jenkins.

''(Sakalis) had a pretty good operation going for himself,'' he said. ''For an indoor grow, this is pretty significant.''

The charges are reminiscent of the popular HBO cable television series ''Weeds,'' which features a suburban housewife who turns to selling marijuana after her husband's death. In the show's second season, characters start a grow house out of a leased home in a gated bedroom community.

The Sakalises pleaded innocent in Quincy District Court yesterday to a series of charges including drug possession with intent to distribute, conspiracy to violate the Controlled Substances Act, intent to distribute within 1,000 feet of a school, possession of a large capacity magazine and possession of ammunition.

Following his arraignment, Sakalis was arrested again for allegedly failing to pay child support.

The couple's 6-year-old daughter, who was home at the time of the bust, was placed in the care of a grandmother.

Jenkins said while Sakalis was known to Braintree drug detectives, they had no idea about his alleged green thumb. Detectives Brian Cohoon and Michael Reynolds went to the Elm Street home early Wednesday morning as part of a multi-agency task force looking to arrest Cynthia Sakalis and her 17-year-old son on non-drug-related warrants.

''It was quite unexpected, to say the least,'' Jenkins said of the discovery.

Sakalis answered the door and told police that his wife was upstairs but that her son had spent the night at his father's house in Roslindale. While searching the house for the son, officers were ''overcome'' by the odor of marijuana inside the house, according to a police report.

When questioned about a locked door leading to the basement, Sakalis allegedly told police that the landlord kept it locked and that he had no key. Officers broke the lock and found hundreds of marijuana plants as well as equipment needed to grow the plants, such as high-intensity lights, an ozone generator and fertilizers.

According to town records, the house is owned by Demetra Poursanidis of Boston. Jenkins said there are no plans to charge her in connection with the grow house.

Reached by telephone, Poursanidis, who bought the house in June, declined to comment.

Jenkins said detectives plan to search electricity records for the house to determine how long the growing has been going on. The lights used to grow the plants consume a large amount of electricity.

Jenkins said police did not immediately know how much the seized crop was worth.

According to outside law enforcement agencies interviewed by The Patriot Ledger, the value could be anywhere from a couple hundred thousand to as much as $1 million, depending on the variety of marijuana being grown, and how much of the drug each plant yielded.

The Drug Enforcement Administration places a standard $1,000 price tag on each individual marijuana plant.

Lt. Paul Hayes, a detective with the Massachusetts State Police narcotics unit, said skilled growers can cultivate up to a pound of marijuana from each plant. A pound goes for $4,000 on the street, he said.

Jenkins said that Peter Sakalis told police that he had kept his wife in the dark about the growing.

''No one in that house could have been unaware of what was going on down there,'' Jenkins said.

Lafayette Man Pleads Guilty In Pot-candy Case (SFC)

By Henry K. Lee, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139592

OAKLAND -- The ringleader of an Oakland group that made marijuana-laced candy and soft drinks resembling popular confections was sentenced today to 70 months in prison, authorities said.

Kenneth Affolter, 39, of Lafayette pleaded guilty in September to a single count of conspiring to manufacture and distribute marijuana for making doctored treats that authorities said were packaged for shipment throughout the West Coast.

Affolter admitted that under the product name Beyond Bomb, he made a range of pot-laced treats with names like Buddahfingers, Munchy Way, Rasta Reece's, Puff-a-Mint Pattie, Keef Kat, Stoney Ranchers, Puffsi, Trippy, Pot Tart, Budtella and Toka-Cola. At a hearing today in Oakland, U.S. District Judge D. Lowell Jensen also ordered Affolter to pay a $250,000 fine and placed him on four years of supervised release.

The case was the latest pitting federal officials against medicinal marijuana advocates.

According to the Drug Enforcement Administration, marijuana is illegal regardless of why someone uses it and no matter what form it takes, especially marijuana candy products that mimic mainstream candies and are attractive to youths.

But angry medicinal marijuana users have said that the raids proved that the DEA and other law-enforcement agencies are running roughshod over local and state laws that allow for medicinal cannabis use.

In 1996, California voters approved Proposition 215, which allows the use of marijuana for medical purposes with a doctor's recommendation. Despite the law, authorities -- from the California Highway Patrol to the DEA -- have regularly pounced on local marijuana-growing operations in the Bay Area.

One of those raids was on March 16, 2006, when drug agents searched two adjoining warehouses at 1055 and 1071 Yerba Buena Ave. and at 3960 Adeline St. in Emeryville.

Investigators learned that a $3,913 PG&E balance for a month's period covered all three locations and was billed to Affolter, Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent William Armstrong wrote in an affidavit.

Affolter told Oakland police officers who responded to a silent alarm at one of the Yerba Buena warehouses in February 2006 that "he made soaps and candles," agents wrote.

Investigators also searched Affolter's Lafayette home and a location on Telegraph Avenue in Oakland.

During the raids, investigators seized about $100,000 in cash, 11,692 rooted marijuana plants, 17,736 unrooted "clone" plants, marijuana-growing equipment, three weapons, an electronic money counter and hundreds of sodas and candy laced with marijuana, authorities said.

Yet Affolter, in a monitored telephone call to his parents from Santa Rita Jail in Dublin, boasted that the DEA "got a lot of money, but they didn't get it all!" Assistant U.S. Attorney Dana Wagner wrote Thursday in a sentencing memorandum.

In the same phone call, which took place shortly after his arrest, Affolter told his mother, "I am financially taken care of" and discussed spending "a couple of years" traveling the world, Wagner wrote.

Citing Affolter's apparent access to "significant undisclosed financial resources," the federal prosecutor urged the judge to impose a $500,000 fine.

A number of Affolter's former employees, who are codefendants, have also been convicted in the case.

Amy Teresa Arata of Oakland and Jesse Monko of Walnut Creek both admitted to performing supervisory roles in Affolter's marijuana operation. Each pleaded guilty to felony conspiracy counts. On Thursday, Jensen sentenced Arata to 18 months in prison; Monko received the same sentence today.

Nathan Woodard was sentenced today to two months in prison.

Jaime Alvarez-Lopez, Barbara Alvarez and Elizabeth Ramirez pleaded guilty to misdemeanor marijuana offenses. Each was sentenced in January to a year in prison.

Camilo Ruiz-Rodriguez was sentenced to eight months for a misdemeanor marijuana offense.

Last month, Maria Alarcon-Romero was placed on probation for a year.

Teresa Rojas will be sentenced on March 9, and James White and Robert Blackwell are scheduled to be sentenced on March 23.

Drug Smugglers Reroute Shipments Via Central America (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

MANAGUA, NICARAGUA — Central America has become a crucial way station in the billiondollar cocaine business, with traffickers shipping hundreds of tons northward from Colombia along the isthmus and increasingly infiltrating police and government agencies, U.S. and regional sources say.

The recent killings of three Salvadoran legislators in Guatemala underscored the shift, intelligence sources say. The lawmakers were shot and their bodies set ablaze last month, allegedly by a group of Guatemalan policemen working on behalf of Mexican drug traffickers.

DOJ_NMG_0139593

All sorts of people have been swept up in the drug trade as the smuggling routes have changed, including impoverished fishermen, small-town mayors, legislators and high-ranking police officials. In years past, the favored route was across the Caribbean to the southeastern United States. Now, with greater Mexican cartel involvement, the cocaine often moves up the coasts of Central America and overland through Mexico.

Although it remains unclear whether the dead Salvadorans had ties to traffickers, other lawmakers from the country have been linked to the trade. Guatemalan officials have said the killings point to widespread infiltration of the country's police force by organized crime.

The four police officers charged in the killings, including the head of Guatemala's organized-crime unit, were later slain in their prison cells, in a stunning raid by armed men who may have entered the facility with the aid of guards and prison officials.

An intelligence official working in the region said the slain police officers worked for a Mexican cartel that ships drugs along the Pacific coast of Central America. The officers were enforcers dedicated to "knocking down" rival traffickers, the source said.

"This is a crime that can best be understood as part of the dynamic that sees drugs flow between Mexico and Colombia," said a second intelligence official, referring to the killing of the legislators. The officials asked not to be named, given the sensitive political nature of the crime — one of the victims was Eduardo Jose D'Aubuisson, the son of the founder of El Salvador's ruling party.

Although drug trafficking has long been common in remote areas of the region, such as the Caribbean coast of Nicaragua, the growing power of Mexican cartels has increased the importance of Central America as a transshipment point.

Smuggling routes across the Caribbean have largely fallen into disuse thanks to U.S. interdiction efforts there, and Colombian drug producers have ceded the bulk of the transportation business to Mexicans.

About 90% of the estimated 780 tons of cocaine entering the United States each year passes through the hands of Mexican drug traffickers, according to U.S. studies. Mexican traffickers see Central America as a natural hub between their Colombian suppliers and the smuggling routes the Mexicans control on the U.S. border.

The "Mexico-Central America corridor is … the predominant transit route for cocaine destined for the United States," U.S. officials wrote in the 2007 National Drug Threat Assessment.

Michael A. Braun, chief of operations for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said in a 2005 congressional hearing that "the corrupting power of illicit drug trafficking organizations on the governmental institutions of Central America significantly increases the difficulty of successful drug interdiction efforts."

Central America will remain the primary transit zone for U.S.-bound drugs "for the foreseeable future," Braun added.

The growing trade has reached areas of Central America where drug trafficking was rare just a few years ago. Police and military forces there are often undermanned and outgunned.

Nicaragua's small navy, for example, only has enough boats to patrol its coastline 12 days a month, officials say, a fact that helps shape the traffickers' strategy. "They know what our limitations are," said Capt. Roger Gonzalez Diaz of the Nicaraguan navy.

On the Pacific coast, the Nicaraguan navy has no craft larger than 40-foot-long "go fast" boats with outboard motors, vessels nearly identical to those the drug traffickers use. In fact, many of the navy's boats are vessels that were discarded by smugglers, Gonzalez Diaz said.

Operatives of Mexico's Sinaloa cartel arrived on the Pacific coast two years ago, officials with Nicaragua's National Police said.

With their Mexican accents, the men stood out. They were eager to buy old, abandoned farms along the beach. They didn't look like farmers, but they bought several tractors. They collected boats, too, but they didn't look like fishermen.

"The tractors were to build new airstrips and also to rehabilitate old ones," said a Nicaraguan police officer who specializes in drug intelligence.

One of the men was Samuel "Sammy" Gutierrez, a Colombian with Mexican identity documents, police said. He and two brothers from Mazatlan, Jorge and Roberto Garcia Villasenor, were air and sea "transportation specialists," police said.

The drug cartel operatives soon found themselves in a cat-and-mouse game with police leading to a plane crash on a rural highway and the arrest of a Mexican couple with nearly $300,000 in cash at a Managua airport.

"We confiscated three tons of cocaine," said an intelligence official with Nicaragua's national police. "We hit them hard."

Nearly all of the cocaine that enters the United States is produced in Colombia, according to U.S. studies. Most of it enters the U.S. through a two-stage process in which it is offloaded and stored at least once in Mexico or Central America.

Cocaine is shipped out of Colombia by sea and air, usually in amounts of a ton or more, through what U.S. officials call "the transit zone" — the stretch of ocean between Colombia and Mexico. Sometimes the traffickers hopscotch up the coast from Colombia to Panama, Costa Rica and other countries in the "go fast" boats.

DOJ_NMG_0139594

Or they may take a more circuitous route in a larger ship that will travel around the Galapagos Islands in the Pacific southwest and later offload to smaller vessels.

Once in Mexico, the drug traffickers benefit from well-traveled smuggling routes protected by corrupt state and local officials, as they move their shipments northward overland to the U.S. border. A war among competing cartels to control those routes, known as "plazas" in Mexico, led to more than 2,000 killings last year.

The various routes through the "transit zone" pass through the beaches of Belize, seaside villages in Honduras and ports along the Pacific coast of Mexico and many other places, according to data from the U.S. government's Joint Interagency Task Force South, based in Florida.

In 2005, U.S. officials discovered, via satellite imagery, an "aircraft graveyard" in the Peten jungle of Guatemala where drug traffickers had disposed of light aircraft that brought shipments from South America. The drugs were eventually smuggled overland into Mexico.

U.S. officials said that Central American organized-crime groups, working with the Mexican and Colombian cartels under a subcontracting system, are reaping huge profits. That money, in turn, is fueling a crime wave, especially in Guatemala and El Salvador.

In El Salvador, sources pointed to a key killing that went largely unnoticed in the local media: the 2005 shooting death of Jose "El Cranky" Cortes outside a San Salvador nightclub.

According to a Salvadoran academic who has studied the drug trade, Cortes controlled the retail drug trade in an urban region of El Salvador and was assassinated for trying to make connections with Colombian suppliers without the permission of other gang leaders.

It was the first time officials had documented contacts between high-level Salvadoran gang leaders and Colombian traffickers, the source said.

Along the impoverished Pacific coast of El Salvador and Guatemala, mayors and other low-level officials in seaside towns find that the sums of money offered by the traffickers are often too tempting to resist.

"This guy tells you that you can make $60,000 easily, very quietly," said one intelligence official who was not authorized to speak publicly.

The same networks that smuggle drugs northward are responsible for shipping several billion dollars in cash southward, usually in $20 bills, DEA officials said. So vast is the money flow that it is routine to arrest couriers carrying $1 million in cash or more in Central America.

The huge sums of money involved in the drug trade have already ensnared top officials in El Salvador.

Last year, William Eliu Martinez, a former Salvadoran congressman, received a 29-year prison sentence from a U.S. judge in Washington after being convicted of smuggling more than 30 tons of cocaine into the United States.

If the privileged can be drawn into the drug trade, then what hope is there that a poorly paid policeman, soldier or sailor can resist the temptation?

Capt. Gonzalez Diaz of the Nicaraguan navy asks himself that question often.

"It's a constant struggle with our personnel," he said. "We tell them, 'Anyone would be tempted if they offered you $500 or $5,000. But for that, you're disgraced…. And if you owe them anything, they'll come after you or your wife and kids.' "

Drug Smugglers Reroute Shipments Via Central America (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

Most Colombian cocaine entering the U.S. comes through the area, with cartels infiltrating security forces and government agencies.

MANAGUA, NICARAGUA — Central America has become a crucial way station in the billiondollar cocaine business, with traffickers shipping hundreds of tons northward from Colombia along the isthmus and increasingly infiltrating police and government agencies, U.S. and regional sources say.

The recent killings of three Salvadoran legislators in Guatemala underscored the shift, intelligence sources say. The lawmakers were shot and their bodies set ablaze last month, allegedly by a group of Guatemalan policemen working on behalf of Mexican drug traffickers.

All sorts of people have been swept up in the drug trade as the smuggling routes have changed, including impoverished fishermen, small-town mayors, legislators and high-ranking police officials. In years past, the favored route was across the Caribbean to the southeastern United States. Now, with greater Mexican cartel involvement, the cocaine often moves up the coasts of Central America and overland through Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0139595

Although it remains unclear whether the dead Salvadorans had ties to traffickers, other lawmakers from the country have been linked to the trade. Guatemalan officials have said the killings point to widespread infiltration of the country's police force by organized crime.

The four police officers charged in the killings, including the head of Guatemala's organized-crime unit, were later slain in their prison cells, in a stunning raid by armed men who may have entered the facility with the aid of guards and prison officials.

An intelligence official working in the region said the slain police officers worked for a Mexican cartel that ships drugs along the Pacific coast of Central America. The officers were enforcers dedicated to "knocking down" rival traffickers, the source said.

"This is a crime that can best be understood as part of the dynamic that sees drugs flow between Mexico and Colombia," said a second intelligence official, referring to the killing of the legislators. The officials asked not to be named, given the sensitive political nature of the crime — one of the victims was Eduardo Jose D'Aubuisson, the son of the founder of El Salvador's ruling party.

Although drug trafficking has long been common in remote areas of the region, such as the Caribbean coast of Nicaragua, the growing power of Mexican cartels has increased the importance of Central America as a transshipment point.

Smuggling routes across the Caribbean have largely fallen into disuse thanks to U.S. interdiction efforts there, and Colombian drug producers have ceded the bulk of the transportation business to Mexicans.

About 90% of the estimated 780 tons of cocaine entering the United States each year passes through the hands of Mexican drug traffickers, according to U.S. studies. Mexican traffickers see Central America as a natural hub between their Colombian suppliers and the smuggling routes the Mexicans control on the U.S. border.

The "Mexico-Central America corridor is … the predominant transit route for cocaine destined for the United States," U.S. officials wrote in the 2007 National Drug Threat Assessment.

Michael A. Braun, chief of operations for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said in a 2005 congressional hearing that "the corrupting power of illicit drug trafficking organizations on the governmental institutions of Central America significantly increases the difficulty of successful drug interdiction efforts."

Central America will remain the primary transit zone for U.S.-bound drugs "for the foreseeable future," Braun added.

The growing trade has reached areas of Central America where drug trafficking was rare just a few years ago. Police and military forces there are often undermanned and outgunned.

Nicaragua's small navy, for example, only has enough boats to patrol its coastline 12 days a month, officials say, a fact that helps shape the traffickers' strategy. "They know what our limitations are," said Capt. Roger Gonzalez Diaz of the Nicaraguan navy.

On the Pacific coast, the Nicaraguan navy has no craft larger than 40-foot-long "go fast" boats with outboard motors, vessels nearly identical to those the drug traffickers use. In fact, many of the navy's boats are vessels that were discarded by smugglers, Gonzalez Diaz said.

Operatives of Mexico's Sinaloa cartel arrived on the Pacific coast two years ago, officials with Nicaragua's National Police said.

With their Mexican accents, the men stood out. They were eager to buy old, abandoned farms along the beach. They didn't look like farmers, but they bought several tractors. They collected boats, too, but they didn't look like fishermen.

"The tractors were to build new airstrips and also to rehabilitate old ones," said a Nicaraguan police officer who specializes in drug intelligence.

One of the men was Samuel "Sammy" Gutierrez, a Colombian with Mexican identity documents, police said. He and two brothers from Mazatlan, Jorge and Roberto Garcia Villasenor, were air and sea "transportation specialists," police said.

The drug cartel operatives soon found themselves in a cat-and-mouse game with police leading to a plane crash on a rural highway and the arrest of a Mexican couple with nearly $300,000 in cash at a Managua airport.

"We confiscated three tons of cocaine," said an intelligence official with Nicaragua's national police. "We hit them hard."

Nearly all of the cocaine that enters the United States is produced in Colombia, according to U.S. studies. Most of it enters the U.S. through a two-stage process in which it is offloaded and stored at least once in Mexico or Central America.

Cocaine is shipped out of Colombia by sea and air, usually in amounts of a ton or more, through what U.S. officials call "the transit zone" — the stretch of ocean between Colombia and Mexico. Sometimes the traffickers hopscotch up the coast from Colombia to Panama, Costa Rica and other countries in the "go fast" boats.

Or they may take a more circuitous route in a larger ship that will travel around the Galapagos Islands in the Pacific southwest and later offload to smaller vessels.

Once in Mexico, the drug traffickers benefit from well-traveled smuggling routes protected by corrupt state and local officials, as they move their shipments northward overland to the U.S. border. A war among competing cartels to control those routes, known as "plazas" in Mexico, led to more than 2,000 killings last year.

DOJ_NMG_0139596

The various routes through the "transit zone" pass through the beaches of Belize, seaside villages in Honduras and ports along the Pacific coast of Mexico and many other places, according to data from the U.S. government's Joint Interagency Task Force South, based in Florida.

In 2005, U.S. officials discovered, via satellite imagery, an "aircraft graveyard" in the Peten jungle of Guatemala where drug traffickers had disposed of light aircraft that brought shipments from South America. The drugs were eventually smuggled overland into Mexico.

U.S. officials said that Central American organized-crime groups, working with the Mexican and Colombian cartels under a subcontracting system, are reaping huge profits. That money, in turn, is fueling a crime wave, especially in Guatemala and El Salvador.

In El Salvador, sources pointed to a key killing that went largely unnoticed in the local media: the 2005 shooting death of Jose "El Cranky" Cortes outside a San Salvador nightclub.

According to a Salvadoran academic who has studied the drug trade, Cortes controlled the retail drug trade in an urban region of El Salvador and was assassinated for trying to make connections with Colombian suppliers without the permission of other gang leaders.

It was the first time officials had documented contacts between high-level Salvadoran gang leaders and Colombian traffickers, the source said.

Along the impoverished Pacific coast of El Salvador and Guatemala, mayors and other low-level officials in seaside towns find that the sums of money offered by the traffickers are often too tempting to resist.

"This guy tells you that you can make $60,000 easily, very quietly," said one intelligence official who was not authorized to speak publicly.

The same networks that smuggle drugs northward are responsible for shipping several billion dollars in cash southward, usually in $20 bills, DEA officials said. So vast is the money flow that it is routine to arrest couriers carrying $1 million in cash or more in Central America.

The huge sums of money involved in the drug trade have already ensnared top officials in El Salvador.

Last year, William Eliu Martinez, a former Salvadoran congressman, received a 29-year prison sentence from a U.S. judge in Washington after being convicted of smuggling more than 30 tons of cocaine into the United States.

If the privileged can be drawn into the drug trade, then what hope is there that a poorly paid policeman, soldier or sailor can resist the temptation?

Capt. Gonzalez Diaz of the Nicaraguan navy asks himself that question often.

"It's a constant struggle with our personnel," he said. "We tell them, 'Anyone would be tempted if they offered you $500 or $5,000. But for that, you're disgraced…. And if you owe them anything, they'll come after you or your wife and kids.' "

Special correspondent Alex Renderos contributed to this report from San Salvador.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush's Last Chance On Immigration (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi / Washington

Time, March 5, 2007

People say a lot of things on the campaign trail, but when Texas Governor George W. Bush stood before conservative Iowa crowds in 1999 and talked about the urgency of immigration reform, it was hard not to believe he was speaking from the heart. "Family values do not stop at the Rio Grande," he said back then, and the felicitous phrase became a touchstone of compassionate conservatism for his campaign and his presidency. For Bush, making immigration fair and safe "is a matter of very strong personal commitment," says his spokesman, Tony Snow.

Bush is about to get his last chance to prove that that commitment is real. Immigration reform stands out as the unfulfilled promise of the Bush presidency, and as Congress prepares to debate a compromise bill in the coming weeks, Democratic leaders in the House and Senate say Bush's help is crucial. "We're going to need Republican votes," says Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate majority leader Harry Reid. "And we're going to need the President." But power is sluicing out of the White House, Iraq is draining the Administration's remaining energies, and the President is entering a difficult period with a Congress he has never treated with much respect.

November's Democratic victory in Congress should have improved Bush's odds of getting what he calls "comprehensive immigration reform": tightened border controls and work-site enforcement, a new guest-worker program and a solution to the problem of the U.S.'s 12 million illegal immigrants. Although some Democrats side with unions in opposition to the President's proposed guest-worker program, a majority favor his broad immigration reforms. At the same time, some of Bush's most outspoken Republican opponents lost in races to Democrats who back his position. Post-election polls showed Hispanic voters punishing Republicans, abandoning the G.O.P. in larger numbers than the rest of the electorate in what some analysts saw as a backlash against tough G.O.P. rhetoric on immigration. That impression may drive fence-sitting Republicans who represent Latinos to support Bush's moderate plans.

DOJ_NMG_0139597

The election effect alone is not enough to deliver Bush the votes he needs, though, especially in the House. Privately, lawmakers and key aides in both parties are skeptical that he can make up those votes. Republicans say Bush's political weakness is too great to coerce enough wavering G.O.P. lawmakers to risk their seats out of loyalty to the President. "What leverage does he have? Not a lot," says a senior Senate Republican aide. Bush's influence has ebbed since the last Congress, when he failed to rally Republicans behind an immigration deal. Democrats say Bush's biggest problem is his style of dealing with Congress. "He likes to be the closer, bringing in the last five fence-sitters," says a senior House Democratic aide. "But this time he needs to engage early in the process to prove this is a real priority for him."

Bush's hardest challenge will be selling a fix for the 12 million illegal immigrants already living in the U.S. The new immigration bill, to be introduced in the Senate as early as next week by Democrat Ted Kennedy and Republican John McCain, will set most of them on a "path to citizenship." Opponents call that amnesty. Bush has been vague in his support for legalization. But Kennedy says that at a private meeting on Jan. 8, Bush gave him a commitment to back "comprehensive" legislation, which Kennedy believes is a commitment to granting them eventual citizenship.

One last opportunity for Bush may have come thanks to G.O.P. hard-liners. The only immigration bill that Congress managed to push through last session cracked down on illegal border crossing. At the same time, the Department of Homeland Security has stepped up work-site enforcement of laws banning the employment of illegal immigrants. The effect has been a marked labor shortage, especially in agriculture. Growers nationwide blame the shortage for losses in the hundreds of thousands of dollars. With business leaning on lawmakers to do something, the crackdown has "increased the chances of comprehensive immigration reform," says a senior Senate Republican aide.

Bush doesn't have much time. Democratic aides say Reid plans to get the new bipartisan bill to the floor this spring in the hope of forcing it through Congress before the presidential campaign paralyzes Washington. If it's not done by August, says one, "it's dead."

TAX:

Here Comes The AMT (USNEWS)

By Leonard Wiener

U.S. News and World Report, March 4, 2007

If your 2006 tax return is among the 3.5 million to 4 million that are projected to be hit by the alternative minimum tax, your only choice may be to grit your teeth. But don't feel neglected. Virtually everyone agrees that the AMT is out of control and needs to be fixed. The big question is how and at what cost in lost potential tax revenue—roughly $1.2 trillion over 10 years if the AMT is totally repealed.

So far, Congress has enacted short-term boosts in exemptions from the tax to slow its expanding reach from only about 1.3 million taxpayers five years ago. If a new temporary or permanent fix isn't enacted for 2007, the number of returns affected could soar to 23 million.

Good intentions. The AMTis an auxiliary tax with fewer deductions than regular tax and kicks in if your tax figured under its formula is greater than your tax figured normally. It was originally aimed at upper-income taxpayers who were avoiding very large amounts of tax through shelters and other manipulations, and it was never intended to be the nuisance it has become.

A failure to index the AMT to inflation and reductions in regular tax are among factors now extending the AMT's reach to some middle-class families.

The original purpose of closing tax shelters has in fact become a much smaller factor in the AMT's impact. Large payments of property tax and state income tax can trigger the AMT since those items aren't deductible when figuring it. People with many dependent exemptions are also susceptible.

"You could just be a normal person living your life and fall into it," says Bill Stone, investment director at PNC Bank's wealth management operation.

The AMT can erase part of the benefits of tax reductions and the cut in the capital-gains rate.

Dealing with the AMT can involve planning the year in which to take certain deductions, timing the receipt of income, manipulating the type and amount of debt, and other arcane issues. The tax is fertile ground for selling tax software or professional help, since you may have to go through complex calculations to figure out if you are hit by it, and tactics to minimize or avoid it in the future can be fraught with gotchas.

DOJ_NMG_0139598

But maybe for those already affected, and those who soon could be, this all will turn out to be a tax horror story with a happy ending.

This story appears in the March 12, 2007 print edition of U.S. News & World Report.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senators Vow Quick Action On Walter Reed (AP)

By John Heilprin

AP, March 5, 2007

Lawmakers promised a quick response and sought an independent commission as they expressed outrage Sunday over the poor conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center for soldiers wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"I'm worried about if it's this bad at the outpatient facilities at Walter Reed, how is it in the rest of the country? Because Walter Reed is our crown jewel," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

In a letter Sunday to Defense Secretary Robert Gates on Sunday, Schumer asked for an independent commission, possibly headed by former Secretary of State Colin Powell, to investigate all post-combat medical facilities and recommend changes.

"To think that men and women are serving their country in the most honorable and courageous way possible and all we give them is a dilapidated, rat-infested, run-down building to recover is a disgrace," Schumer wrote. "My fear is that Walter Reed is just the tip of the iceberg, and merely highlights the pervasive and systemic mistreatment of our service members."

President Bush last week ordered a comprehensive review of conditions at the nation's network of military and veteran hospitals. They have been overwhelmed by injured troops from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The White House said the president would name a bipartisan commission to assess whether the problems at Walter Reed exist at other facilities. Last week, Gates created an outside panel to review the situation at Walter Reed and the other major military hospital in the Washington area, the National Naval Medical Center at Bethesda, Md.

Gates also dismissed Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey, who had fired the medical center's previous commander, Maj. Gen. George Weightman, and replaced him with Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the Army's surgeon general and a former commander of Walter Reed. Gates said that Harvey's response was not aggressive enough.

The Army announced that Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker will be the new commander of Walter Reed, which is in Washington.

In addition, the Army took disciplinary action against several lower-level soldiers at Walter Reed, but officials have declined to publicly confirm any details of those actions. Peter Geren, the undersecretary of the Army, will serve as Harvey's temporary replacement until Bush nominates a new secretary.

The moves came in response to a series of Washington Post reports about substandard conditions and bureaucratic snafus affecting the care of injured soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan to Walter Reed, one of the military's highest-profile and busiest medical facilities, and its outpatient facilities.

The reports embarrassed the Army and the Bush administration at a time when the White House is scrambling to shore up eroding support for the Iraq war. They have prompted numerous calls in the newly Democratic Congress for more information, and sullied the reputation of what is supposed to be one of the military's foremost medical centers.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said the scandal is emblematic of the Bush administration.

"I believe this disgraceful neglect has been the result of two things. One is a lack of accountability," said Levin, who is chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. "Almost no high-level people have ever been held accountable until Secretary Gates came along."

Levin said the second factor "is the overoptimism which just symbolized this administration right from the beginning of this war, that the mission was accomplished."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., also praised Gates' quick response. "He's taken action, and not only low-level people but high-level people have been replaced, and I think that's welcome action."

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., said he probably would support a commission such as what Schumer proposes. "Investigations are not always the best way to go, but I think we ought to do whatever's necessary," he said.

Lott said the revelations show that President Bush and Congress should take a look at all Veterans Affairs hospitals and military hospitals to be sure they are providing adequate services.

DOJ_NMG_0139599

"It is indefensible and appalling," Lott said. "Why didn't we know more and do more? I'm not, you know, trying to fix blame. I want to know how we're going to fix it."

Rep. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich., called it an "appalling situation. Hopefully they're putting in place the leadership that will make sure that our troops get exactly the kind of quality care that they make. The sooner they get focused on this, the better."

Schumer and Lott spoke on ABC's "This Week." Feinstein and Hoekstra appeared on "Fox News Sunday." Levin was interviewed on CBS' "Face the Nation."

Democrats Fume Over Walter Reed Scandal (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey,

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

Sen. Charles Schumer says he fears this 'is just the tip of the iceberg.'

WASHINGTON — Congressional Democrats on Sunday kept up their attacks on substandard care for injured soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center as they prepared for hearings on the issue this week.

"If it's this bad at the outpatient facilities at Walter Reed, how is it in the rest of the country?" Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said on ABC's "This Week." "Walter Reed is our crown jewel."

In a letter sent Sunday to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, Schumer called for the creation of an independent commission to examine conditions at all medical facilities treating military personnel and veterans. He suggested that former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, a retired Army general and former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, lead the panel.

"To think that men and women are serving their country in the most honorable and courageous way possible and all we give them is a dilapidated, rat-infested, rundown building to recover is a disgrace," he wrote. "My fear is that Walter Reed is just the tip of the iceberg, and merely highlights the pervasive and systemic mistreatment of our service members."

Schumer's call for an independent panel follows a promise from President Bush last week to name a bipartisan commission for the same purpose.

The scandal over the living conditions and care for soldiers at a Walter Reed outpatient facility, detailed in a recent series of articles in the Washington Post, claimed two generals and the Army's top civilian last week. On Thursday, in response to the articles, Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey replaced the hospital's commander for the last six months, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, with Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who had headed the hospital from 2002 to 2004. But veterans groups and legislators criticized that appointment, saying Kiley had known about problems and failed to act; a day later, Kiley lost the command and Harvey resigned under pressure, attacked for appointing Kiley.

Members of Congress from both parties have expressed outrage at the substandard care. The revelations have also embarrassed the Bush administration as it has been laboring to build support for sending 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles), who heads the powerful Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, plans to hold a hearing at the hospital today. Weightman and Kiley are to testify.

The Senate Armed Services Committee plans a hearing on the matter Tuesday.

Meanwhile, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a staunch Iraq war critic, said that today he would unveil his plan to put new restrictions on the administration's war effort.

Murtha, chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense, has been working on ways to attach conditions to a nearly $100-billion emergency supplemental bill that would require troops to be fully trained and equipped before they are deployed.

"We should not send troops into combat if they don't have equipment and if they don't have the training they need," Murtha, a Vietnam veteran, said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Murtha has also suggested requiring the withdrawal of U.S. forces unless the Iraqi government meets benchmarks showing progress toward reducing sectarian strife.

The proposal has been attacked by Republicans and some Democrats as an effort to micromanage the war, a critique reiterated Sunday by Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a leading supporter of the president's plans to boost the number of U.S. forces in Iraq.

"Some of these resolutions are just nightmares for a commander. You can fight Al Qaeda, but you can't fight people involved in sectarian violence. You can go here, and you can't go there," Graham said on NBC. "There's a reason there's only one commander in chief."

noam.levey@latimes.com

Walter Reed Hearing To Put Spotlight On Kiley's Leadership (WP)

By Josh White

DOJ_NMG_0139600

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

When the first congressional hearing about the care of wounded soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center opens this morning in a campus auditorium, many eyes will turn to Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who has served as the Army's top doctor since he gave up command of the hospital in 2004. The hearing will allow Kiley to explain why bureaucratic tangles and horrid conditions made life so difficult for outpatients at the Army's premier hospital, while also likely putting him in a position of defending his job.

Though members of Congress have called for Kiley to step down and take responsibility for the problems at Walter Reed, he has been spared so far. Other leaders have not been so fortunate: Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, the hospital's commander the past six months, was fired on Thursday, and Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey was forced to resign on Friday, in part because he appointed Kiley to temporarily take over Weightman's job.

Kiley, the commander of Walter Reed from 2002 to 2004, has been accused of being brash and indifferent to concerns raised about problems there. After a series of Washington Post articles described the outpatient conditions at Walter Reed, Kiley said the problems "weren't serious and there weren't a lot of them," and that they were not "emblematic of a process of Walter Reed that has abandoned soldiers and their families."

People close to Kiley say he realizes he could lose his job over the problems that occurred on his watch, but many who have known him over the past several decades said it would be unlike him to give up. Many colleagues and former commanders described him as a dogged and aggressive leader -- sometimes to a fault. Others described him as constantly career-minded and focused on personal success. Through Army spokesmen, Kiley declined to be interviewed for this article.

Now at the pinnacle of Army medicine as the service's 41st surgeon general, Kiley is capping a diverse career with the challenge of a devastating scandal. Critics argue that his indifference exacerbated the problems; supporters say that he is the only person who can turn the situation around.

"Even if there were sins of omission on the part of General Kiley as he was focused on the soldiers' primary care, now that this will receive his attention in a way that he is uniquely capable of applying it, the Army couldn't have a better guy to do it," said Mike Sullivan, a retired Army colonel who has known and worked with Kiley since the early 1990s and considers him a friend. "He will be utterly ruthless in approaching the problem. I've seen him utterly ruthless any number of times, and it's a thing of beauty."

After graduating from medical school at Georgetown University, Kiley began his Army career as an obstetrics and gynecology specialist, a clinical area that doesn't often produce top Army brass. But he became the division surgeon with the 10th Mountain Division and later deployed to Saudi Arabia as commander of the 15th Evacuation Hospital in support of operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm, giving him wartime field experience.

Gen. William W. Crouch, who retired after serving as the Army's vice chief of staff and worked with Kiley at several commands, praised his ability to motivate staff members. Crouch said Kiley, an avid runner, was able to whip a group of doctors and nurses into shape before they deployed from Fort Polk, La., to the Middle East.

"I particularly remember him leading doctors, nurses and staff on early-morning runs," said Crouch, who in the early 1990s commanded the 5th Infantry Division at Fort Polk. "They probably did not like it, but he was preparing them for the rigors of war."

After graduating from the Army War College, Kiley went to Germany and as a colonel took command of the Landstuhl Regional Medical Center. There, he supervised the military's largest hospital outside of the United States and dealt with medical issues surrounding missions in the Balkans.

While there, he both impressed colleagues and irked them. In interviews, some said he was a deft leader, but others criticized his apparent desire to stick to the budget and increase productivity while sacrificing care.

"His last concern was his concern for the patient," said retired Col. Robert M. Tabachnikoff, chief of obstetrics and gynecology under Kiley at Landstuhl in the mid-1990s. Tabachnikoff said Kiley wanted to discharge new mothers within 24 hours of delivery to keep beds free and counted phone calls as office visits. "He was more concerned for meeting requirements and advancing his own career. . . . At last, it's catching up with him. His leadership style is being exposed."

Carolyn Bulliner, a retired colonel who has known Kiley since 1993, said he is a strong leader who has always thought the soldiers in his care were the most important aspect of his job. Bulliner, who now works down the hall from Kiley in the Army Health Facility Planning Agency, also said he is a dedicated family man, devoted to his three children. Two have followed Kiley into military service.

"All I can say is that he absolutely worked his best to ensure the right things were done for his soldiers," said Bulliner, who was director of nursing at Landstuhl. "He trusted and relied on us as his staff to do what we were supposed to do. . . . He got involved when he needed to get involved."

Retired Lt. Gen. Ronald R. Blanck, who commanded Walter Reed from 1992 to 1996 and then served as the Army's surgeon general until 2000, said he always found Kiley on top of things. In conversations with Kiley over the past few years,

Blanck noticed that he was particularly interested in front-line care for the wounded and appeared to delegate responsibility when the wounded returned to the United States.

"I don't think he saw himself as someone who should micromanage," Blanck said, adding that he thinks Kiley and Weightman were weighed down by the ballooning casualties from Iraq and Afghanistan. "It's just tragic all around. The problems could have easily been addressed by people paying attention. They were overwhelmed by the number of casualties and they unfortunately let that kind of thing slip."

Kiley's comments about Walter Reed are not the first time he has played down allegations of concerns with the Army medical community. In 2005, when Kiley's office reviewed detainee medical operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, after the Abu Ghraib prison abuses, he said that no systemic problems were found but did not mention that his office found serious flaws in detainee health care overseas, and that it had identified dozens of abuse cases.

"The majority of medical personnel interviewed did not observe any abuse, and with few exceptions, those medical personnel who did observe suspected abuse reported it," Kiley said at a Pentagon news conference in July 2005. "The assessment results demonstrate that the nation can be proud of our military medical professionals."

The report, released the next day, showed that there were major gaps in detainee care and that there was little official guidance on how to treat detainees. Kiley also said he supported using psychiatrists and physicians on Behavioral Science Consultation Teams that were using medical information from detainees to guide military intelligence interrogations -- against the recommendations of a two-star general who led the assessment.

Leonard S. Rubenstein, executive director of Physicians for Human Rights, said that Kiley was not necessarily responsible for coming up with tactics that cross ethical boundaries, but that he defended them. "He did not oppose the use of physicians in military interrogations," Rubenstein said. "It's an invitation to abuse, because the involvement of physicians tends to aggravate the situation."

Kiley, as a three-star general, has gone as high as he can go within the Army's medical hierarchy, and most surgeon generals retire at the end of their four-year terms. Should Kiley weather this storm, he could hold his position until September 2008.

US Army Scrambles To Clean Walter Reed (CSM)

By Gordon Lubold

The Christian Science Monitor, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON

The abrupt departure of the secretary of the Army, taking place as an angry Defense secretary responded to public criticism of how the Pentagon has treated its war wounded, is giving Congress fresh reasons to look more closely at war operations.

Monday, lawmakers are to begin a week of hearings that will look into the situation at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington – how conditions worsened there and why it appeared, at least, that no one was paying attention. The Army's surgeon general, Army Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, and the commander of the hospital who was relieved of his duties, Army Maj. Gen. George Weightman, are to appear Monday on Capitol Hill. Intense questioning is expected from lawmakers on a subcommittee of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee.

The Army, meanwhile, is scrambling to rectify the situation: It's moving patients out of certain areas of Walter Reed in preparation for those places being refurbished, and it's creating new support initiatives to help wounded veterans of the war in Iraq.

"We've got to make sure that our VA hospitals and our military hospitals in this country are equipped to provide the services [so] that our men and women in uniform and our veterans can be confident that they're going to get the help they need," said Sen. Trent Lott (R) of Mississippi, appearing on "This Week" on ABC.

It's important to find out what happened, not to point fingers, Senator Lott said. "Why didn't we know more and do more?" he said. "I'm not ... trying to fix blame. I want to know how we're going to fix it."

The unraveling at the Pentagon began after a story in the Feb. 18 editions of The Washington Post, which detailed problems at what's been considered the nation's premier military medical facility. The story outlined issues with the physical condition of one of the buildings, Building 18, where troops recuperate, receive counseling, or await outprocessing from the military. The report included details of rotting walls and mold and pest infestation, as well as bureaucratic bungling that delayed services or support.

The portrayal of the hospital in the story sparked a furor in Washington. Within days, the Army had relieved General Weightman, and its leadership had identified General Kiley as the acting commander. A number of other, lower-level military personnel were also reassigned.

But that was not enough for Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who didn't like the way the Army, which runs the hospital, was responding. For example, Kiley, in a press tour of the hospital in the wake of the newspaper article, criticized the report for being too one-sided.

"I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to the outpatient care at Walter Reed," Secretary Gates said in a briefing last Friday. "Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems."

Following Gates' remarks, the Army announced that Maj. Gen. Eric Schoomaker, a physician, would be named as the permanent commander of the hospital. General Schoomaker's older brother, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, is the Army's chief of staff. Another flag officer who is not a physician is expected to be named to the hospital's command structure to ensure someone without a medical background can keep an eye on the improvements, according to a Washington Post report Sunday.

Weightman's side of the story may emerge during the hearings. This may include the information that he did in fact listen to internal warnings last year about problems with staffing.

The Army released a statement Saturday that indicated Weightman had responded to those internal warnings from Army Col. Peter Garibaldi, the Walter Reed garrison commander. Colonel Garibaldi had warned that "patient care services are at risk of mission failure" due to a privatization effort that left the hospital short-staffed. According to media reports, Garibaldi said that Weightman had addressed each of three issues raised.

Rep. Henry Waxman (D) of California, who leads the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said the Garibaldi memo raises "a new dimension to the problems at Walter Reed."

The problems at Walter Reed could be symbolic of the kind of neglect that many lawmakers believe exists across the military. Funding for a war that costs up to $7 billion per month has strapped resources that normally would be spent elsewhere.

Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, a respected Marine veteran who is pushing to bring troops home, asserted Sunday that the problems at Walter Reed have occurred because war costs have trumped so many other needs.

"It happened because the resources are so much in Iraq. They've spent so much money that they've ignored the very thing that is so important to our troops at home," Representative Murtha said on "Meet the Press."

'It Is Just Not Walter Reed' (WP)

By Anne Hull And Dana Priest, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Soldiers Share Troubling Stories Of Military Health Care Across U.S.

Ray Oliva went into the spare bedroom in his home in Kelseyville, Calif., to wrestle with his feelings. He didn't know a single soldier at Walter Reed, but he felt he knew them all. He worried about the wounded who were entering the world of military health care, which he knew all too well. His own VA hospital in Livermore was a mess. The gown he wore was torn. The wheelchairs were old and broken.

"It is just not Walter Reed," Oliva slowly tapped out on his keyboard at 4:23 in the afternoon on Friday. "The VA hospitals are not good either except for the staff who work so hard. It brings tears to my eyes when I see my brothers and sisters having to deal with these conditions. I am 70 years old, some say older than dirt but when I am with my brothers and sisters we become one and are made whole again."

Oliva is but one quaking voice in a vast outpouring of accounts filled with emotion and anger about the mistreatment of wounded outpatients at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Stories of neglect and substandard care have flooded in from soldiers, their family members, veterans, doctors and nurses working inside the system. They describe depressing living conditions for outpatients at other military bases around the country, from Fort Lewis in Washington state to Fort Dix in New Jersey. They tell stories -- their own versions, not verified -- of callous responses to combat stress and a system ill equipped to handle another generation of psychologically scarred vets.

The official reaction to the revelations at Walter Reed has been swift, and it has exposed the potential political costs of ignoring Oliva's 24.3 million comrades -- America's veterans -- many of whom are among the last standing supporters of the Iraq war. In just two weeks, the Army secretary has been fired, a two-star general relieved of command and two special commissions appointed; congressional subcommittees are lining up for hearings, the first today at Walter Reed; and the president, in his weekly radio address, redoubled promises to do right by the all-volunteer force, 1.5 million of whom have fought in Iraq and Afghanistan.

But much deeper has been the reaction outside Washington, including from many of the 600,000 new veterans who left the service after Iraq and Afghanistan. Wrenching questions have dominated blogs, talk shows, editorial cartoons, VFW spaghetti suppers and the solitary late nights of soldiers and former soldiers who fire off e-mails to reporters, members of Congress and the White House -- looking, finally, for attention and solutions.

DOJ_NMG_0139603

Several forces converged to create this intense reaction. A new Democratic majority in Congress is willing to criticize the administration. Senior retired officers pounded the Pentagon with sharp questions about what was going on. Up to 40 percent of the troops fighting in Iraq are National Guard members and reservists -- "our neighbors," said Ron Glasser, a physician and author of a book about the wounded. "It all adds up and reaches a kind of tipping point," he said. On top of all that, America had believed the government's assurances that the wounded were being taken care of. "The country is embarrassed" to know otherwise, Glasser said.

The scandal has reverberated through generations of veterans. "It's been a potent reminder of past indignities and past traumas," said Thomas A. Mellman, a professor of psychiatry at Howard University who specializes in post-traumatic stress and has worked in Veterans Affairs hospitals. "The fact that it's been responded to so quickly has created mixed feelings -- gratification, but obvious regret and anger that such attention wasn't given before, especially for Vietnam veterans."

Across the country, some military quarters for wounded outpatients are in bad shape, according to interviews, Government Accountability Office reports and transcripts of congressional testimony. The mold, mice and rot of Walter Reed's Building 18 compose a familiar scenario for many soldiers back from Iraq or Afghanistan who were shipped to their home posts for treatment. Nearly 4,000 outpatients are currently in the military's Medical Holding or Medical Holdover companies, which oversee the wounded. Soldiers and veterans report bureaucratic disarray similar to Walter Reed's: indifferent, untrained staff; lost paperwork; medical appointments that drop from the computers; and long waits for consultations.

Sandy Karen was horrified when her 21-year-old son was discharged from the Naval Medical Center in San Diego a few months ago and told to report to the outpatient barracks, only to find the room swarming with fruit flies, trash overflowing and a syringe on the table. "The staff sergeant says, 'Here are your linens' to my son, who can't even stand up," said Karen, of Brookeville, Md. "This kid has an open wound, and I'm going to put him in a room with fruit flies?" She took her son to a hotel instead.

"My concern is for the others, who don't have a parent or someone to fight for them," Karen said. "These are just kids. Who would have ever looked in on my son?"

Capt. Leslie Haines was sent to Fort Knox in Kentucky for treatment in 2004 after being flown out of Iraq. "The living conditions were the worst I'd ever seen for soldiers," he said. "Paint peeling, mold, windows that didn't work. I went to the hospital chaplain to get them to issue blankets and linens. There were no nurses. You had wounded and injured leading the troops."

Hundreds of soldiers contacted The Washington Post through telephone calls and e-mails, many of them describing their bleak existence in Medhold.

From Fort Campbell in Kentucky: "There were yellow signs on the door stating our barracks had asbestos."

From Fort Bragg in North Carolina: "They are on my [expletive] like a diaper. . . . there are people getting chewed up everyday."

From Fort Dix in New Jersey: "Scare tactics are used against soldiers who will write sworn statement to assist fellow soldiers for their medical needs."

From Fort Irwin in California: "Most of us have had to sign waivers where we understand that the housing we were in failed to meet minimal government standards."

Soldiers back from Iraq worry that their psychological problems are only beginning to surface. "The hammer is just coming down, I can feel it," said retired Maj. Anthony DeStefano of New Jersey, describing his descent into post-traumatic stress and the Army's propensity to medicate rather than talk. When he returned home, Army doctors put him on the antipsychotic drug Seroquel. "That way, you can screw their lights out and they won't feel a thing," he said of patients like himself. "By the time they understand what is going on, they are through the Board and stuck with an unfavorable percentage of disability" benefits.

Nearly 64,000 of the more than 184,000 Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans who have sought VA health care have been diagnosed with potential symptoms of post-traumatic stress, drug abuse or other mental disorders as of the end of June, according to the latest report by the Veterans Health Administration. Of those, nearly 30,000 have possible post-traumatic stress disorder, the report said.

VA hospitals are also receiving a surge of new patients after more than five years of combat. At the sprawling James J. Peters VA Medical Center in the Bronx, N.Y., Spec. Roberto Reyes Jr. lies nearly immobile and unable to talk. Once a strapping member of Charlie Company, 1st Battalion, 5th Cavalry, Reyes got too close to an improvised explosive device in Iraq and was sent to Walter Reed, where doctors did all they could before shipping him to the VA for the remainder of his life. A cloudy bag of urine hangs from his wheelchair. His mother and his aunt are constant bedside companions; Reyes, 25, likes for them to get two inches from his face, so he can pull on their noses with the few fingers he can still control.

Maria Mendez, his aunt, complained about the hospital staff. "They fight over who's going to have to give him a bath -- in front of him!" she said. Reyes suffered third-degree burns on his leg when a nurse left him in a shower unattended. He was unable to move himself away from the scalding water. His aunt found out only later, when she saw the burns.

DOJ_NMG_0139604

Among the most aggrieved are veterans who have lived with the open secret of substandard, underfunded care in the 154 VA hospitals and hundreds of community health centers around the country. They vented their fury in thousands of e-mails and phone calls and in chat rooms.

"I have been trying to get someone, ANYBODY, to look into my allegations" at the Dayton VA, pleaded Darrell Hampton.

"I'm calling from Summerville, South Carolina, and I have a story to tell," began Horace Williams, 62. "I'm a Marine from the Vietnam era, and it took me 20 years to get the benefits I was entitled to."

The VA has a backlog of 400,000 benefit claims, including many concerning mental health. Vietnam vets whose post-traumatic stress has been triggered by images of war in Iraq are flooding the system for help and are being turned away.

For years, politicians have received letters from veterans complaining of bad care across the country. Last week, Walter Reed was besieged by members of Congress who toured the hospital and Building 18 to gain first-hand knowledge of the conditions. Many of them have been visiting patients in the hospital for years, but now they are issuing news releases decrying the mistreatment of the wounded.

Sgt. William A. Jones had recently written to his Arizona senators complaining about abuse at the VA hospital in Phoenix. He had written to the president before that. "Not one person has taken the time to respond in any manner," Jones said in an e-mail.

From Ray Oliva, the distraught 70-year-old vet from Kelseyville, Calif., came this: "I wrote a letter to Senators Feinstein and Boxer a few years ago asking why I had to wear Hospital gowns that had holes in them and torn and why some of the Vets had to ask for beds that had good mattress instead of broken and old. Wheel chairs old and tired and the list goes on and on. I never did get a response."

Oliva lives in a house on a tranquil lake. His hearing is shot from working on fighter jets on the flight line. "Gun plumbers," as they called themselves, didn't get earplugs in the late 1950s, when Oliva served with the Air Force. His hands had been burned from touching the skin of the aircraft. All is minor compared with what he later saw at the VA hospital where he received care.

"I sat with guys who'd served in 'Nam," Oliva said. "We had terrible problems with the VA. But we were all so powerless to do anything about them. Just like Walter Reed."

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Army Hospitals: Finally, Some Action (NSWK)

By John Barry And Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

For a lot of soldiers, tangled bureaucracy and shabby living quarters are a way of life. Perhaps that's why the brass didn't respond to reports of mismanagement and decay at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center with more urgency. But the grim stories, first reported in The Washington Post, appalled the one person who really mattered: the new secretary of Defense, Robert Gates. He promised President Bush that high-level officials would be held accountable—and seemed to get that when the commander of the hospital, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, was fired. But then Gates found that the temporary replacement—Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, named after Weightman was sacked—had earlier run the place himself. According to a senior Defense official who didn't want to be named discussing personnel matters, a furious Gates demanded the resignation of the secretary of the Army, Francis J. Harvey.

Will it end there? Before he resigned, Harvey told reporters he had broadened the Army's own inquiry to include facilities such as Landstuhl Regional Medical Center in Germany, a target of complaints by some vets. Bush created a commission to study soldiers' health care, asking for "concrete recommendations" within months, and a final report within the year, according to a White House aide who couldn't be named discussing internal deliberations. It can't come too soon.

Reddit Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, March 4, 2007

Nothing screams change to an old setting like a new set of furniture and edgy decorations. President Bush signaled a new, more formal tone when he junked former President Clinton's gaudy Oval Office furnishings. Nancy Pelosi returned grace and style to the House speaker's office with flowers and bowls of chocolates. And Bob Gates, the latest defense secretary, is doing it at the Pentagon.

Distinguishing himself from Don Rumsfeld's combativeness, Gates held his first press conference around a big table in a small conference room. But it was too cramped, so he set his sights on making the larger briefing room cozier. Gone is the lone podium, replaced by a set that would better fit a morning TV news show: a big table for himself and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in front of a world map. And unlike Rummy, Gates likes to sit, despite formerly heading Texas A&M University, where the "12th Man" tradition keeps students on their feet for Aggie games. "Frankly," says Gates, "I get tired when I stand up too long."

DOJ_NMG_0139605

Now the decorations. Gates thinks the office looks better with a few trinkets from Aggieland, says spokesperson Hollen Wheeler. That, naturally, riled the larger corps of brass, who hail from the University of Texas. But Wheeler, herself a Longhorn, says the UT gang doesn't feel too threatened: They outnumber Aggies 9 to 2.

Breaking Bread Now, Heads Later

The groundwork is being laid for the first meeting between the two party chairmen, longtime Democratic boss Howard Dean and GOP newbie Sen. Mel Martinez. But it's not just to gab over a cup of Starbucks. Both sides want to make sure that the other won't let states hold primaries before New Hampshire's first. We hear that the GOP will activate a rule to punish state parties if they do by slashing their number of delegates at the nominating convention in half. The Democrats don't have a similar rule.

No Retreat, and a Plan to Get Even

Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay is joining the activist world with a plan to return conservatives to dominance. DeLay calls his new group the Coalition for a Conservative Majority, and it has one mission: recruiting and electing conservatives in all 50 states. He plans to begin building it during an April book tour to promote No Retreat, No Surrender, his blueprint for victory. Ironically, DeLay was inspired by Democrats who followed their loss to President Bush in 2000 with what he calls a liberal shadow party that ousted the GOP last year and is aimed at installing Sen.Hillary Rodham Clinton in the White House.

Don't Mess With This Texan's Picks

Katrina cleanup czar Donald Powell didn't get his Super Bowl picks right, but he did correctly predict the vastly underrated New Orleans Saints and San Diego Chargers would make the playoffs. So considering those creds, we asked him his pick for the World Series. "The Houston Astros vs. the California Angels," he tells us. It's an authoritative guess: He talks baseball with former President Bush, a longtime fan, and current President Bush, a former Texas Rangers partner.

A Nelson Mandela for an Earlier Time

Most White House reporters stick to what they know when it comes time to pen a book. But Cox Newspapers correspondent Bob Deans thought bigger. "I found it fascinating to write about the first great leader we know of in English America—Chief Powhatan. "Yes, the father of Pocahontas and the first native big shot the British encountered. In The River Where America Began, Deans charts civilization along Virginia's James and finds the chief to be more than the despot others have called him. If Powhatan had been born today, Deans thinks he knows whom the chief would be compared to: "It's not hard to imagine Powhatan as a kind of 17th-century Nelson Mandela, standing boldly for the cause of his people."

Juicing the GOP Message

Florida's Rep.Adam Putnam, the No. 3 House Republican, isn't shy about his Sunshine State pride. After his alma mater University of Florida Gators won the national football championship, he met with reporters in the Capitol sitting next to an alligator head. Since then, he's talked politics with reporters over jugs of Florida's Natural orange juice, produced from a farming co-op begun in 1933 that his family is a part of. "We try to sweeten the reporters' dispositions," he jokes, and he thinks it's working. "We've been having a couple of good-message weeks."

What's With Watts and Richardson?

It could have been the environment, the Clinton School of Public Service in Little Rock, or the brash frankness of an ex-politician. But former Rep. J. C. Watts, once the House GOP's main communicator and a sometimes entry on Republican vice presidential lists, fessed up at the University of Arkansas last month that he likes Democratic New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson in the 2008 presidential race. "Personally, I'm a Bill Richardson fan," he admits. "I think he has the Bill Clinton touch with people."

A G-Man's Version of Oprah's List

He's no Oprah. But FBI Director and avid reader Robert Mueller has started a new bureau reading list to help his G-men broaden their horizons. The list has more than 60 books about the FBI's history, terrorism, intelligence, and professional development. "He just thought," says an insider, "that we must have more formalized intellectual stimulation." Some gems: Public Enemies, by Bryan Burrough, about the birth of the FBI; The Looming Tower, Lawrence Wright's book about al Qaeda's road to 9/11; China, Inc. by Ted Fishman; and Louis Gerstner's Who Says Elephants Can't Dance? about IBM's historic turnaround. We also hear that Mueller's a big fan of former GE bigwig Jack Welch. So naturally, Welch's Winning also gets top billing.

Paul Bedard's blog is at www.usnews.com/whispers

With Anna Mulrine, Silla Brush, Suzi Parker and Chitra Ragavan

Focus Is On Veterans' Chief As Inquiries On Care Begin (NYT)

By Lynette Clemetson

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 4 — As President Bush ordered an investigation of the military's care of wounded soldiers and veterans last week, Jim Nicholson, secretary of veterans affairs, darted between events, seeking to put a positive public face on his beleaguered agency.

In Chicago on Friday, Mr. Nicholson spoke to a group of Navy boot camp graduates, toured the North Chicago V.A. Medical Center, and visited a private trauma clinic to gather ideas on providing special care for injuries like brain trauma.

"If there is even one injured veteran that falls through the cracks then that is too many," he said in a telephone interview at the end of the day. "It pains me to hear about problems in our system, but I am a competitor, and I am finding that it is strengthening my resolve and deepening my commitment."

In the wake of the shake-up last week in the Defense Department medical system — which included the firing of the two-star general in charge of Walter Reed Army Medical Center and the resignation of Francis J. Harvey as secretary of the Army — the Department of Veterans Affairs is facing intense political and public scrutiny. The agency operates the country's largest health care system, serving more than 5.5 million veterans a year.

On Monday, the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform is to conduct a hearing at Walter Reed on the problems there, and the Senate Armed Services Committee has set a hearing for Tuesday. Mr. Nicholson's agency is also likely to come under scrutiny at the hearings.

"I welcome Congressional oversight, and the oversight of the president and the commission he is forming," Mr. Nicholson said. "I welcome them looking at us and taking a measure of how we are doing, so we can improve any deficiencies that are found."

Mr. Nicholson, 69, a Vietnam War veteran and past chairman of the Republican National Committee, was appointed by Mr. Bush to lead the department in 2005.

He has been accused by some veterans and the organizations that represent them of being primarily a mouthpiece for the Bush administration and of being slow to respond to increasing strains on his agency as returning soldiers move from facilities like Walter Reed, which is run by the Defense Department, into the veterans affairs system.

Critics say he has under-emphasized his agency's budget needs to Congress, has not responded to calls for more mental health workers and brain trauma specialists and has failed to overhaul disability claims procedures. Some leaders of veterans groups say Mr. Nicholson is less communicative than his predecessors.

"We're supposed to be partners, but there is no free flow of information since he took over," said Bill Bradshaw, director of National Veterans Service for the Veterans of Foreign Wars. "We often learn about changes after they are done, and there is little consultation."

Mr. Nicholson says his agency is making changes. It is putting procedures in place to screen all veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan for signs of brain trauma and the agency is also researching how to shorten the claims process, he said.

"I am willing to take responsibility for the mistakes in the system, but at the same time I am entitled to credit for all the good things and advances happening at the V.A.," Mr. Nicholson said. He said the V.A. system had been cited "as among the best, if not the best" integrated health systems in the country. Mr. Nicholson called the 2008 budget request of nearly $87 billion "a landmark request" and said that V.A. financing had increased by 77 percent since Mr. Bush took office in 2001. (Critics point out that there are also increased demands from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.)

Friends and colleagues say that Mr. Nicholson, a deeply religious man from dirt-poor Iowa roots, has maintained a chin-up response. But his wife, Suzanne, said the scrutiny and criticisms had shaken him.

"He's not one to show his emotions. When he is upset and worried a calmness comes over him," said Suzanne Nicholson, 62. "But it keeps him awake at night. It is terribly distressing and awful for him."

His stoicism and determination, said his wife and close friends, are an outgrowth of his tough childhood. Born in the small, rural town of Struble, Iowa, he was the third of seven children of an alcoholic father and a devout Catholic mother who taught her children nightly catechism lessons by kerosene lamp because the family had no electricity and no car to get them to daily Mass.

After high school, he was accepted to West Point. He was an Army ranger and was awarded a Bronze Star in Vietnam. Later, after law school, he became a legal counsel for the Denver Home Builders Association, and later a developer.

Mr. Nicholson was viewed skeptically by some in Washington when he was elected in 1997 to succeed Haley Barbour as Republican Party chairman. But he eventually won respect, even praise, as a skilled fund-raiser and a tough, credible leader. Mr. Bush appointed him ambassador to the Vatican in 2001.

Through his varied careers, Mr. Nicholson has never run anything even close to the size of the Department of Veterans Affairs, which operates 155 medical centers and roughly 900 outpatient clinics. With a staff of 235,000, it is the second-largest government agency behind the Defense Department.

DOJ_NMG_0139607

His detractors, including some leaders of veterans groups, say Mr. Nicholson has a far less cooperative relationship with their groups than his predecessors had. Some say he is more attentive to his bosses in the administration than the veterans he serves and that he lacks deep experience in veterans affairs.

"Mr. Nicholson is purely a political appointee who comes from a background of no involvement in veterans issues," said David W. Gorman, executive director of Disabled American Veterans. "He very much wants to do what he believes is the right thing to do, but not knowing the system as one needs to, he is at a distinct disadvantage."

Not all veterans representatives are as critica. John F. Sommer, executive director of the Washington office of the American Legion, the largest veterans service organization, said Mr. Nicholson had been attentive to his organization's needs.

"Are there problems with the V.A.? Sure. But did Jim Nicholson cause the problems? I don't think so," Mr. Sommer said. "Especially when it comes to funding, you have to look at the amount of money the V.A. is getting from Congress."

Some Congressional leaders say Mr. Nicholson and his agency are victims of political maneuvering. "Mr. Nicholson just happens to be in the wrong party," said Senator Larry Craig, Republican of Idaho, the ranking member of the Committee on Veterans Affairs. "People now want to say that not only are they against the war and the way the president has handled it, but now they want to take aim at the way the government takes care of the veterans."

More serious than complaints about Mr. Nicholson's style are charges that he has not sufficiently addressed efficiency and preparedness. Linda J. Bilmes, a professor of public finance at Harvard, recently completed a study of the long-term costs of providing medical care and benefits to veterans of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. The Department of Veterans Affairs, she said, "is overwhelmed in every area."

Valor And Squalor (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

When Salon, the online magazine, reported on mistreatment of veterans at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center two years ago, officials simply denied that there were any problems. And they initially tried to brush off last month's exposé in The Washington Post.

But this time, with President Bush's approval at 29 percent, Democrats in control of Congress, and Donald Rumsfeld no longer defense secretary — Robert Gates, his successor, appears genuinely distressed at the situation — the whitewash didn't stick.

Yet even now it's not clear whether the public will be told the full story, which is that the horrors of Walter Reed's outpatient unit are no aberration. For all its cries of "support the troops," the Bush administration has treated veterans' medical care the same way it treats everything else: nickel-and-diming the needy, protecting the incompetent and privatizing everything it can.

What makes this a particular shame is that in the Clinton years, veterans' health care — like the Federal Emergency Management Agency — became a shining example of how good leadership can revitalize a troubled government program. By the early years of this decade the Veterans Health Administration was, by many measures, providing the highest-quality health care in America. (It probably still is: Walter Reed is a military facility, not run by the V.H.A.)

But as with FEMA, the Bush administration has done all it can to undermine that achievement. And the Walter Reed scandal is another Hurricane Katrina: the moment when the administration's misgovernment became obvious to everyone.

The problem starts with money. The administration uses carefully cooked numbers to pretend that it has been generous to veterans, but the historical data contained in its own budget for fiscal 2008 tell the true story. The quagmire in Iraq has vastly increased the demands on the Veterans Administration, yet since 2001 federal outlays for veterans' medical care have actually lagged behind overall national health spending.

To save money, the administration has been charging veterans for many formerly free services. For example, in 2005 Salon reported that some Walter Reed patients were forced to pay hundreds of dollars each month for their meals.

More important, the administration has broken longstanding promises of lifetime health care to those who defend our nation. Two months before the invasion of Iraq the V.H.A., which previously offered care to all veterans, introduced severe new restrictions on who is entitled to enroll in its health care system. As the agency's Web site helpfully explains, veterans whose income exceeds as little as $27,790 a year, and who lack "special eligibilities such as a compensable service connected condition or recent combat service," will be turned away.

So when you hear stories of veterans who spend months or years fighting to get the care they deserve, trying to prove that their injuries are service-related, remember this: all this red tape was created not by the inherent inefficiency of government bureaucracy, but by the Bush administration's penny-pinching.

But money is only part of the problem.

DOJ_NMG_0139608

We know from Hurricane Katrina postmortems that one of the factors degrading FEMA's effectiveness was the Bush administration's relentless push to outsource and privatize disaster management, which demoralized government employees and drove away many of the agency's most experienced professionals. It appears that the same thing has been happening to veterans' care.

The redoubtable Henry Waxman, chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, points out that IAP Worldwide Services, a company run by two former Halliburton executives, received a large contract to run Walter Reed under suspicious circumstances: the Army reversed the results of an audit concluding that government employees could do the job more cheaply.

And Mr. Waxman, who will be holding a hearing on the issue today, appears to have solid evidence, including an internal Walter Reed memo from last year, that the prospect of privatization led to a FEMA-type exodus of skilled personnel.

What comes next? Francis J. Harvey, who as far as I can tell was the first defense contractor appointed secretary of the Army, has been forced out. But the parallels between what happened at Walter Reed and what happened to New Orleans — not to mention parallels with the mother of all scandals, the failed reconstruction of Iraq — tell us that the roots of the scandal run far deeper than the actions of a few bad men.

At The Pentagon, Gates Seen As Liberator (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Robert M. Gates is finding Donald H. Rumsfeld an easy act to follow, as the new defense secretary wins hearts and minds throughout Washington and overseas.

"Stylistically, it's night and day," said Rep. Mark Udall (D-Colo.), a member of the House Armed Services Committee. With Gates's modest manner, Udall said, "He's the anti-Rumsfeld."

At the Pentagon, where Gates has been greeted as a liberator, "you can already feel the stability," said retired Air Force Lt. Gen. Charles F. Wald, formerly the deputy U.S. commander in Europe. He said he considers the appointment of Gates to be the Bush administration's best move in years.

At the same time, Gates has shown that he can act decisively, as when he fired Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey on Friday over the handling of the growing patient-care scandal at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Expressing disappointment, Gates said that "the problems at Walter Reed appear to be problems of leadership."

Former national security adviser Brent Scowcroft urged caution on Gates's honeymoon. "How much of it is Bob Gates as a personality, manager and leader, and how much of it is Rumsfeld being gone, is hard to say," said Scowcroft, who has known Gates for 30 years. "Rumsfeld was a difficult man to work for."

Indeed, in his first months at the Pentagon, Gates has been welcomed largely because of who he is not rather than what he has done, noted a longtime friend who has held top national security posts. In the months ahead, however, Gates will be judged on his own decision-making in the war he has inherited from Rumsfeld. Speaking privately with members of Congress, Gates has said he has three priorities in his new job: "Iraq, Iraq and Iraq."

It isn't clear that the goodwill Gates has engendered will help him manage the war. "I don't know that anybody can do that job," former defense secretary William S. Cohen said. "I think he'll do as well as anyone can do."

Gates said he finds it "amusing" to see people parsing out whether he is distinguishing himself from his predecessor. Rather, he told reporters in Spain last month, "I'm just going along doing what feels right for me."

One thing that apparently feels right is slyly alluding to Rumsfeld's memorable statements. Speaking at a recent security conference in Germany, Gates said that divisions such as "Old Europe versus New" were "characterizations [that] belong to the past" -- a reference to a crack made by Rumsfeld in January 2003 that rankled some longtime NATO allies.

One major difference for Gates from his previous work in intelligence -- he spent 27 years at the CIA, serving as director from 1991 to 1993 -- is the amount of time he must spend in the public eye, testifying before Congress, holding news conferences and visiting foreign capitals. In his first 2 1/2 months as defense secretary, he has visited Iraq, Afghanistan and Europe.

He has made it clear he doesn't intend to emulate Rumsfeld's bravura-filled televised briefings. "I feel more at ease in a more informal setting," he said last month. "I like a setting that is more of a conversation than a one-way means of communication."

Some experts worry that Gates's inexperience in military affairs will make him rely too much on a defense establishment that was slow to adjust to reality in Iraq. Others argue that his expertise will help. "This is an intelligence war," said Andrew Krepinevich, a retired Army officer who directs the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments. "How many tanks we have doesn't matter. So Gates being an intelligence guy might be a real advantage." Gates was also a member of the Iraq Study

DOJ_NMG_0139609

Group, which in December called for the United States to withdraw most combat forces from Iraq early next year -- a move the Bush administration has rejected.

In contrast to Rumsfeld's damn-the-torpedoes style, Gates conceded in the conference in Germany that the United States sometimes makes mistakes and must better explain its actions, especially with issues such as the treatment of terrorism suspects held at the detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The audience of 250 security officials and experts applauded enthusiastically.

A significant step Gates took at the Pentagon early on was putting the word out that he would keep almost everyone in their jobs -- including some officials seen as Rumsfeld men. "His choice to work with people already in place rather than bring in a new team sent a very strong signal of confidence in the professionalism of the organization, and they were thirsting for that after Secretary Rumsfeld's erratic irascibility," said Kori Schake, who worked with the Rumsfeld Pentagon as a White House defense official and now teaches at West Point.

Despite some departmental friction over the burdens of Iraq, Gates seems to have a better relationship with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice than did Rumsfeld. Both are Soviet experts, and they have known each other since they were on the staff of the National Security Council during the George H.W. Bush administration. Last year Rice asked Gates to be her deputy. "I think they have a real compatibility," Cohen said.

World Bank Slow To Inform Employees Of Baghdad Shooting (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

World Bank employees were surprised late Thursday by an e-mail advising them that a bank driver in Iraq had been seriously wounded in a shooting in Baghdad the previous week, and had been evacuated from the country.

Usually, news of serious staff injuries goes up quickly on the internal intranet. "When anything like this happens in a country it's supposed to go up there immediately," one staffer explained. "People are concerned, maybe it's someone they know, and injuries can often occur while working in Third World countries. And they want to know the bank is looking out for them."

But Thursday's e-mail, sent at 6:16 p.m. from Daniela Gressani, a vice president for the Middle East and North Africa (MENA), came hours after employees had been passing around a story by the Inter Press Service news agency about the shooting -- and accusing the bank of keeping it quiet so as not to disturb efforts to recruit employees to work in Iraq.

In her e-mail, Gressani -- who recently replaced another vice president who had questioned World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz's decision to go big-time into nation-building in Iraq -- said that MENA employees at a Feb. 22 meeting "were informed that we had just evacuated a bank driver from Baghdad who had been injured when caught in a cross-fire at a checkpoint.

"Many of you have asked about his progress," she wrote, reporting that he had been "evacuated and treated in a hospital" in Amman, Jordan. The employee's name and that of his family were being withheld for his privacy and their safety, she said. His condition was "stable and improving daily and we expect a full recovery."

The bank's rank and file were upset because the Inter Press article was the first time many headquarters employees -- for example, those who work in the Asia, Africa or Latin America regions -- and others stationed around the world -- had heard of the shooting. The intranet postings, we're told, are the first thing bank employees check every morning when they get to work.

We began calling the bank Thursday afternoon about the incident in order to knock down the accusation that the bank had kept the matter under wraps, but have not gotten a response.

First Lady Weighs In on Iraq, Then Finds Safety in Seals

First lady Laura Bush raised a few eyebrows last Monday when she weighed in on the Iraq war during an interview with CNN's Larry King.

She acknowledged that the war was "wearying," and "probably" would continue after she and her husband leave town, and then reminded us that the media make things seem worse than they really are.

"Many parts of Iraq are stable now," she told King. "But, of course, what we see on television is the one bombing a day that discourages everybody."

Even President Bush, who used to make the press-bashing argument, no longer does so.

But, judging from a White House release Friday, she was back on message.

"This is a great way to end today, with the monk seals," she told reporters after visiting the Hawaiian Monk Seal Captive Care Project at Midway, "because so far today it's looked like this is all really bird life, but the real huge number of species, and one of the reasons this has been named a national monument, is because of the marine life -- the fish that we didn't get to see today, of course, we didn't snorkel, but if you were here in the summer, you probably could do that -- and all the other algae and other things that are below the water that are so important to this national marine monument."

A reporter asked a question about the visit.

DOJ_NMG_0139610

"Well, I love the monk seals, of course, everyone loves them, loves the way they look," she said. "And then I fell in love with all those little albatross chicks. You feel very protective of them, they're so vulnerable, sitting on their nests. It's so important that they don't have -- they don't have any natural predators here in their natural life, and it's really important that no invasive predators ever come."

Can't argue with that.

Bob Ney, Still Glad He Didn't 'Miss the Dance'

Some people, reflecting on a particularly bad patch in their lives, often turn to poets, writers, spiritual leaders and the like for philosophical ballast.

Former representative Bob Ney (R-Ohio) -- heading to the federal pen last week for 30 months for taking free meals, gifts and trips from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff-- turned to Garth Brooks.

In an e-mail to supporters obtained by Gannett News Service, Ney said he would "not have access to e-mail so this will be my last for awhile. i wanted to drop you a short e-mail to give you my address," in Morgantown, W.Va., he wrote, including his inmate number -- 28882-016. The e-mail, typed in all lowercase letters, can be found at http://www.zanesvilletimesrecorder.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20070301/NEWS01/70301003. Ney said, "someone asked me the other day, if i wish i had never ran for office. i answered that i am glad that i did. nothing can erase the wonderful memories . . . working to bring jobs to the district, helping constituents . . . trying to change law to help people. . . ." Not to mention that wonderful golf trip to Scotland.

Then he did a Rumsfeld-style self-interview. "would I change things if i could,sure. am i sorry for things that happened, absolutely, and i will pay the price."

He closed: "As garth brooks said in his song the dance:

and now I'm glad I didn't know
the way it all would end, the way it all would go
our lives are better left to chance,
i could have missed the pain,
but i'd have had to miss, the dance."

Cheney Takes His Line, if Not His Cue, From Gore

Former U.N. ambassador John Bolton has been trashing the administration lately, but Vice President Cheney had only praise for him at the Conservative Political Action Conference here last week, saying he wanted "especially" to recognize Bolton, "who did a superb job for America at the United Nations."

Cheney even stole a line from Al Gore. "Like it or not," he said, "the enemy we face in the war on terror has made Iraq the primary front in that war. To use a popular phrase, this is an inconvenient truth." The crowd laughed and applauded.

Out Of Stocks, And Into ...? (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

All dressed up with no place to go.

That's the problem confronting the investment dollar in the wake of last week's stock slide.

As billions of dollars came out of the world's stock markets last week, the money didn't just evaporate. It is trying to decide where to alight.

The economy continues to grow, generating profits. Market interest rates remain low -- in fact they have been falling again -- making it cheap to borrow money. So there is no shortage of cash.

The question is where, once the dust settles a bit, the cash will go. Some lately has been heading for safety, to such things as Treasury bonds. In the longer run it is likely to go elsewhere as well, and where you think it will go depends a lot on what you think just happened to the financial markets.

Analysts see at least three ways to view last week's trouble, which resulted in a 4.2% drop in the Dow Jones Industrial Average. Goldman Sachs economists Ed McKelvey and Andrew Tilton outlined three competing views in a report last week.

1. A much-overdue short-term pullback. The Dow Jones industrials hadn't fallen as much as 2% from a high in more than seven months, and hadn't fallen 10% in almost four years. That is an exceptionally long time without a serious hiccup.

If last week's trouble was just a hiccup, then stocks should rebound in the next few weeks, and the trick is to pick out the stocks likely to rebound the most.

"This does not mark the end of the cyclical bull market," wrote veteran money manager Steve Leuthold, chairman of Leuthold Weeden Research, in a special report to clients after Tuesday's 416-point Dow selloff.

DOJ_NMG_0139611

"I am extremely doubtful that this big down day marks the start of the market's widely anticipated 7%-10% correction phase," Mr. Leuthold wrote. "Why? Because far too many CNBC pundits now expect this to happen." He said he would be looking for stocks to buy, including adding to his investments in China.

Some analysts think that even if the problems are just temporary, they could last a little longer. In this view, hedge funds -- large, loosely regulated pools of private capital -- had more money invested in stocks than they really wanted, to avoid being left behind by the market's rampant gains. Now, with the market clearly no longer rampant, hedge funds will take the opportunity to pull back and bet on declines -- and while they do so, stocks could remain under pressure.

2. A flight from risky investments. If that is what is going on, then the market shift is more serious.

At least for now, this appears to be happening. Investors suddenly have pulled back from a raft of risky securities, from developing-country stocks and bonds to junk bonds and small stocks in the U.S.

"I would caution people not to say that this is over," says Marc Stern, chief investment officer at Bessemer Investment Management in New York. His view is that investors had become blasé about risky securities, paid too much for them, and now are seeing the prices of those assets fall back to a more normal level. "One should naturally expect heightened volatility to persist. A healthy correction in this time period wouldn't surprise us," he says -- meaning he thinks risky investments could fall further.

Mr. Stern, in other words, won't be following Mr. Leuthold into China anytime soon. He won't be buying developing-country bonds until their prices have fallen to a level he considers more realistic. Earlier this year, Mr. Stern had built up his cash hoard and has pulled back from risky securities. Once the storm seems to be passing, he says, he likely will buy larger, blue-chip stocks that can withstand the possibility of more stormy weather as the year progresses.

"Some of the easy money that went elsewhere may be coming back to the U.S.," says Richard Sichel, chief investment officer at Philadelphia Trust, who also thinks the stocks of big U.S. multinational companies could come back into favor. Big-stock bulls have been predicting such a shift for more than a year, and big stocks generally have lagged behind other investments, but the bulls think they will come into their own now.

Nervousness about risk also is evident in the way investors have been using stock options. For months, investors didn't feel much need to buy and sell stock options to protect themselves from sudden market changes. An index measuring the use of options, called the Vix and tracked by the Chicago Board Options Exchange, has been unusually low for months. Last week it jumped 70%, an almost unheard-of gain in percentage terms. In absolute terms, however, the Vix is still well below its historic average.

3. A sign of a weaker economy to come. This could be the most troubling prognosis. Some investors took former U.S. Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan at his word last week when he said a recession later this year couldn't be ruled out. These investors see the flight to bonds as another sign conservative investors are hunkering down for a period of economic trouble.

Until last week, investors who had bet on a softening economy hadn't done very well. Consumer spending and corporate profits repeatedly have come in stronger than most pundits expected. Reports of the consumer's demise have been exaggerated.

Despite this, the Goldman economists say in their report that they think economic growth, the housing market and consumer spending all may be softer this year than more bullish analysts are forecasting. They also don't rule out the possibility that default problems in the lower end of the mortgage market could bleed into other lending markets.

The Goldman economists see a silver lining: They expect the Fed to step in by June and begin cutting its target interest rates.

Early this year, before the U.S. government slashed its once-strong estimate of fourth-quarter economic growth, many investors thought the robust economy would prevent the Fed from cutting interest rates until year's end, if then. Today, with the economy appearing to be growing more like 2% than 3% annually, bond yields and interest-rate futures suggest many investors think the Fed will cut rates by summer to give the economy a boost.

Lower interest rates support stronger economic growth. They also support home sales because they make it cheaper to invest in land and to take out a mortgage.

And cheap money makes it easier for people to borrow money and invest in financial markets. A big source of support for the stock market over the past four years, and for a wide variety of riskier investments, has been the huge amount of cash sloshing around, looking for a place to go. The availability of cheap money has made investors a lot more comfortable about taking risk.

As long as the Fed is expected to cut rates -- rather than raise them, as it was doing in 2000, when the last bear market began -- the cheap money can continue supporting stocks. Cheap money would help offset some of the worries these days about slowing economic growth, a credit crunch, a weak housing market and investor exposure to risky assets.

DOJ_NMG_0139612

Mortgage Crisis Spirals, And Casualties Mount (NYT)

By Julie Creswell And Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

Even in affluent Orange County, Calif., the growing wealth of executives and brokers in the booming mortgage industry was hard to miss.

For Kal Elsayed, a former executive at New Century Financial, a large lender based in Irvine, driving a red convertible Ferrari to work at a company that provided home loans to people with low incomes and weak credit might have appeared ostentatious, he now acknowledges. But, he says, that was nothing compared with the private jets that executives at other companies had.

"You just lost touch with reality after a while because that's just how people were living," said Mr. Elsayed, 42, who spent nine years at New Century before leaving to start his own mortgage firm in 2005. "We made so much money you couldn't believe it. And you didn't have to do anything. You just had to show up."

Just as the technology boom of the late 1990s turned twenty-something programmers into dot-com billionaires, and leveraged buyouts a decade earlier turned Wall Street bankers into Masters of the Universe, the explosive growth in subprime lending turned mortgage bankers and brokers into multimillionaires seemingly overnight.

Now an escalating crisis in the market, which seemed to reach a new crescendo late last week, is threatening a wide band of people. Foremost are the poor and minority homeowners who used easy credit to buy houses that are turning out to be too expensive for them now that mortgage rates are going up, but the pain is also being felt widely throughout the business world.

Large companies that bought subprime lenders during the boom, like H&R Block and HSBC, are now scrambling to sell them or scale back their exposure. Many investors are also likely to suffer: Wall Street firms made billions in fees, commissions and trading revenue from packaging and selling subprime mortgages to them as bonds.

New Century has emerged as a poster child for the lenders that rode that boom to the top and are now in free fall. The company disclosed on Friday that federal prosecutors and securities regulators were investigating stock sales and accounting errors. The latter could jeopardize billions of dollars in financing for the company, which issued $39.4 billion in subprime loans in the first nine months of last year.

Weakening home prices and rising default rates have rocked the subprime business. But for those who cashed out before the market turned, the ride up was particularly sweet. The three founders of New Century, for example, together made more than $40.5 million in profits from selling shares in the company from 2004 to 2006, according to an analysis by Thomson Financial. They collected millions of dollars more in dividends, salaries, bonuses and perks.

The company said in a statement yesterday that the founders were "still significant shareholders," noting that they collectively owned about 7 percent of the company at the end of last year.

New Century's stock price, which seemed to mirror the trajectory of the subprime business, peaked at nearly $66 a share in December of 2004 and traded in the $40s most of last year; on Friday, it was trading at $11 a share after the market closed. In a series of sales from August to November, two of the company's founders sold shares for an average price of about $40 a share, for a total profit of $21.4 million.

It is not known whether the stock sales by the founders are among the sales being examined by federal investigators. Some of them had been part of scheduled stock sales that are often used by executives to diversify their portfolios. But some of the sales occurred on the same day that the executives entered the plans. A New Century spokeswoman, Laura Oberhelman, said that executives declined further comment.

The founders' stock also rose in the social circles of southern California, the epicenter of the boom in subprime. Five of the 10 biggest providers of subprime mortgages last year had their headquarters in the region.

Robert K. Cole, 60, a co-founder who retired as chairman and chief executive last year, lives in a 6,100-square-foot oceanfront home in Laguna Beach that is valued at tens of millions of dollars and was once owned by the chief executive of Pimco Advisors, the giant bond trading and management firm. Edward F. Gotschall, 52, another co-founder who is vice chairman of the board, donated $3 million for an expanded trauma center at Mission Hospital that will be named for him and his wife Susan.

The executives from New Century are by no means alone in cashing in on the bonanza, and they do not appear to have scored the biggest profits. That title may be claimed by Angelo R. Mozilo, the chief executive of Countrywide Financial, the nation's largest stand-alone mortgage company and one of the largest subprime lenders last year. He reaped more than $270 million in profits from sales of stock and the exercise of stock options from 2004 to the start of this year, according to the Thompson analysis.

DOJ_NMG_0139613

Of course, most of the 500,000 people who work in the mortgage industry did not cash in so grandly. The wealth was concentrated among executives, loan officers and brokers, because the greatest rewards were meted out in the form of commissions, bonuses and stock awards.

"In the hot times, it was not unusual to see a broker make a million bucks," said Guy Cecala, publisher of Inside Mortgage Finance, a trade publication. "You can carry that up further to people who ran the companies. The whole business revolves around personal compensation."

The hot times are clearly over.

New Century's disclosure of the federal investigations on Friday was the most serious in a string of shocks to have rocked the industry in the last three months.

A handful of lenders have sought bankruptcy protection, several have been acquired and a few have been shut down. Also on Friday, Fremont General, a top-five lender, said it planned to leave the business.

Industry officials say they are seeing an exodus of executives and salespeople as companies fold, cut jobs and push out early leaders.

"Everyone has run for the hills," said William D. Dallas, whose company, Ownit Mortgage, filed for bankruptcy protection in December after it lost financing from Merrill Lynch and other banks.

For the borrowers of these mortgages, it may become more difficult to refinance if lending standards are tightened significantly. Many are already facing the prospect of payment shock when low, fixed-interest mortgage rates adjust to higher, variable rates.

On Wall Street, big investment banks could lose a significant source of revenue if the appetite for bonds backed by mortgages dries up.

In the last two years many skeptics began warning that the red-hot housing market and adjustable-rate loans would blend into a toxic brew. Last year, subprime loans totaled $600 billion, or about 20 percent of all mortgages, up from $120 billion and 5 percent in 2001, according to Inside Mortgage Finance. More than half of subprime loans have adjustable rates.

Many of the problems that have surfaced thus far are not tied to the resetting of rates. Rather, they stem from a sharp and early spike in the default rates among loans issued last year.

For example, about 13.8 percent of the loans in a group of mortgages New Century sold to investors in April were behind in payments or in foreclosure by January. By comparison, only 6 percent of loans in a pool sold to investors in March 2005 had met that same fate by January 2006.

Investors and regulators fear that the problems will only worsen as so many borrowers have fallen behind so quickly, especially at a time when the overall economy is healthy. The phenomenon suggests that lending standards were significantly weakened last year and that lenders were not as watchful for fraudulent transactions.

For New Century, the early payment defaults pose significant financial problems. In the first nine months of last year, Wall Street banks and investors that it does business with forced it to buy back $469 million in loans it had sold to them, up from $240 million for the same period in 2005.

The company was able to sell back about half of those loans at a discount of 26.5 percent. How it handled the remainder — about $227 million — is now under scrutiny. According to accounting rules the company should have valued the loans on its books for what they were worth today, not their previous face value. But it did not.

If it had, the company would have seen its earnings fall by about $60 million before taxes, wiping out most of its profit in the third quarter, according to Zach Gast, an analyst at the Center for Financial Research and Analysis, a forensic accounting firm.

This is important, because the company's financing agreements require that it not lose money for any rolling six-month period. On Friday, New Century said it did not expect to make a profit in the six months that ended in December and that it was negotiating with lenders to waive the requirement but has only secured six of 11 waivers it needs.

"They had losses sitting on their balance sheets," Mr. Gast said.

In August, the company's chief financial officer, Patti M. Dodge, announced she was stepping down from her post to oversee investor relations, a department that typically reports to the chief financial officer. Taj S. Bindra, a former executive at Washington Mutual, replaced her in November.

For the second time in a decade, New Century finds itself fighting to survive. The firm's roots were planted at Plaza Home Mortgage Bank where the three founders of New Century — Mr. Cole, a longtime mortgage executive; Mr. Gotschall; and a lawyer named Bradley A. Morrice — worked together. The three formed New Century in 1995 after Plaza was sold to Fleet Mortgage Group, now a part of Washington Mutual.

In the late 1990s, New Century narrowly survived accounting concerns and a scare in the bond market after Russia' s default in 1998. It pulled through thanks to an investment by U.S. Bancorp, a bank based in Minneapolis.

DOJ_NMG_0139614

With interest rates at historic lows, it quickly grabbed a big share of the fast-growing subprime market during the housing boom.

“They walked into a niche industry at a time when everything was lining up perfectly for what they did,” said W. Scott Simon, a managing director at Pimco Advisors. “In 2001, 2002 and 2003 the subprime business was just phenomenally profitable. Home prices kept appreciating and it seemed that no loans ever went bad.”

From Serving In Iraq To Living On The Streets (WP)

By Christian Davenport

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

It was a bad week for Aaron Chesley. He talked back to the staff at a Baltimore homeless shelter, got into an argument with a fellow veteran and missed an appointment for his post-traumatic stress disorder counseling session.

"Are you still watching the news?" his counselor, Anthony Holmes, asked.

Maybe that's what had set Chesley off. He had been showing progress since he came to the program last fall. But television footage from the war could cast him back in Iraq in an instant, back to fingering the trigger of his machine gun, scanning the horizon for insurgents. And Holmes knew it wouldn't take much for Chesley to land back on the streets.

"No. If the news is on, I turn my back," Chesley said.

In a homeless shelter filled with Vietnam War veterans, Chesley, 26, a former Catonsville High School honors student who joined the West Virginia Army National Guard in 2000 to help pay for college, was the only one in the facility who fought in the country's latest conflict. But across the nation, veterans of recent combat in Iraq and Afghanistan are slowly starting to trickle into shelters, officials say.

The number of homeless veterans from recent wars is hard to gauge. From 2004 to 2006, the Department of Veterans Affairs provided shelter to 300 veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan tours, out of the tens of thousands who have served.

That figure "is not even close to accurate," said Paul Rieckhoff, executive director of the Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, because it doesn't include the "others sleeping in buses, their cars or on the streets."

In New York City alone, he said his organization has helped 60 homeless veterans since 2004.

As in the Vietnam War era, when thousands of vets ended up homeless, there are already signs that the recent conflicts are taking a traumatic psychological toll on some service members. Many veterans' advocates said that despite unprecedented attempts by the military and Veterans Affairs to care for veterans, increasing numbers of the new generation of warriors are ending up homeless.

"This is something we need to be concerned about," said Cheryl Beversdorf, president of the National Coalition for Homeless Veterans, a Washington-based nonprofit.

Not everyone agrees, however, that the wars will spark a significant uptick in homelessness. Peter H. Dougherty, director of Veteran Affairs' Homeless Veterans programs, said that the administration is "light years ahead" of where it was during the Vietnam era. Without a draft, today's all-voluntary military is "better physically and mentally prepared" for combat, he said. The department now also provides free health care for two years after Iraq and Afghanistan vets get out of the military, and it's focusing on preventive services that help veterans and their families cope.

"We are continuing to expand services, but we don't see any influx yet," he said.

* * *

The debate comes as Army studies have found that up to 30 percent of soldiers coming home from Iraq have suffered from depression, anxiety or PTSD. A recent study found that those who have served multiple tours are 50 percent more likely to suffer from acute combat stress.

Veterans' homeless shelters across the country, such as the Maryland Center for Veterans Education and Training in Baltimore, are bracing for increased demand. "The wave has not hit yet, but it will," said retired Army Col. Charles Williams, MCVET's executive director.

Nearby, the South Baltimore Station shelter is doubling the size of its program in anticipation of the Iraq war vets it expects to serve, said Woody Curry, the center's program director. He thinks it will be several years before they start showing up in large numbers.

"Usually it takes a period of time before it surfaces -- the PTSD," he said. "And the military mentality leads you to try to tough it out and not say anything."

He said he was particularly worried about members of the National Guard and Reserves who return to their civilian lives after their service. "A lot of these guys were just everyday working people, and then you put them in a situation like that," he said. In Iraq, "you're on a hyper-vigilant state all the time. You can't turn that off. It becomes who you are."

DOJ_NMG_0139615

Meanwhile, a report by the Democratic staff of the House Veterans Affairs Committee found that from October 2005 to June 2006, the number of Iraq and Afghanistan veterans seeking services from walk-in veterans centers doubled, from 4,467 to 9,103.

"It's clear from the report that Vet Center capacity has not kept pace with demand for services, and the administration has failed to properly plan and prepare for the mental health needs of returning veterans and their families," U.S. Rep. Michael H. Michaud (D-Maine), a member of the committee, said in a statement.

But Dougherty said the increase shows that more veterans were receiving treatment, and that the department's efforts to reach out them has succeeded. It has started sending letters to vets returning from Iraq and Afghanistan with the location of the nearest veterans center and "encouraging them to go," he said.

"One of the big differences now is we're much more in a preventative health-care mode than we were in the past," he said. "We're hoping by getting that early intervention we'll be able to take care of them."

Although many vets suffer from PTSD, "epidemiologic studies do not suggest that there is a causal connection between military service, service in Vietnam, or exposure to combat and homelessness among veterans," according to the Veteran Affairs Web site. Rather, homelessness in veterans is cause by an amalgam of forces: family support, finances, education, mental illness -- the same factors that cause homelessness in the general population.

The veterans department is going to considerable lengths to reach out to Iraq and Afghanistan veterans and their families, Dougherty said. There are also specialized services for women, who are an increasing part of the military force and are seeing combat in Iraq. Meanwhile, the total number of homeless veterans has gone down from about 250,000 10 years ago to about 194,000 this year.

The Army has increased the number of mental health professionals in Iraq and Afghanistan, and a pilot program where primary care physicians at Army bases screen patients for PTSD and other disorders is expanding. The military has also started following up on service members three to six months after they return from war to check on their overall physical and mental health.

* * *

In Iraq, Chesley's unit provided convoy security, which meant the Army specialist was out on the roads exposed, always wondering when the next roadside bomb would explode.

He became hardened, he said, prepared to die: "It was kind of like you embrace death to stay alive. If you were going to die, you were going to die."

When he got home in March 2005, he struggled to adapt from the first day. He was excited to be home, and he knew his family was waiting, but as he got off the plane he felt dizzy.

Once gregarious and engaging, Chesley was withdrawn and sullen. This was not the young man who was a star athlete and an honors student, whose walls were adorned with plaques and certificates, whose principal, Robert Tomback, recently remembered him as "bright, quite charming and enormously popular."

Chesley started drinking heavily, he said, "putting coffee in my vodka just to get going in the morning." Drinking led to drugs and that led to trouble.

He stole about $600 from his mother. He was arrested twice for DUI, once after he hit a police car, the other after he flipped the truck with the windows he tinted so no one could see him drinking and smoking pot as he drove. He ended up floating between family members' homes.

He tried to resume his studies at West Virginia University, but he couldn't regain his old life.

Finally, his stepfather brought him to a VA Hospital in Baltimore, and Chesley was diagnosed with PTSD and bipolar disorder. Later, he enrolled in MCVET, the nonprofit shelter that provides drug and alcohol counseling and other services.

Sitting across from Holmes at the counseling session, Chesley was a model of contrition and promise. He vowed to take his medicine, to talk to someone if he felt rage creeping up, to "work on being respectful even if I'm angry."

Holmes finally let him go but worried.

"He's still got a lot of anger from the war," Holmes said after Chesley left. "He's on thin ice. He's on real thin ice."

A few weeks later, Chesley left the program, and its director of student services said he didn't know what happened to him.

Chesley's stepfather, Bennie Price, said he recently enrolled in a veterans program in West Virginia after "hitting rock bottom again."

Reached by phone last night, Chesley admitted he had slipped. "But I know I need help," he vowed. "And I want to succeed."

For Rep. Sanchez, A Hot-tomato Label Means A Hot Potato (LAT)

By Ashley Powers

DOJ_NMG_0139616

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

Pacing next to the desk and U.S. flag in her district office in Garden Grove, the paradox that is Rep. Loretta Sanchez was on full display.

The congresswoman ticked off a meaty legislative to-do list: immigration reform, port safety, stopping sex trafficking, revamping "terrible management" at the Department of Homeland Security. She was articulate and sharp, even magnetic.

At the same time, she was shedding a red St. John Knits suit and shimmying into an ao dai, a traditional Vietnamese tunic and pants, for her next event. Meaning that she was telling a female reporter about her chairmanship of the House Subcommittee on Border, Maritime and Global Counterterrorism while wearing only pants and a black bra.

Was this a glimpse of Loretta Sanchez, siren, a politician known for her strenuous workout regimen and fondness for come-hither heels? Or was this Loretta Sanchez, harried congresswoman, too wrapped up in important national issues to take a break in the name of modesty?

Few members of Congress, if any, are such a walking Rorschach test. In the decade that Sanchez has represented central Orange County, the Democrat has been viewed alternately as a masterful fundraiser, legislative lightweight, political mentor, headstrong politician, leading Latina voice and one of Congress' "babes."

Her latest headline-maker, quitting the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, mixes two familiar elements in Sanchez's career: politics and the risque.

Sanchez had told Politico, a new website covering Capitol Hill, that her departure was due in part to Rep. Joe Baca's demeaning manner toward women and his gossiping that she was a "whore," both of which he has denied.

Comedy Central's Stephen Colbert then devoted an entire "Colbert Report" segment to pondering, "Is Loretta Sanchez a whore?" (No, the comedian decided.) Last week, several caucus members unsuccessfully tried to oust Baca, a Democrat from Rialto, as the group's chairman, the Hill newspaper reported.

In the coming months, Sanchez will be tested on whether her reputation will be more coquette or congresswoman. Entrenched in the House majority for the first time, she is allied with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and sits on two of the most prominent committees: Armed Services and Homeland Security, being the second-ranking Democrat on the latter.

Sanchez, 47, has also recently considered a gubernatorial run, creating a committee, People for Loretta 2010, that allows her to raise money. Among her biggest hurdles to a statewide win, she said while rushing from her office to Little Saigon's Tet Festival: "I don't sit on the fence and nuance things, and sometimes voters don't like that." The plain-speaking Sanchez is an intriguing study at a time when female politicians have reached new heights — House speaker and viable presidential contender, to name but two — but she still gets criticized for a flirtatious nature.

"I think that traditionally what the public has seen as far as a woman in politics is someone that dresses a certain way and has a certain demeanor and is always very serious, because that's what it took to break through," Sanchez said. "I think you're seeing a whole new set of women … feeling much more comfortable about being themselves versus being some blob that will blend in."

Fred Smoller, a Chapman University political scientist who backed the appointment of Sanchez to the school's Board of Trustees in 2001, said that if the congresswoman were male, she would be described as "feisty and independent" and be taken more seriously.

"My God, if we can have a former action hero as governor, why not someone who served 10 years in Congress?"

Sanchez sauntered onto the national stage in 1996 with the nickname "Dragon Slayer" after ousting longtime incumbent Republican Rep. Robert Dornan. Her victory coincided with the national emergence of Latinos as a voting power — within once-homogenous Orange County, as well — and gave her a prominent platform.

She trumpeted a rousing personal narrative: shy second child of seven born to Mexican immigrants who won a scholarship to Chapman University in Orange, earned an MBA from American University in Washington, D.C., and became a financial consultant. (Sanchez's husband of 14 years, Stephen Brixey, filed for divorce in 2004, citing irreconcilable differences.)

After taking office, she expressed a disappointment in an interview with the New York Times: "The news stories tend to say I won because I'm Latina or because Bob Dornan was extreme — not because I was strategic or smart."

That disappointment lingered, even as Sanchez pummeled a new GOP challenger every two years in a district where Democrats hold a slight registration edge, but which President Bush won in 2004 and which Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger took last year, according to an analysis by the nonpartisan California Target Book.

A close talker with a penchant for patting arms and gripping shoulders, Sanchez has a style that some label friendly and others flirtatious. With animated eyes and a build she describes on her MySpace page as "5'4"/Slim/Slender," she was initially labeled by Washingtonian magazine as one of the House's new "babes."

DOJ_NMG_0139617

But the magazine's subsequent surveys of Capitol Hill aides have also placed Sanchez on lists such as "No Altar Boy/Girl" and "No Rocket Scientist." A reporter once asked Sanchez who would play her on television. Jennifer Lopez, she replied, since "I've got a big booty."

Rep. Linda T. Sanchez (D-Lakewood) said critics fixate on her sister's personality because they "can't pick apart the substance of who she is as a person or her work…. Everyone complains about how boring members of Congress are, but as soon as someone exhibits a personality, puts their own stamp on something, everyone comes out with a dagger."

Sanchez has indeed been skewered as squandering her national platform — and reaping publicity for, of all things, her cheeky holiday cards. Starring her long-haired cat, Gretzky, they have shown the pair in a red convertible, in bed and most recently on a beach chair — with the feline in her lap — under the phrase "Pet the Cat."

"She is not accused of anything except being in-your-face: 'She stands too close. She's too flirtatious,' " said Carol Hardy-Fanta, director of the Center for Women in Politics and Public Policy at the University of Massachusetts. "There are so few women in Congress that when one's a little flamboyant, she stands out."

Other sore spots: Sanchez doles out endorsements sparingly, despite being one of the GOP-dominant county's few Democrats with little competition. And a onetime business associate who was her first campaign manager, Howard Kieffer, had gone to prison for federal tax fraud in 1989.

Then there is Bunnygate. During the 2000 Democratic National Convention, Sanchez riled party members by scheduling a fundraiser at the Playboy Mansion; the Bunnies were to don more modest cocktail attire. Democratic leaders took away her speaking slot at the convention. Sanchez moved the event and again was offered a speaking slot. She declined. A staffer for the congresswoman christened the office goldfish "Hef."

"Show me three important national pieces of legislation that have come out of her office," said UC Irvine political scientist Mark Petracca. "If I were her, I'd be scared. You had an excuse all these years" — being in the minority party — "and you could play frivolous. Not anymore."

Among her legislative accomplishments, Sanchez lists a resolution that rebuked the Vietnamese government for confiscating private property; voting against the Iraq war and opposing the president's plan for a troop surge; and made an issue of military sexual assault laws and — before it dominated headlines — how military tribunals operate.

There is little dispute about her fundraising prowess. In her most recent race, Sanchez pocketed $1.3 million, a formidable war chest for an election that was dismissed as a cakewalk. Republican challenger Tan Nguyen mustered a little more than $500,000, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

Backed heavily by unions, Sanchez helped sister Linda, a former labor organizer, top a tough Democratic field in 2002. Sanchez's mentoring is often credited with launching fellow O.C. Democrats Lou Correa and Joe Dunn to Sacramento.

"She could charm wallets out of pockets," said John Hanna, a trustee for the Rancho Santiago Community College District in Santa Ana. It's a skill that has blocked county Republicans from wooing a viable challenger.

Though Sanchez's key supporters are Latino, she has won over the district's Vietnamese American leaders by so doggedly criticizing their homeland's human rights record that she has been repeatedly denied a visa.

When Nguyen asked Tony Lam, a former Westminster councilman, for his endorsement in their November race, Lam said: "I told him, 'You're not ready yet. There's no way you can run against her.' "

That hasn't kept some from speculating that a strong Vietnamese American candidate such as Assemblyman Van Tran (R-Garden Grove) could unseat her. But Sanchez has also nurtured a strong relationship with her district by spending her weekends jumping from parades to banquets to festivals to ribbon-cuttings — events that Dornan, her predecessor, often eschewed.

On a recent Saturday, after she shook hands at the Tet Festival, Sanchez again donned the red knit suit and headed to the Veterans Affairs hospital in Long Beach before attending a formal event in her district. As Sanchez chatted with a patient about his mother's enchiladas and planted a kiss on his forehead, a hospital staffer whispered that the congresswoman shows up far more often than other politicians.

Sanchez also helped another patient dial his cellphone and later teased a doctor: "You're Vietnamese? Why aren't you at the Tet Festival?"

In the lobby, punctuating each word with a gesture, she said she couldn't grasp the policy wonks in Congress dreading time among the kind of constituents who relish her candor and unpredictability.

"They say I'm a legislator. She crinkled her nose for emphasis. "Well, I'm a politician and a legislator."

A Senator's Railroad No-Brainer (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139618

The Federal Railroad Administration handed a rare victory to the American taxpayer last week by denying a questionable $2.3 billion loan application by the Dakota, Minnesota and Eastern (DM&E) Railroad. What makes this news of special interest is the paramount role Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) played in boosting the loan. Here is a cautionary tale of political life in Washington and how it corrupts.

Thune guided through Congress legislative changes that made the loan possible. But an assessment that DM&E was a poor credit risk was shared by two other conservative senators -- Tom Coburn of Oklahoma and Jim DeMint of South Carolina -- who took the extraordinary step of advocating rejection of a colleague's pet project. Making matters worse, Thune worked as a paid lobbyist for the South Dakota-based railroad before his election to the Senate and has received political contributions from company executives.

Thune entered the Senate in 2005 as a rising GOP star after defeating Democratic leader Tom Daschle. He declared himself eager to rein in spending in a Republican-controlled government. But instead of aligning with his party's reformers, Thune has been energetic in promoting pork for South Dakota. After the embarrassment of the DM&E loan rejection, a Republican Senate source who did not want to be identified said: "One can hope this episode helps Thune recover his revolutionary zeal."

DM&E applied for the loan guarantee under the Railroad Rehabilitation and Improvement Financing (RRIF) program to build and renovate a railway from the Powder River Basin in Wyoming, across South Dakota and into Minnesota to carry coal, ethanol and other agricultural products. This area is already served by two railway giants, Union Pacific and Burlington Northern Santa Fe.

The fact that RRIF still exists is testimony to Thune's energy and skill. The program was zeroed out of President Bush's 2005 and 2006 budgets, but it was saved and revised behind closed doors under Thune's leadership as part of the 2005 transportation appropriations bill (which contained the infamous "Bridge to Nowhere"). Indeed, Thune took credit for it, traveling through South Dakota in November 2005 to spread the good news.

Whether this qualifies as an earmark is a matter of opinion. Coburn and DeMint contend that the loan is about policy. Normally, when senators dislike a colleague's protected project, they follow the chamber's politesse and swallow their objections. Not Coburn and DeMint, who since their election in 2004 have waged war on pork.

On Jan. 23, without telling Thune, they wrote Transportation Secretary Mary Peters: "Because the applicant could not secure private funding, we are concerned that a loan of this size unnecessarily puts taxpayers at risk." Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), the leading House opponent of earmarks, opposed the loan for the same reason, as did the conservative National Taxpayers Union and Citizens Against Government Waste.

Last Monday, Federal Railroad Administrator Joseph H. Boardman indicated he agreed, denying the loan application because there was "too high a risk concerning the railroad's ability to repay."

None of these critics mentions Thune's connections with DM&E. Since 2001, the railroad's executives have given him $21,750 in contributions (all but $2,000 before his election in 2004). In 2003 and 2004, when Thune was a private citizen between service in the House and Senate, he received $220,000 as a lobbyist for DM&E. (Thune says he never worked on the loan application as a lobbyist.)

If he had it to do over again, I asked the senator last week, would he still advocate the loan project? Thune replied: "I don't know what else I could do. I was strong for my state. It was a no-brainer."

The DM&E loan cannot prove a cautionary tale for Thune unless he knows he went in the wrong direction and admits it, at least to himself. If he has not come to terms with this, he is not alone. Well-meaning conservatives such as Thune get caught up in procuring the benefits of the federal leviathan for their states and their constituents. It is much of what ails the Republicans.

Going Down With The Ships (WP)

By Craig Hooper

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Over the past six years, 79 condemned Navy ships have been towed out to sea and destroyed by Air Force bombs, submarine-launched torpedoes or hails of gunfire. These exercises, long considered the most cost-effective way to dispose of unwanted naval vessels, have eaten away at America's inventory of still-useful retired warships. Soon every vessel capable of serving in America's reserve combat fleet could vanish, leaving an overextended Navy with no viable backup forces. This unwise drawdown goes against Navy tradition.

As the Navy budget, already under pressure because of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, is hoarded for new shipbuilding initiatives, the inactive reserve, an emergency fleet of second-string warships, is quietly becoming a sham.

Denied maintenance funding and protected only from "fire, flooding and pilferage," decommissioned warships are quickly deteriorating past any hope of recall. The aircraft carrier USS Constellation, "mothballed" in 2003, went from the battle fleet to designation for the artificial-reef donation program in a mere three years.

DOJ_NMG_0139619

Since being sworn in early last year, Secretary Donald C. Winter, a former Northrop Grumman executive, has headed a Navy that is continuing to dispatch vessels with an efficiency unseen since just after World War II, when the battle fleet was chopped from 6,768 ships to 634.

Important reserve warships are disappearing. The USS Belleau Wood, an amphibious assault vessel used to carry helicopters and Marines, returned from a Persian Gulf deployment in 2004, was decommissioned in 2005 and was sunk just eight months later.

At one time, prudent thinking would have dictated that the Belleau Wood undergo a life-extending refit and return to service for 15 more years. But that mind-set is long gone. Meanwhile, a better candidate for target practice, the former USS New Orleans, a helicopter carrier decommissioned in 1997, rots away, still waiting to be sunk.

As the United States confronts an enormous budget deficit and a looming shortage of already overtasked amphibious assault vessels, the expense of mothballing -- and in an emergency, repairing and operating -- venerable Marine "Gators" might seem trivial compared with the cost of the replacement vessels, the Northrop Grumman LHA(R) assault ship.

Even relatively fresh vessels are being wrecked. According the Naval Vessel Registry, the ex-USS Valley Forge, a billion-dollar antiaircraft and missile-defense cruiser (also made by Northrop Grumman), was blasted after serving barely half of an expected 40-year lifetime. Four other recently decommissioned Aegis cruisers will probably follow suit.

This flurry of ship disposal suggests the administration is getting rid of useful warships to compel construction of pricey new vessels such as the next-generation CG(X) anti-missile cruiser or the $3.3 billion DDG-1000 land-attack destroyer. When the Clinton administration pruned the national stockpile of reserve destroyers, only eight feeble, 46-year-old hulks went to the bottom. But the Bush administration has sunk (so far) a 31-year-old fleet of 27 destroyers. Twenty-two others have been scrapped or sold, and additional disposals are pending.

In this carnage, virtually all 31 of the country's middle-aged submarine-hunting Spruance-class destroyers have been sunk, scrapped or scheduled for destruction. As China readies a deep-ocean submarine fleet and more navies deploy cruise missiles on ultra-quiet diesel submarines, the rationale for eliminating a mothballed reserve fleet of sub-killing destroyers is scanty at best. The administration is destroying a cheap insurance policy.

An inactive reserve has always been a national safety net. The country's first large warship, the frigate USS United States, was maintained in mothballs after the Revolutionary War and returned to fight during the War of 1812. In the early days of World War II, when Britain and Canada needed anti-submarine escorts to fight Germany, reserves provided 50 World War I-era destroyers on short notice.

After World War II, prudent Navy leaders invested $213 million to mothball a "Ghost Fleet" of 2,000 surplus vessels. That supplied 381 much-needed warships during the Korean War, including 13 aircraft carriers and two battleships. Other ships were recalled for Vietnam, and even the enormous Iowa-class battlewagons returned to finish out the Cold War.

Some tired Navy assets will always be sunk. Sinking exercises grant an unparalleled opportunity to hone ship-killing skills while simultaneously collecting data that can make new vessels less vulnerable. Real battle data are so valuable that during World War II, the Navy shipped a bombed-out destroyer, the former USS Welles, back from Europe for research. But now, rather than extract all possible value from stricken ships, America appears uneager to study many of its sinking exercises.

This is no way to run a navy. With each sinking, the Navy risks becoming a hollow force, dependent on the construction of pricey ships that, given America's overextended finances, may never arrive.

The writer is a lecturer at the Goldman School of Public Policy at the University of California at Berkeley. He served on the Chief of Naval Operations' Maritime Strategy Working Group at the Naval War College last fall.

Deep Trouble For Deepwater (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, March 4, 2007

At the time, it looked like a triumphant moment for the U.S. Coast Guard. Last Veterans Day, about 1,000 people joined Coast Guard Commandant Thad Allen and Michael Chertoff, the homeland security chief, at a shipyard owned by defense giant Northrop Grumman in Pascagoula, Miss., to christen the first major cutter—or large enforcement ship—the agency had acquired in 35 years. As a peppy military band played, Allen predicted the cutter would "be the most capable" the agency had ever had.

It was a heady time. The Coast Guard was still riding a wave of goodwill inspired by the service's response to Hurricane Katrina, when its helicopter rescuers hoisted more than 33,000 people to safety while the rest of the federal effort floundered. President George W. Bush had sworn in Allen—a popular admiral who took over the federal government's response to Katrina from Federal Emergency Management chief Michael Brown—as head of the Coast Guard in May 2006.

Lemons. But now that November gathering is starting to look like a party on the deck of the Titanic. Audits have revealed that the cutter's cost has grown by millions of dollars since it was commissioned and that it has potentially fatal design flaws. And that's only part of the bad news. The 38,000-person military service has been accused of buying what one member of Congress called "a series of lemons" with a $24 billion megacontract to replace nearly all its ships and planes. Meanwhile, the Coast Guard is also dealing with the shocking deaths of two rescue swimmers and allegations of assault at its academy. The Coast Guard's motto is semper paratus—or "always ready"—but its supporters wonder if even Allen can fix all this.

DOJ_NMG_0139620

The Coast Guard had traditionally been known for doing more with less. Back in the 1990s, slim budgets left the service with a badly aging fleet that was "a huge embarrassment," says former Rear Adm. George Naccara. By 2002, of the 39 similar cutter fleets around the world, only two were older than the Coast Guard's. Yet the agency's mission was rapidly expanding; after 9/11, it joined the Department of Homeland Security, took over some new port and chemical-plant security roles, and saw its budget grow by 50 percent.

Those new responsibilities added urgency to the massive Deepwater program, an unprecedented effort kicked off in 2002 to upgrade virtually all of the service's fleet. Two large defense contractors—Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman—led the team that won a contract to provide a catalog of 91 ships, 49 aviation drones, 124 small boats, and 195 new or upgraded helicopters, all connected by a new communications system. The contracting team advises the Coast Guard on what to buy, chooses the parts providers, and serves as prime builder. Because of staff shortages, the Coast Guard restricted itself initially to a mostly advisory role. "We thought this was a way to eliminate redundancy and save a whole pile of money," says Tom Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste.

Today, that sentiment seems more than a bit ironic. Originally a $17 billion contract, Deepwater was repegged at $24 billion in 2005. A recent DHS inspector general report said that the cost of the first two of the largest cutters—originally estimated at $517 million together—has risen to $775 million and is headed higher still. Allen says much of the swell was caused by his agency's "evolving needs" in an age of terrorism. That 418-foot national security cutter christened in November, for instance, now must be able to sail even if a nuclear bomb is dropped nearby.

But Deepwater has other problems as well—like the need to rework designs for ships that have already been partially built. The national security cutter is getting an upgrade because of fatigue concerns; auditors say it won't survive its 30-year life span, a notion Northrop officials strongly deny. Congress, however, has reason to be skeptical: The Coast Guard used about $90 million to overhaul eight patrol boats, only to withdraw them from service in November when fissures in the hulls and engine troubles made them unseaworthy.

The contractors have defended their work. Leo McKay, Lockheed Martin's lead executive on the project, has said Deepwater has "already resulted in measurable progress with the Coast Guard's rescue, enforcement, and interdiction missions on the high seas." And experts point to the non-drone aircraft—including newly engined helicopters that can carry twice the weight of their predecessors—as bona fide Deepwater successes. But the program's bottom line still seems troubling: The Coast Guard has spent about $4 billion on the contract so far but today has fewer operational cutters than it had before 9/11. "This didn't need to happen," Capt. Kevin Jarvis, a retired Coast Guard engineer, said recently. He described government employees futilely writing memos about already-visible safety problems even before ships were built. Rep. Henry Waxman, chairman of a House oversight committee, calls Deepwater "one of the worst contract organizations that I've ever seen."

All that comes on top of other difficulties. Last summer, for the first time in its history, the service court-martialed an academy cadet for sexual assault. Then in August, two of the service's storied corps of rescue swimmers died during a routine training dive in the Arctic Ocean, the first such drownings since 1974. Sen. Maria Cantwell, the top Democrat overseeing the Coast Guard, has promised to investigate. The service's own probe revealed that some members of the divers' support team had been drinking and misinterpreted distress calls. The number of dive teams more than tripled after 9/11, causing oversight challenges: Some of their equipment was years overdue for inspection.

Allen, who's garnered kudos for a no-nonsense style, is attacking the problems vigorously. "We will not accept," he wrote to the entire Coast Guard in January, "preventable [life] loss or injury." In the days after the drownings, he halted all diving until every piece of underwater equipment in use was reinspected. To clean up troubles at the Coast Guard Academy in New London, Conn., he created a task force in September to study the climate there after reports of drinking and promiscuity. A related investigation has already resulted in the reprimand of a senior Coast Guard official.

Deepwater, however, is arguably more daunting. "We'll never have the organizational structure you'll find in the [U.S.] Navy," Allen says of the service's ability to coordinate massive purchases, "but ... I'm trying to create as much of that capability in the Coast Guard as I can." He recently gave the service's chief engineer the authority to veto designs. He's also incorporating regular third-party evaluations of contracting work, calling for robust training of oversight personnel, and reorganizing the entire Coast Guard to limit layers of bureaucracy that may have contributed to Deepwater's problems. And more is coming: Between now and June, Allen can rewrite portions of the contract. Last week, the Coast Guard revealed it would reach outside the contract for one of the ships, which was to be provided by the Lockheed-Northrop team. The reason: Coast Guard officials think they can get similar boats for $100,000 less apiece than the price quoted by the contracting team.

DOJ_NMG_0139621

Still, some wonder if it'll be enough. "At this point," Cantwell says, "I think we need legal advice" on recouping contract costs. Rep. Bob Filner, formerly the ranking House Democrat overseeing the service, has urged dropping the contract arrangement altogether. "The first thing you do when you've dug yourself into a hole," Filner says, "is stop digging."

That Film's Real Message? It Could Be: 'Buy A Ticket' (NYT)

By Michael Cieply

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

LOS ANGELES, March 4 — Three weeks ago a handful of reporters at an international press junket here for the Warner Brothers movie "300," about the battle of Thermopylae some 2,500 years ago, cornered the director Zack Snyder with an unanticipated question.

"Is George Bush Leonidas or Xerxes?" one of them asked.

The questioner, by Mr. Snyder's recollection, insisted that Mr. Bush was Xerxes, the Persian emperor who led his force against Greek's city states in 480 B.C., unleashing an army on a small country guarded by fanatical guerilla fighters so he could finish a job his father had left undone. More likely, another reporter chimed in, Mr. Bush was Leonidas, the Spartan king who would defend freedom at any cost.

Mr. Snyder, who said he intended neither analogy when he set out to adapt the graphic novel created by Frank Miller with Lynn Varley in 1998, suddenly knew he had the contemporary version of a water-cooler movie on his hands. And it has turned out to be one that could be construed as a thinly veiled polemic against the Bush administration, or be seen by others as slyly supporting it.

In the era of media clutter, film marketers increasingly welcome controversy as a way to get attention for their more provocative fare. The companies behind the Dixie Chicks documentary "Shut Up & Sing" and "Borat: Cultural Learnings of America for Make Benefit Glorious Nation of Kazakhstan," for example, positively reveled in it.

But the dance can be more delicate when viewers find a potentially divisive message in big studio movies that were meant more to entertain than enlighten. The danger is that an accidental political overtone will alienate part of the potential audience for a film that needs broad appeal to succeed.

Spontaneous debate on the Internet and around the office can be a film's best friend when, as with a picture like "The Passion of the Christ," even potential negatives, like accusations of anti-Semitic undertones, feed curiosity.

"Whatever the question is, it's wonderful for the movie," said Peter Sealey, a former Columbia Pictures executive who is now an adjunct professor of marketing at Claremont Graduate University's Drucker School of Management.

Yet studios can be wary of seeming to foster it. Walt Disney largely sidestepped arguments about whether its Pixar-created animated film "The Incredibles" was quietly channeling Ayn Rand. "We feel that the longer we either refute or debate a subject like that, the more the story will live," said Dennis Rice, senior vice president of marketing for Disney's Buena Vista Pictures unit. "So we chose to do nothing."

Executives at Warner, which is releasing "300" in the United States on Friday declined to discuss the studio's approach in marketing the film. Billboards and trailers, seeming to mirror Disney's tack with "The Incredibles," have focused heavily on the picture's battle action and visual flamboyance — "Prepare for Glory!" runs the most oft-repeated advertising line — while avoiding some deeper story elements that are stirring unexpectedly heated reactions, especially abroad.

Shortly after his press-junket grilling Mr. Snyder — an established commercials director, whose best-known previous credit was a remake of George Romero's "Dawn of the Dead" — ran into some surprising reactions at the Berlinale film festival in Germany. Some attendees walked out of a screening there, while others insisted on seeing its presentation of the Spartans' defense of Western civilization in the face of a Persian horde as propaganda for America's position vis-à-vis Iraq and Iran. (By contrast it drew applause at a Los Angeles screening last month.)

"Don't you think it's interesting that your movie was funded at this point?" Mr. Snyder recalled being asked in Berlin. "The implication was that funding came from the U.S. government."

When a Feb. 22 report on Wired.com carried a brief mention of the question about Mr. Bush's proper parallel in the film, Web commentators in the United States began to lock on its supposed political vibe. Yet attempts by both the left and the right to appropriate the lessons of Thermopylae clearly predated the movie.

Mr. Bush has been compared to Xerxes at least since his "axis of evil" speech in the wake of 9/11, for instance, while the Spartan cry "Molon labe," or "Come and take them," has long been a rallying call for supporters of the right to bear arms.

According to Deborah Snyder, Mr. Snyder's wife and an executive producer of "300" (which has more than a dozen credited producers of various levels, including Mark Canton and Gianni Nunnari), some changes to Mr. Miller's original story may have inadvertently amplified its political resonance.

DOJ_NMG_0139622

In a key twist Mr. Snyder and his collaborators expanded the presence of Gorgo, the Spartan queen and Leonidas's wife, including, among other things, a sequence in which she inspires a wavering populace and weak-willed council to resist the Eastern armies even at the cost of battle deaths. "Her story is that she is trying to rally the troops," said Ms. Snyder, who dismissed as irrelevant a question about her and her husband's personal political philosophies.

Mr. Snyder acknowledged that Mr. Miller — who declined to be interviewed for this article — had opened the door for contemporary comparisons with his passionate, if not entirely accurate, portrayal of the ancient Spartans as saviors of Western civilization. "He'd be on their side regardless of who they were fighting, because he just loves them," Mr. Snyder said.

Thanks to computer-generated effects that contribute to "300's" highly stylized look, the film's cost, according to its makers, was considerably less than the outsized production budgets of "Troy," which did relatively well for Warner, and "Alexander," which did not. But Warner could use a hit after finishing last year behind several competitors at the domestic box office. (A success in the second half of 2006, like "Happy Feet," could only do so much to make up for duds like "Poseidon.")

And the enormous expense of making and marketing any major studio picture — the combined costs appear likely to exceed $100 million in the case of "300" — sharpens the risk in alienating a portion of the hoped-for audience.

In any case Mr. Snyder said he was pleased about the debate, though he never meant the movie to provoke it. "If that's a by-product, that's good," he said.

Blog The Debt Away (NYT)

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

Public humiliation in the stocks long ago fell out of fashion. A virtual version is making a comeback. This time it's a self-imposed punishment for debtors trying to abase their way back into the black.

As John Leland reported recently in The Times, people have started their own debt blogs to share the most intimate details of their faltering finances, hoping their online confessions will help them develop some self-restraint.

Every time the bloggers reach for a credit card, the realization that they will have to confess any splurges is supposed to give them pause. The 29-year-old woman who writes bloggingawaydebt.com — identified only as Tricia — keeps a running tally of her obligations in the upper-right-hand corner of the Web page (just over $22,000 right now, down from almost $38,000). Right below that is the button that allows readers to sign up to receive updates: 349 regulars are keeping a watchful eye.

They were fairly understanding when she and her husband went roughly $100 over budget on Christmas presents for their son, though one comment suggested they "start the new year with redoubled determination." Hard to be too tough on them since they've already wiped out over $15,000 in debt.

Consumers are asking others to help them develop self-control because so many companies are not showing any restraint. The Federal Reserve estimates that credit card companies sent out more than six billion direct-mail solicitations in 2005. Last year the average American household was $21,000 in debt, about a third of that on credit cards.

In response to the explosion in consumer debt, Congress passed a law in 2005 making it more difficult for individuals to declare bankruptcy. But legislators did nothing to curb the blizzard of pre-approved cards that fall through the mail slots. Often the most profitable customers are the least responsible ones. At a Senate Banking Committee hearing in January, Chairman Christopher Dodd cited a study estimating that credit-card penalty fees had risen to $17.1 billion in 2006 from $1.7 billion in 1996.

Credit can be a good thing, both for simplifying transactions and helping people get over a temporary crunch. But Congress needs to do more to make rates and fees more transparent while putting an end to some of the most abusive policies. In a fairly common practice known as universal default, for instance, a credit card company raises interest rates because a consumer missed or was late with a payment on a different company's account. Citigroup just announced that its credit-card business would voluntarily end the practice. That's something good to blog about for a change.

OTHER NEWS:

Without Health Benefits, A Good Life Turns Fragile (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

SALISBURY, N.C. — Vicki H. Readling vividly remembers the start of 2006.

"Everybody was saying, 'Happy new year,' " Ms. Readling recalled. "But I remember going straight to bed and lying down scared to death because I knew that at that very minute, after midnight, I was without insurance. I was kissing away a bad year of cancer. But I was getting ready to open up to a door of hell."

Ms. Readling, a 50-year-old real estate agent, is one of nearly 47 million people in America with no health insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0139623

Increasingly, the problem affects middle-class people like Ms. Readling, who said she made about $60,000 last year. As an independent contractor, like many real estate agents, Ms. Readling does not receive health benefits from an employer. She tried to buy a policy in the individual insurance market, but — having had cancer — could not obtain coverage, except at a price exceeding $27,000 a year, which was more than she could pay.

"I don't know which was worse, being told that I had cancer or finding that I could not get insurance," Ms. Readling (pronounced RED-ling) said in an interview in her office, near the tree-lined streets and stately old homes of this city in the Piedmont region of North Carolina.

It is well known that the ranks of the uninsured have been swelling; federal figures show an increase of 6.8 million since 2000.

But the surprise is that the uninsured are not necessarily the poor, the unemployed and the undocumented. Solidly middle-class people like Ms. Readling are one of the fastest growing subgroups.

And that is one reason, according to a recent New York Times/CBS News poll, that the problems of the uninsured have jumped to the top of the domestic political agenda in Washington and on the campaign trail.

Today, more than one-third of the uninsured — 17 million of the nearly 47 million — have family incomes of $40,000 or more, according to the Employee Benefit Research Institute, a nonpartisan organization. More than two-thirds of the uninsured are in households with at least one full-time worker.

Ms. Readling's experience is typical; people who have had serious illnesses often have difficulty obtaining insurance. If coverage is available, the premiums are often more than they can afford.

While the government does not have an official definition of "middle class," one commonly used point of reference is the median household income, which was $46,326 in 2005.

Katherine Swartz, a professor of health policy and economics at Harvard, said the soaring cost of health care was a major reason for the increase in the number of uninsured. She said it also reflected long-term changes in the economy, like the decline in manufacturing jobs and the growth in the share of workers in service industries and small businesses, which are less likely to provide health benefits.

Moreover, Ms. Swartz said, "Companies have become more aggressive in hiring people as temporary or contract workers with no fringe benefits."

The National Association of Realtors says 28 percent of its 1.3 million members are without health insurance.

"Because real estate agents are independent contractors, they are forced into the individual insurance market, where there is no negotiating or leverage," said Pat V. Combs, president of the association.

As an independent contractor with a Century 21 real estate brokerage, Ms. Readling had bought insurance on her own, a temporary extension of coverage from a prior job. But she was unable to renew it after she had surgery for breast cancer in 2005. Most insurers would not offer her coverage, she said, and one carrier quoted a price of $2,300 a month for coverage with a deductible of $5,000 a year.

Concerns about health insurance permeate her life.

To save money, Ms. Readling said, she defers visits to the doctor and stretches out her cancer medication, which costs her about $300 a month. She takes the tiny pills three or four times a week, rather than seven days a week as prescribed.

"I really try to stay away from the doctor because I am so scared of what everything will cost," said Ms. Readling, who is divorced and has twin 18-year-old sons. Before every doctor's visit and test, she asks, "How much are you going to charge me?" She says she tries to arrange "the best deals I can." But in many cases, the price is still unaffordable, and "I have to do without."

Even those with insurance have reason to be concerned, economists say, because they end up paying for the uninsured in various ways. Some of the costs are also passed on to taxpayers and employers. To help cover the cost of treating the uninsured, hospitals often increase charges to other patients. Insurers then increase premiums for companies that provide health benefits, and they in turn shift some costs to employees.

Ms. Readling is engaged to be married in June, to another real estate agent. But she said she may postpone the wedding because she would not want her husband to be legally responsible for her medical bills.

"I am scared to get married because I don't have insurance," Ms. Readling said. "If I have to go to the hospital and I can't pay my hospital bills, what happens? Do they go after him? Can they take your home?"

To collect unpaid medical bills, health care providers often obtain judgments against a patient's spouse, as well as the patient, and file liens against their homes. Ms. Readling says she does not own a house, but her fiancé does.

The idea of universal coverage, in the form proposed by President Bill Clinton, proved politically untenable. Since the Clinton plan collapsed in 1994, the politics of health care have changed because of the steady rise in health costs, the increase in the number of uninsured and the erosion of employer-sponsored insurance. Politicians are once again speaking about universal coverage as a goal, though opinion polls show that many voters still oppose the idea of a government-run health care system.

DOJ_NMG_0139624

Ms. Readling said it was stressful enough visiting doctors every few months for her cancer follow-ups. Without coverage, she said, the experience is even more stressful.

"When you go to any medical person and they ask for your insurance card, you are so ashamed because you have to say, 'I don't have insurance,' " Ms. Readling said. "You just feel like you are dirt."

Ms. Readling said she often woke up at night, terrified of the cost of getting sick without insurance.

"Anything that goes wrong with my health could destroy me financially," Ms. Readling said. "I could be ruined."

She said she had never voluntarily allowed her insurance to lapse and could not understand why she was being blackballed.

"What did I do wrong?" Ms. Read-ling asked. "Why am I being punished? I just don't understand how I could have fallen through this horrible, horrible crack."

Knowing her health benefits from her prior job would expire in January 2006, she began shopping for a new policy in May 2005. But in June 2005, she learned she had cancer.

"At that point," Ms. Readling said, "I called everybody I could think of, begging for help. But no insurer would touch me."

Barbara Morales Burke, the chief deputy insurance commissioner of North Carolina, said state law did not guarantee the availability of health insurance for individuals. "Most insurers decline to issue policies to those individuals whom they deem to be too risky because of their medical history," Ms. Morales Burke said.

Blue Cross and Blue Shield of North Carolina will sell to anyone, regardless of the person's medical condition, she added, but the premiums may be very high for people who have had serious illnesses.

Heidi Deja, a spokeswoman for Blue Cross and Blue Shield of North Carolina, said, "Rates are based on the anticipated cost of providing care." For people who have had serious illnesses, she said, monthly premiums "can run into the thousands of dollars."

A 1996 federal law limited the ability of insurers to discriminate against people because of pre-existing conditions. But consumer protections are much more extensive in the group health insurance market.

"In the individual market, the federal protections provide precious little help to people seeking coverage," said Karen L. Pollitz, a research professor at the Georgetown University Health Policy Institute.

When Ms. Readling was shopping for insurance, she found two responses particularly galling. One insurer, she said, suggested she return to her prior job, at a furniture company, so she could participate in its group health plan, though she loved her work as a real estate agent. Another insurer suggested she remarry her former husband to get back on his insurance plan.

Working with her doctors, Ms. Readling raced to get as many tests as possible before her coverage expired. She recalled her anxiety in the final months: "It's like a freight train coming at you, and it's going to get you. And there was nothing I could do."

Ms. Readling said she was mystified by the inability of real estate agents to band together and buy health insurance as a group.

"Why can't Realtors in North Carolina, or a few counties, have coverage under one umbrella?" she asked. "You would think that some insurance company would want our business."

Janet S. Trautwein, executive vice president of the National Association of Health Underwriters, which represents insurance agents and brokers, said employee groups were more attractive to insurers for several reasons.

"In a group health plan," Ms. Trautwein said, "the employer typically pays a large share of the premium, so most employees sign up as soon as they are eligible, regardless of their health status."

"The health plan covers a mix of sick and healthy workers," she said. "By contrast, individuals and independent contractors are more likely to defer coverage until they need it, so the pool of people insured is, over all, less healthy. Sick people consume more health care. As a result, the cost to insure them is higher."

Though satisfied with her care, Ms. Readling continually wonders if doctors and nurses treat her differently because she is uninsured.

"Are they going to turn their nose up at you because you don't have insurance?" Ms. Readling asked. "Will they take care of other people first? They can make more money on patients with insurance. What am I? I am just a financial loss to them."

Oil Innovations Pump New Life Into Old Wells (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139625

BAKERSFIELD, Calif. — The Kern River oil field, discovered in 1899, was revived when Chevron engineers here started injecting high-pressured steam to pump out more oil. The field, whose production had slumped to 10,000 barrels a day in the 1960s, now has a daily output of 85,000 barrels.

In Indonesia, Chevron has applied the same technology to the giant Duri oil field, discovered in 1941, boosting production there to more than 200,000 barrels a day, up from 65,000 barrels in the mid-1980s.

And in Texas, Exxon Mobil expects to double the amount of oil it extracts from its Means field, which dates back to the 1930s. Exxon, like Chevron, will use three-dimensional imaging of the underground field and the injection of a gas — in this case, carbon dioxide — to flush out the oil.

Within the last decade, technology advances have made it possible to unlock more oil from old fields, and, at the same time, higher oil prices have made it economical for companies to go after reserves that are harder to reach. With plenty of oil still left in familiar locations, forecasts that the world's reserves are drying out have given way to predictions that more oil can be found than ever before.

In a wide-ranging study published in 2000, the U.S. Geological Survey estimated that ultimately recoverable resources of conventional oil totaled about 3.3 trillion barrels, of which a third has already been produced. More recently, Cambridge Energy Research Associates, an energy consultant, estimated that the total base of recoverable oil was 4.8 trillion barrels. That higher estimate — which Cambridge Energy says is likely to grow — reflects how new technology can tap into more resources.

"It's the fifth time to my count that we've gone through a period when it seemed the end of oil was near and people were talking about the exhaustion of resources," said Daniel Yergin, the chairman of Cambridge Energy and author of a Pulitzer Prize-winning history of oil, who cited similar concerns in the 1880s, after both world wars and in the 1970s. "Back then we were going to fly off the oil mountain. Instead we had a boom and oil went to $10 instead of $100."

There is still a minority view, held largely by a small band of retired petroleum geologists and some members of Congress, that oil production has peaked, but the theory has been fading. Equally contentious for the oil companies is the growing voice of environmentalists, who do not think that pumping and consuming an ever-increasing amount of fossil fuel is in any way desirable.

Increased projections for how much oil is extractable may become a political topic on many different fronts and in unpredictable ways. By reassuring the public that supplies will meet future demands, oil companies may also find legislators more reluctant to consider opening Alaska and other areas to new exploration.

On a global level, the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, which has coalesced around a price of $50 a barrel for oil, will likely see its clout reinforced in coming years. The 12-country cartel, which added Angola as its newest member this year, is poised to control more than 50 percent of the oil market in coming years, up from 35 percent today, as Western oil production declines.

Oil companies say they can provide enough supplies — which might eventually lead to lower oil and gasoline prices — but that they see few alternatives to fossil fuels. Inevitably, this means that global carbon emissions used in the transportation sector will continue to increase, and so will their contribution to global warming.

The oil industry is well known for seeking out new sources of fossil fuel in far-flung places, from the icy plains of Siberia to the deep waters off West Africa. But now the quest for new discoveries is taking place alongside a much less exotic search that is crucial to the world's energy supplies. Oil companies are returning to old or mature fields partly because there are few virgin places left to explore, and, of those, few are open to investors.

At Bakersfield, for example, Chevron is using steam-flooding technology and computerized three-dimensional models to boost the output of the field's heavy oil reserves. Even after a century of production, engineers say there is plenty of oil left to be pumped from Kern River.

"We're still finding new opportunities here," said Steve Garrett, a geophysicist with Chevron. "It's not over until you abandon the last well, and even then it's not over."

Some forecasters, studying data on how much oil is used each year and how much is still believed to be in the ground, have argued that at some point by 2010, global oil production will peak — if it has not already — and begin to fall. That drop would usher in an uncertain era of shortages, price spikes and economic decline.

"I am very, very seriously worried about the future we are facing," said Kjell Aleklett, the president of the Association for the Study of Peak Oil and Gas. "It is clear that oil is in limited supplies."

Many oil executives say that these so-called peak-oil theorists fail to take into account the way that sophisticated technology, combined with higher prices that make searches for new oil more affordable, are opening up opportunities to develop supplies. As the industry improves its ability to draw new life from old wells and expands its forays into ever-deeper corners of the globe, it is providing a strong rebuttal in the long-running debate over when the world might run out of oil.

DOJ_NMG_0139626

Typically, oil companies can only produce one barrel for every three they find. Two usually are left behind, either because they are too hard to pump out or because it would be too expensive to do so. Going after these neglected resources, energy experts say, represents a tremendous opportunity.

"Ironically, most of the oil we will discover is from oil we've already found," said Lawrence Goldstein, an energy analyst at the Energy Policy Research Foundation, an industry-funded group. "What has been missing is the technology and the threshold price that will lead to a revolution in lifting that oil."

Nansen G. Saleri, the head of reservoir management at the state-owned Saudi Aramco, said that new seismic tools giving geologists a better view of oil fields, real-time imaging software and the ability to drill horizontal wells could boost global reserves.

Mr. Saleri said that Saudi Arabia's total reserves were almost three times higher that the kingdom's officially published figure of 260 million barrels, or about a quarter of the world's proven total.

He estimated the kingdom's resources at 716 billion barrels, including oil that has already been produced as well as more uncertain reserves. And thanks to more sophisticated technology, Mr. Saleri said he "wouldn't be surprised" if ultimate reserves in Saudi Arabia eventually reached 1 trillion barrels.

Even if the Saudi estimates are impossible to verify, they underline the fact that oil companies are constantly looking for new ways to unlock more oil from the ground.

At the Kern River field just outside of Bakersfield, millions of gallons of steam are injected into the field to melt the oil, which has the unusually dense consistency of very thick molasses. The steamed liquid is then drained through underground reservoirs and pumped out by about 8,500 production wells scattered around the field, which covers 20 square miles.

Initially, engineers expected to recover only 10 percent of the field's oil. Now, thanks to decades of trial and error, Chevron believes it will be able to recover up to 80 percent of the oil from the field, more than twice the industry's average recovery rate, which is typically around 35 percent. Each well produces about 10 barrels a day at a cost of $16 each. That compares with production costs of only $1 or $2 a barrel in the Persian Gulf, home to the world's lowest-cost producers.

Chevron hopes to use the knowledge it has obtained from this vast open-air, and underground, laboratory and apply it to similar heavy oil fields around the world. It is also planning a large pilot program to test the technology in an area between Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, for example.

Oil companies have been perfecting so-called secondary and tertiary recovery methods — injecting all sorts of exotic gases and liquids into oil fields, including water and soap, natural gas, carbon dioxide and even hydrogen sulfide, a foul-smelling and poisonous gas.

Since the dawn of the Petroleum Age more than a century ago, the world has consumed more than 1 trillion barrels of oil. Most of that was of the light, liquid kind that was easy to find, easy to pump and easy to refine. But as these light sources are depleted, a growing share of the world's oil reserves are made out of heavier oil.

Analysts estimate there are about 1 trillion barrels of heavy oil, tar sands, and shale-oil deposits in places like Canada, Venezuela and the United States that can be turned into liquid fuel by enhanced recovery methods like steam-flooding.

"This is an industry that moves in cycles, and right now, enormous amounts of innovation, technology and investments are being unleashed," said Mr. Yergin, the author and energy consultant.

After years of underinvestment, oil companies are now in a global race to increase supplies to catch the growth of consumption. The world consumed about 31 billion barrels of oil last year. Because of population and economic growth, especially in Asian and developing countries, oil demand is forecast to rise 40 percent by 2030 to 43 billion barrels, according to the Energy Information Administration.

Back in California, the Kern River field itself seems little changed from what it must have looked like 100 years ago. The same dusty hills are now littered with a forest of wells, with gleaming pipes running along dusty roads. Seismic technology and satellites are now used to monitor operations while sensors inside the wells record slight changes in temperature or pressure. Each year, the company drills some 850 new wells there.

Amazingly, there are very few workers in the field. Engineers in air-conditioned control rooms can get an accurate picture of the field's underground reservoir and pinpoint with accuracy the areas they want to explore. None of that technology was available just a decade ago.

"Yes, there are finite resources in the ground, but you never get to that point," Jeff Hatlen, an engineer with Chevron, said on a recent tour of the field.

In 1978, when he started his career here, operators believed the field would be abandoned within 15 years. "That's why peak oil is a moving target," Mr. Hatlen said. "Oil is always a function of price and technology."

Romney: Blogs More Open Than Mainstream Media (POL)

By Roger Simon And Mike Allen

DOJ_NMG_0139627

The Politico, March 5, 2007

Mitt Romney's Republican presidential campaign needed an adrenaline jolt after a couple of weeks of Rudymania in the press and polls. The former Massachusetts governor got it (sort of) Saturday evening when the Conservative Political Action Conference, the annual Woodstock of the activist right, gave him first place in its highly publicized -- if somewhat meaningless -- straw poll.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona, knowing he would fare poorly, didn't show up for the 5,000-plus gathering at a Washington hotel. Former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani gave a well-received speech at lunchtime Friday, and then was hustled out of the Omni Shoreham, with aides saying he had a plane to catch. Neither of those two, who lead in national polls, had a booth in the massive exhibit hall.

Romney was more leisurely, speaking on Friday afternoon and then sticking around for a reception that was open to all attendees. In the voting, where he took 21 percent, to Giuliani's 17 percent and McCain's 12 percent, despite a dude in a dolphin suit who was wandering around the convention with a sign calling himself "Flip Romney, another Flip-Flopper from Massachusetts." The hot CPAC souvenir was the Romney Flip Flop -- cheap foam footwear available in green, orange, yellow and red. These shots aimed at what many Republicans view as Romney's greatest liability—the perception that he is guided by opportunism rather than principle. Romney wanted to win badly enough that he stacked the deck by bringing a group of college kids in to vote for him.

Despite the flak and his recent slide in the polls, Romney seemed unruffled when he sat down for an interview with the Politico, which came after a stroll along CPAC's Radio Row, where conservative stations from around the country had talk shows set up.

Surrounded by cameras and supporters, Romney also wandered past a section the American Conservative Union, the group's sponsor, had set up for bloggers. Romney has given several interviews to bloggers and he has a director of online communications, Stephen Smith, who is respected by New Media types. Smith is responsible for reaching and monitoring the blogosphere.

The Politico interview took place outside the "Mitt" booth at CPAC, behind a blue curtain that separated the "exhibit hall" from a parking garage. His wife of nearly 38 years, Ann Romney, joined the conversation. Here are excerpts of the interview that did not make the cut for an upcoming column on Romney and his new campaign plan:

Politico: Governor, you're pretty popular on blog row.

Romney: Well, it's a great group, I'll tell you that. I appreciate the blogs because the blogs are able to really zero in on issues and find the truth. Sometimes the mainstream media writes one article and it sits out there and it may be accurate, it may not be accurate. But the blogs are open – there's a discourse, there's back and forth and it allows us to get to the truth. And that's why the blogs are playing such an important role, particularly in grassroots organization of American politics.

Politico: How helpful do you think the blogs have been so far?

Romney: Oh, I don't know at this stage that you can point to great advances for anybody based on blogs alone. But I think what you're seeing is that blogs are able to get to bottom of things and to cut through the spin. The spin has a huge impact on the mainstream media. Candidates are able to go to the mainstream media, spin their story, they write it and sometimes it's accurate, sometimes it's not. The blogs actually are open for comment and debate and they ultimately get the truth out. And that's critical, in my opinion. Because there are going to be a lot of opposition research folks on other campaigns trying to put up things that aren't accurate.

Politico: Governor, what did you mean by "spin"?

Romney: Well, sometimes an opposition research team will go to the mainstream media and try and slant or direct a story in favor of their viewpoint. And the nice thing about blogs is that if that happens to them, why they still are open to get the views of the other side and you see the truth getting ultimately told.

Politico: Governor, how do you unite a polarized country?

Romney: I think that what we have to do is have Republicans and Democrats be willing to reach across the aisle and find common ground on important issues. I remember Ronald Reagan used to sit down with Tip O'Neill -- they were friends even though they were competitors, from a political standpoint. I have, in my service as governor, sat down almost weekly with the Senate president and the speaker of the House of the opposition party. We work on issues together. We sometimes agree, sometimes we don't. But communications, openness and searching for common ground is what America wants to see. They do not like the fact that the polarity in our political process has yielded an absence of action. They want Washington to change and I represent a change in the way business has been done in Washington.

Politico: Do you have any hope for doing that?

Romney: I do, because I've done it in Massachusetts. Here I was in a state that had a legislature 85 percent Democrat, and I balanced the budget all four years without raising taxes. I also put in place, together with the legislature, an insurance plan that took some mandates off insurance companies -- I wanted to take off more -- but got insurance for all of our citizens without the requirement of raising taxes and without a government takeover. That's the kind of conservative thinking that's willing to reach across the aisle and find common ground with Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0139628

Politico: Are you concerned that only people of vague faith will be able to run, if someone who's strong and vocal about their faith gets picked apart, as your Mormon faith has been?

Romney: When people don't know a great deal about a person's faith, they're just not sure what it means. And as they focus in on my faith, I think that they'll see Ann and my marriage, they'll see our family and they'll say Hey, there's nothing wrong with that. Whatever has produced those guys has got to be OK. And I don't mean by that they we're perfect -- we're a long way from that. But our faith has certainly made us better than we certainly would have been otherwise. I'm proud of the fact that my parents were of my faith, and I've learned from them. I think you will find that the people of America, as they get to know us better, will be pretty darn comfortable with us as a couple and me as a politician.

Politico: Mrs. Romney, do you mind joining the conversation? (The former governor smiles and playfully shoves two of the four tape recorders on the table in front of her.) On ABC's "This Week" and at a recent event in Salt Lake City, you were quite candid or blunt about the fact that you saw this was going to be a difficult process, but you seem to have steeled yourself for that. Could you just talk about what you think this is going to be like?

Ann Romney: It's interesting. If you go to Iowa, South Carolina, New Hampshire, Atlanta – wherever it is, in Orlando – you LOVE meeting people. That is not hard. You love, actually, even, the fundraisers. They're great. People are wonderful and supportive. The only part that's distasteful is, unfortunately, the media. (Smiles.) Here you guys sit.

Romney (chuckling): These aren't the media. These guys are open, honest, fair and balanced guys.

Ann Romney: All the rest of it is an extraordinary honor, to be able to be doing what we're doing. I'm awed by it. People in Iowa and South Carolina and New Hampshire take their citizenship very personally and responsibly. It is impressive to me, and I'm buoyed up by it. (Refers to the media.) It keeps people out of that arena. That's very unfortunate.

Romney: You've got to have a pretty thick skin to be able to do it. And I've grown up in a home where politics was spoken about and then my dad ran for office and my mom did. And I've learned that you can develop thick skin and just don't worry about it.

Politico: Mrs. Romney, how involved do you plan to be in the campaign? (Ann Romney was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis in 1998. She says she's healthy now but worries the stress of the campaign could inflame her MS.)

Ann Romney: As involved as my heath will allow. We're not quite sure where that line is yet. I can't keep up with him. There's no question about that. I also am an equestrian – I love to ride horses. They keep me balanced and healthy and feeling great about life. Besides my family, it's the joy of my life. So I have to get out every once in awhile and see my horses. I've got to tell you: They don't care whether Republic or Democrat. They just want to know if their oats are coming. It's kind of stabilizing and balancing and being able to pull out every once in awhile – see the grandkids, see the horse, get my bearings, and then jump back in.

Politico: Governor, how do you strike a balance between being your own candidate, without renouncing the president?

Romney: I just have to do what Popeye used to say: "I am what I am and that's all I am." I indicate what my positions are, what I think about issues. I try and do so with respect. In doing so, in some respects I'm going to be acknowledging the president's leadership. In other cases, I'm going to be critical, just by virtue of my positions -- not intentionally, but just every person is different. Even if you're in the same party, you have different views on certain issues and I don't line up that I know of with any Republican, exactly -- even Ann. (Gestures toward his wife.) And so people will draw their distinctions. I've lived a different career, I have a different management style than does the president and do other Republicans, and people will draw that distinction as they think as appropriate.

Politico: What is the difference in your management style?

Romney: Oh, I'm going to have to let you make that assessment. I wouldn't try and characterize the president's. My management style is to bring in a lot of people who are bright and have more skill and experience in certain areas than I, to gather a lot of data and insist on an analytically driven decision-making process, to ask for a lot of debate, a lot of discussion of the pros, the cons, the upsides, the downsides. I like a highly deliberative process for making decisions. Now, I can pull up and shoot whenever I need to. But I like having a very extensive debate of people who agree and disagree on issues in order to make a final and best answer

Politico: What have you learned about the country so far in this process?

Romney: I read, some time back, excerpts from Jimmy Carter's malaise speech, which says that the problem in America is the American people and that the wonderful government leaders are doing their job but the American people could just wake up – effectively, that's what is says. What I've learned is, as I have always believed, the greatness of America is the American people – that the heart of the American people is strong and well and the American people are looking for leadership in Washington to finally get their act together and lead. And that's why I am in this. It's because I'm very concerned about the America that I'm going to leave to my kids and grandkids and your kids and grandkids and I think I can make a real difference.

DOJ_NMG_0139629

Politico: Governor, what books should we be reading?

Romney: I like reading – I read a lot of books.

Politico: Even during this process?

Romney: Yeah, yeah. "The Looming Tower," I just read, by Lawrence Wright, which I found very interesting. "The Cube and the Cathedral" – a very good book, about Europe. "America Alone," by Mark Steyn – I read that. I just read one called "The River of Doubt," about Teddy Roosevelt. "Mayflower," by Nathaniel Philbrick. So I like reading.

Ann Romney: We pass the books between us.

Politico: Ever fiction?

Romney: I LOVE fiction. Right now, we're reading a lot of Vince Flynn. I've read every Louis L'Amour book there is – I love those old Westerns. Unfortunately, those are gone – although, as my memory gets weaker, I can go back and read some of them again. Vince Flynn is a spy-novel type.

Ann Romney: Vince Flynn? I'm on his third one. It would really be nice if those characters that were in those books were real and were really doing some of this stuff.

Romney: What's the other one that I like? The great CIA operative? Mitch Rapp!

Politico: What the White House reporters really want to know is whether your Crawford will be in Deer Valley, Utah, or Lake Winnipesaukee, N.H.? (He has homes both places.)

Romney: Well, that's a hard choice. But without a question, it would have to be in Lake Winnipesaukee, N.H. We've actually chuckled about that, thinking about it the last couple of weeks and months. I wouldn't want to impose the Secret Service and the press corps on our nice little community New Hampshire. So maybe I'd get to visit once a year for a quick weekend and then get the heck out. Because I wouldn't want to intrude on the beauty and the calm of that fabulous place.

Romney Gets The Nod From CPAC (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, March 5, 2007

Mitt Romney's efforts to become the preferred candidate for social conservatives were rewarded at the weekend when he won a straw poll asking attendees at the Conservative Political Ac-tion Conference who they thought was most likely to be the Republican presidential nominee in 2008.

Mr Romney, a former governor of Massachusetts, had faced scepticism at the conference amid charges that he had flip-flopped on some of the critical issues for conservatives, changing his stance on gay and abortion rights. The initial reception to his speech at the conference on Friday was far less enthusiastic than the rousing greeting for the celebrity figure of Rudy Giuliani, former mayor of New York.

About a third of the 6,000 attendees at the three-day conference voted in the poll. Mr Romney won with 21 per cent of the vote, followed by Mr Giuliani, with 17 per cent. Senator John McCain, the only Republican presidential front-runner not to attend CPAC, languished in the poll, ranking fifth with 12 per cent.

Mr Romney's campaign was the best organised at the conference. Dozens of students wearing blue Mitt Romney T shirts and carrying red Mitt Styrofoam baseball mitts were bussed in to encourage activists to vote in the poll. Even so, national polls have consistently shown Mr Romney as trailing in third place. His national campaign has appeared to stall as attention shifted to Mr Giuliani as his presidential ambitions have become clearer.

Unlike at the recent parade for the Democratic presidential candidates last month at the Democratic National Committee meeting, where the main preoccupation was to set out assertive stances on the Iraq war and for withdrawing troops, the Republican candidates largely avoided the subject, focusing instead on the need to win the war on terror.

Other than Mr McCain, the other notable missing figure at the conference was President George W. Bush.

CPAC Embraces Steele, Gingrich (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

Michael S. Steele and Newt Gingrich were the biggest stars according to activists who attended the three-day Conservative Political Action Conference.

Former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani pulled off CPAC's biggest coup, former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III was the biggest surprise, and Ann Coulter was the biggest loser.

DOJ_NMG_0139630

Mr. Steele, the former Maryland lieutenant governor -- rejected last fall by the Bush White House for chairmanship of the Republican National Committee (RNC) -- was mobbed by hundreds of attendees wanting their picture taken with him on the dais after he served as master of ceremonies at the Thursday banquet featuring Vice President Dick Cheney and former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton.

"He acknowledged the November shellacking that he and the rest of the GOP took, but was upbeat and essentially said, 'Hey, I'm an African-American Roman Catholic Republican from Maryland, so overcoming odds is nothing new to me,' " said Cleta Mitchell, a Washington lawyer and board member of the American Conservative Union (ACU). "He was funny, smart, warm, and representative of all we stand for."

This year's CPAC was also a boon for Mr. Gingrich, as the former House speaker acknowledged after his Saturday speech that closed the conference.

"I got more bang for my buck than the other [2008 presidential hopefuls]," a smiling Mr. Gingrich told The Washington Times after he marched from the back of the Regency Ballroom at the Omni Shoreham Hotel, amid stirring music nearly drowned out by applause and cheers.

Mr. Gingrich was the only top-tier potential contender for the Republican nomination who hadn't formed a presidential exploratory committee or bought any CPAC banquet tables for supporters. Yet in the largest presidential preference straw poll in the conference's history, he placed fourth (14 percent) -- ahead of Arizona Sen. John McCain (12 percent), who rejected an invitation to address the event.

Mr. Giuliani made his decision to accept CPAC's speaking invitation four days before the conference, yet managed to place second (17 percent) in the straw poll behind former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (21 percent), who had invested heavily in pre-event organization.

Perhaps most importantly, the conference poll conducted by the Fabrizio-McLaughlin firm allowed attendees to indicate their second preferences. Mr. Gingrich and Mr. Giuliani each got 16 percent of the second-choice votes, so that when first- and second-place were combined, Mr. Giuliani was on top (at 33 percent), with Mr. Romney and Mr. Gingrich tied for second at 30 percent each.

"I think Giuliani is doing much better among conservative audiences than anybody could have imagined six months ago," said Michael Toner, a Federal Election Commission member appointed by President Bush.

Following Mr. Giuliani's Friday speech, several previously skeptical conservatives stopped a reporter to express their admiration for how thoughtful Mr. Giuliani appeared and to say they liked the way he conveyed a sense of leadership.

However, when questioned Saturday night after both Mr. Gilmore's and Mr. Gingrich's speeches, more CPAC attendees remembered the former Virginia governor's address and said the Virginian -- a former RNC chairman who headed the Gilmore Commission to assess terrorism threats -- got all the nuances right on foreign policy, while also praising Mr. Gingrich's emphasis on basic Republican themes of individual freedom.

"Newt showed he is the strongest spokesperson for today's conservatives," said Tom Edmonds, a veteran campaign strategist and chief executive officer of the Edmonds Hackney media-consulting firm.

Mr. Steele, who lost his 2006 Senate bid in a bad year for Republicans, got high marks from CPAC attendees for his easygoing humor as master of ceremonies at the gala banquet on opening night.

"Michael Steele showed himself clearly to be a significant figure in the future of the conservative movement," said Joe Morris, a Chicago lawyer and ACU board member who noted that Mr. Steele, who now heads GOPAC, has been nominated for the ACU board, "a tribute to his campaign last year."

Several conference attendees said they were shocked by an apparently offhand remark Miss Coulter made during her standing-room-only speech Friday.

Asked to comment on Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards, Miss Coulter said, "It turns out you have to go into rehab if you use the word 'faggot,' so I'm kind of at an impasse -- I can't really talk about Edwards."

Mrs. Mitchell said that Miss Coulter -- a best-selling author, TV commentator and a frequent speaker at campus conservative events who also drew criticism for using an anti-Arab epithet in her 2006 CPAC speech -- has become an "embarrassing ... caricature" who is hurting the movement.

"No question -- we shouldn't give Coulter a serious platform when she is seriously out of line," said Mrs. Mitchell, an Oklahoma native whose clients include many top Republican candidates. "She is the Howard Stern of so-called conservative commentators, and we should take her off the list in my view."

Former Republican congressional staffer Gil Macklin agreed.

"Every time Ann Coulter opens her mouth, taste takes a holiday," Mr. Macklin said. "No blow is too low for Coulter to throw."

DOJ_NMG_0139631

Pollster Tony Fabrizio took an unusual turn in the spotlight as the conference concluded Saturday evening, eliciting sometimes deafening boos from the packed ballroom every time he mentioned a poll finding associated with Mr. McCain. The Arizona senator snubbed CPAC, and a McCain spokesman called the annual gathering a bunch of Washington insiders even though the poll showed that 85 percent of its 4,800 registered attendees came from 47 states outside of Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia.

A Mood Of Gloom At CPAC (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

The Politico, March 3, 2007

At first blush, the state of the Vast Right-Wing Conspiracy appears to be strong. Here at the annual Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC), a few thousand students, activists, hopeful pols and professional hangers-on have descended on one of Washington's larger hotels to affirm and amplify the right-wing gospel.

But even though every conservative group from the Islamic Free Market Institute to The American Protectionist is here in force, there is considerable grumbling about the health of the movement. From conservative pioneers to up-and-coming true believers, many attendees are looking for leaders -- and they're uncertain about the current crop of presidential candidates and not even thrilled with the current occupant of the White House.

"I'm disenchanted, I'm disenfranchised, I'm just dissed," quipped David Bossie, the president of Citizens United and a tireless congressional investigator in the Clinton era.

"It's a struggle," said conservative activist and public relations specialist Mike Thompson. "Conservatives want to win, but they aren't really sure the guys at the top of the field are conservative." Reconciling purity and pragmatism is always a challenge, Thompson added, but it's especially so going into 2008 because "of the fear of the other side."

Some of the ire at the CPAC conclave is directed squarely at Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), whom many conservatives suspect talks the talk when it comes to movement ideals but harbors dangerously moderate instincts.

On Thursday, Bossie gleefully unveiled a 22-page dossier kneecapping McCain ("He's No Ronald Reagan: Why Conservatives Should Not Vote for John McCain"). But Bossie also said his beef wasn't just with the one Republican presidential aspirant – McCain -- who skipped the CPAC festivities

His McCain manifesto "may be the first, but it's not going to be the only," Bossie said by way of warning to the other GOP aspirants.

For More Info Visit Our Candidates Page

It's not just skepticism about McCain, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney that has members of the movement in a funk.

While conservatives here are appreciative of his steadfastness in the war on terror, President Bush has disappointed some on the right who had high hopes.

Bush has "made so many mistakes," said the Eagle Forum's Phyllis Schlafly. "The war is a disaster and he flubbed the [immigration] issue."

And the leading GOP contenders to succeed Bush? "They're all equally unacceptable," Schlafly said.

Comparisons with the ultimate CPAC icon, Ronald Reagan, are, of course, inevitable in this crowd. While Bush has never addressed the gathering, now in its 34th year, CPAC proudly posts on its Web site all the years that Reagan addressed the conference (12 times all told). And as veteran activists recall, the Gipper did far more than give perfunctory after-dinner remarks.

"Reagan wasn't just at the head table," said a wistful Richard Viguerie, "he walked among us." The direct mail guru said conservatives "are leaderless at this point in time."

"They no longer look to Republican leaders, whether it's President Bush or Republicans in Congress."

Conservatives, Bossie said, "are desperately looking for an heir to Reagan's mantle." And among the top three contenders, "I don't think that any of these candidates are up to that."

But it's not just the old-timers, pining for the good old days that always look better in hindsight, who have soured the mood at CPAC.

"There is no agenda," said Soren Dayton, a young consultant and blogger, complaining that GOP candidates are only offering up predictable platitudes. "You say you're pro-life, you say you'll ban gay marriage and you say you'll cut taxes."

Many of the younger bloggers here, at least those not actively working for a campaign, are in no hurry to get on board with the 2008 contenders.

"I'm for letting them fight it out for a while," said Mary Katharine Ham, who writes for the conservative TownHall.

Some GOP gurus dismiss the overlay of pessimism. Grover Norquist admits that "there's no Ronald Reagan that everybody's in love with," but he takes a more hopeful view of the rightward shifts of Romney, McCain and Giuliani.

DOJ_NMG_0139632

"We have candidates going to where Reagan is," pointed out the anti-tax crusader. "That's good, that's called progress."

Conservatism would be in trouble, Norquist added, if the top candidates were saying, 'I'm not where Reagan is, and I don't want to be.' "

"There's no Rockefeller wing of the party left," he observed.

Indeed, the conservative movement has consolidated their control over the GOP and kept successive Democratic hopefuls out of the White House.

As John O'Neill, Sen. John F. Kerry's fellow Swift Boat veteran-turned-nemesis put it when I asked him about the 2004 race: "mission accomplished."

The question now is what the next mission is and who will lead it.

Giuliani's Not-so-wild Card In 2008 (USAT)

By Chuck Raasch

USA Today, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — In a paradoxical way, George W. Bush's struggles as president may be benefiting 2008 candidate Rudy Giuliani, who has a solid lead in head-to-head polls among fellow Republicans.

National horserace polls usually aren't worth the money spent on them until you get closer to primary and caucus season, and even then, they can be cruelly fickle. Otherwise, it would have been President Howard Dean.

But in Giuliani's case, a recent surge in national polls so defies conventional wisdom that it may be indicative of important contours in the 2008 campaign, at least as it is shaping up today. The search for a candidate identified with strong leadership qualities, as Giuliani has carried since 9/11, may be trumping some of the threshold requirements on abortion rights and other cultural issues that have marked GOP presidential primaries for over a quarter century.

Conventional wisdom has been that as Giuliani's support of abortion rights, gay rights and gun control becomes better known, he will be toast among social conservatives who vote in GOP primaries and caucuses. The negative primary and caucus ads that could be run against Giuliani almost write themselves. The only question is which opponent attempts to draw first blood and when.

But Giuliani's poll standing has risen the more he has been on the stump, where a lot of coverage has focused on this twice-divorced candidate's attempts to explain himself to dubious cultural conservatives. Yet, as he has moved around the country, Giuliani leads Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., to 44-21% in the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll, taken Feb. 22-25. A month earlier, Giuliani enjoyed a 7 percentage-point advantage.

As Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., maintains her front-runner status among Democrats (she led Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., 41-17 in the Post-ABC survey), the fear and loathing created on the right over the thought of another Clinton administration might also be fueling Giuliani's surge. The calculations over the best available candidate to defeat Clinton may be trumping ideological fealty among Republicans. There is no guarantee this equation will survive the hurly-burly of debates and mega-campaign ad blitzes. But that no clear cultural conservative champion has yet arisen in the GOP field accrues to Giuliani's favor.

Bush may be a lame duck, but it is almost impossible to create an election scenario in 2008 that is not a referendum on his leadership. With opposition to the war in Iraq building, Democratic presidential candidates are already being measured in the distance they are putting between themselves and Bush on the war. Democratic rhetoric is heavily built around the notion that this has been a failed presidency, and Democrats are banking that a majority of Americans will agree with them in November of 2008 — no matter who their nominee turns out to be.

Conversely, Republican presidential candidates are facing a tougher balancing act between stressing support for an embattled fellow Republican versus separation on issues that have not gone well for the president, most notably Iraq and immigration reform. Three out of four Republicans in a recent USA TODAY poll still gave Bush favorable ratings.

Even if Iraq stabilizes in the coming months, as Bush struggles to make his "surge" work, the president's leadership still would be the subject of referendum, this time accruing favorably to Republicans in a redemptive, stay-the-course way.

In many ways, Bush is unlike any other president. In an upcoming book, "Second-Term Blues," by the Brookings Institution Press, eminent presidential scholar Charles O. Jones describes Bush as "fascinatingly paradoxical," his presidency featuring "many firsts, mosts and leasts." Jones said it has been a presidency marked — some would say marred — by wide swings in favorability, and branded with counterintuitive acts and leadership style.

Jones describes Bush as "the president with the least political standing of those elected in modern history," yet he is "among the most boldly aggressive policy advocates."

Bush's presidency has been marked by "agenda-bending" events, Jones said, including 9/11, Katrina, Iraq, rising nuclear threats in Iran and North Korea. He is the first president to govern in a post-9/11 reality that two oceans and history's most sophisticated military no longer protects Americans from distant terror and turmoil.

DOJ_NMG_0139633

The American people often understand the magnitude of the challenges better than the tacticians and wedge-drivers inside campaigns.

This is why leadership, strength, and clarity of national purpose could transcend narrower ideological tests when Americans choose their next president.

The Real Rudy Giuliani: A Profile (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

Rudy Giuliani had been speaking for six minutes before anyone in the audience thought to clap, which was exactly the way he wanted it. Talking to a political crowd in North Spartanburg, S.C., last month, the former New York City mayor and 2008 presidential candidate was not there to excite but to warn; he was less interested in making political promises than he was in sketching out the perils we face. He spoke in the hushed tones of the day that marked him for history, September 11, 2001, his voice barely filling the somber setting—not a hotel ballroom or a church basement, but a firehouse, festooned with American flags.

America's struggle was far from over, Giuliani warned the crowd. The terrorists who tested the nation that morning were still plotting to destroy its spirit. He wouldn't even use the word "if" to talk about future attacks: "I think probably the way I have to say it is, when we're attacked. That's the only way we're going to be safe." The crowd remained silent. "We're going to be in this war for quite some time," Giuliani concluded. "Not by our choosing, but by theirs."

His remarks were dramatic, which was fitting, since Giuliani has always been a man of drama, always thriving at moments of crisis. Growing up in the Long Island suburbs of New York in the placid 1950s, he would close the door to his bedroom and listen to Italian operas, in which each song contained a challenge, a confession or a choice. As a college student he read the words of Winston Churchill, perhaps dreaming that he, too, might one day feel as though he were "walking with Destiny." For a pudgy, Brooklyn-born undergraduate at Manhattan College, his aspirations seemed somewhat outlandish. Sometimes they still do. In his daily interactions, Giuliani can be arrogant, abrasive and imperious, an average-size man trying too hard to prove himself a giant.

But when the crises come, Giuliani has proved to be big enough. New York City was crime-ridden with a dwindling middle class when he became mayor in 1994. By the millennium, the city was safe, swaggering—and the envy of much of the nation. On 9/11, with the president hidden from view, "America's Mayor" steeled the country by speaking the terrible truth: "The number of casualties will be more than any of us can bear." Now, with the war in Iraq in chaos and Al Qaeda still unvanquished, he is pitching himself to Republican primary voters as the man destined to steady the party and the nation in a time of trial.

The Republicans will require some convincing. Giuliani is a social moderate running in a party dominated by Christian conservatives; he supports gay rights and gun control, and hopes to be his party's first pro-choice presidential nominee since Gerald Ford more than 30 years ago. His tenure at city hall—in which he donned fishnet stockings to dance alongside the Rockettes and sauntered for the press corps as a pink-chiffon-clad Marilyn Monroe—is a case study in why no New York City mayor has gone on to higher office since 1868.

Yet with their party in turmoil after the disastrous 2006 midterm elections, some conservatives seem willing to overlook the mayor's colorful past. After a slow start, Giuliani's candidacy has gained ground in recent weeks, thanks in part to former front runner John McCain's staunch advocacy for escalating the troop presence in Iraq and the emerging impression that none of the top-tier candidates (Giuliani, McCain, former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney) is a true believer on social issues. In the new NEWSWEEK Poll, Giuliani leads McCain by 25 points (59 to 34 percent) as the choice of registered Republicans and voters leaning Republican for the party's nomination, while Romney trails both men by more than 30 points.

As Giuliani campaigns to protect the country from disaster, he will have to account for calamities from his own past and of his own making. Twice divorced, he has lived a life more to the tastes of New York tabloid editors than evangelical voters in South Carolina. "I can guarantee you that the majority of Southern Baptists will not vote for Giuliani," says Richard Land, president of the Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention. "President Truman said he would never hire someone who cheated on his wife, because if a person breaks his marriage oath he could also break his oath of office."

Mindful of Giuliani's vulnerabilities, his campaign has controlled his exposure to the media tightly. He declined to be interviewed or photographed for this story. But with the Iowa caucuses still 10 months away, Republican primary voters will soon learn all about the Real Rudy that New Yorkers know so well. The former mayor's life story is that of a man with a righteous sense of right and wrong who excels when the world presents him with a crisis, and, when left to his own devices, creates crises for himself.

DOJ_NMG_0139634

Born in 1944, Rudolph William Giuliani was raised to be tough in moments of peril. On a school trip to Washington, D.C., at the age of 17, he stayed up late with other boys, horsing around in the hallway of the hotel. The commotion attracted the attention of an angry hotel manager. "He said to us, 'Pack your bags, you're out of there'," recalls Peter Powers, a Giuliani friend since childhood. The other teenagers panicked; Giuliani was unimpressed. "He's bluffing," said the future mayor. "I'm going to bed." Sure enough, the manager was never heard from again.

Giuliani was taught to venerate courage by his father, Harold, a man with a complex moral history. In 2000, Wayne Barrett, author of "Rudy!", uncovered court documents showing that Harold had served time for armed robbery in Manhattan when he was 26. Barrett's account also quoted eyewitnesses who claimed Harold had served as an enforcer for a brother-in-law who ran a loan-sharking business out of a Brooklyn bar. But Giuliani, who said he knew only "parts" of Harold's checkered past, still spoke of his father with awe. Powers recalls Harold as a moral pillar: "He would ... tell us, 'Behave, do the right thing'."

Young Rudy adopted a black-and-white sense of justice. After Manhattan College and New York University Law School, he set off on a career as a prosecutor singularly focused on battling evil. He made a name for himself as a young assistant U.S. attorney in the Southern District of New York, chasing drug rings and corrupt cops. Friends recall an exceptionally driven prosecutor. "Rudy's professional life always took precedence over his personal life," says Jeffrey Harris, a colleague from the Southern District. "If that meant canceling a vacation or not being at home much in order to ensure he ... performed at the highest level, he was willing to make the personal sacrifice." The sacrifice was real: Giuliani's first marriage, to his second cousin Regina Peruggi, ended in divorce. (It was later annulled by the Roman Catholic Church on the ground that the couple hadn't gotten a special dispensation required for blood relatives to marry.) But his star turn earned him an appointment as Ronald Reagan's associate attorney general, the Justice Department's No. 3 position, in 1981.

At Justice, Giuliani had a knack for causing a ruckus. Shortly after arriving in Washington, he held a highly unusual meeting with the general counsel of McDonnell Douglas. The aeronautics corporation was under federal indictment on charges of fraud and conspiracy at the time and allegedly applied pressure to Republican lawmakers to get the Justice Department to back off. Informed of Giuliani's backdoor session, the two career prosecutors handling the case dashed off a letter to him claiming he'd created the "appearance that certain influential defendants have access to senior officials." The letter quickly found its way into the press. Enraged, Giuliani called the two prosecutors into his office. "He was raising his hands, screaming, 'How dare we send a note like this!' " recalls Michael Lublin, one of the prosecutors. "I've never seen a public official who behaved like that." The scandal passed, but Giuliani held a grudge. After the McDonnell flap, he was slated to give awards to Lublin and his fellow prosecutor, George Mendelson, at a Justice Department ceremony. Giuliani refused to present the honor, Lublin says. (Giuliani's campaign did not respond to a request for comment.)

Within two years, Giuliani had earned the trust of Reagan administration officials and was offered the job he really wanted: U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York. He logged long hours and brought a string of high-profile cases against mobsters, corrupt public officials and Wall Street inside traders. And he developed an addiction to media attention. To make a point about the city's rampant drug problem, he and New York Sen. Alfonse D'Amato donned black leather jackets and dark shades and cruised the streets of an uptown neighborhood to make undercover crack buys.

By then, Giuliani had come to rely on an influential adviser: his wife. On a trip to Miami in 1982, Giuliani was introduced to an attractive local anchorwoman named Donna Hanover. Hooked, he pursued her intently and proposed within six weeks. Together in New York, Hanover helped Giuliani navigate the tricky tabloid culture. This was no idle exercise; Giuliani had long viewed the Southern District as a jumping-off point for elected office in New York. In 1989, he ran as the Republican candidate for mayor against David Dinkins. He lost by three points.

Bitter about his defeat, Giuliani was convinced he would have to intensify his efforts to survive the bedlam of New York politics. Targeting Dinkins in a 1993 rematch, he brought in a steady stream of outside experts to run a series of seminars on city government. "He didn't want Dinkins to know something he didn't," says Henry Stern, a New York City parks commissioner under Giuliani. One snowy morning in 1991, while Stern was out walking his dog, he ran into Giuliani and his young son, Andrew, in a park on Manhattan's Upper East Side. "When are we going to get a dog, Daddy?" Andrew asked his father. "When we live in Gracie Mansion, we'll have a dog," Giuliani replied. The seminars paid off: in 1993, Giuliani defeated Dinkins by 2.9 points.

The crisis facing New York when Giuliani took over city hall was vast. With a $2 billion deficit, the city was struggling to provide basic services, and the persistence of violent crime had forced many urban professionals to move their families to the suburbs. The problems were so vast, some observers wondered if Giuliani, or any mayor, could do much to solve them. Dismissing the doubters, Giuliani seemed to revel in the challenge, casting it as historical drama. "Winston Churchill," he said in a December 1993 speech, "didn't walk out in the middle of the Battle of Britain and say, 'You know, those bombs may really win out in the long run and we may lose to the Nazis'."

Giuliani wouldn't rest until New York was safe. He ordered the NYPD to scale back its feel-good community-liaison projects and simply patrol the streets. As his police commissioner he recruited William Bratton, a media-friendly Boston police commissioner who subscribed to the "broken windows" approach to enforcement. The theory held that areas that tolerated small-time crime would eventually become havens for more-serious offenses. (A single broken window would lead to more broken windows, which would lead to squatters' breaking into a building.) Graffiti artists, loiterers and prostitutes became the targets of the swift hand of the law. Bratton introduced CompStat—a system for mapping real-time crime statistics to allocate policing resources more precisely and keep track of officers' performance. Questions persisted about whether pursuing squeegee men—panhandlers who washed the windows of cars waiting in traffic—was the best use of the mayor's and his police force's time. But the strategies seemed to work: by the end of Giuliani's first year, homicides in the city were down 18 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0139635

New York was emerging from adversity and Giuliani wanted the credit. It was widely reported that he was enraged when Bratton appeared on the cover of a January 1996 Time magazine under the headline FINALLY, WE'RE WINNING THE WAR AGAINST CRIME. Bratton stepped down from the NYPD within months. (Giuliani denied publicity was the issue; "Bratton didn't understand that he had a boss," says Giuliani friend Powers. "It's not a question of credit.") By this time, New Yorkers had grown accustomed to a mayor who loved combat—with allies and adversaries alike. "For Rudy, governing New York was conquering New York," says Mitchell Moss, a professor of urban policy and planning at New York University. "He thrived on confrontation." As long as Rudy got results, the public didn't particularly care how he did it, or how many fights he picked. The squeegee men were gone, as were turnstile jumpers and the more notorious pornographic emporiums. In terms of quality of life, he delivered. The rest was just drama—drama that exhausted those involved, yes, but what mattered was New York was livable again. Suburban parents no longer automatically vetoed children's trips into the city. By the end of his first term, Giuliani had cut 20,000 workers from the city's payrolls, was dramatically reducing the welfare rolls and had violent crime approaching a 30-year low. The public rewarded him with 55 percent of the vote when he ran for re-election in 1997.

His city delivered from strife, Giuliani went, in John Quincy Adams's phrase, in search of monsters to destroy. Sometimes the mayor created them when a lot of people didn't think they really existed. Where to begin? First, there was the New York Magazine ad campaign in which the magazine called itself "possibly the only good thing in New York Rudy hasn't taken credit for." Giuliani banned the ad from city buses, prompting the magazine to sue, successfully, on the ground that the mayor had violated its First Amendment rights. Then there was the risqué Brooklyn Museum exhibit that included a portrait of the Virgin Mary that the artist had stained with a clump of elephant dung. Whatever one might think of the exhibit's artistic merits—and reasonable people could disagree—Giuliani went to war in a way even some of his friends found rhetorically extreme. Outraged, he responded as though the museum was poised to destroy Christendom. "You don't have a right to government subsidy for desecrating someone else's religion," the mayor said. Some old supporters wondered if he'd lost his sense of proportion. "It was almost as if he became so enamored of his press," says Floyd Flake, a former Democratic congressman from Queens who supported Giuliani in 1993, "that he had to be solving something, even if there wasn't any problem to solve."

The mayor's largely cultural or political skirmishes—bus ads, art exhibits—were particularly irksome to minorities, who believed he was ignoring a real problem: the city's racial divide. To some community activists, Giuliani's police force seemed especially eager to practice its tough new enforcement tactics on black New Yorkers, guilty or not. Tensions boiled over on Feb. 4, 1999, when NYPD officers fired 41 shots at Amadou Diallo, an unarmed Guinean immigrant, in the vestibule of his Bronx apartment building. Giuliani expressed regret over the killing but seemed primarily concerned with protecting the police department's image. Ed Koch, the former New York mayor who'd supported Giuliani in the 1993 and '97 campaigns, became an ardent critic. "Blacks and Hispanics ... would say to me, 'He's a racist!'" Koch tells NEWSWEEK. "I said, 'Absolutely not, he's nasty to everybody'."

Giuliani was also embroiled in personal crises. By the late '90s, he and Hanover were leading largely separate lives. In 1999 the mayor met Judi Nathan, an attractive East Side divorcée. He was smitten. Over the next year, Nathan and Giuliani spent time together. When Giuliani was diagnosed with prostate cancer in the spring of 2000, forcing him out of a Senate race against Hillary Clinton, Nathan, a registered nurse, helped him as he underwent treatment. Finally, in May 2000, after the New York Daily News published photos of the couple, Giuliani confirmed that Nathan was his "very good friend."

Then a bizarre sequence unfolded: a week after the photos appeared, Giuliani announced in his daily press briefing that he and Hanover would begin divorce proceedings. But later that day, in a hastily arranged press conference, Hanover had her own announcement: Giuliani's announcement had caught her by surprise.

Giuliani's private life was a shambles—and on full display. Another mayor of another city might have moved swiftly to settle the unseemly matter quietly; Giuliani, however, hired Raoul Felder, a celebrity divorce attorney never known to be shy of publicity. When Hanover's lawyers filed a "paramour access motion" seeking to prevent Nathan from entering Gracie Mansion, where Hanover continued to live, Felder accused Hanover of "howling like a stuck pig." (After a judge banned Nathan from the mansion, Giuliani moved into a suite in the home of his friend Howard Koeppel and his partner Mark Hsiao.) No detail seemed too personal for the papers—even the fact that Giuliani's cancer treatment had rendered him temporarily impotent was used to counter the idea that Nathan was his mistress. ("The mayor can't have a paramour if he can't paraform," the comedian Jackie

DOJ_NMG_0139636

Mason, a Giuliani friend, explained to the New York Post.) Giuliani and Hanover eventually reached a settlement, but by the summer of 2001, Giuliani, savior of Gotham in his first term, had fallen from his early heroic heights. He was unpopular, even irrelevant, as New Yorkers prepared to elect his successor in the autumn of the first year of the new century.

And then came the cold horror of September 11. In those morning and midday hours Giuliani was transformed into the man of destiny he'd seemed to always believe himself to be. Some New Yorkers will remember that awful day as a sheer struggle for survival, a crazed exodus from lower Manhattan. Others will recall the frantic search for a loved one feared to be in one of the towers or on one of the doomed planes. But when the vast majority of Americans look back on 9/11, they will, for the ages, think of Giuliani walking through ash and soot. He was honest, sad and strong; he was heroic. Alone that night, before going to bed, he read Churchill's May 1940 speech to the House of Commons: I have nothing to offer but blood, toil, tears and sweat.

September 11 made Giuliani untouchable. Queen Elizabeth named him an honorary knight. French President Jacques Chirac called him "Rudy the Rock." He became a fixture at Republican rallies around the country in the elections of 2002, 2004—the year the GOP convention came to Madison Square Garden—and 2006. Once reviled by his party for his moderate views, he leapt to the top of opinion polls of potential 2008 Republican nominees.

There were other, more immediate rewards. After leaving the mayor's office in January 2002, Giuliani eventually commanded $100,000 per engagement on the lecture circuit. He found joy spending his new money with Nathan. "She became a socialite," says a friend who would comment on the couple only anonymously. "She helped his hair, she helped his suits." In May 2003, Michael Bloomberg, Giuliani's successor as mayor, married them in a star-studded ceremony on the lawn of the mayor's residence. Wearing an antique white Vera Wang gown and a pearl-and-diamond tiara, Nathan was finally mistress of Gracie, if only for one night.

Giuliani had found the good life, but that didn't stop him from playing a role in the arena, with very mixed results. In 2004, when the Bush administration was looking for a new Homeland Security secretary, Giuliani enthusiastically made the case for Bernard Kerik, who'd served as his police chief on 9/11. Gruff and hard-charging, Kerik was a Giuliani favorite; when the former mayor started Giuliani Partners, a security firm, he brought Kerik onboard, along with other associates such as Anthony Carbonetti and Denny Young. His recommendation helped Kerik win White House support. "Rudy got the door open for Bernie," says an administration official familiar with the Kerik nomination who would discuss personnel matters only anonymously.

Kerik's nomination was a disaster from the moment Bush announced it. Reporters inundated the White House with allegations of his seemingly shady behavior, including a sweetheart stock deal, improper use of police resources and connections to Mafia-linked construction moguls. (In 2006, Kerik pleaded guilty to two misdemeanors for accepting $165,000 in renovations to his Bronx apartment from a company attempting to win city contracts and for failing to report a $28,000 loan from a real-estate developer.) The White House was caught completely off guard. Bush withdrew Kerik's name after a week and a half, and the botched nomination threw Giuliani's political future into doubt. By the end of 2006, he had yet to assemble a serious political team for a 2008 run. The New York Daily News published an embarrassingly amateurish memo from his staff laying out potential fund-raising targets (many of whom had already been scooped up by McCain) and forecasting potential weaknesses. More than a few Republicans concluded he wasn't serious about running.

Then, once again, Giuliani surprised. "I'm running," he told Larry King in an interview last month before setting off on a series of carefully staged campaign events around the country to prove the point. Just showing that he meant it gave Giuliani a serious bump in the polls and worried his rivals. "I have thought for the longest time that [Giuliani] had zero chance," says an aide to another Republican candidate who asked for anonymity talking up the chances of his boss's rival. "But he's got real momentum. And if there's a terrorist attack between now and the election, he could be the next president of the United States."

Social conservatives remain skeptical and suspicious. "Giuliani is highly respected by lots of Americans because of his leadership after 9/11," says Gary Bauer, president of the conservative nonprofit organization American Values. "In fact, there is evidence that it might be the only thing people could tell you about him." A particular weakness for Giuliani may be gun control, a cause he advocated again and again as part of his crimefighting plan in New York. Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, asks: "The question is, do you need someone who is 100 percent on these issues, or someone who reaches a threshold? He wouldn't be polling so well if he wasn't coming close to a certain threshold."

Giuliani may well be his own worst enemy. His strength in crisis can blur into stubbornness; his resolute conviction sometimes leads to churlishness and a tendency to divide the world into good and evil, with little apparently in between. Voters will have to decide whether his virtues are worth his vices in the White House.

But make no mistake: he is a man of formidable virtues, and mastering the brutal politics of New York is good training for a fast-paced nomination fight and what will likely be a close-run general election.

Will conventional considerations—that is, the ordinary expectations voters have of presidential candidates—apply to Giuliani, or does 9/11 loom so large in the national consciousness even now that Americans will give the mayor a pass on the temperament question in favor of a man who is both strong and competent? (It is hard to imagine a President Giuliani botching the response to Katrina in the way President Bush did.)

DOJ_NMG_0139637

The numbers may be strong now, but as British Prime Minister Harold Wilson used to say, a week is an eternity in politics, much less a year. At the event last month in South Carolina, Giuliani looked unsteady as he fielded questions on jobs, immigration and free trade. He still seems un-comfortable when coaxed off his national-security script. But no one knows better than Giuliani that every day is not 9/11, and while the crises of a campaign may seem inane, they are far from inconsequential. In the coming months, there will be a million small disasters—ways to falter or chances to become a man of destiny once more.

With Susannah Meadows, Mark Hosenball, Michael Isikoff, Eve Conant, Sarah Childress, Andrew Romano and Jonathan Mummolo

What Makes Rudy Run (USNEWS)

By Gloria Borger

U.S. News and World Report, March 4, 2007

I know, it's early. The public hasn't really focused on the presidential race yet. It's all a bunch of background noise. Except when it's not. And there is something happening in the Republican Party these days that goes beyond the usual rat-a-tat-tat of early campaigns and polls, because it's so mind-boggling: Rudy Giuliani is surging. The pro-abortion rights, pro-gun control, pro-gay rights, thrice-married former New York mayor—who as part of a spoof once dressed in drag and got cozy with Donald Trump—is ahead. And not just in one poll; in most every poll. And not just because he's a well-known name; GOP voters specifically rate him above the rest of the field as a leader, both inspirational and electable. In one recent poll, the putative front-runner, John McCain, beat him on just a single quality-experience. For whatever that's worth these days.

So are GOP voters just remembering the moment on 9/11 when Rudy took charge? Or can it be that they might actually embrace a candidate whose positions on social issues are nothing less than a heresy to the party's right flank? Just months ago, that seemed like a nutty idea, particularly with the once-maverick McCain going Establishment. But the inevitability of McCain took a hit with Iraq—and his support for the president's plan for a troop surge. No matter how much McCain says the war was botched—and he says it all the time now—he's still Bush's guy on adding more troops. And that's a problem.

Enter Rudy. His bid is a huge gamble with a simple premise: that, in the end, the appeal of his personality, leadership cred, and the new primary schedule (which could be full of big states with large urban areas with lots of moderate Republicans), will give a city boy a chance to win the nomination. From the minute Giuliani announced his intention to announce (that's how they do it these days), he's been in the top tier. But guess who isn't? "Not one of the leading candidates is a conservative," says William Bennett, a conservative who hosts a radio talk show. The best horse conservatives have is Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas—smart, but not exactly about to catch fire.

Cultural conservatives are, to put it mildly, miffed about "Rudy McRomney." While McCain has spent years burnishing his conservative credentials—and has a clear antiabortion voting record—the purists still consider him suspect. (After all, he supports embryonic stem cell research.) And Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor positioning himself as the conservative alternative to McCain, has a few credibility problems, starting with this: He was for abortion rights just two years ago, before a sudden (pre-convention?) conversion. For Republicans, who like their primaries orderly, it's all just so unsettling. To calm them down, the Giuliani crowd likes to say its guy is just like Bush, only articulate. "Republicans still believe Bush is right on the principles," says a Giuliani backer. "They just wish he could say it—and do it—better." That's obviously the strong suit for the mayor who captivated the nation on 9/11. "If your complaint is that Bush hasn't gotten results in the war on terror, you should be with Rudy," says an adviser. Rudy gets results! Sound like a slogan?

Guns and gays. But is that enough to push aside the GOP social agenda? Not if you're a cultural conservative like Tony Perkins, who runs the Family Research Council. He says that once GOP voters figure out where Giuliani stands on the issues, they'll dump him. And if they don't, he warns, "an unenthusiastic Republican base will suppress turnout and set up a Democratic victory." But what if Giuliani finds a way to finesse his liberal past by, say, promising to appoint conservative judges, as he did recently on the stump? "I would want judges who are strict constructionists because I am," he said. As for his support for gay civil rights, an adviser says, "since when are voters not open to tolerance?" And when it comes to guns, he adds, Giuliani had a city in crisis, got the guns off the streets, and reduced crime. And, in a pitch to conservatives last week, Giuliani himself called Ronald Reagan his "hero."

Will all of this work? It's unknowable. But here's what we do know: In 1999, George Bush was the only Republican candidate who could raise about $70 million to get elected. Now each man in the top tier can raise that, and more. That means they can last until they kill each other off—and get ready. Stories about Giuliani's marriages, McCain's temper, Romney's Mormonism: It'll be a food fight.

DOJ_NMG_0139638

Alter: Wrong Time For An Urban Cowboy? (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

Presidential elections are said to be about the future, but they also end up as verdicts on the past. Voters often reject the type of leadership they have recently experienced. In 1960, young JFK was the antidote to dowdy Ike. In 1976, Jimmy ("I'll never lie to you") Carter campaigned to wipe away the stain left by Richard Nixon. In 1980, sunny Ronald Reagan tapped into disgust with the malaise of the Carter years. In 2000, George W. Bush took on not just Al Gore, but Bill Clinton and Monica Lewinsky.

The reason the 2008 campaign favors Democrats—at least for now—is that Bush has failed so badly that the next president may be the one who resembles him least. Job One in 2009 will be reviving the prestige of the United States, which is a prerequisite for confronting nuclear threats, jihadists, climate change—you name it—none of which can tackled by Americans acting alone.

So to be effective, Bush's successor must be a tough-minded but flexible and humble chief executive with a talent for building bridges, not burning them. For instance, preventing terrorism is less a matter of war than a subtle diplomatic challenge involving international coordination and a convincing projection of Western values. It's a group activity, which means that the next commander in chief will need a Tom Sawyer-like skill in getting other kids in the global neighborhood to paint the fence. This requires charm and leadership.

Which brings us to Rudy Giuliani. On one level, his consistent lead in the polls makes perfect sense. The trauma of 9/11 still moves through the national bloodstream like a time-release capsule. For many Americans, it was the most significant public event of their lifetimes. If Gen. William Henry Harrison could be elected in 1840 on the strength of his victory over Indian "terrorists" at the Battle of Tippecanoe three decades earlier, the cataclysmic events of 2001 might yet make "America's Mayor" president, whatever his views on other issues.

But from a different angle, Giuliani's leadership style seems out of sync with history's pendulum. Why would voters want to replace a my-way-or-the-highway Texan with a shut-up-and-listen New Yorker? Exchange a Crawford cowboy for an urban cowboy? A woman, African-American, Hispanic, Mormon or Vietnam POW would represent a sharper break from the immediate past.

Not that Giuliani is a Bush clone. He performed in slashing crime and helping to save New York. But Rudy was often petulant and polarizing. To give just one example (minor in itself, but revealing): he broke diplomatic relations with the Manhattan borough president, Virginia Fields, because she dared to criticize him. (Giuliani was feuding with Harlem politicians at the time.) When, amid a racial crisis in the city, I went to Gracie Mansion to ask him how he could refuse to speak for more than two years to the highest-ranking African-American in town, he scoffed that there was no point.

Of course, such detail about his fitness for the give-and-take of the presidency is too nuanced to be a campaign issue. So is the dictatorial way he dealt with local dissent. Unless his temper explodes on the trail, which is not as likely as his detractors predict, we probably won't squarely face the question of whether America is Ready for Petty. The more that liberal New Yorkers warn Republicans in the rest of the country about Giuliani, the more those Republicans will bond with him. The mayor once described by Jimmy Breslin as "a small man in search of a balcony" has found one, and with lots of people standing in rapt attention below.

Including me. In the days after 9/11, I went with Giuliani five times to Ground Zero and to the funerals of several firefighters. Up close, his compassion and calm command were every bit as impressive as advertised. I fell hard for him and what he was doing for New York and the country. Too hard. When he said it was "cynical" to believe he should leave office at the end of his term—nearly four months after 9/11—I bought his argument for an extension. I was fearful enough to write that he had "practical reasons" for moving in an extraconstitutional direction amid the emergency. When cooler heads than mine prevailed, he eventually backed down on that idea, as well as his insistence on changing the city constitution so he could run for a third term.

Rudy was a good mayor in many ways, but his appeal now is based on fear. When terrorists attack again, we'd want him at the helm for the first few weeks. But after that? Even the most skeptical among us might bend too easily to his will, with frightening consequences. As Giuliani moves toward the big prize, voters will have to look closely at how his history and character could condition his behavior in the White House, where past is always prologue.

Clinton, Obama Praise Civil Rights Achievements (USAT)

By Alvin Benn And Jamie Kizzire

USA Today, March 5, 2007

Two Democratic presidential candidates — one black, the other a woman — speaking three blocks apart on a street named for Martin Luther King Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0139639

Sens. Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Clinton of New York came here Sunday to help commemorate Bloody Sunday, a 1965 march that became a seminal moment in the civil rights movement.

The re-enactment of the march over the Edmond Pettus Bridge into Selma was the first time in their campaigns that the candidates appeared together. Later, they watched former President Bill Clinton inducted into the National Voting Rights Hall of Fame.

At the churches and in early appearances, the senators told how the civil rights movement touched their lives.

"I could not be here if not for the foot soldiers," Obama said at a breakfast.

At the pulpit of First Baptist Church, Clinton described herself as a "grateful friend" and "beneficiary" of the civil rights movement.

Obama focused on continuing the struggle in his remarks at Brown Chapel AME Church.

Everyone, he stressed, makes a difference.

"Don't tell me we can't do better by our children," said the 45-year-old senator. "We can achieve. We can do it. The power is in our hands.

"I know if cousin Pookie would vote, if brother Jethro would get off the couch and stop watching SportsCenter and go register some people and get them to the polls, we'd have a different kind of politics," Obama said. "Kick off your bedroom slippers, put on your marching shoes!"

Clinton also embraced the theme of pushing the movement forward.

Bloody Sunday and other major civil rights events such as the integration of Little Rock's Central High School "do not mark the end of the journey," said Clinton, 59.

"We've got a march to finish. The brave men and women of Bloody Sunday did not lose heart. We can do no less."

Clinton recalled how her life changed in 1963 when she attended a speech by King.

She then turned to the future, touching on national issues including health care, education and care for wounded soldiers. After speaking at length about voting irregularities in the last two presidential elections, she vowed to push for federal election reform.

Outside, Cheryl Griffin and Barbara Mann recalled the 1965 demonstrations that changed the political face of America. Students at Alabama State University, they joined the marchers when they got to Montgomery.

"I did it because my mother couldn't vote because of the poll tax," said Griffin, who was of age but also could not vote. "I marched for both of us."

Clintons, Obama Honor Activists In Selma (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, March 5, 2007

Presidential candidates Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton crossed campaign paths for the first time Sunday as they paid homage to civil rights activists who they said helped give them the chance to break barriers to the White House.

The two candidates and former President Clinton, making his first appearance with his wife since her campaign began, linked arms with activists who 42 years ago were attacked by police with billyclubs during a peaceful voting rights march. "Bloody Sunday" shocked the nation and helped bring attention to the racist voting practices that kept blacks from the polls.

"I'm here because somebody marched for our freedom," Obama, who would become the first black president, said from the Brown Chapel AME Church where the march began on March 7, 1965. "I'm here because you all sacrificed for me. I stand on the shoulders of giants."

Not to be outdone in the hunt for black votes, Hillary Clinton also spoke in Selma at a church three blocks away and brought a secret weapon — her husband. Three days before the march anniversary, her campaign announced that the former president who is so popular among blacks would accompany her for his induction into Selma's Voting Rights Hall of Fame.

Sen. Clinton said the Voting Rights Act and the Selma march made possible her presidential campaign, as well as those of Obama and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who would be the first Hispanic to occupy the Oval Office.

"After all the hard work getting rid of literacy tests and poll taxes, we've got to stay awake because we've got a march to continue," Clinton said in a speech interrupted numerous times by applause and shouts of approval. "How can we rest while poverty and inequality continue to rise?"

Clinton and Obama both appeared outside Brown Chapel for a pre-march rally, but came from opposite sides of the podium and did not interact. Despite the intense rivalry between their campaigns, the two praised each other.

"It's excellent that we have a candidate like Barack Obama who embodies what all of you fought for here 42 years ago," Clinton said. Obama said Clinton is "doing an excellent job for this country and we're going to be marching arm-in-arm."

DOJ_NMG_0139640

But they did not join arms when the commemorative march attended by thousands got under way. Instead, Clinton held hands with her husband and Obama was several people down the line. Obama, who shed his coat and tie for the march, approached Hillary Clinton at one point and the two chatted for a few seconds before moving back to opposite sides of the street.

The two candidates sounded similar themes in their speeches. Both said the civil rights movement is not over because inequality still exists in education, health care and the economy. Both criticized the Bush administration for failing to return Hurricane Katrina victims to their homes.

But Obama, who was three years old on Bloody Sunday, delivered a call to action that would be politically unfeasible for Clinton or any of his other white rivals. He said the current generation of blacks does not always honor the civil rights movement and needs to take responsibility for improving their lives by rejecting violence; cleaning up "40-ounce bottles" and other trash that litters urban neighborhoods; and voting instead of complaining that the government is not helping them.

"How can it be that our voting rates dropped down to 30, 40, 50 percent when people shed their blood to allow us to vote?" Obama asked at a unity breakfast with community leaders.

At the breakfast, Obama got a key to the city and another to surrounding Dallas County from a probate judge, Kim Ballard. "Forty-two years ago he might would have needed it because I understand it would open the jail cells," Ballard said. "But not today."

Obama said the fight for civil rights reverberated across the globe and inspired his father to aspire to something beyond his job herding goats in Kenya. His father moved to Hawaii to get an education under a program for African students and met Obama's mother, a fellow student from Kansas.

Obama said he was not surprised when it was reported this week that his white ancestors on his mother's side owned slaves. "That's no surprise in America," he said and added that the civil rights struggle made it possible for such a diverse couple to fall in love.

"If it hasn't been for Selma, I wouldn't be here," Obama said. "This is the site of my conception. I am the fruits of your labor. I am the offspring of the movement. When people ask me whether I've been to Selma before, I tell them I'm coming home."

But the former president stole the show from the two candidates. The audience cheered loudest for him when the three took the stage at the end of the march and the crowd mobbed him as he tried to make it to his limousine, delaying his departure.

Speaking at his induction, Clinton said the 2008 campaign features "a rainbow coalition running for president."

"If it hadn't been for the Voting Rights Act, the South would have never recovered and two white southerners — Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton — never could have become president," Clinton said.

Other Democratic candidates are not leaving the black vote to Obama and Clinton. John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee, was speaking about Selma and civil rights at the University of California, Berkeley.

"The fight for civil rights and equal rights and economic and social justice is more than just going to celebrations, even as wonderful as the one in Selma," Edwards said in remarks prepared for delivery as he referred to Berkeley janitors' fight for a wage increase. "The fight is going on right here, right now."

Candidates Obama, Clinton Vie For Black Voters In Selma (MCT)

By Matt Stearns

McClatchy Newspapers, March 5, 2007

SELMA, Ala. - Sens. Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton brought their increasingly intense battle for the Democratic party's base to this heart of the American civil rights movement Sunday.

Obama, the upstart Illinois Democrat, brought the hot vibe of the cool new. Clinton, the veteran New Yorker, brought her long history and a ringer: husband and former President Bill Clinton, whom black author Toni Morrison once called the "first black president."

The trio came to Selma for the 42nd anniversary of a seminal event in American civil rights history - the bloody protest march from Selma to Montgomery in defiance of a ban on protest marches by then-Gov. George Wallace. Hundreds of marchers were savagely beaten by Alabama state troopers on March 7, 1965, as they attempted to cross the Edmund Pettus Bridge on the highway to Montgomery. The national outcry helped lead to a successful five-day march of thousands two weeks later. Within months, the Voting Rights Act was signed into law, forever changing American society.

The annual celebration of the event has become a civil rights demonstrators' reunion and political pilgrimage, thrown into high relief this year by the fight for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination. Obama and Clinton already had a high-profile tiff over deep-pocketed Hollywood support; this weekend, both were vying for black voters, a key element of the Democratic primary vote, especially in the South.

A recent Washington Post-ABC News poll late last month found that Obama, once trailing Clinton by 40 points in support among black voters, had gone 11 points up on Clinton among them.

DOJ_NMG_0139641

Obama accepted an invitation to a unity breakfast and to speak at a local church several weeks ago; Clinton days later accepted an own invitation. Then last week, Clinton's campaign announced that her still popular husband would come to Selma to be inducted into Selma's Voting Rights Museum Hall of Fame. Originally, Hillary was to accept on Bill's behalf.).

The rhetoric Sunday was lofty despite the gamesmanship. Obama, a toddler at the time of the Selma demonstrations, said the civil rights measures that Selma begat made his rise possible.

"If it hadn't been for Selma, I wouldn't be here," Obama said. "This is the site of my conception. I am the fruits of your labor. I am the offspring of the movement. When people ask me if I've been to Selma before, I tell them I'm coming home."

Sen. Clinton took the idea further, saying that the civil rights movement had made possible not just Obama's candidacy but New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson's and her own.

Some voters had already made up their minds as they massed on Martin Luther King Jr. Street to see Obama at Bethel Chapel A.M.E. Church or Clinton at First Baptist. The two old "movement" churches are just a few hundred yards apart, separated by a public housing project.

Waiting in line after a four-hour drive to see Obama, Fran Gholston wore an Obama T-shirt and carried a sign saying "I Have the Audacity of Hope," a reference to Obama's best-selling book.

"It's a new beginning, a time for a change," Gholston said of her support for Obama. "I like Hillary, too. And I love Bill. If he were running…It's just time for a change."

"I'm still open," said Dennis Middlebrooks, of Tarrant, Ala. "I was sold on Clinton until he stepped up…I need to investigate both."

The weekend-long celebration was the classic Southern dichotomy of Saturday night fun and Sunday morning solemnity. Both showed how far Selma had come since "Bloody Sunday", the March 7 morning that marchers came under attack on the bridge.

Saturday night saw much of a downtown street closed for a rollicking block party that featured teens in long t-shirts and baggy pants and adults dressed to the nines, munching on plates of barbecue and giant turkey legs. Many danced to a blues band and the crowd was almost entirely black.

Leaning against a telephone pole, Vinney Cooper remembered that in his youth, before the movement, such celebrating never would have been allowed to happen: "There was one place we could do something, twice a year, for one day." (Cooper himself, whose older brothers were injured on Bloody Sunday, later became one of Alabama's first black state troopers.)

Next morning, Selma, a poor town in the old cotton fields of west-central Alabama's Black Belt, was transformed. Now it was the set for something unimaginable 42 years ago: two presidential candidates vying for crucial black votes _ one candidate black, one female.

"If the men and women who crossed that bridge could see…I could hear Dr. King saying, 'We're about at the mountaintop'," said U.S. Rep. Emanuel Cleaver a Missouri Democrat.

Crowds Jam Selma Churches To See Obama, Clinton (AJC)

By By Scott Shepard

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 5, 2007

Selma, Ala. — The stars fell on Alabama on Sunday in political pageantry that looked to be an early defining moment in the campaign for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

Overflow crowds of mostly African-Americans jammed two historic churches to hear sermon-like speeches from the front-runners for the party's nomination, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

But the crowds swelled even larger when former President Bill Clinton, one of the most popular political figures ever among African-Americans, led a re-enactment of the famous 1965 "Bloody Sunday" march that produced landmark federal legislation guaranteeing minorities the right to vote.

Obama acknowledged his debt to a generation of civil rights "foot soldiers" during his remarks at Brown Chapel AME Church, the sanctuary from which the voting rights marchers set out on their fateful walk on March 7, 1965, across the Edmund Pettus Bridge and into the violence of club-wielding law enforcement officers.

"We're in the presence today of ... giants whose shoulders we stand on," he said. "Because of what they endured, they led a people out of bondage. It's because of them that the next generation has not been so bloody. It's because of them I stand before you today."

Indeed, among those in the audience were the Rev. Joseph Lowery of Atlanta, a lieutenant of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. who took over the Southern Christian Leadership Conference after King's assassination, and Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), who led the original "Bloody Sunday" march, a prelude to King's Selma-to-Montgomery march days later.

DOJ_NMG_0139642

Speaking to the crowd, Lewis said, "Forty-two years ago it was almost impossible for people of color to register to vote. We got in the way. We stood up. That's why we come back [to mark the anniversary]." Lewis sat next to Obama inside the church, but in his remarks, he did not indicate a preference for Obama or Clinton in the 2008 Democratic presidential contest.

African-Americans are one of the most important constituencies in the Democratic Party, and the face-to-face confrontation between Clinton and Obama in Selma underscored how actively both plan to court black voters.

Comments from those who heard the speeches Sunday did not provide definitive proof of which candidate carried the day.

"We love the Clintons, but it's a brand new day," said Freddie Gholston, 55, an African-American from Trinity, Ala., who attends the "Bridge Crossing Jubilee" every year. "It's really possible for Obama to become president."

But Althea Roy, 67, a lifelong resident of Selma, said of Clinton: "I think she would be good for our people. Her husband was."

Obama, who is seeking to become the country's first African-American president, was just three years old when state and local police turned back Lewis and the other "Bloody Sunday" marchers, producing television images that galvanized the nation against election tactics >used mostly in Southern states to legally disenfranchise blacks.

In a breakfast speech at a local community college earlier Sunday, he told students that his father, a goat herder in Kenya, also was inspired by the struggles in Selma. He moved to Hawaii to attend school and there met the white woman from Kansas who would become his wife and the senator's mother.

"If it hadn't been for Selma, I wouldn't be here," Obama said. "I am the offspring of the movement."

Sen. Clinton also credited the struggle in Selma and the 1965 Voting Rights Act it produced with proving new opportunities for women and Hispanics.

"It is the gift that keeps on giving," she said of the Voting Rights Act.

"It is giving Senator Obama a chance to run for president, [New Mexico Gov.] Bill Richardson, a Hispanic, a chance to run, and it is giving me a chance," she said. "I know where my chance came from, and I am grateful."

Clinton, who is seeking to become the first female president, spoke at the First Baptist Church, located just two blocks from Brown Chapel. During the voting rights demonstrations in the early 1960s, the Baptist church often served as a meeting place for King and SCLC organizers.

Drawing upon biblical scriptures and the sermons of King, she said after all the "hard work getting rid of literacy tests and poll taxes, we've got to stay awake because we've got a march to continue." To shouts of approval and applause, she added, "How can we rest while poverty and inequality continue to rise? We all know we have to finish the march. That is the call to our generation."

Following the church services, Clinton and Obama praised each other as they appeared together outside Brown Chapel for a rally that kicked off the march from the church over the Edmund Pettus Bridge.

"It is excellent that we have a candidate like Barack Obama who embodies what all of you fought for here 42 years ago," Sen. Clinton said. Clinton is "doing an excellent job for this country, and we're going to be marching arm-in-arm," Obama said of his Senate colleague.

When the commemorative march began, Obama linked arms with Lowery, who had led the Selma-to-Montgomery march at the request of King, and Clinton joined arms with her husband in their first joint appearance since she announced her presidential campaign in January.

The march ended with a ceremony in a park at the foot of the bridge heralding the induction of the former president into Selma's Voting Rights Hall of Fame.

Obama Praises Selma Achievements (USAT)

By Alvin Benn

USA Today, March 5, 2007

SELMA, Ala. — Sen. Barack Obama praised Selma for its civil rights achievements Sunday morning, and said that his presidential candidacy has a direct relation to the events of 1965.

"I am the product of your legend," Obama, D-Ill., said at the Wallace Community College gymnasium, where he spoke to about 1,000 supporters.

The school is named for Alabama's famous, former segregationist governor, George C. Wallace, who once stood in the doors at the University of Alabama to keep black students from entering.

Obama and Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., are in Alabama to participate in events Sunday marking the 42nd anniversary of the Selma to Montgomery march. Former President Bill Clinton will also participate.

Political historians consider the weekend visit by two candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination significant.

DOJ_NMG_0139643

"This city has become the symbolic place to come for the African-American vote in this country," Selma historian Alston Fitts said Friday.

Posted

E-mail | Save | Print |

Enlarge

By Rob Carr, AP

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., spoke Sunday morning at the Martin and Coretta King Beloved Community Unity Breakfast, in Selma, Ala.

Obama, Clinton Seek Votes At Civil Rights Landmark (CHIT)

By Dahleen Glanton And Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, March 5, 2007

SELMA, Ala. -- Two of the Democratic Party's leading presidential candidates came to an emotionally evocative touchstone of the civil rights movement Sunday seeking to strengthen their bonds with African American voters and tie their campaigns to the cause's unfinished work.

Speaking at two of the city's oldest black churches, located yards from each other, Sens. Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Clinton of New York presented their campaigns as legacies of the struggle for political equality.

With African American votes crucial to winning Democratic primaries in the South, Clinton and Obama have been making a determined effort to win over black voters. The candidates came to Selma for the 42nd commemoration of Bloody Sunday, when civil rights marchers were beaten by state troopers as they tried to cross the Edmund Pettus Bridge.

Sunday marked the first entrance into the presidential campaign by former President Bill Clinton, a popular figure with African-Americans whom writer Toni Morrison once called "our first black president." He avoided upstaging his wife at her speech by staying away from the church. But people cheered and rushed to be near him when he joined his wife and Obama for a re-enactment of the 1965 march.

In a keynote address for the commemoration, Obama declared himself part of a new wave of black political leaders that he called "the Joshua Generation." It was Joshua, the Biblical successor to Moses, who led the Jewish people to the Promised Land after Moses delivered them from slavery in Egypt.

"We are in the presence today of a lot of Moseses, ... of giants whose shoulders we stand on," said Obama, surrounded by civil rights veterans. But, he added, "We've got to remember now that Joshua still has a job to do."

While Obama did not explicitly claim for himself the role of Joshua, that was clearly the implication, coming during a campaign to be elected the nation's highest leader.

Speaking at the First Baptist Church, Clinton said that three Democratic contenders for the presidency-Obama, an African-American, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, a Latino, and herself, a woman-benefited from the civil rights movement.

"I come here as a ... great beneficiary of what happened in Selma," said Clinton.

"In the last two elections, we have seen our right to vote tampered with ... in state after state," Clinton said.

Clinton began the presidential race with a huge lead among African Americans, many of whom have deep affection for the former Clinton White House, but recent polls have shown Obama leading her among black voters. Though Obama is African American, he is a newcomer to national politics and is not as well known as the former first lady.

Black voters could play an important role in the selection of the next Democratic nominee. South Carolina, where blacks make up about half of the Democratic primary electorate, will hold one of the earliest nominating contests. Several other Southern states, including Alabama, are considering moving up their primaries.

Marching at the front of the procession through downtown Selma and across the bridge, the Clintons and Obama were separated in line by two black congressmen and several other civil rights leaders. People along the route snapped pictures and yelled out the names of Obama and the Clintons. Many of them fell in behind as the march passed.

"It is important for us to see what they stand for," Patrick Dick, a 33-year-old heating and ventilation technician from Birmingham, said of the candidates. "It will be a difficult decision because both of them seem like they are there for us and want to make the world better."

Before the procession, Obama spoke at Brown Chapel A.M.E. Church, the meeting place for Selma civil rights organizers during the 1960s and the starting point for the Bloody Sunday march. Obama was joined there by the local congressman, Artur Davis (D-Ala.), who has endorsed Obama, and by Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), who was badly beaten on the bridge and returns for every anniversary.

Obama placed his own life in the broader experience of black Americans and noted recent news accounts of his genealogy showing a white ancestor once owned slaves.

DOJ_NMG_0139644

His father, a black man from Kenya, "met this woman whose great great-great-great grandfather had owned slaves," he said.

Some commentators have argued that Obama's biography-he is the son of a white woman from Kansas and a black man from Kenya and was raised by white grandparents in Hawaii-gives him a different experience from most black Americans.

But he asserted his ancestors in colonial Africa suffered many of the same humiliations as blacks in the Jim Crow-era South, noting his African grandfather was a "house boy" whom even in old age his British employers addressed by his first name, rather than his last.

"Sound familiar?" Obama said, rousing a chorus of affirmations.

He offered his life story as a legacy of the civil rights movement, asserting formative events in his life as touchstones of the movement's achievements: election to high office, the opportunity to study at prestigious Ivy League universities, and even his birth of a mixed-race marriage.

"There was something stirring across the country because of what happened in Selma, Ala., because some folks are willing to march across a bridge. So they got together and Barack Obama Jr. was born," Obama said.

Obama was born in 1961, four years before the march across the Edmund Pettus Bridge. But spokesman Bill Burton said Obama was "speaking metaphorically about the civil rights movement as a whole."

During Sunday's commemoration, Bill Clinton was inducted into the National Voting Rights Museum Hall of Fame.

His wife said much work remains to be done in this country, including providing health care for 46 million uninsured Americans, creating an efficient energy policy and taking care of American soldiers fighting in Iraq.

"How do we refuse to march when our young men and women are in harm's way and when they come back our government does not take care of them," she said.

She added, "The brave men and women [in the 1960s] did not lose heart. We can do no less."

Clinton And Obama Unite In Pleas To Blacks (NYT)

By Patrick Healy And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

SELMA, Ala., March 4 — Evoking the passions and rivalries of the civil rights era, Senators Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton made deeply personal appeals to voters in the sanctuaries of black churches here on Sunday, and then joined former President Bill Clinton for a march across a bridge where white police officers beat protesters, most of them black, nearly 42 years ago.

It was an extraordinary sight: the Clintons and Mr. Obama, two of them competitors for the Democratic presidential nomination, walking — with two black congressman, and sometimes others, in between them — down Martin Luther King Jr. Street to commemorate the footsteps of black demonstrators who were met with violence as they tried to march to Montgomery to demand civil rights in 1965.

The visit to Selma, a historically rich, economically struggling city, became a proxy battle for black support between Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama, whose candidacy represents a threat to Mrs. Clinton's traditional base. That competitive dynamic intensified on Sunday with the debut of Mr. Clinton on the campaign trail, six weeks into his wife's bid, and among a bloc of voters who are at once devoted to the former president and torn between his wife and Mr. Obama.

It was the first side-by-side appearance of Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton in the 2008 presidential campaign, and the political theater of the two campaigns overlapped repeatedly, but with a polite tone that contrasted with their political skirmishing of recent weeks. Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton spoke at services on the same street, three blocks apart, and the lines of worshipers were so long that they nearly intermingled. Both candidates paid homage to the same civil rights leaders, and both concluded the services by locking arms with worshipers and swaying to "We Shall Overcome."

At different points, both Clintons said that the Voting Rights Act of 1965 had paved the way for Mr. Obama to run for president.

"Today it is giving Senator Obama the chance to run for president," Mrs. Clinton told worshipers at the First Baptist Church, to enthusiastic applause. "And by its logic and spirit, it is giving the same chance to Gov. Bill Richardson to run as a Hispanic. And, yes, it is giving me that chance."

Mr. Obama, before the commemoration march, praised both Clintons and said of the political campaign under way, "We don't have time for other folks to divide us."

Mr. Clinton, arguably the most cadence-blessed speaker of the three, half-joked Sunday afternoon that he had been bested by the other two. "All the good speaking has been done by Hillary and Senator Obama already — I'm just sort of bringing up the rear," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0139645

If Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton had one overarching theme in their remarks, it was the honoring of the civil rights movement that had contributed to their own rise in politics and quests for the nomination.

"We're in the presence today of giants whose shoulders we stand on," Mr. Obama said at the Brown Chapel A.M.E. Church. "People who battled on behalf not just of African-Americans but on behalf of all Americans, who battled for America's soul, that shed blood, that endured taunts and torment."

In a 35-minute address, interrupted repeatedly by applause and shouts of praise from worshipers, Mr. Obama said it was time for his generation to pick up the work of those who had toiled before. He said it was time for the "Joshua generation" — a biblical reference to the leader who succeeded Moses — to urge family and friends to shake their apathy to engage in politics and action.

"I know if cousin Pookie would vote, if brother Jethro would get off the couch and stop watching Sports- Center and go register some folks and go to the polls, we'd have a different kind of politics," Mr. Obama said, the crowd rising to its feet. "Kick off your bedroom slippers, put on your marching shoes!"

Down the street, meanwhile, the congregation warmly welcomed Mrs. Clinton, who blended personal anecdotes with a fluidly thematic set of remarks, in which she said the civil rights march "is not over yet."

"We've got to stay awake, we've got to stay awake because we have a march to finish," Mrs. Clinton said, "a march towards one America."

Her voice rising, she said: "Poverty and growing inequality matter. Health care matters. The people of the Gulf Coast matter. Our soldiers matter. Our future matters."

Both candidates, too, turned to stories from their past to show their connection to the civil rights movement.

Mr. Obama relayed a story of how his Kenyan father and his Kansan mother fell in love because of the tumult of Selma, but he was born in 1961, four years before the confrontation at Selma took place. When asked later, Mr. Obama clarified himself, saying: "I meant the whole civil rights movement." He also acknowledged for the first time a recent revelation by a genealogist that his mother's ancestors in Kentucky owned slaves, something reported by The Baltimore Sun last week.

"It turns out that her great-great-great-great-grandfather actually owned slaves," Mr. Obama said before another audience, over breakfast, at George C. Wallace Community College. "That's no surprise. That's part of our tortured, tangled history."

Mrs. Clinton, meanwhile, recalled going with her church youth minister as a teenager in 1963 to hear the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. speak in Chicago. Yet, in her autobiography and elsewhere, Mrs. Clinton has described growing up Republican and being a "Goldwater Girl" in 1964 — in other words, a supporter of the presidential candidacy of Senator Barry M. Goldwater, who opposed the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

After the services, the senators were joined on the steps of the Brown Chapel by Mr. Clinton, who flew to Selma to campaign with his wife and be inducted into the National Voting Rights Hall of Fame.

Indeed, the start of the re-enactment march was delayed as a crowd swarmed around Mr. Clinton, who smiled and hugged his admirers, a few of whom were even wearing Obama buttons.

Mary Broadnax, 52, was walking closely behind, absorbing a moment she would never have imagined growing up in nearby Montgomery. After hearing Mr. Obama speak, she said she would do whatever she could to see him win the presidency.

"I love Bill Clinton, but if he came up to me and asked me to support Hillary, I would have to say I'm sorry," Ms. Broadnax said, pausing before unspooling a long string of attributes about Mr. Obama. "He's the right man for our time."

The two political rivals, followed by large entourages and curious onlookers, had come to Selma three days before the anniversary of Bloody Sunday, a violent afternoon near the Edmund Pettus Bridge that became a turning point in the American civil rights movement. Dozens of congressmen and other elected officials also came for the ceremonies; among them was a House leader, Representative Rahm Emanuel, who represents the same state as Mr. Obama, was a former aide to Mr. Clinton and went to church Sunday with Mrs. Clinton. He has not endorsed anyone in the race.

As they re-enacted the 1965 march, making their way to the Alabama River, the Clintons were at the front of the assembly, while Mr. Obama was often only two people away, separated by John Lewis and Artur Davis, the Democratic congressmen from Georgia and Alabama. They were all linked arm in arm throughout as they slowly moved forward on the two-mile walk.

Clinton, Obama Link Selma March To Present (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

SELMA, Ala., Mar. 4 -- Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), describing himself as "the offspring of the movement," paid homage Sunday to the civil rights protesters whose violent beatings here at the hands of state troopers and sheriff's deputies 42 years ago sparked national outrage and led to legislation ensuring the voting rights of African Americans throughout the South.

DOJ_NMG_0139646

Just a few blocks away, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) claimed the same inheritance, describing the civil rights movement as "the gift that keeps on giving" as it propels new types of politicians onto the national stage. Their simultaneous appearance at the annual commemoration of one of the most famous moments in the civil rights struggle embodied the historic nature of a presidential race in which an African American and a woman lead the Democratic field.

The two presidential candidates spoke at separate Sunday morning services and later joined in the ritual march across the Edmund Pettus Bridge, led by Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), who as a young civil rights leader was beaten on the bridge with other protesters on the morning of March 7, 1965, as they began a voting-rights march to Montgomery.

Clinton marched with her husband, former president Bill Clinton, who came to Selma to be inducted into the National Voting Rights Museum's hall of fame. It was the first time the Clintons had appeared together at a major event in the 2008 campaign and an appearance much-debated in Hillary Clinton's campaign before it was announced Thursday night.

In the days leading up to the commemoration of "Bloody Sunday," advisers to Obama and Clinton had insisted it would not be a day for politics. But their mere presence in Alabama signaled the extraordinary importance of black voters in the upcoming Democratic primaries, with recent surveys indicating that Obama is jeopardizing Clinton's lead in the race by gaining among African Americans.

Any pretense that it was not part of the presidential campaign was dropped as they day went on. Supporters carried signs for the two campaigns, former president Clinton joked about the "rainbow coalition" of candidates on the Democratic ballot, and Rep. Artur Davis, the Alabama Democrat who represents Selma, unabashedly introduced Obama in his keynote address at Brown Chapel AME Church as the next president of the United States.

The crowd in and around Obama's appearance was decidedly larger -- his audience included 15 members of Congress, compared with four who went to hear Clinton. Obama, who was 3 years old at the time of the Selma clash, used his keynote address to mark his place in a younger generation of black Americans who do not march in the streets -- but still, in his words, are required "to fulfill that legacy, to fulfill the obligations and the debt that we owe to those who allowed us to be here today."

Referring to his heritage, Obama said that although his own ancestors were not slaves, the civil rights movement inspired his African father to move from Kenya to seek an American education and eventually marry his white mother -- "whose great, great-great-grandfather had owned slaves." "But she had a different idea," Obama said.

"Something stirred across the country because of what happened in Selma, Alabama, because some folks were willing to march across a bridge," Obama said, explaining that, as a result, his parents "got together and Barack Obama Jr. was born." Earlier in the day at a prayer breakfast the Illinois Democrat said: "If it hadn't been for Selma, I wouldn't be here."

"This is the site of my conception. I am the fruits of your labor," Obama told an audience of civil rights movement veterans. "When people ask me if I've been to Selma before, I tell them I'm coming home." An aide later said that the senator did not mean to imply his birth was a literal result of the Selma marches but rather the movement overall.

As Brown Chapel filled to capacity, crowds spilled out onto the lawn and the street, swaying and singing along to gospel music broadcast from speakers set up to accommodate the large number of churchgoers. A lighthearted skirmish broke out among visitors seeking programs featuring Obama. Dueling barbecues served hot dogs and hamburgers -- selling out of both even before thousands gathered mid-afternoon to walk across the bridge.

A smaller group of union members and families lingered outside the First Baptist Church, another civil rights landmark, after Hillary Clinton went inside to speak. Addressing the congregation from the pulpit where the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. once spoke, Clinton, after singing along to a jaunty version of "Battle Hymn of the Republic," described herself, as well as her main Democratic rival, as beneficiaries of the movement.

Democratic Reps. Anthony Weiner (N.Y.) and Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) went to hear Clinton speak. The bulk of the other members of Congress in Selma on Sunday, including Lewis, went to hear Obama.

Clinton described the civil rights era as a gift, saying: "Today it is giving Senator Obama the chance to run for president."

"And by its logic and spirit, it is giving the same chance to Governor Bill Richardson, a Hispanic, and yes, it is giving it to me," Clinton said.

In her 20-minute speech, Clinton recalled going with a church group as a girl to hear King speak in Chicago in 1963. "I come here as a sister in worship," she told the churchgoers.

Clinton then linked the spirit of the civil rights march and its future to the ideals underlying her agenda: insuring the uninsured, improving schools, reducing the nation's dependency on foreign oil and answering the threat of climate change, which she characterized as "tinkering with God's creation."

The civil rights movement, she said, was not just for "the history books." The march has "carried us a mighty long way," she said. "But we all know we have to finish the march." "How do we say that everything is fine -- Bloody Sunday is for the history books -- when over 96,000 of our citizens, the victims of Hurricane Katrina, are still living in mobile homes and trailers, which is a national disgrace?" The line drew loud applause.

DOJ_NMG_0139647

Speaking late in the afternoon at his induction ceremony at the National Voting Rights Museum, Bill Clinton promised to be brief because "all the good speaking today has been done by Hillary and Senator Obama."

Urging the crowd to pursue the ideal of the civil rights movement, he advised them to find support in the idea that in 1965, most of the progress today might have seemed unimaginable.

"A lot of what you hoped for has happened. A lot of what you thought you would never see, you have seen," Clinton said. "We got a rainbow coalition running for president and Reverend [Al] Sharpton is tied to Strom Thurmond. I thought I'd never see it."

Davis Hits HRC On War Vote As Obama Ties Himself To Movement (POL)

The Politico, March 5, 2007

SELMA, Ala., -- Turns out Obama didn't have to wait for all those speakers to get his turn. In a nod to his full schedule, the organizers here allowed their special guest to take the mic ahead of schedule.

Before he did, though, Rep. Artur Davis offered a glowing introduction of his colleague and candidate that included a direct shot at Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Noting how the same knock against Obama, "longevity," had been used against "Dr. King and Jack and Bobby," Davis said seniority wasn't always an asset.

"Longevity," Davis said, "can make you too cautious. It can make you calculate when you cast your vote on a war."

Asked to respond, Clinton spokesman Mo Elleithee said, "Today is not a day for politics."

Obama's address weaved together a tribute to "the foot soldiers" of the movement, many of whom were in attendance here, with an explanation of how he is connected to their struggle.

"My grandfather at age of 60 was still called a houseboy by his employers," Obama said of his paternal kin in Kenya. Even white children in the country, Obama noted to an audience that included many who knew such indignities, "called him by his first name because they didn't want to dignify him."

It was the reverberations of the Civil Rights Movement that got the attention of his father, a goat herder, and inspired him "to set his sights a little bit higher" and eventually pursue his education in America, Obama said.

Turning to his mother, Obama addressed with almost nonchalance the recent discovery that her descendants owned slaves.

"As if that were a surprise," Obama quipped to a crowd of head's nodding knowingly. "That's no surprise."

"That's part of our tortured tangled history."

Obama pivoted to present problems and his vision for the future by invoking the language of scripture and the movement. "Our work is not done," he declared.

"We haven't yet crossed the river...we haven't yet reached the promised land."

Obama talked of racial and economic gaps in health care and education and offered tweaks of President Bush on the war and affirmative action but said nothing direct or indirect about Clinton or his other Democratic opponents.

But he also chided his own community, by saying that just as his generation stands on the shoulders of the giants who preceded them, "our children are going to have to stand on our shoulders."

"We're going to have to strengthen our shoulders, broaden our shoulders," Obama implored.

Further funding of education is critical, he said, but "money will not make a dimes bit of a difference if you don't turn off the television set and put away the Game Boy and make sure you're talking to the teacher and get over the anti-intellectualism that still exists in some of our community"

Obama got loud applause for that line and many others -- not to mention more than a few "mmm-hmms" and "that's-right's" -- but was subdued in his delivery. He raised his volume and cadence at the end of his remarks, paying tribute again to the sacrifices of those who went before, but mostly offered unembellished rhetoric.

Silicon Valley Looks To Obama (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

Silicon Valley leaders whose endorsements have been key in past presidential races give Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton high marks, but say there is little to learn about her candidacy. Instead, they have bubbling curiosity about her fellow 2008 contender, Sen. Barack Obama.

"He's a once-in-a-generation talent. He's just the real deal," said Jude Barry, longtime Silicon Valley political observer who founded Obama for America. "He's not well known here but he will take off like a hot IPO."

DOJ_NMG_0139648

Translation: Local insiders who track stock deals and initial public offerings the way Washingtonians follow politics have growing interest in the Illinois Democrat. Many of them think Mr. Obama could be Silicon Valley's next new thing.

Mrs. Clinton, New York Democrat, who spent time in the valley during her husband's two terms as president, is a known commodity and is still the liberal Bay Area's presumptive favorite. But in California's innovation hotbed, investors, executives and valley politicians are always looking for new blood.

Santa Clara County Assessor Larry Stone has been a force in Democratic politics for decades, and prides himself on his early endorsement of Bill Clinton in 1990.

When former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner opted against running this cycle, Mr. Stone was left in what he describes as a "confusing dilemma."

"In my younger days I was about ideology, now I am just about winning," he said. "I like Hillary a lot and I know her the best of everybody, but I just question whether she can win."

Mr. Obama is courting Mr. Stone, and asked him recently what it would take to "make this deal."

It's a good question for Mr. Stone, who says Mrs. Clinton would be a good president but concedes that probably isn't enough to embrace her for 2008: "She clearly has it together but it just doesn't seem to excite people."

That sentiment echoes throughout the valley.

Mr. Barry, Howard Dean's state director in California in 2004, started the Obama group without ever meeting the senator and raised $30,000 in a matter of hours.

"I was surprised at how easy it was, and it portends great things for him out here," said Mr. Barry, once the spokesman for former San Jose Mayor Ron Gonzales.

Given Mr. Obama's anti-war stance and appeal to youth, Mr. Barry predicts the first-term senator will break all of Mr. Dean's online fundraising records.

"Obama really has a buzz in the valley because he's something new," agreed Victor Arranaga, a longtime San Jose political fixture who works in government affairs for a major tech firm.

Mr. Obama got an early endorsement from former state Controller Steve Westly, a Democrat who made his name as an EBay leader.

In 1992, a group of Silicon Valley business executives from the world's most powerful technology companies gathered at San Jose's Tech Museum three weeks before the general election to endorse Mr. Clinton over an incumbent Republican president.

The CEOs of companies such as Hewlett Packard and Apple Computer -- Republicans, Democrats and independents -- said then they chose Mr. Clinton over George Bush because he would be better for economy and innovation.

The informal Silicon Valley group has become even more influential this cycle, with a wide-open field sending candidates flocking to the Bay Area for money and to prove their tech mettle.

Russell Hancock, CEO of Joint Venture: Silicon Valley Network, said valley leaders are curious about Mr. Obama. "Folks are really interested to see what he is like. He hasn't spent enough time out here yet," he said.

Fueling the need for candidates to visit the valley is the likelihood California's 2008 primaries will be moved from June to Feb 5. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger says he will sign a bill changing the date.

Former San Jose Mayor Tom McEnery, a Democrat, remembers when Apple's John Sculley and HP's John Young -- lifelong Republicans -- joined 30 fellow valley powerhouses to endorse Mr. Clinton.

"They were people who looked to accomplishment and to the future," he said. "Since then, every presidential candidate makes a stop in Silicon Valley because they understand the future is being invented here every day. It's an absolute necessity."

This time around, the executives are equally interested in Republican presidential candidates.

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, announced recently that Cisco CEO John Chambers will serve as his campaign's national co-chairman and as economic and technology adviser.

Mr. Chambers, a Republican, said Mr. McCain can "move America forward" because "he understands the value that technology contributes to economic prosperity and growth."

Mr. McEnery called Mr. McCain "the type of independent with real appeal to the valley."

Former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani also has broad valley support, with many viewing him as a leader with centrist credentials.

Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina is no Silicon Valley favorite because of his ties to trial lawyers. "He's not a good fit," Mr. McEnery said.

"Trial lawyers are like poison," agreed Mr. Stone.

The Senator's 'Streak' Ends At 57th Vote (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0139649

By Paul Kane
The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Sure, it wasn't quite DiMaggio-esque in terms of its pop culture mythology, as far as "streaks" go. But Barack Obama's reign as the only perfect attendee of Senate votes among presidential hopefuls came to a crashing end last week.

After 56 straight votes this year on the chamber floor, Obama (D-Ill.) missed his 57th on Friday, bypassing his senatorial duties on a homeland security bill to deliver a speech to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee meeting in Chicago.

"He really hoped to make it back to Washington in time, but it turns out, that was just the audacity of hope," spokesman Ben LaBolt said of the streak ending.

Obama was the last of the six senators already declared for the presidential campaign to have made every vote in the chamber this year. He missed a second vote Friday as well. Both were amendments that sailed to easy passage in the ongoing debate on the homeland security bill.

Obama wasn't alone: Declared candidates Joseph Biden (D-Del.), Christopher Dodd (D-Conn.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) missed both votes.

But if politics were baseball, Biden and McCain were barely on the field last week. Out of six votes on the homeland security bill, they made it to one apiece.

Weekend At Obama's (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

False hope springs eternal, which is one way to look at the recent concordat between Barack Obama and John McCain to "save" the public financing of Presidential election campaigns.

In case you haven't been following this political version of "Weekend at Bernie's" -- and you need a hobby if you have -- nearly every major Presidential candidate has decided not to abide by public-spending limits for the 2008 campaign. That includes Messrs. Obama and McCain. This decision is entirely rational, because the amount of money needed to compete in the primaries exceeds the limits imposed by our campaign-finance scolds.

But now comes the Illinois Senator to say that if he wins the Democratic nomination, he will ask his GOP opponent to agree with him to accept public money and spending limits for the 2008 general election. Mr. McCain quickly matched the offer. In some media precincts, this is being hailed as an achievement, and other candidates are being challenged to follow suit.

We hope they don't. The public-financing regime is collapsing of its own misguided assumption that only public money in politics is uncorrupting. But campaign limits on individual contributions have instead made candidates even more reliant on organized special interests, and they reduce political competition by favoring the rich and famous. Messrs. Obama and McCain are trying to prop up a policy corpse that deserves to rest in peace.

Clinton Brings Debt Worries To The Fore (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon And John Harwood
The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Hillary Clinton, sounding a theme likely to recur among 2008 presidential hopefuls, is warning about the "economic vulnerabilities" posed by foreign interests owning large amounts of U.S. debt.

In remarks on the Senate floor and a letter to Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke and Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, Mrs. Clinton said President Bush's economic policies have contributed to an "erosion of U.S. economic sovereignty." She also said it is "undeniable that the exponential growth of foreign debt in the last six years has undermined our economic standing."

The comments by Mrs. Clinton, considered the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination, are an early indication of how big an issue the growing unease over globalization and free trade will be in the 2008 campaign. Many Democrats won election last year in part by arguing that global trade leads to job losses and lower wages. They also are warning about the nation's heavy reliance on foreign debt to finance domestic needs, including the federal budget deficit. With polls showing voters are concerned about jobs and wages, Republicans are also expected to address the issue.

Currently, the U.S. imports more goods than it exports from places like China, resulting in a trade deficit, and it borrows heavily from abroad to finance its domestic investment. Foreign interests own about $2.2 trillion of U.S. Treasury securities -- or about 52% of the public debt not held by the U.S. government, compared with about 20% in the early 1990s, during the Clinton administration. The U.S. has come to rely on foreign capital because Americans don't save enough to finance the nation's domestic investment.

But there are differences over how to attack the issue. In her letter, Mrs. Clinton suggested she might support setting a benchmark for foreign-held U.S. debt that would trigger some type of White House action.

DOJ_NMG_0139650

An aide to another 2008 presidential candidate, Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd, chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, said such a move could rattle markets and would require extensive consultation with the Federal Reserve. Similar concerns were raised by an aide to Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill). A top economic adviser to the Republican presidential campaign of John McCain also questioned the soundness of setting a specific benchmark for U.S.-held foreign debt.

Still, there is broad concern that the growing reliance on foreign investors puts the U.S. at risk, and some say the way to address it is to begin saving money at home by erasing the current $248 billion budget deficit, moving into a surplus and putting money aside to pay for costly obligations like Social Security and Medicare.

Edwin Truman, a former Treasury assistant secretary in the Clinton administration and a senior fellow at the Peter G. Peterson Institute for International Economics, a pro-globalization think tank here, said that while Mrs. Clinton is right to call attention to the growing reliance on foreign debt, there are no "magic numbers" that should be used as a benchmark for a trigger. Mrs. Clinton said in her letter that she supported legislation last year "that sounds an alarm bell when U.S. foreign-owned debt reaches 25% of GDP or the trade deficit reaches 5%" of gross domestic product.

Mr. Paulson, meanwhile, disagreed with Mrs. Clinton's concerns, saying the willingness of foreigners to buy U.S. Treasurys helps keep interest rates low and is a sign of the U.S.'s strong economy. "We're holding our economic fate in our own hands, and if we keep our economy growing, they're going to invest here," Mr. Paulson said yesterday on the ABC program "This Week."

Write to Deborah Solomon at deborah.solomon@wsj.com1 and John Harwood at john.harwood@wsj.com2

Crafting The New Hillary (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, March 4, 2007

The moment she stepped into the room, the crowd of 100 union and environmental activists burst into applause, and Hillary Rodham Clinton began dispensing hugs and air kisses. As photographers followed, Senator Clinton made her way to a front table and blurted out, "Hi, Anna," when she saw labor leader Anna Burger at the podium. At that point, an embarrassed Hillary quickly raised her hand to cover her face as she realized she had interrupted Burger's speech. "Sorry," Clinton said, prompting good-natured laughter from the activists, who had gathered in Washington for a national strategy conference. In her own address, Clinton sounded more like a motivational speaker than a presidential contender, urging the crowd to fight global warming and help reduce U.S. reliance on fossil fuels. "We're makin' progress," she exhorted. "Do not grow weary. You are doing good, as the gospel would say."

Her presentation was devoid of hard edges, contrary to her longtime image among critics as a harridan and a polarizer. Instead, Clinton has begun trying to present a warmer, more genial side—and she's having some success. Forty percent of Americans have an unfavorable view of Hillary Clinton, but 58 percent see her favorably, according to the latest USA Today/Gallup poll. That's an improvement from just a few years ago (chart, Page 26). And she enjoys a substantial lead over her Democratic rivals for the 2008 presidential nomination. In a hypothetical matchup, 36 percent of Democrats support Clinton, while 24 percent back Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, 14 percent support former Vice President Al Gore, and 12 percent endorse former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, according to a recent Washington Post/ABC News survey.

The New York senator's basic strategy is to scare off potential donors and supporters of her competitors by campaigning as the favorite of the Democratic establishment—and the inevitable nominee. After conducting a "vulnerability assessment," Clinton and her advisers have embarked on a two-pronged plan to expand her lead. First, they are emphasizing her strengths—high name identification, a seemingly endless string of endorsements, lots of Washington experience, a reputation for toughness and intelligence, and enormous fundraising potential. Just last week, her campaign announced that it had collected more than $1 million from a seven-day online money drive.

Equally important, Hillaryland, as her team calls itself, is placing more emphasis on her personal qualities—friendliness, a sense of humor, and a willingness to listen—all in a crucial effort to improve her image. "People have dark notions about her. They think the Clintons are all-or-nothing people and that she is vindictive, angry, cold, and calculating," says a prominent Republican strategist. "A man who is cold and calculating is smart and shrewd. A woman who is cold and calculating is considered 'a bitch.'"

Attack. The tough side of Senator Clinton, 59, was evident in her dust-up with Obama a few weeks ago. After Hollywood mogul David Geffen, a former fundraiser for Bill Clinton, endorsed Obama and strongly criticized Bill and Hillary, the empire struck back. Howard Wolfson, Hillary's campaign spokesman, called on Obama to apologize for Geffen's remarks and to return his campaign contributions. Obama refused. "It reminded people that the Clinton instinct always is to attack," says a GOP adviser with close ties to the White House. "They can't help themselves." Many GOP strategists say this image is more than a little harmful to Senator Clinton, especially with men and independent voters. But there was no retreat. "When you're attacked," she declared in Iowa in late January, "you have to deck your opponents. You can count on me to stand my ground and fight back."

DOJ_NMG_0139651

With that kind of rhetoric, perhaps it's no wonder that Hillary is just as polarizing as President Bush, maybe more so. Republican strategists, in fact, say she has so many detractors that she could never persuade more than a bare majority of Americans to vote for her. This again raises the nagging question of her electability, long a sore point. Her advisers are doing their best to counteract it.

"Hillary has just come off two landslide elections [for the Senate in New York]," says Mark Penn, Senator Clinton's chief presidential strategist. Penn says Clinton is competitive in all major polls with her likely Republican rivals, and notes that she's leading her Democratic competitors or is near the top of the heap in the early primary and caucus states of Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire, and South Carolina.

Why Hillary? "People see her as an experienced leader who has what it takes to govern in difficult times," Penn told U.S. News. "They see her as smart, strong ... someone who can relate to international leaders and restore respect to America." Penn says men are drawn to her "strength of leadership" while women, a majority of the electorate and the core of her support, see "the idea she can be the first woman president as an emotional and important event in their lives."

Clinton is also trying to come across as more cautious and centrist, if often ambiguous in her policy stands, to reassure independents and conservatives. In an interview with CNBC's Power Lunch last week, she urged Bush to address fundamental problems in the economy, such as soaring foreign debt and massive budget deficits. She called the stock market plunge a "wake-up call" and encouraged the administration to find some "sensible and reasonable" answers.

So far, the crafting of her new persona appears to be working, at least to a degree. "Hillary," as she prefers to be called, is not only maintaining a lead over Democratic rivals; she has also increased her favorability ratings among voters. In another surprise to critics who have claimed she's unelectable, recent polls find that she is running even with or within striking distance of the leading Republican candidates, Rudy Giuliani and John McCain, and running ahead of Mitt Romney.

"The electability argument has faded," a prominent GOP strategist admits. "It's a credit to her and her campaign that she has moderated her personality step by step." In addition to hewing to the center on some issues, such as abortion and free trade, she has talked openly about her belief in prayer and has worked on legislation with a number of conservative senators, including South Carolina's Lindsey Graham, who helped lead the impeachment drive against her husband. And she has refused to endorse immediate withdrawal from Iraq, despite demands from many antiwar activists.

Her aides are also confronting the "Bill problem." Asked if the former president and his history of adultery and impeachment will cause her problems with voters, a senior Hillary aide says, "They wanted him to continue to be their president even in the middle of the [impeachment]. He is living an exemplary life raising hundreds of millions of dollars for charity. And Bill has always been an asset in New York [in Hillary's two campaigns there]." In fact, the Bill problem might be overrated. A new Gallup Poll finds that Americans, by a margin of 70 percent to 28 percent, believe he would be more helpful than harmful to his wife's presidency; 61 percent want him to advise her unofficially.

Pride. Women form the core of her constituency—and make up 54 percent of the electorate, a powerful base of support. To capitalize on this, Hillary talks openly about her pride in being a woman and a mother. About 59 percent of women have a favorable view of Clinton, compared with 39 percent who have an unfavorable view, according to the Washington Post/ABC News poll. She is especially popular among women 18 to 34, of whom 66 percent have a favorable view. In her re-election to the Senate from New York last November, she won 73 percent of the female vote.

But Clinton is much less popular among men. Forty-eight percent of men have a favorable view of her, and 49 percent are unfavorable. Her share of the male vote in New York last year, 61 percent, was strong but lagged substantially behind the women.

In one way, history is on her side, since the establishment candidate generally wins major-party nominations, as did John Kerry in 2004, Al Gore in 2000, and many Republicans over the years. But the establishment candidate also sometimes stumbles and falls, as did Ed Muskie in losing the nomination to George McGovern in 1972. As the front-runner, Hillary knows she will be everyone's favorite target.

"She's got the old guard, the establishment," says a Democratic strategist with close ties to a rival presidential campaign. "But is this a year when all the accouterments of the old guard and the establishment will be more of a hindrance than a help? You've got an electorate looking for change, and they're not looking to Washington." Adds Frank Donatelli, former political director in the Reagan White House: "The American people look to the future, not the past. Hillary Clinton can only be a candidate of the past."

All this insider chatter seemed far away during her talk to the union and environmental activists in Washington last week. While her friend Anna Burger spoke, a smiling Senator Clinton, like a schoolmarm admiring a star pupil, nodded approvingly. When it was her turn, Clinton wonkishly called for the creation of a strategic energy fund, starting with $50 billion from the government raided partly from the repeal of tax breaks for the oil companies, to help develop renewable energy and create energy security. She criticized a "hint of fatalism" that has crept into Washington during the Bush administration and called for Americans to renew their optimism and unite behind new solutions to the nation's problems. "This is what Americans do best," she said with a big smile. "We are problem solvers."

DOJ_NMG_0139652

That's certainly an uplifting theme, but it's far from clear at this point that Hillary Rodham Clinton is the right messenger.

Bloomberg: The Waiting Game (NSWK)

By Eleanor Clift

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

In the aftermath of 9/11, nobody thought he could fill Rudy Giuliani's shoes. But under billionaire Michael Bloomberg, New York City's Democrat-turned-Republican mayor, the city rebounded. He's overseen a continued decline in the crime rate, forced restaurants to go smoke-free and has made vast strides in improving the public schools, the bane of any urban mayor. Not as ill-tempered as Giuliani, Bloomberg is doing a good job—perhaps, some New Yorkers might say, even a better job than his predecessor did. So why isn't he the one running for president?

Publicly, Bloomberg is focused on his second term and leaving the city in better shape than he got it. Privately, Bloomberg and political adviser Kevin Sheekey are meeting with pollsters and consultants to assess the mayor's chances as a third-party, independent candidate. "There is no Bloomberg campaign," Sheekey tells NEWSWEEK. "But we have certainly reached out." At a dinner last year with Al From, founder of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council, Bloomberg was candid and self-deprecating, wondering what chance a 5-foot-7, divorced Jew has in the celebrity-sweepstakes presidential contest.

The answer is that it depends on who the nominees are for the two major parties, and how much cash Bloomberg is willing to spend. The money part is easy for a self-made media mogul. "He could spend $500 million in a campaign and not even think about it," says From. But he'd probably do it only if buyer's remorse sets in among the voters. Because the primary process is so front-loaded this cycle, the winners will be known in early February, leaving nine months until the election for voters to get antsy. "He won't say anything until March of next year," says a former aide privy to the early discussions who didn't want to be named talking about them. "The guiding philosophy is who the Democratic and Republican nominees are, and the mood of the country once they know who those two people are."

It's hard to project a year in advance if that opening will be there, but there is so much discontent with the two parties that the stage could be set for an independent run. Hamilton Jordan, who masterminded Jimmy Carter's 1976 come-from-nowhere candidacy, and Doug Bailey, a longtime Republican consultant, have teamed up to offer a third-party centrist ticket to be chosen online in a virtual convention in June 2008. So far, 35,000 members have signed on—hardly a groundswell, but Jordan and Bailey are working to get on the ballot in all 50 states. Bloomberg would be a catch for their "Unity '08" ticket, though he might bristle at the rule that the slate has to be bipartisan and just go it alone. Still, Jordan initiated a meeting with Sheekey. Says Jordan: "I let him know there's an opening."

The Kucinich Conundrum (TIME)

By Joel Stein

Time, March 5, 2007

Remember that kid in high school who ran for class president, the one who wasn't popular, who didn't have money or dress well or even make a decent hallway poster? Now imagine if he sticks to it so long he starts to win. And by the time he's 23, he's a city councilman in Cleveland. At 31, he's the country's youngest big city mayor. All this success, you figure, would make his skin glow a little, his suits a bit spiffier, his speeches a little punchier. But what if he was so damn earnest that it didn't? What if at 60 he still looked and sounded like Dennis Kucinich?

You would make fun of him. And you did.

But Kucinich--a six-term Congressman who is running for President despite consistently coming in last in the 2004 primaries and first in talk-show monologues--doesn't care. Because he's so sure that what he's been saying for four years is right--he's for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, ratifying Kyoto, universal health care--he's convinced there's a moment coming, some event or speech or interview, when voters will suddenly realize he's not a joke: "When people see what I have to say, they go, 'Hey, wait. He's right about the war. Ha-ha. He's right about health care. Ha-ha.'" Kucinich believes deeply in the coming of this grand American epiphany even if no one outside his tiny camp does. "How can you take someone seriously that led us to war and not take someone seriously who stood for peace? It's a commentary on where we are as a society," he says. "Do we value celebrity over truth?"

That, of course, is a decision that society made when Star magazine launched. And Kucinich isn't a celebrity; he's an aging, 5-ft. 7-in. vegan. Last Saturday, as he spoke at a lectern on the corner of Hollywood and Vine in Los Angeles, accepting a

DOJ_NMG_0139653

Champion for Peace Award from the members of Military Families Speak Out at an Oscars for Peace event, none of the hundreds of people who walked right in front of him stopped, despite the fact that he was standing next to an 8-ft.-tall Oscar clad in camouflage and missing a leg.

Unlike most fringe presidential candidates, Kucinich has years of experience in elective office. But even mainstream liberals won't support a candidate who wants to end the war on drugs and create a Department of Peace. Nancy Pelosi and Henry Waxman passed over him for chairman of the National Security and Foreign Affairs Subcommittee, which he was in line to take over. Even Shirley MacLaine, who has been friends with Kucinich since the '70s, sees how his party won't embrace him. "Maybe it's because he doesn't speak doublespeak and we're so used to seeing that as leadership," she says. "Or maybe it's because he's so short."

And yet the universe has been going his way lately. Even his old kooky ideas are looking pretty good these days. His decision to allow Cleveland to default instead of selling its electric-utility company cost him re-election and landed him in a book about the worst mayors in American history, but he was later honored by the city council for refusing to sell, a move that saved customers nearly $200 million over 10 years. More inconceivable, less than two years ago, his office was visited by a stunning 6-ft.-tall Julianne Moore look-alike 31 years his junior, a Brit who was working for the American Monetary Institute. After some smooth wooing on his part ("I gave her a copy of my Department of Peace legislation and my e-mail address") and one date (at MacLaine's house), she agreed to marry him. If that happened to you, you'd think you could be President too.

Kucinich said he knew after that first meeting that Elizabeth would be his third wife: "I went up to Stephanie Tubbs Jones [Ohio Democratic Congresswoman], and I said, 'I met her.' And Stephanie said, 'Shut up!'" Now with his new bride constantly at his side, Kucinich has picked up his campaigning a little. Speaking to the Rainbow/PUSH Coalition, he broke into Sixteen Tons (standing ovation from Jesse Jackson; four stars on YouTube). At an event in Nevada, Kucinich ended his speech with his new move: after listing his goals, he asks, "Why is it I'm able to do this?" Then he puts his arms out and spins, waiting for someone to yell, "No strings!" Once someone does, he twirls more and then yells, "A President with no strings!" (five stars on YouTube).

Kucinich will run all the way, waiting for that moment when he transforms from punch line to President. And he insists that he isn't frustrated that it hasn't happened yet. "Not at all," he says. "The real test of power is whether you can endure the setbacks and still meet each day with integrity and courage." That, though, is the test of moral fiber, not the test of power. The test of power is whether you can persuade others to do your will. And it may be that an earnest man with progressive ideas who still can't make a decent campaign poster will always fail that test.

Susan Collins May Be Vulnerable, But Don't Underestimate Her (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, March 5, 2007

If you listen to Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) talk for a few minutes, you are likely to think that she doesn't have the toughness and quickness to hold off her likely Democratic challenger, Rep. Tom Allen.

Well, stop thinking that way.

I don't know whether Collins will be able to swim against a potentially strong anti-President Bush, anti-Iraq War current in 2008, but at this point, I'm certainly not going to bet against her.

Collins was the third moderate Republican woman elected to the Senate from Maine in a 30-year period, following in the footsteps of the late Margaret Chase Smith (elected to her final term in 1966) and Olympia Snowe (first elected in 1994), who currently occupies the state's other Senate seat.

A native of Caribou, Collins worked for two GOP moderates, former Maine Gov. John McKernan and former Sen. Bill Cohen, before taking a job as Massachusetts' deputy treasurer. She returned to her home state to run for governor in 1994, finishing a disappointing third behind Joe Brennan (D) and the winner, Independent Angus King.

Two years later, she ran for Cohen's open Senate seat. Her prospects didn't look good, but she won a three-way primary for the Republican nomination and went on to defeat Brennan, 49.2 percent to 43.9 percent in the 1996 general election.

More notable is that Collins drew 298,422 votes in that race at the same time that her party's presidential candidate, then-Sen. Bob Dole (Kan.), was drawing just 186,378 votes (30.8 percent). Collins ran an incredible 18.3 points ahead of Dole and garnered 112,000 more votes than he did.

Collins' strength that year, in an open seat and a hostile environment for Republicans, suggests that she ran a good race and had considerable personal appeal. It also confirmed the state's reputation for independence.

Six years after she was first elected to the Senate, Collins went on to pummel 2002 Senate opponent Chellie Pingree (D), who was then a state legislator and widely viewed as a credible challenger.

Collins won that second term with 58.4 percent, winning all five of the state's largest counties — Androscoggin (Lewiston-Auburn), Cumberland (Portland), Kennebec (Augusta and Waterville), Penobscot (Bangor and Orono) and York (Kennebunk, Biddeford and Saco). In the presidential election two years earlier, Bush won only one of those counties (Penobscot), and he did so with less than 50 percent of the vote. Collins won York and Penobscot, the most Republican of the five, with more than 60 percent of the vote.

DOJ_NMG_0139654

If Allen runs, he almost certainly will be a threat to the Senator all the way until Election Day.

A former Rhodes Scholar with an undergraduate degree from Bowdoin College and a law degree from Harvard, Allen is serving his sixth term in Congress. He served on the non-partisan Portland City Council, including a term as mayor (appointed by his fellow councilmembers).

In his initial Congressional race, Allen won a heavily contested primary against Dale McCormick, an openly gay liberal state Senator who helped found the Maine Lesbian and Gay Political Alliance. The primary was widely portrayed as a test of ideology and activism, with Allen the establishment and the moderate candidate and McCormick the insurgent and the liberal.

McCormick counted on her ideological message and intensely loyal base, and the outcome was extremely close. But Allen won the nomination 51.6 percent to 48.4 percent and went on to handily defeat the sitting Congressman, Jim Longley (R).

Since elected, Allen's liberal and organized labor interest group ratings have been at or near 100 percent. National Journal's ratings place him as the 86th most liberal Member of the House in 2006, sandwiching him between Rep. Lucille Roybal-Allard (D-Calif.) and Rep. Robert Wexler (D-Fla.). In contrast, Collins ranked as the 46th most liberal Member of the Senate in 2006.

Once a reliable GOP bastion, Maine now at least leans Democratic. While Republicans control both of the state's Senate seats, Democrats sit in both House seats, occupy the governor's office and hold majorities in both chambers of the Legislature (though their majority in the state Senate is a paper-thin one seat).

The last Republican to carry the state for president was George H.W. Bush in 1988. Since then, the best GOP presidential showing was in 2004, when incumbent Bush won just 44 percent of Maine's vote.

Collins and Snowe seem to have discovered the formula for winning elections in Maine. Both of the moderate women come from the state's 2nd district — Snowe represented it in Congress, while Collins hails from it — and have been able to rally support in that more conservative part of the state, while at the same time neutralizing some of the Democrats' advantage in the normally more liberal 1st district.

Democrats no doubt will attack Collins for supporting the Bush agenda, as well as for breaking a two-term pledge. Some of those attacks may stick, but she will be able to cite a number of high-profile instances where she broke with the president or her GOP colleagues, including her "not guilty" votes on the articles of impeachment of former President Bill Clinton, her vote against opening the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to drilling and her generally moderate views on abortion.

Though it is early, Collins' electoral fate seems tied to whether Maine voters see her reelection as a referendum on Bush and the Iraq War or as a referendum on Collins herself. Since she has been able to run far ahead of other GOP candidates in the past, and since Bush won't be the party standard-bearer during the 2008 general election, Collins begins with the edge. But Democrats will come after her aggressively, and she must expect a difficult contest.

City Council Race Shows Changed Face Of Beverly Hills (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. -- When voters here go to the polls tomorrow, Jimmy Delshad is a favorite to be re-elected to the City Council. Under the city's system, he would also become mayor -- the first Iranian-born mayor of this glitzy city, known around the world more for its palm trees and movie stars than its sizable Jewish Iranian-American population.

At a time when tension between the U.S. and Iranian governments is on the rise, Mr. Delshad, a 66-year-old Jewish immigrant, is on the brink of becoming one of the highest-ranking Iranian-American elected officials in the U.S. So what are some of the political issues he feels most passionate about? Traffic-light timing, reducing sprinkler-water use at local parks and even beautifying the city's alleys.

"I want to make Beverly Hills one of the safest cities in the nation, in order to protect our residents and visitors," Mr. Delshad said in a recent interview. "Oh, and free wireless too."

Roughly 8,000 of the approximately 35,000 residents of Beverly Hills are of Iranian descent -- an influx that began in earnest nearly 30 years ago after the fall of the shah of Iran and has fundamentally changed one of America's most iconic cities. The sensitivity of the situation was underscored recently when the city, for the first time, printed its entire ballot in English and Farsi -- a move that prompted an outpouring of complaints, including a number from Iranian-Americans. (See a sample ballot.1)

See Beverly Hills' new English-Farsi ballot2.

DOJ_NMG_0139655

Six candidates in tomorrow's election will be vying for two seats on the Beverly Hills City Council. Three are Persian. Mr. Delshad -- who changed his first name to Jimmy from Jamshid when he became a U.S. citizen -- first won election to the City Council in 2003. If re-elected, he would become mayor; council members rotate the job each year, based on seniority.

While Mr. Delshad effectively mobilized the Persian community to vote in larger numbers than ever before during his 2003 campaign, he has said this race should be tougher. As an incumbent, he has received the endorsement of both of the city's local newspapers. However, in a small city like Beverly Hills, which traditionally sees a low voter turnout, results can be unexpected.

A former computer entrepreneur, Mr. Delshad says he's not fazed by seeking a high-profile role at a time when the U.S. and Iran are facing off on the world stage. "It doesn't keep me up at night," he says. "This is the bed I made and I'm going to sleep in it." A registered Democrat, Mr. Delshad declined to comment on the global issues surrounding Iran.

He prefers to focus on challenges facing other small-town mayors, like traffic congestion and development. But because Beverly Hills is so prominent, he's also keenly interested in securing the city against possible terrorist strikes. He wants to increase video surveillance in public spaces and continue to add license-plate scanners to police vehicles.

At times, he has worried for his own safety. In 2003, during his first City Council campaign, Mr. Delshad hired three bodyguards after he received written death threats in his native Farsi language. He also carried a panic button that could summon local police. He says he never knew who was behind the threats or why he received them, but he kept the bodyguards for a few months even after he was elected.

While there have been other Iranian-born candidates for public office, Mr. Delshad's election would be a watershed, says Trita Parsi, president of the National Iranian American Council, in Washington. "This is a man with long ties in the community who has risen through the process," Dr. Parsi says. Mr. Delshad has lived in the U.S. nearly 50 years, the last 18 in Beverly Hills.

The demographics of today's Beverly Hills are a far cry from days past. Early residents included Douglas Fairbanks and Mary Pickford who built their "Pickfair" mansion here in 1919; Charlie Chaplin, Gloria Swanson and Buster Keaton also called the city home. Its first honorary mayor was humorist Will Rogers.

Hollywood stars and executive moguls still live here today. But beginning with the Islamic Revolution in 1979, thousands of Iranians -- most of them Jewish -- immigrated to the city and over the next few years sent for relatives. Once here, the immigrants retained strong family bonds and connections, often keeping them from integrating into the larger community, Mr. Delshad and others say.

Disputes have surfaced in zoning battles over so-called "Persian Palaces," large homes decorated in a sometimes gaudy style that some said clashed with the surroundings. The city found compromises, some brokered by Mr. Delshad. In 2004, the city passed an ordinance that greatly restricted the proliferation of such structures, by offering specific design choices and a review board for new homes.

The split in the community was nowhere more evident than at Sinai Temple, a 101-year-old conservative Jewish congregation a few blocks west of city limits. Today, Persian members account for nearly half of its 1,900 families, says its rabbi, David Wolpe. The influx of Persian families caused tensions and some longtime congregants left the temple. Everyone else self-segregated, sitting on opposite sides of the aisle, he says.

In 1999, Mr. Delshad was elected president of the temple, which he says may be the first time an Iranian-American has led a temple founded and previously run by European Jews. "Jimmy's presidency here was a way of saying that you can have a Persian president of an American synagogue and the sky doesn't fall," says Mr. Wolpe.

Today, both he and Mr. Delshad say, assimilation of the cultures has reduced the tensions at the temple and in Beverly Hills. "The fact that Persians have been in the community for many years now and have issues they're concerned with -- things like their kids and zoning issues -- requires them to get more involved in things that affect their lives," Mr. Wolpe adds.

Mr. Delshad, born in the southern Iranian city of Shiraz, came to the U.S. in 1958, following his brother, then a college student, to Mankato, Minn. Their father, a jeweler and goldsmith in Iran, would later join his sons in the U.S.

Mr. Delshad took university-extension courses and worked as a janitor to make ends meet. He and two brothers eventually formed the "Delshad Trio" playing the santur, a Persian string instrument. They moved to Los Angeles's growing Iranian community, playing music as they put themselves through college.

After graduating with a degree in electrical engineering, Mr. Delshad joined a fledgling computer firm. For about two decades, he ran his own computer-hardware company, which he sold in 1999, when he became president of the temple. Married 38 years, he is the father of two grown children.

The recent dustup over the Farsi ballot demonstrated that, despite strides the Iranian community has made, its presence can still be a lightning rod. City Hall has received about 300 complaints since absentee ballots went to voters at the beginning of last month, says Byron Pope, the city's clerk, who decided to translate the ballots into Farsi. (A separate Spanish ballot is available, too.) Mr. Pope says he made the move in consultation with an outside election-services firm and was complying with the federal Voting Rights Act, which says that a jurisdiction that has more than 5% of its voting-age population in "a single language group" should have a ballot available in that language. In the 2005 city election, some information was translated into Farsi, but not the entire ballot, he says.

DOJ_NMG_0139656

For Mr. Delshad, the ballot issue was a "blip that most people have gotten over." Traffic, he says, is the true Beverly Hills issue of the day.

Justice Restored (WP)

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

IT ATTRACTED little notice, but Virginia's legislature took a big step last month toward reforming the antediluvian rules that make adequate legal representation a pipe dream for many poor defendants in serious criminal cases.

Alone among states, Virginia until now has set ironclad caps on the fees paid to court-appointed defense attorneys, caps that cannot be waived under any circumstances, even by judges. The capped fees are so low that often the effect is to force defense lawyers to work for peanuts or discourage them from working enough, in all but the most open-and-shut cases.

For instance, a court-appointed lawyer representing an indigent client facing life in prison would be paid a maximum of just $1,235, even if the case went to trial and dragged on for weeks, requiring scores or hundreds of hours of legal work. In less serious felony cases, capped compensation is even more ludicrous: $445 for attorneys representing poor defendants facing prison terms of up to 20 years. (The exception is death penalty cases, which are not subject to a cap.)

This sorry state of affairs is shockingly common because a large majority of criminal defendants cannot afford legal representation and about half live in jurisdictions without public defender offices and must rely on court-appointed lawyers.

After years of shrugging off the problem, the General Assembly finally addressed it last month, thanks to the bipartisan efforts of Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat, and Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell, a Republican. With scarcely a murmur of opposition, lawmakers approved a measure to raise the caps for court-appointed lawyers handling adult felony cases -- and, far more significantly, to allow the caps to be waived with judicial approval.

The legislation is not perfect and would benefit from amendments that Mr. Kaine ought to offer. Under the bill as written, the no-waiver rule would remain for cases involving defendants under the age of 18 if they are tried in juvenile court, as well as for misdemeanor cases in district courts. In both instances it is possible to imagine scenarios under which the fee caps now in place would discourage court-appointed lawyers from mounting vigorous defenses.

What's more, real reform is still at least a year off as a matter of practice. Since the courts could not determine the probable cost of the higher caps and waivers, lawmakers appropriated an extra $8 million, a token amount; the understanding is that fee data collected under the new rules in the coming year will allow for a more precise estimate of actual costs and a more realistic appropriation.

As Mr. McDonnell pointed out, any justice system will not work unless both sides of a criminal case are represented by competent, fairly compensated attorneys. Until now too many defendants in Virginia were denied that basic right. Now, at least, there is the real prospect of a fix.

Bush Poised To Counter Chávez (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon And Matt Moffett

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

President Bush travels to Latin America this week to take on Hugo Chávez's militant brand of economic populism. But the weakened U.S. president could spend much of the trip defending against charges his own economic policies have helped shortchange the region.

In a speech in Washington today, Mr. Bush is expected to lay out a central theme of his Latin America tour -- that democracy is key to improving life for the millions of working poor in the region. As an example, he is expected to cite the Millennium Challenge Account, a U.S. government-sponsored program set up in 2004 to channel aid to poor countries that meet certain democratic standards. During his trip, which begins Thursday, he also is expected to tout an agreement with Brazil to spread production of ethanol throughout the region, as a way of promoting greater prosperity -- and countering the influence of Venezuelan President Chavez's oil wealth.

Mr. Bush's message seeks to respond to widespread complaints in the region that globalization and international-development policies -- of which he is viewed by many there as a main champion -- have done little to improve the lives of ordinary people there. The president also hopes to use the democracy theme to push back against what he views as Mr. Chávez's authoritarian tendencies.

Mr. Bush won't venture into any countries that have moved into Mr. Chávez's sphere of influence, including Argentina, Bolivia, Ecuador and Nicaragua. Instead, he plans during his weeklong trip to visit five generally friendly countries: Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0139657

Mr. Chávez and his allies are preparing a typical street-theater response to Mr. Bush's visit. Argentina's President Nestor Kirchner has invited Mr. Chávez to a public demonstration, most likely in Buenos Aires, that probably will coincide with Mr. Bush's visit to neighboring Uruguay at the end of the week .

Mr. Chávez has also been talking up confrontation with Mr. Bush on his daily radio program. He has alleged that Mr. Bush will use his latest trip to weaken the South American common market, known as Mercosur, that Mr. Chávez wants to use to promote trade and investment ties among members and to counteract U.S. dominance in the region. Besides Venezuela, Mercosur's members include Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay and Paraguay.

In Brazil, labor unions and social groups plan protests against Mr. Bush. Demonstrations are likely in Venezuela and elsewhere in the region.

Mr. Chávez has his own problems. Many in Latin America view the Venezuelan leader as a meddler with militaristic tendencies. A regionwide poll taken in December by the Latinobarometro firm of Santiago, Chile, found that 39% of Latin Americans viewed both Messrs. Bush and Chávez negatively -- a level of disapproval exceeded among the region's leaders only by Cuba's Fidel Castro, Mr. Chávez's ally and mentor.

The prospect of further conflict between Messrs. Bush and Chávez threatens to distract from the U.S. president's efforts to rebuild ties to the region, which have suffered given the U.S. focus on terrorism and the Middle East.

The most important stop for Mr. Bush may be Brazil, the largest Latin economy, where he is scheduled to meet with President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva. In São Paulo, South America's biggest city, Mr. Bush is expected to take a firsthand look at the region's poverty, underscoring his concern for economic development.

Mr. Bush aims to accelerate his drive for alternative fuels by announcing a partnership with Brazil to broaden the global market for ethanol. The plan envisions production across Latin America and the Caribbean, as well as greater standardization. Mr. da Silva is expected to seek lower U.S. tariffs on Brazil's sugar-based ethanol, but prospects of that are slim in Congress.

Beyond ethanol, Mr. Bush "wants to maintain [Mr. da Silva] as a mediator in Latin America and a counterweight to Chávez," said Gilberto Dupas, a specialist in international relations at the University of São Paulo. Despite Brazil's strong trade ties and cordial relations with Venezuela, Brazilians blame Mr. Chávez for encouraging Bolivian President Evo Morales to announce the nationalization of the country's oil industry last year.

Mr. Bush's next stop, Uruguay, could give him another wedge against Mr. Chávez and Mercosur. The U.S. has been seeking a free-trade agreement with Uruguay, and Mercosur would have to ease its rules to allow Uruguay to remain a member, if it strikes a deal with the U.S.

Mr. Bush is expected to get a warm reception in Colombia, where he is relatively popular. That is due largely to Plan Colombia, a U.S. military- and social-assistance program started under the Clinton administration.

In Guatemala, Mr. Bush is expected to toast early benefits of the Central American Free Trade Agreement, a regional, tariff-reducing pact ratified by Congress in 2005, as well as the country's progress toward building a democracy.

In Mexico, the country with the closest ties to the U.S., Mr. Bush is set to meet with recently inaugurated Mexican leader Felipe Calderón to discuss such sensitive issues as immigration. Hoping to nudge U.S. immigration reform, Mr. Calderón introduced a plan Tuesday aimed at providing better treatment to the Central Americans who come through Mexico's southern border.

Analysts said Mr. Calderón is likely to use the initiative to show that progress can be made on bilateral issues facing the U.S. and Mexico. That, in turn, could help Mr. Bush persuade Congress to pass a comprehensive immigration-reform bill that includes a guest-worker provision.

Chavez Calls Envoy 'Professional Killer' (AP)

By Elizabeth M. Nunez

AP, March 5, 2007

President Hugo Chavez on Sunday said he believes enemies including the CIA are out to kill him, and called U.S. diplomat John Negroponte a "professional killer."

Chavez said Venezuelan officials have intelligence that associates of jailed Cuban anti-communist militant Luis Posada Carriles also are involved in plotting to assassinate him.

He said the death plot idea has "gained weight" due to various factors, including the recent appointment of Negroponte, the former director of national intelligence, as deputy to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"Who did they swear in ... there at the White House as deputy secretary of state? A professional killer: John Negroponte," Chavez said.

DOJ_NMG_0139658

Chavez did not elaborate, but his government has previously accused Negroponte of playing a key role in the Contra war against the leftist Sandinista government of Nicaragua when he served as ambassador to Honduras — a haven for clandestine Contra bases — from 1981 to 1985.

U.S. Embassy officials could not immediately be reached for comment, but they have denied Chavez's repeated accusations that they are plotting to oust him.

Chavez was asked about reports of assassination plots during a televised interview.

"They have assigned special units of the CIA, true assassins, who go around not only here in Venezuela, in Central America, in South America," Chavez said, without elaborating.

He added that while Posada Carriles, a former CIA operative, remains jailed in the U.S. on immigration charges, "Posada Carriles' people are very active in Central America and searching for contacts in Venezuela ... They are going around searching for explosives in large quantities, thinking about a sort of car bombing or searching for ground-to-air missiles, thinking about the presidential plane."

Chavez did not give details. His government has demanded that the U.S. extradite Posada Carriles, a naturalized Venezuelan, to stand trial for allegedly masterminding the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner that killed 73 people. Posada Carriles denies involvement in that incident.

Chávez's Oil Largesse Winning Fans Abroad (CSM)

By Sara Miller Llana And Mark Rice-Oxley

The Christian Science Monitor, March 5, 2007

The London bus has come to symbolize many things over the years. It's a national icon, a picture postcard paragon of public transport, a byword for frustration and irregularity.

But a harbinger of international socialism? Far-fetched perhaps, but less so after the latest move by Venezuela's President Hugo Chávez to offer cut-rate fuel so that 250,000 Londoners on welfare can travel half-price throughout one of the world's most expensive cities.

The double-decker trademark isn't the only trace of Mr. Chávez's so-called "21st century socialism:" For the past year residents in New York, Boston, and other major US cities have scored cheaper heating bills, thanks to Venezuela. Chávez has also sent cheap oil to Cuba, Nicaragua, and more than a dozen other countries.

His offerings go beyond oil and have been announced with particular frenzy since he won a third term in December, promising $500 million in financing for Ecuador, $135 million for a dairy cooperative in Argentina, and a development plan in Nicaragua that includes generators to ease blackouts as well as a new development bank.

Analysts say his projects both in Latin America and beyond are singular among leaders sitting on vast energy reserves, as Chávez sets out to create a counterbalance to US dominance with a flurry of deals, measures, gifts, and grandiose schemes. To his harshest critics he's an egomaniac using an "energy bribe" to inflate his reputation. To fans he's the consummate humanitarian. Both agree that his moves have amounted to a PR coup, and some analysts even say the fallout could lead to a shift in social, economic, and political balances across the region.

"By situating Venezuela in these various international arenas of cooperation, the Chávez government is also attempting to limit what the US can do to isolate Venezuela," says Miguel Tinker-Salas, a Latin America oil and politics expert at Pomona College in California.

Certainly, providing subsidized oil to help residents pay bills and access public transportation has raised his visibility, cloaking him in the role of benefactor, says Larry Birns, director of the left- leaning Council on Hemispheric Affairs in Washington. "I think that these actions have projected an image for the average Latin American of great good will."

That has put pressure on other Latin American leaders, such as Brazil's Lula da Silva, for example. "I could easily see Lula throwing up his hands over Chávez's antics, but Lula regularly goes to Caracas hugging Chávez because he needs that for domestic consumption," says Mr. Birns.

It is this type of "demonstration effect," as Mr. Tinker-Salas calls it, that could ultimately prove lasting in the region and beyond.

In the US, Venezuela is sending oil subsidized at a 40 percent discount from the delivery price to 16 states – double from the year before – as well as 163 native American tribes. That represents 100 million gallons of fuel this winter. The program brochure describes it this way: "This is a people-to-people program that comes from the heart of Venezuela to the homes of American families who just can't pay their energy bills."

"In New York, residents wonder why a foreign country has to provide this. They want to know, 'Why can't you provide it? Or BP and Shell?' " says Tinker-Salas. "It's highlighting what those countries are not doing for their own populations."

DOJ_NMG_0139659

That was the sentiment in November in a neighborhood called Las Torres, one of the poorest in Nicaragua's capital, Managua, which has been plagued by blackouts over the past year. "Light? Of course not," says Flor de Maria Flores, who regularly lights her home by candle, and, like so many of her neighbors, cooks over an open fire. She was vaguely aware of Chávez's plan to send discounted oil to her nation to help ease power blackout problems. "I'm glad someone is doing something about it," she says.

Chávez's latest scheme, signed by London's leftist mayor Ken Livingstone on Feb. 20, will save the city $32 million a year. In return, London transport chiefs will visit Caracas next month to advise on traffic management and urban planning. "The agreement with Venezuela is to use the energy cost contribution to alleviate the impact of high energy costs for some of the poorest Londoners," says a spokesperson for Mayor Livingstone.

But critics have questioned the logic of the deal. "I find it strange that the capital of a G-8 country is effectively receiving foreign aid from a poor country," says Richard Barnes, a Livingstone opponent in the Greater London Assembly. "Thirty-eight percent of [Venezuela's] people live below the poverty line and here [Venezuela] is subsidizing London's poor."

London joins a growing list of locales receiving Chávez largesse. Venezuela's oil has gone to at least 18 nations. Cheap oil is sent to needy Caribbean nations as part of Chávez's Petrocaribe initiative. Recently he pledged to send Nicaragua 10,000 barrels of discounted oil and oil products a day.

In its most obvious defiance against the US, Venezuela sends 100,000 barrels of oil a day to Cuba at subsidized rates. The projects go beyond oil. Venezuela gave Argentina $2.5 billion to pay off its debt to the International Monetary Fund (IMF) last year, and promised to help Bolivia to continue nationalizing key industries.

Programs strike a chord with the poor

Chávez's programs, especially in Latin America, have tapped into a widespread disenchantment with the free-market policies championed throughout most of the region in the past couple decades, a sentiment reflected by the recent electoral wins of Chávez allies, including longtime US foe Daniel Ortega in Nicaragua, Rafael Correa in Ecuador, and Evo Morales in Bolivia.

"I think that there has been significant erosion of US-Latin American dependence, psychological as well as actual dependence, on the US," says Birns.

Yet some say that his influence is overestimated. "He needs the US more than the US needs him," says Gal Luft, co-director of the conservative Institute for the Analysis of Global Security in Washington, an energy security think tank. "I don't think we should scare ourselves to death by what Hugo Chávez is doing," he says pointing out that Venezuela is the fourth biggest supplier of US crude imports.

An 'energy bribe'?

Mr. Luft dubs Chávez's moves an "energy bribe" and says that most leaders will leave his side when he runs out of money. "There is a great game going on now in Latin America, in which he is trying to pour a little oil money into every one of the chess squares," says Luft. "If someone offers you a gift, it's hard to turn down. Hugo Chávez does all kinds of things that make a lot of headlines but at the end of the day everyone knows who he is."

In fact, his popularity may have surged in pockets where residents are direct beneficiaries of his aid, but overall his popularity has not changed dramatically. According to a regional survey in late 2006 by Latinobarometro, a polling firm in Chile, respondents grouped Chávez, Cuba's Fidel Castro, and President Bush all as bad leaders.

Chávez's reputation also took a blow last fall when he failed to win a seat on the UN Security Council despite fierce lobbying, after he called President Bush "the devil" at the United Nations.

Michael Shifter, the vice president for policy at the Inter-American Dialogue in Washington who is coming out with a report this week on the challenges the Chávez administration poses to US policy makers, says that Chávez is able to point out what is wrong with Latin America, but his direction is not necessarily a solution. "He offers a seductive project, and his appeal is totally understandable. His gift is to tap into ... this resentment toward the US, which has a real basis," says Shifter. "But I don't think Chávez has an answer to the problems either."

U.S. To Offer North Korea Face-Saving Nuclear Plan (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 4 — In an effort to make the best of newly murky intelligence about North Korea, Bush administration officials say they plan to tell the North's nuclear negotiators on Monday that Washington's doubts about how much progress the country has made in enriching uranium gives North Korea a face-saving way to surrender its nuclear equipment.

The new approach to solve a dispute over the existence and extent of a uranium program, which intelligence agencies say could have been developed using equipment that the North Koreans purchased from Pakistan, will come at a meeting with North

DOJ_NMG_0139660

Korea at the United Nations. It is the first session intended to hammer out a schedule under which North Korea is supposed to disable its main nuclear plant and then account for all its nuclear programs.

Because the agreement includes providing North Korea with a million tons of fuel oil before it turns over its suspected arsenal of nuclear arms and fuel, some of President Bush's conservative allies have denounced it as a dangerous concession. Mr. Bush has called it a "first step," though it bears similarities to the kind of deal that the administration rejected in its first term.

On Sunday, Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, said that at the meeting he planned to "form an agenda to work on our bilateral relationship — what's involved in the establishment of diplomatic relations, what's involved before North Korea can get off the state-sponsor-of-terrorism list, and how to get them off the Trading with the Enemies Act." He said he would be "pressing for disclosure of all their nuclear programs, including highly enriched uranium."

Persuading North Korea to address that program will be particularly challenging — both because the North Koreans have denied seeking to enrich uranium and because a top American intelligence official told Congress last week that there was only moderate confidence that the equipment North Korea bought had been used. But that ambiguity, officials say, may give North Korea the chance to turn over its equipment with a vague explanation that an effort to produce energy, rather than a bomb, did not work out.

That is a very different tone than intelligence officials struck in November 2002, just after American officials told the North Koreans that they had discovered evidence of the purchase of centrifuges, the high-speed devices that enrich uranium, from Abdul Qadeer Khan, the head of Pakistan's nuclear program.

In an unclassified, single-page report distributed to members of Congress at the time, top agency officials, headed by George J. Tenet, then the director of the Central Intelligence Agency, reported, "We recently learned that the North is constructing a plant that could produce enough weapons-grade uranium for two or more nuclear weapons per year when fully operational — which could be as soon as mid-decade."

On Friday, three days after the testimony of Joseph DeTrani, the North Korea coordinator for the director of national intelligence, suggesting doubts about the current state of the program, Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan and the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, sent a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates seeking more answers.

"Is this still the intelligence community's assessment?" he asked of the 2002 report. "If not, why, and when did the intelligence community revise this assessment? What is the current intelligence community assessment?"

He also asked what underlay the conclusion that an enrichment plant was under construction.

US, North Korea Begin Thaw In Relations (AFP)

AFP, March 5, 2007

Landmark US-North Korea talks on normalizing relations were to get underway Monday amid questions in Washington over whether US intelligence had exaggerated Pyongyang's nuclear threat.

US officials were cautioning that the talks in New York are only a small first step towards establishing diplomatic ties and that North Korea needs to meet a series of denuclearization benchmarks in order to end a half century of enmity between the two states.

Washington's chief negotiator, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, and his North Korean counterpart, Kim Kye-gwan, will kick off the meetings with a dinner Monday night at a New York hotel and then hold a full day of talks on Tuesday, US officials said.

The talks come as the International Atomic Energy Agency said the UN atomic watchdog's chief Mohamed ElBaradei will travel to North Korea on March 13 to discuss how to monitor its promised dismantling of nuclear facilities.

"The plan is for Dr. ElBaradei to arrive in Beijing on March 12 and leave for North Korea on the 13th for a two-day visit," spokeswoman Melissa Fleming said.

The bilateral talks between Washington and Pyongyang meet a long-standing condition set by the reclusive communist regime for abandoning its nuclear ambitions, and could bring the two sides the closest ever since Korea was divided in the wake of World War II.

But they come amid controversy in Washington over whether US intelligence agencies overstated Pyongyang's alleged secret uranium enrichment program in 2002, and whether the agencies' ability to provide information on the North is adequate and reliable.

"We still don't have the intelligence community overall to give us, as policymakers, the information that we need to make good decisions in North Korea, Iran and other places," Republican Representative Peter Hoekstra said Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0139661

"You always make policy with imprecise information, but you know, there are some things that we've been disappointed with," he told the Fox News Sunday program.

"It's a concern about the leadership in the intelligence community, not the folks who are working this 24/7," Hoekstra added.

The talks Monday come as part of the six-nation deal reached February 13 to end North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

Under the multi-phase agreement, North Korea said it would shut down its main nuclear facility and begin steps towards giving up its nuclear weapons program in exchange for some 300 million dollars in aid and moves towards "full diplomatic relations" with the US.

While the rapid start to those normalization talks took many by surprise -- in 2002 President George W. Bush branded North Korea part of the "axis of evil" -- US officials stressed that the talks would yield no breakthroughs.

"Don't look at it as a meeting that's going to produce immediate results," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack last week.

He said the talks were more likely to focus on "organizational" issues like setting a framework and agenda for what are hoped will be ongoing discussions.

But observers of Bush administration foreign policy said this week's meetings turned an important page for Washington.

"In and of itself the meeting Monday is historic," said Joseph Cirincione, a North Korea and non-proliferation expert at the Center for American Progress.

Cirincione said the talks showed that, "In the end, the relationship with the US matters more to the North Koreans than their nuclear weapons."

But amid US lawmakers there was lingering concern over whether Washington could obtain enough and reliable information about what the Koreans are up to.

Last week Joseph DeTrani, the North Korea mission manager for the Directorate of National Intelligence told a Congress panel that US spy agencies are less confident now than they were in 2002 about accusations that Pyongyang was secretly enriching uranium.

"We still have confidence that the program is in existence -- at the mid-confidence level," told the US Senate Armed Services Committee.

The US accusations in 2002 that the North was running a secret uranium program, in addition to its declared plutonium-based nuclear operation, led to the collapse of a 1994 denuclearization deal with Pyongyang.

Subsequent tit-for-tat actions led to Pyongyang's atomic bomb test in October 2006, a move that some officials say might have been avoided.

On Sunday De Trani complained in a written statement about "considerable misinterpretation" of what he had told the panel.

"We have continued to assess efforts by North Korea since 2002," he said. "All intelligence community agencies have at least moderate confidence that North Korea's past efforts to acquire a uranium enrichment capability continue today."

N. Korea: Intelligence And Uncertainty (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh And Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, March 5, 2007

Intel analysis is an art, not a science—and one that sometimes depends on the politics of the moment. Last week the government's senior North Korea intel analyst, Joseph DeTrani, told Congress that American officials now had only "midlevel confidence" in the same intel that led the Bush administration to assert in 2002 the North was actively "enriching" uranium—and could have a bomb-making plant up and running soon. During a confrontation with Pyongyang officials in October 2002 over the North's secret program, the then Assistant Secretary of State Jim Kelly says he actually had little certainty. He told NEWSWEEK last week that the North Koreans themselves "gave no specifics about what kind of program they had." According to several current and former administration officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter, Kelly knew that Pyongyang was buying equipment for some 20 centrifuges from Pakistan in return for shipping Nodong missiles. He also had some tentative intel that the North Koreans might be building a factory. But "I don't think it was known then and apparently it's not known now what they've done with this stuff they've bought," Kelly said. The rest was creative interpretation, especially a CIA assessment to Congress that said the North was building a plant to make weapons-grade uranium that could be "fully operational" by "mid-decade."

DOJ_NMG_0139662

Now, post-Iraq, the intel community is more cautious. And with the administration eager to pursue an aid-for-nukes agreement with Kim Jong Il, there's less interest in putting the worst possible spin on what is known. CIA spokesman Paul Gimigliano says the agency stands by its earlier assessment, saying "the classified assessments ... contain far more detail."

Kim Jong Il's Word (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

North Korean officials arrived in New York over the weekend for discussions on normalizing relations with the U.S. as part of the nuclear disarmament accord struck last month. Chief U.S. negotiator Christopher Hill is scheduled to meet today and tomorrow with his counterpart, Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan.

May we suggest that, before he sits down, Mr. Hill take a look at the brief statement issued quietly Thursday by the United Nations Development Program (UNDP). There is no better guide to Kim Jong Il's negotiating style, nor to the North Korean dictator's habit of breaking his word. Nuclear negotiators, beware.

The agency announced, in an item on its Web site, that it is suspending all operations in North Korea because the "necessary conditions set out by the Executive Board on 25 January 2007 have not been met." The UNDP's 20 or so projects will be shut down, we're told, and its eight international staffers will be pulled out of the country. The U.N. isn't known for its tough love, and no one we've talked to can recall another example of the UNDP suspending operations in a country that refused to comply with the regulations.

The "necessary conditions" were imposed at the last board meeting in response to an outcry over the UNDP's lack of oversight over its programs in North Korea. U.N. documents, produced reluctantly after prodding by the U.S. mission to the U.N., showed numerous irregularities dating back into the late 1990s. Tens of millions of dollars for programs that were supposed to help the poor appear instead to have been handed over to Kim's dictatorship.

As the March 1 deadline for compliance approached, North Korea decided to throw a tantrum to see if it could get excused from its obligations. It deemed the conditions politically motivated -- especially the one that limits aid to programs that directly help the people and bans assistance that could aid the government -- and demanded a renegotiation.

Never mind that North Korea sits on the Executive Board and had agreed to abide by the terms thrashed out in January. To its credit, the UNDP refused to be bullied into extending the deadline and is holding Pyongyang to its commitments. The suspension applies to all existing projects; the board had already suspended new projects until an audit could be completed and better oversight provided.

The U.N. has another deadline fast approaching in North Korea. At the end of January, Secretary General Ban Ki Moon ordered a full investigation of all U.N. programs in North Korea, to be completed within three months. Those include Unicef, the World Food Program and the U.N. Population Fund. As the end-of-April deadline for that audit comes closer, it will be instructive to watch Pyongyang's degree of cooperation.

Meanwhile, the talks on North Korea's nuclear program are moving ahead, with the U.S., South Korea and Japan all holding bilateral meetings with Pyongyang this month toward the goal of normalizing relations. At the top of Japan's agenda is the whereabouts of its citizens who were kidnapped by North Korean agents in the late 1970s and 1980s and forced to train North Korean spies. Negotiations with Pyongyang have so far yielded the return of only five abductees along with preposterous explanations for how the rest have supposedly died.

The preference in some diplomatic circles, including the U.S. State Department and perhaps now in the White House, is to dismiss the U.N. corruption in North Korea as well as the abductee and other human-rights violations as side-issues to the more vital objective of getting Kim to give up his nuclear program.

We'd argue that international focus on these issues is an essential part of keeping up the pressure on Kim's regime. But even if you buy the argument that these are ancillary issues, there's still an important lesson here: If Kim won't abide by the pledges he made regarding UNDP aid to his country, how can he be expected to keep his promises on nuclear disarmament?

